4thly, In allowing him a free honourable trial upon an Indictment, first found upon oath by the grand jury, and then suffering him to take not only his particular challenges by the poll to every of the jurors returned, upon a voyre dire (not formerly heard of, yet allowed him, as reasonable, to take away all colour of partiality or non indifference in the jurors,) whereupon every jury-man was examined before he was sworn of the jury, Whether he had contributed or advanced any monies upon the propositions for Ireland, or was to have any share in the rebels lands in Ireland by act of parliament or otherwise? But likewise in permitting him to take his peremptory challenge to 35 of the 42 jurors returned, without any particular cause alledged; which liberty our laws (f) allowing men in favorem vite, and because there may be private causes of just exceptions to them known to the prisoner, not fit to be revealed, or for which he wants present proof, and that in cases of high-treason as well as of felony, the court thought just and equal to allow the same to him, though a notorious Irish rebel. Wherefore it ought much more to be allowed to all English freemen less peccant, and not so notoriously guilty as this transcendant traitor; the debarring the party indicted of his lawful challenges, being to debar him of a principal matter concerning his trial, yea a means to take away his life without just cause or guilt; much more than a trial by such jurors, committees, commissioners, or other judges nominated by persons interested, or parties, without the denomination or direction of sworn officers of justice alone, against the course of the common law, as the statute of 11 H. 4, c. 9. and Coke's 3 Instit. p. 32, 33, resolve.

In this argument the readers, especially Irish students of the law, may take notice; first, of some observable passages and records (g) touching the settling of the laws and great charter of England in Ireland, the endenization of Irish natives to make them capable of the laws and liberties of the English there; the statutes, peers of Ireland, and the trial of peers there for treasons, not obvious in other law-books; to which I at first intended to have added an appendix of the most remarkable passages in our histories, and chiefest records in the Tower relating to the sovereign jurisdiction of the kings and parliaments of England over Ireland, and to the parliaments, officers, government, and affairs thereof, not hitherto published, and unknown to most, of very necessary and excellent use. Which being over-large for an appendix, I must reserve for a particular treatise by themselves; or joined with some other records and histories relating unto Scotland, most worthy of public view, if God send health and opportunity to communicate them to posterity. Only I shall here insert one pertinent record to manifest, that the trying of Irish malefactors in England, the binding them to appear, the recording their defaults and giving judgment against them for not appearing here for murders, robberies, and felonies committed or acted by them in Ireland, is no novelty (having omitted it in my argument) it being in use in the ninth year of king John, as this patent manifests.

2dly. The readers may herein discern the treacheries, conspiracies, insurrections, rebellions of the native Irish, in all ages, since their submission to king Henry the 2d, A. D. 1171, and their swearing of fealty to him and his heirs, for ever as to their lawful kings and lords, recorded at large in our historians, (i) towards our kings and English nation, and their frequent endeavours utterly to cast off their dominion, and extirpate them out of Ireland, which is notably expressed in many of our records, as Claus. 5 E. 3, part 2. m. 12, dorso. and fullest description of it, and its conquest, and of the manners, qualities of the Irish; of any of our Historians, gives this character of them and their deportment towards the English in that age; 'Præ omni alia gente proditiōibus semper insistent; fidem datam nemini servant, fidei et sacramenti religionem quam sibi semper servari summopere volunt, aliis præstitam quotidie violare nec verecundantur, nec verentur: unde et cum cautelas omnes observaveris et adhibueris, cum securitati et indemnitati tuæ tam sacramentis et obsidibus, quam amicitii firmiter junctis, et beneficiis multimodè collatis, modis omnibus invigilaveris, tunc primo timendum est tibi: quia tunc præcipue ipsorum vigilat malitia, cum ex securitatis abundantia te tibi præsenferint invigilare: Tum demum ad arcem nequitie, tum ad assueta fallaciæ tela confugiant, ut sumpta securitatis occasione lædere valeant vel improvisum.' (k) He subjoins, 'Inter alia multa artis iniquæ figmenta, hoc unum habent tanquam præcipuum argumentum: (and O that too many English as well as Irish were not guilty of this transcendent treachery and hypocrisy!) 'sub religionis et pacis obtentu ad sacrum aliquem locum conveniunt cum eo quem oppetere cupiunt: primo compaternatis fœdera jungunt: Deinde ter circa ecclesiam se invicem portant; postmodum ecclesiam intrantes coram altari reliquiis sanctorum, sacramentis multisfariè præstitis, demum missæ celebratione, et orationibus sanctorum sacerdotum tanquam dispensatione quadam, indissolubiliter fœderantur. Ad ultimum vero ad majorem amicitie confirmationem, et quasi negotii consummationem sanguinem sponte ad hoc fusum, uterque alterius bibit. Hoc autem de ritu gentilium adhuc habent, qui sanguinem in fœderalibus fœderibus uti solent.' O quoties in ipso desponsationis hujus articulo a viris sanguinum et dolosis, tam dolose et inique funditur sanguis, ut alteruter penitus maneat exanguis! O quoties eadem hora et in continent, vel sequitur, vel prævenit, vel etiam inaudito more sanguinolentum divortium ipsum interumpit desponsationem! 'Adeo proditiōnis pestis hic invaluit et quasi radices pouit, adeo in naturam converti prævalet prave consuetudinis longus abusus, adeo a convicto more formantur, et qui tangit picem con inquinabitur ab ea, adeo mali vis magna est, quod etiam advenæ eodem vitio inquinati sunt.' He adds in another place, 'Ad resistendum Anglis, et antiquæ libertatis sub capiti discriminine jura tuendum, unanimi voto conspirant. Et ut hunc plenius affectum deducere possint ad effectum, vinctis undique fœderibus, de novo fiunt ex hinc amici qui antea fuerunt inimici.' (l) All which we find verified of them in this last rebellion and massacre of the English, for which this prisoner was indicted and executed: so as we may well conclude of the Irish in his ensuing words. 'Nationis subdola

3dly. The readers may here in part discern, by whom, and in what manner the laws of England were first established in Ireland, and how far, and to what persons there: to which I shall add this passage of Mat. Paris, (n) A. D. 1172, touching K. Henry the 2nd, his settling our laws there. 'Rex Pater antequam ab Hybernia rediret apud Lissemor Concilium congregavit, Ubi Leges Angliæ ab omnibus sunt grante acceptæ, et juratoria cautione præstita, confirmatæ.' With that of Sylvester Giraldus, (o) who reciting the constitutions made at the council of Cassilis in Ireland under this king Henry for the government of the church, and reformation of the manners of the Irish, there recorded at large, concludes thus. 'Itaque omnia divina ad instar sacrosanctæ Ecclesiæ Juxta quod Anglicana observat Ecclesia in omnibus partibus Hyberniæ amodo tractantur. Dignum etenim et justissimum est, ut sicut Dominum et regem ex Anglia, sortita est divinitus Hybernia, sic etiam exinde viveendi formam recipiant meliorem. Ipsi namque Regi magnifico tam Ecclesia quam Regnum Hyberniæ debent, quicquid de bono pacis, et incremento Religionis habentus est assecuta.' After which the Irish rebelling, and casting off the English laws, king John (p) A. D. 1211, arriving at Dublin with a great army; 'Occurrerunt ei ibidem plusquam viginti Reguli illius Regionis, qui omnes timore maximo perterriti, homagium illi et fidelitatem fecerunt: Fecit quoque Rex, ibidem construere Leges et Consuecudines Anglicanas, ponens Vicecomites et alios Ministros qui populum regni illius juxta Leges Anglicanas judicarent,' (to wit, in the English pale, (q) and territories reduced into counties, and under the king's dominion) as Matthew Paris and others story.

4thly, the readers and our whole nation may hereby and herein discover, for their present and future information, the provident care and prudence of our English parliaments in all former ages, to secure the lives and inheritances of all English freemen and Irish subjects against all arbitrary, tyrannical power and proceedings whatsoever, even in cases of pretended or real treasons, and the highest capital offences, by providing and enacting from time to time, that not only all English freemen, but all other Irish or outlandish persons accused of any high treasons, misprisions or concealments of treasons committed by them either within or without the realm of England, should be impeached of, and arraigned for the same, only upon a legal presentment or indictment first found against them by a jury of good and lawful men upon their oaths; and after that tried for the same by another legal jury of 12, honest and substantial indifferent freeholders upon their oaths, or by the lawful judgment of their peers, if English peers, and not forejudged of life or limb, nor outlawed, exiled, put to death, passed upon or any way destroyed, but only by the lawful judgment of their peers, according to the due course of the common law, and not otherwise, is the grand Charter of king John, the statute of Magna Charta, ch. 29, in 9 H. 3, 25 E. 1, c. 1, 28 E. 1, c. 1, 5 E. 3, c. 9, 20 E. 3, c. 2, 25 E. 3, c. 2. of treasons, 28 E. 3, c. 3, 42 E. 3, c. 3, 2 R. 2, rot. parl. n. 57, 1 H. 4, rot. parl. n. 44, 2 H. 4, n. 60, 89, 2 H. 5, c. 6, 20 H. 6, c. 9, 22 H. 8, c. 9, 23 H. 8, c. 13, 26 H. 8, c. 13, 28 H. 8, c. 7, 10, 18, 31 H. 8, c. 8, 14, 32 H. 8, c. 4, 35, 33 H. 8, c. 12, 40, 21, 23, 35 H. 8, c. 2, 3, 1 E. 6, c. 12, 5 E. 6, c. 11, 1 Mar. c. 6, 1 & 2 Phil. & Mar. c. 10, 11, 1 Eliz. c. 1, 6, 5 El. c. 1, 13, El. c. 1, 14 El. c. 1, 18 El. c. 1, 23 El. c. 1, 27 El. c. 2, 3 Jac. c. 2, the Petition of Right 3 Caroli, with sundry other statutes enact, and all our law books (r) resolve: so that no man's life whatsoever can legally be hazarded or taken away for any real or pretended treason or capital crime, without a double jury, and the verdicts of 24 sworn good honest men at the least, or more, or by a Grand Jury, and 12 or more peers of the realm, if an English peer; and in case of Foreigners, by a jury of 6 English, and 6 of their own country-men, if so many may be found fit to be returned of a jury, to avoid partiality: which seconded must be with the judgment of one or more sworn judges sitting on the tribunal of justice. Which treble bulwark and grand fundamental security of all English freemen's and others lives, inheritances, families, estates, against all unlawful conspiracies, practices, combinations, subornations of witnesses, machiavilian policies, and arbitrary tyrannical powers, proceedings whatsoever, especially in perilous treacherous times, if once undermined, subverted, or interrupted by arbitrary courts-martial, committees, or any other new erected tribunals, by what names or specious pretences whatsoever of public safety, danger, or necessity, what sad effects it would soon produce to the endangering, yea loss of the lives, inheritances, fortunes of the most innocent, best deserving persons, and real patriots of their country's laws and liberties, through the power, policy, confederacy, covetousness, ambition, revenge, malice, emulation, suspicion, tyranny, injustice, partiality, self-interests of suborned, perjured witnesses, or despiteful, powerful prosecutors, accusers, and of unrighteous packel, partial pre-engaged judges, (admitting no legal pleas against their exorbitant jurisdictions, no legal challenges to their persons, nor appeals from their unjust sentences, though capital, without any clear testimony to prove them guilty and worthy of death by our known laws) all lovers of their own families, friends, neighbours, liberties, lives, estates, or the public safety, may easily resolve, not only from sundry experiments and Histories (s) in former and late ages over tedious to recite; but by the memorable precedents of innocent Naboth recorded for this purpose in sacred writ, 1 Kings, 21, and of the Prophet Zechariah, 2 Chron. 24, 20, 21, 22, compared with that of Psal. 94, 20, 21, 'Shall the throne of iniquity have fellowship with thee which frameth mischief by a law? They gather themselves together against the soul, or life, of the righteous, and condemn the innocent blood.' with Ezech. 22, 6, 9, 12, 27, and Isaiah 59, 6, 7. 'Behold the princes of Israel, every one were in thee to their power to shed blood. In thee have they taken gifts to shed blood. Her princes in the midst thereof are like wolves ravening the prey. To shed blood and to destroy souls' (that is the lives of innocent men under a pretence of law (t) justice for pretended crimes, treasons) 'to get dishonest gain: their ways are ways of iniquity, the act of violence is in their hands; their feet run to evil, and they make haste to shed innocent blood: their thoughts are thoughts of iniquity; wasting and destruction are in their paths, there is no judgment, or justice, in their goings, they have made them crooked paths,' paralleled with Jer. 22, 17, 'But thine eyes and thine heart are not but for thy covetousness, and for to shed innocent blood, and for oppression and violence to do it.'—Such monsters of injustice, rapine, oppression, violence, against all laws of God and man, do kings, princes, and great men degenerate into even among God's own people, when they break down the pales and fences of public laws and justice made for their subjects preservation, and let loose the reins to arbitrary government, and lawless proceedings, to shed their blood, or confiscate their estates, supplant and ruin their posterity in a seeming way of justice. The consideration of which sacred texts and precedents should both caution and engage all future English parliaments, the whole nation, and every individual member thereof, for ever to abandon and abominate such irregular judicatures and extravagant proceedings, and not to give the least countenance or encouragement thereunto, especially after this memorable precedent of the lord Maguire, and our many years late contest in parliament and bloody encounters in the field, to maintain the fundamental laws, privileges, and good customs of this kingdom (whereof the trial of men by a lawful indictment, jury, and verdict of their peers, is the principal) whereby not only the supreme authority, but the people's security of lives, lands, livings, and privileges, both in general and particular, are preserved and maintained, and by abolishing or alteration of the which, it is impossible but that present confusion will fall upon the whole state and frame of this kingdom; as king James himself, and the whole parliament long since resolved in the act of 1 Jacob. ch. 2, and without the full possession of which fundamental rights, laws and liberties, we can have little hopes, as to human considerations, to enjoy any comfort of life, or so much as life itself, but at the pleasures of some men, ruling merely by will and power; as the generals, officers, and army themselves have long since published and declared to the parliament, and world, in express words, in their declaration and representation humbly tendered to the parliament, (u) concerning the just and fundamental Rights and Liberties of themselves and the kingdom, June 14, 1657, which they may do well to remember and pursue: in prosecution whereof, in the heads of proposals agreed upon by his excellency and the council of the army, to be tendered to the commissioners of parliament residing with the army; containing the particulars of their Desires in pursuance of their former declarations and papers, Aug. 1, 1647. Proposal 10, they desired, That the rights of the commons of England might be cleared, as to a due exemption from any judgment, trial, or other proceedings against them by the house of peers, without the concurring judgment of the house of commons. As also from any other Judgment, Sentence, or Proceeding against them other than by their equals, or according to the law of the land. Which how inconsistent it is with all military and summary proceedings in all new courts, committees, or commissions since erected, I refer to their own consciences and judgments to resolve.

5thly, The readers may hereby discern, that errors themselves in the courts of Ireland, with other grievances could not anciently be redressed in the parliaments thereof, but only in England, (x) till 29 E. 3, as is evident by this memorable hitherto unprinted record made for relief in such cases.

If then the king and his council in England might thus by this their Ordinance made in England, without a parliament, redress these grievances and failures of justice in cases only of private concernment in Ireland itself, formerly examinable and remediable only in England, for the ease and benefit of the loyal subjects, (not of Irish enemies and rebels) there; much more may the king and parliament of England for the preservation of the king's crown, interest, and of the lives, inheritances of all his loyal subjects there, and securing the peace of Ireland, enact and ordain, that all Irish rebels, traitors, committing High Treason, and taking up arms against the king, and destroying his liege people there, especially in times of universal rebellions and insurrections, shall be sent over thence, and tried for the same in England, by a sworn jury of lawful indifferent Englishmen in the King's-bench, be they Commons or Peers of Ireland; without any injury or injustice.

Thus submitting this argument to the candid censure, and friendly embracement of every judicious reader, and craving a share in his prayers for God's gracious blessing both on me and it, I leave it to the readers' immediate perusal without further Prologue.

From my study in Lincoln's-inn, June 19, 1658, on which day of the month 1637, I was taken pro confesso by the Star-Chamber lords upon a pretended contempt, in refusing to answer; (bb) when as themselves refused to give me leave to plead, or answer, and rejected the answers tendered in court under my own and my counsel's hand, to the information there exhibited, against all rules of law, justice, and of that very Court.

WILLIAM PRYNN.

I apprehend it neither unseasonable nor unprofitable to publish this Argument at Law concerning the Trial of Irish Peers for foreign Treasons acted by them, made by me near 14 years past, in the King's-Bench Court at Westminster, in the case of Connor Macguire, an Irish baron, there indicted for High-Treason, in having a principal hand in the late bloody rebellion in Ireland; against whom I was (by special order) assigned counsel, among others, by the parliament then sitting; upon whose plea, and a demurrer thereunto, I first argued this new point in law, never formerly disputed, adjudged in open court, Whether an Irish Peer (or commoner) committing Treason in Ireland, sent over from thence into England against his will, might be lawfully tried for it in the King's-Bench at Westminster by a Middlesex jury, and outed of his Trial by Irish peers of his condition, by the statute of 35 H. 8, c. 2.? After two solemn arguments at the bar, by myself and serjeant Rolfe, against, and Mr. Hales, and Mr. Twisden for the prisoner, and Mr. Justice Bacon's argument on the bench, his plea was over-ruled, adjudged against him; it being resolved, he might and ought to be tried only by a jury of Middlesex, not by his peers of Ireland: whereupon he pleading Not Guilty to his indictment, was tried by a substantial jury (to whom he took both his peremptory and legal challenges, which the court allowed him of right), and after a very fair and full trial, was found guilty by the jury, upon most pregnant evidence; and then condemned, and executed as a traitor at Tyburn. Pryn's Preface to his Argument, p. 1, 2. Mr. Pryn in his celebrated Speech [Dec. 1648.] in support of the “satisfactormess of the king's Answer to the houses Propositions,” says “Nor did I ever yet receive so much as your public thanks for any public service done you, which every preacher usually receives for every sermon preached before you, and most others have received for the meanest services; though I have brought you off with honour in the cases of Canterbury and Macguire when you were at a loss in both.” 3 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 1153.

The CASE and PLEA of the Lord Macguire.

Connor Macguire, by the name of Connor Macguire of London, esq., was, in Michaelmas Term last, indicted in this court for several High Treasons committed by himself, together with Hugh MacMahon and divers other conspirators and false traitors against our lord the king, within the realm of Ireland in partibus transmarinis, on the 23d day of October, 17 Caroli. Upon his arraignment at this bar, after Not Guilty pleaded, being demanded how he would be tried? he put in this special plea, as to the particular manner of his trial only, under his counsel's hand.

That by the statute of Magna Charta, it is enacted, That no freeman ought to be imprisoned, &c. Nor will we pass upon him, but by the lawful judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land. That after this, in a parliament held at Droghedah in the kingdom of Ireland, in the 10th year of king Henry 7, it was enacted, That all statutes late made within the realm of England concerning or belonging to the common and public weal of the same, from thenceforth should be deemed good and effectual in law; and over that, be accepted, used, and executed within the land of Ireland in all points, and at all times requisite, according to the tenor and effect of the same: And that by authority aforesaid they and every of them be authorized, approved, and confirmed in the said land of Ireland; That before the time of the supposed treasons, king Charles, by his letters patents under the great seal of Ireland, bearing date the last day of August, in the 4th year of his reign, at Dublin in Ireland, did create Brian Macguire, father of the said Connor Macguire, baron of Iniskellen in the county of Farmanagh in the said realm; and granted to him and the heirs males of his body, the title, honour, and dignity of the said barony, and to have a place and voice among the peers and nobles of Ireland in the parliaments of that realm: By virtue whereof the said Brian was seized in his demesne as of fee tail of the said barony, and died seized thereof at Dublin, 1 Feb. 12 Caroli, before the supposed treasons; after whose death the said barony descended to him as heir in tail: That by virtue of these letters patents, before the said supposed treasons committed, he was one of the barons, lords, and peers of parliament in the realm of Ireland; and at the parliament begun and held there the 16th day of March, 16 Car. at Dublin, and continued until the 17th of August then next following, and then adjourned till the 9th of November next ensuing, and thence prorogued to the 24th of February next following, and from thence continued till the 24th of June, 17 Car. he was present as one of the peers of the realm of Ireland. And further saith, That on the 23d of October, 17 Car. he was taken and arrested by certain persons to him unknown at Dublin, in Ireland, and there committed to safe custody for the treasons pretended to be committed by him, till afterwards he was, on the 12th of June, 18 Car. by certain persons to him unknown, brought in safe custody, against his will, to Westminster within the realm of England, and then and there committed to the Tower of London, where he is yet detained. And therefore prayeth, That he may be tried and judged by his peers of the realm of Ireland, for the supposed treasons in the indictment. To this plea of his Mr. Aske, the king's attorney in this court, hath demurred in law, and the prisoner hath joined in demurrer. And whether this plea of the prisoner, as to his trial by his peers of the realm of Ireland, be good in law? is the sole question to be now argued.

This case is of very great concernment, and yet of greater expectation: It concerns the whole peerage of Ireland in some respects, on the one hand; and on the other, the justice both of the king, parliament, and kingdom of England, in bringing a desperate rebel and arch-traitor to condign punishment, for the most horrid, bloody treason against the king's royal crown and authority, the protestant religion, and the whole English nation inhabiting Ireland (devoted to destruction by this traitor and his confederates), that ever was plotted or executed under the sun. The eyes of all our three kingdoms (highly concerned in, and deeply suffering by, this treason), but more especially the eyes and hearts of our adjoining vigilant parliament (which hath especially recommended it to this court, and assigned myself, among others, counsel in this case), are intently fixed upon the final result and issue of it. I wish my vacancy to study and ability to argue this public cause, had been such as might have satisfied expectation, and discharged the trust reposed in me; but other public services having much interrupted me therein, I shall begin to argue it for the present with the best skill I may, and so leave it to those learned gentlemen of the law, if there shall be need of any further arguments, who are provided to argue after me, to supply what is defective in this my proemial argument.

All matters of fact and form arising in this plea have been already admitted true, and sufficiently pleaded in law by mutual consent, and nothing but the mere matter in law rests now to be debated, which I conceive to be but one short, single point.

For though the prisoner pleads, That there was a parliament, of which he was a peer and member, continuing in Ireland by prorogation at the time of his apprehension and sending over into England; yet this privilege of parliament comes no ways in question as to the point of his trial, now only in issue (as hath been falsely suggested to the lords house, and intimated in an ordinance of theirs since revoked), but relates only to his first apprehensions, which is not here in controversy. Besides, he pleads not, That this parliament is yet continuing and actually sitting in Ireland, of which he ought to have (a) the privilege; but that it was continued till the 24th of June, 17 Car. which is three years since, and so intended to be long since ended: Nor pleads he, That he ought to be, or to have been tried for his treason in the parliament of Ireland, nor that his privilege of parliament ought to extend to secure him from any apprehension or indictment for high treason (when the treason is visible and real, as his is, and not imaginary only), in which case of treason no privilege of parliament is to be admitted, as hath been resolved, 8 H. 6, rot. parl. n. 57, 31 H. 6, rot. parl. n. 25, 26, 27, Coke's 4 Instit. fo. 25. So as the matter of his privilege of parliament is quite out of doors, and the sole point in issue is but this:

Whether a peer of Ireland committing high treason in Ireland, for which he is there apprehended, and afterwards by order of parliament here brought thence into England against his will, may be indicted and tried for that treason in this court of King's-Bench by a jury of Middlesex only, not by his peers of Ireland, by virtue of the statute of 35 Hen 8. cap. 2.?

And under favour, I conceive in some clearness affirmatively, That he may and shall be tried here by an ordinary jury of Middlesex, and outed of his peerage, by virtue of this Act.

The question arising merely upon the Act itself, which is very short, I shall first recite it, and then draw my arguments out of the very intention, words, and bowels of it.

(a) See 3 E. 4, c. 1, in Ireland.

'For as much as some doubts and questions have been moved, That certain kinds of treasons, misprisions, and concealments of treasons, done, perpetrated, or committed out of the king's majesty's realm of England, and other his grace's dominions, cannot, ne may, by the common laws of this realm, be enquired of, heard, and determined within this his said realm of England; for a plain remedy, order, and declaration therein to be had and made, be it enacted by authority of this present parliament, that all manner of offences being already made or declared, or hereafter to be made or declared, by any the laws and statutes of this realm, to be treasons, misprisions of treasons, or concealments of treasons, done, and perpetrated, or committed, or hereafter to be done, perpetrated, or committed, by any person or persons out of this realm of England, shall be from henceforth inquired of, heard and determined, before the king's justices of his bench, for pleas to be holden before himself, by good and lawful men of the same shire where the said bench shall sit and be kept, or else before such commissioners, and in such shire of the realm, as shall be assigned by the king's majesty's commission, and by good and lawful men of the same shire, in like manner and form, to all intents and purposes, as if such treasons, misprisions of treasons, or concealments of treasons, had been done, perpetrated, and committed within the same shire where they shall be so enquired of, heard, and determined, as is aforesaid.

'Provided always, that if any the peers of this realm shall happen to be indicted of any such treasons or other offences aforesaid, by authority of this act, that then after such indictment they shall have their trial by their peers, in such like manner and form as hath been heretofore accustomed.'

From this act I shall deduce several arguments and conclusions to prove, that the prisoner at the bar, though a peer of Ireland, shall be tried by an ordinary jury of Middlesex here, not by his peers in or of Ireland, for the treasons committed in Ireland, whereof he stands here indicted:

For my more methodical proceeding, I shall divide the single point in controversy into these three subordinate questions:

I. Whether this statute extends to treasons committed in Ireland, by Irish Commoners?

II. Whether it reacheth to treasons in Ireland perpetrated by Irish peers, as well as by Irish commoners?

III. Admit it extends to Irish peers as well as commoners, whether it doth not then inevitably out them of their trials by Irish peers, and subject both of them alike to a trial at this bar, by a Middlesex jury?

moners? There is but little doubt of it. For first, it is as clear as the sun at noon-day, that this act extends to all treasons done or perpetrated in Ireland by Irish commoners; for the main scope and intent of this law being to make all manner of offences then made or declared, or hereafter to be made or declared to be treasons, misprisions of treasons, or concealments of treasons, by any laws or statutes of this realm, done, perpetrated or committed by any person or persons out of England, inquirable or triable within this realm, without any scruple or difficulty, either in this court, or before such commissioners in such shire of this realm, as the king by his commission shall assign, the very sum and substance of this act, as the express letter thereof resolves, the realm of Ireland being out of this realm of England, and no part thereof, and treasons therein committed by commoners, being treasons done and perpetrated out of this realm of England; (as is clear by 20 H. 6. f. 8, a. b. 19 H. 6. 53, b. 32 H. 6. 25, b. 2 R. 3. f. 12. 1 H. 7. f. 3, Plowden 368, b, Dyer, f. 360, b. Coke 7 Report, f. 22, 23. Calvin's Case, 1 H. 5. c. 8, 4 H. 5. c. 6, Coke's Instit. p. 11. 18.) these treasons must certainly and most necessarily be both within the intent and words of this law, and so consequently triable in this court by an ordinary jury of Middlesex, without any scruple or difficulty: The rather because Ireland, though out of this realm of England, is yet part of the king's dominions, and a subordinate kingdom, united and annexed to the crown of England, governed by the laws of England, and bound by acts of parliament made in England in many cases, as is resolved, and undeniably evidenced by Pat. 6, Johan. m. 6, n. 17, Rot. Pat. 8, Johan. m. 1, Claus. 12 H. 3, m. 8, Pat. 30 H. 3, m. 3. 14 H. 3. Mr. Saint John's argument at law at Stafford's attainer, vide Rushworth's Stafford's trial, p. 694, et seq. and therefore treasons there committed are more apt and proper to be tried here within the letter and intention of this law, than treasons done in France, Spain, or any parts else, out of the king's dominions, where our laws and acts of parliament are not obligatory.

II. This statute, as I conceive, was principally made to punish treasons, misprisions of treasons, and concealments of treasons in Ireland, where they were more frequently done and perpetrated, than in any or all parts of the world out of this realm of England, as our histories and the (b) Irish statutes record : and the horrid general treason, insurrection and rebellion in Ireland (much like this for which the prisoner is indicted), mentioned in the statute of Ireland, 28 H. 8, c. 1, but seven years before this act, with other frequent treasons and rebellions, there were, no doubt, the chiefest ground of making this new law. And that which puts it out of all dispute, is the statute of 28 H. 8, made in the parliament at Dublin in Ireland, c. 7, which reciting the statute of 26 H. 8, c. 13, made in England, concerning treasons and enacting, (as this of 35 H. 8.) "That if any of the king's subjects, denizens, or others, do commit or practise out of the limits of this realm of England, in any outward parts, any such offences, which by this act are made, or heretofore have been made treason, that then such treason, whatsoever it be, that shall so happen to be done or committed, shall be enquired and presented, by the oaths of twelve good and lawful men, upon good and probable evidence and witness, in such shire and county of this realm, before such persons as it shall please the king's highness to appoint by commission under his great seal, in like manner and form as treasons committed within this realm have been used to be enquired of and presented : and that then upon every indictment and presentment founden and made of any such treasons, and certified into the King's-Bench, like process, and other circumstance shall be there had and sued against such offenders, as if the same treasons so presented had been lawfully found to be done and committed within the limits of this realm, &c." adds this memorable clause thereto, "Considering then this statute made in the realm of England, is most beneficial and expedient to have due execution within the king's land and dominion of Ireland, especially in respect of the high rebellion here lately committed, that the odible infamy against the king and queen in the same act expressed, and other offences, abuses, and abominations there mentioned, principally have been promulged, pronounced, done and attempted within this said land, Be it therefore established, ordained, and enacted, by authority of this present parliament, That the aforesaid statute and ordinance, and every thing and things therein contained, be established, confirmed, accepted, deemed, judged and taken for a good and right law within the king's land and dominion of Ireland, and to be as good, effectual, and of the same strength and quality, effect, force and virtue, to all intents and purposes within the said land, as the same is or ought to be in the realm of England; and that the said statute and act made in England, and every thing therein contained, shall have relation, and take effect within this land of Ireland against all offenders contrary to the form thereof, &c." Now that act of 26 H. 8, c. 13, with this of 35 H. 8, c. 2, being principally made and intended for the treasons done and committed in Ireland, as this Irish parliament resolves in terminis, and being most beneficial and expedient for that realm; it would be very illegal, yea irrational, absurd, impolitic, and imprudent, to exclude Ireland out of this law, where treasons were most frequent, most dangerous to our kings and realm, and to extend it only to other places out of the realm, where treasons were seldom done or perpetrated, and nothing so perilous to the king and realm of England, as treasons, rebellions in Ireland have usually been in former and later ages.

3. It hath been adjudged by all the judges of England both in (c) Orouk's Case, 33 Eliz. and in sir John Perrot's Case, 24 Eliz. cited in Calvin's Case, Coke's 7 Report, f. 23, a. in his 1 Institutes on Littleton, f. 26, b. 3 Institut. p. 11, 24, and so it was agreed without any argument in Hugh Mac-Mahone's Case, this last Michaelmas term (the prisoner's confederate in this horrid treason,) that treason committed in Ireland itself by an Irish commoner, is triable in this court by this very statute, (contrary to the subitane, extrajudicial opinion of Dyer, M. 19 & 20 Eliz. fol. 360.) resolved since to be no law: seeing then it hath been thus frequently resolved heretofore, and in case of the treasons now in question this very last term without any scruple; That an Irish commoner committing treason in Ireland, and brought over from thence hither against his will, is triable in this court by a Middlesex jury; there is no doubt at all of the first question, but that this statute extends to treasons committed in Ireland by Irish commoners, and the doubt, if there be any, will rest merely in the second point, which I am already arrived at; namely,

Whether this act extends to treasons perpetrated in Ireland by Irish peers, as well as by Irish commoners? And under correction, I conceive, with much clearness, that it doth, for these ensuing reasons.

1. From the generality and universality of the act itself; wherein I shall observe a four-fold universality, which supplies me with four undeniable Arguments, to prove Irish peers within this law, as well as Irish commoners.

The first is a universality of the kinds of offences specified in the act, in these general terms; 'all manner of offences being already made or declared or hereafter to be made or declared, by any the laws or statutes of this realm, to be treasons, misprision of treasons, or concealment of treasons, done or perpetrated out of this realm of England, shall be enquired of by the king's justices of his bench, &c.' Now these general words, all manner of

(b) See the Statutes of Ireland, 3 E. 2, c. 4. 18 H. 6, c. 2, 3. 25 H. 6, c. 4. 5. 28 H. 6, c. 10. 1 E. 4, c. 2. 5 E. 4, c. 6. 18 E. 4, c. 2, 10 H. 7, c. 6, 8, 9, 10, 13, 17, 19, 28 H. 8, c. 1, 3, 9, 11. 3 Phil. & Mar. c. 11. 1 Eliz. c. 6, 17. 27 Eliz. c. 1. 28 Eliz. c. 8, 9. 11 Jac. c. 4, and the Annals of Ireland.

offences, &c. must necessarily extend to all manner of treasons perpetrated or committed out of this realm, by peers as well as commoners; to this treasons of the lord Macguire, as well as to the treasons of Mac-Mahone, esq. they being the self-same treasons in substance, and a manner of treasons specially made and declared by the laws of this realm, since there are no restrictive words to confine these general clauses of treasons only to commoners, and no express exception for the offences or treasons of Irish peers to be found within the statute; else there would be a repugnance and contradiction between the text and the gloss, and this general should be turned into a specific in respect of the traitors offending: Therefore this general clause extending to all treasons whatsoever done or perpetrated out of the realm, must necessarily extend to the treasons of all Irish peers as well as commons; and so both of them, by the words and intention of this law, shall be triable in this court.

The second is a universality of time. 'All manner of offences already made or declared, or hereafter to be made or declared; treason, &c. done, perpetrated, or committed, or hereafter to be done, perpetrated, or committed, shall be enquired of by the king's justices of his bench, &c.' which extends to all former treasons done out of the realm at any time before the making, and to all future treasons since the passing of this act: Now this universality of time extends as well to the treasons of Irish peers as commoners, to the treasons of baron Macguire as well as of Mr. Mac-Mahone, both being alike treasons committed after this act.

The third is a (d) universality of place: 'All manner of treasons done, perpetrated, or committed out of this realm of England,' that is, in any place whatsoever out of the realm of England, be it in Ireland, Scotland, France, Spain, Germany, Italy, Barbary, Turkey, the East or West Indies, as was resolved in Dr. Storie's case, Hil. 13 Eliz. Dyer 998, b. 2 and 3 Phil. and Mar. Dyer 131, 132. Now this extends generally to all foreign treasons committed by peers as well as commons, and so to the treason of the prisoner at the bar, it being done in Ireland, out of this realm of England, and so fully within the act.

The 4th, which is fatal and unanswerable, is a universality of persons, coupled together with all the three former generalities in these express words; 'All manner of offences made treason, &c. done, perpetrated, or committed by any person or persons, out of this realm of England, shall be from henceforth enquired of, heard and determined before the king's justices of his bench, &c.' Now 'any person or persons' being a universal expression, equivalent to all manner of persons whatsoever collectively, or, to all and every person whatsoever, distributively, extends to Irish peers, as well as commoners, yea, to all subjects, of all ranks whatsoever, within the compass of this law, in regard of the manner of trial, but such only who are excepted out of it by special Proviso. Now Irish peers are none of those persons excepted, as I shall prove anon.

That these words, 'any person or persons,' extend to peers as well as commoners, where there is no exception of peers, is undeniable.

First, Because a peer is a person, though of a higher rank or degree than an ordinary commoner, or freeman, and one kind of person in law; therefore within these words, 'any person or persons.'

Secondly, Because general laws, made for the common good, safety of the realm, and punishment of the grand crime of high treason, are like to God himself (d*), no respecters of persons, but bind and punish all alike. Therefore 'any person or persons,' in such a public law as this, made for the common good, safety, and punishment of the greatest treasons, evils, must necessarily include all persons, subjects whatsoever, and except none, especially the greatest, whose examples and offences are commonly most dangerous and pernicious.

Thirdly, In all public acts whatsoever, these words, 'any person or persons,' extend to peers as well as commoners; and I know to one precedent to the contrary. To instance in some few acts, instead of many: in the statutes of 26 H. 8, c. 13, and 5 and 6 E. 6, c. 11, concerning Treasons, 'any person or persons, or any of the king's subjects, denizen, or others, that shall commit or practise Treason out of the limits of this realm, in any outward parts, extend to peers as well as commons:' therefore, in this act of the same nature. So in the statutes of 1 Ed. 6, c. 1, 2, and 3 Ed. 6, c. 1. 5 and 6 Ed. 6, c. 1, and 1 Eliz. c. 2. 'If any person or persons shall deprave or revile the most blessed sacraments, or the book of the Common Prayer, &c.' In the statute of 1 Eliz. cap. 1, and also of 5 Eliz. cap. 1. 'If any person or persons, &c. shall extoll, &c. the power of the bishop of Rome, or of his see.' 13 Eliz. c. 1. 'If any person or persons shall bring in, or put in yre any bull from the bishop of Rome, Agnus Dei, pictures, crosses, &c.' In the statute of 23 Eliz. c. 2. 'If any person or persons shall, with a malicious intent, speak any false or seditious news of the queen,' &c. In 27 Eliz. c. 2, 'If any person or persons shall harbour or contribute any money to the maintenance of any Jesuits, Priests,' &c. In all these acts (to pretermitt (e) many others), the words, 'any person or persons,' extend to peers as well as commons, as is resolved in the bodies and provisos of all these acts: yea, in the statute of 25 E. 3, c. 2. of Treasons (though a most penal law), the words are only, 'If a man do compass or imagine the death of the king; if a man do levy war against the king in his realm, &c. If a man counterfeit the king's broad or privy seal, or his money,' &c. Yet it hath been resolved without dispute in all times, and so agreed by sir Edward Coke, Institute 3. p. 4, 5, that this word, 'a man,' extends to both sexes alike, including women as well as men, peers as well as commoners, lords as well as peasants: yea, all ranks, callings, conditions of men who are subjects; and that this word Man, in the singular number only, extends to many men, to any number of men committing any of these Treasons jointly, as well as to a single man, or traitor, because it is a general law, made for the safety of the king's person, and the realm. Much more then must 'any person or persons,' in this statute, being both in the singular and plural number, and in common acceptation, a far more universal, general, and comprehensive expression than this of 'a man,' in 25 E. 3, c. 2, extend equally to all sorts, sects, and degrees of men, as well as it, and so to peers as much as it, and to peers as well as to commons, as it doth in the statutes of 25 H. 8, c. 22. 26 H. 8, c. 13. 27 H. 8, c. 2. 33 H. 8, c. 12, and 20. 5 E. 6, c. 11. 1 Mar. c. 6, and 2 Phil. & Mar. c. 9, 10, 11. 5 Eliz. c. 1. 13 Eliz. c. 2. 18 Eliz. c. 1. 23 Eliz. c. 1. 27 Eliz. c. 2. 3 Jac. c. 4, concerning treasons.

Secondly, My second argument to prove Irish peers within this statute, is, because Irish commons are within its verge, even for treasons committed in Ireland, as hath been adjudged in the fore-cited cases of Orourk, sir John Perrot, and Mac Mahone: for laws and law-givers being no respecters of persons, where the offences be the same, and there being no clause, word, or syllable in this statute extending to Irish commoners treasons, but which doth, may, and ought, by the self-same justice, reason, and equity, to extend to the treasons of Irish peers, (this statute making no distinction between the one and the other) and the commons of Ireland having as absolute a right and inheritance in their native privilege of being tried by their peers in Ireland, which yet is taken away by this act in case of treason, as the peers in Ireland have in their peerage, to be tried there by their Irish peers: We must not, yea we cannot, in point of justice, distinguish between the one and the other; where the law itself makes no distinction: therefore, since the Irish commoner is undoubtedly within the words and scope of this act, to be tried at this bar by a Middlesex jury, the Irish peer (unless we will judge with respect of persons, and coin a distinction not warranted by this act) must be also tried in the self-same manner. The law is the same, the crime is the same, both in Macguire's and in Mac Mahone's cases; therefore the trial, and judgment too, must, in law and reason, be the same in both.

Thirdly, It will be granted me, without dispute, that if an Irish peer commit treason in any foreign parts, out of England and Ireland, as in Spain, France, Flanders, Italy or Germany, he shall be tried in this court by an ordinary jury, if freeholders, and not by his peers in Ireland, by virtue of this act. Nay, if he commit treason in Ireland, and fly into England, he may, and shall be tried for that very treason, by an ordinary jury, at this bar (f); because by flying his country, and a legal trial there, he hath outed himself of the benefit of his peers. Therefore it extends to Irish peers, even for treasons done in Ireland, else they could not be triable here in any of these cases, which are granted on all hands to be law.

Fourthly, It is evident by the proviso in this act, that English peers committing any manner of treasons out of this realm, are triable for it in England, by virtue of this law, as well as English commoners, though they were not so by the common law. Therefore Irish peers committing treasons shall be within it likewise, and so triable here as well as Irish commons, else they should be in far better condition than English or Scottish peers, and quite exempted out of this act. Now the same words that bring English peers within this law, must of necessity look in Irish peers too, there being no clause which exempts or includes the one more than the other.

Fifthly, The very letter, intent, and scope of this act (as appears by the body of it, and likewise by the statutes of 26 H. 8, c. 13, and 5 and 6 E. 6, c. 11, to the same effect) was, to make all treasons done or committed out of England, by any person or persons whatsoever, triable in England, either before the justices in this court, or (g) before special commissioners in some other counties; but to be still triable within this realm, as the words 'all manner of treasons hereafter to be done, perpetrated, or committed by any person or persons out of the realm of England, shall be from henceforth enquired of, heard, and determined before the king's justices of his bench, &c.' clearly resolve in direct terms: therefore to make the treasons of Irish peers committed in Ireland, or elsewhere, triable here in England, as well as the treasons of English peers, or Irish commoners. And to send them back into Ireland, to be there tried by their peers, when once they are here in prison, and indicted in this court, by exempting them out of this act, contrary to the very letter and intent of the law, is to run point-blank against the very words and meaning of this law, and the law-makers: therefore he must, by this act, be tried at this bar, and that by an ordinary jury only, as I shall prove anon.

Sixthly, The very sense and sole purport of this act is not to make new treasons, or traitors, which were none before, but to bring real traitors only, for treasons formerly made, or hereafter to be made and declared treasons by the laws and statutes of this realm, to exemplary punishment in this kingdom, for the peace and preservation of the king, realm, and the better execution of justice (the very life of laws), upon delinquents only of the highest rank, for the most transcendent crimes of high treasons, or misprision, or concealments of treasons, not for felonies, or petit treasons; which consideration must necessarily induce us, for the common good, to give it the largest, fullest, and most equitable construction that may be. Thus the judges, in former times, have always interpreted it, as appears by Dyer, f. 132. 298. Coke's 7 Rep. Calvin's Case, f. 23. a. his first Institut. on Littleton, f. 26. his third Institut. p. 24. and in Orourk's case, wherein the judges resolved, first, That the statute of 1 Mar. sess. 1. repealing all former treasons, but those within 25 E. 3. and of 1 and 2 Phil. and Mar. c. 10. enacting, 'That all trials hereafter to be had for any treason, shall be had and used only according to the due course of the common law of this realm, and not otherwise,' extends not to the taking away of foreign treasons, or their trials, by this law. And in Orourk's case, they extended it by equity beyond, and in some sort, against the letter of the law itself; for he standing mute, and refusing his trial, was thereupon condemned and executed for a treason committed by him in Ireland, though the words of the statute are, 'The treason shall be enquired of, heard, and determined before the justices of the king's bench, by good and lawful men of the same shire, where the said bench shall sit;' and the act speaks nothing at all of standing mute. But this being a public law for the common good, to bring traitors only to their trial and just punishment, his refusal to put himself upon his trial, was adjudged to be a determination and conviction of his treasons within the act; the any traitor, by standing mute, might evade and frustrate this good law. If then this statute may thus be construed by equity, and dilated beyond the words, to one who stands mute, for a treason done in Ireland; much more may it be extended to a treason by an Irish peer, who is fully within the words and intent of it, as I have already manifested: And it would be a most pernicious gloss which should either elude or nullify this beneficial public law.

Seventhly, It is clearly resolved in and by our parliaments, 13 E. 1. Proem. 13 E. 1. of Statute Merchants, 21 E. 3. rot. parl. n. 67. in the statute of 5 H. 5. ch. 6. and in divers of our law books, (h) that acts of parliament made in England, wherein Ireland is either specially named, or generally and necessarily included, do bind those in Ireland, both commoners or peers alike. This therefore being such a law, extending and binding those in Ireland, as hath been resolved in the fore-cited cases, it must certainly bind both the peers and commons of Ireland to a trial at this bar, for treasons done in Ireland, when the king and

Eighthly, The proviso in this act for trial of treasons done out of this realm, by peers within the same, extends only in positive terms to peers of this realm of England, because they only are peers within England, and so only triable by their peers, for foreign treasons within the same; not to peers of Ireland, who are no peers at all, nor triable by their peers within this realm of England; therefore this proviso extending only to peers of this realm, excludes all other foreign peers, whether Irish or Scots, from any trial by their peers in England, for treasons acted out of it.

Ninthly, There is very great reason why natural Irish peers and barons should be within the compass of this law as well as commoners, and rather they than any other foreign peers; because, as our (i) historians, the Irish annals, statutes, and our records do testify, ever since their conquest by king Henry 2. and submission to the kings of England, they have frequently (almost every year) in most king's reigns, broken forth into private, petit, or general rebellions and insurrections against the English, (as I could instance in sundry particulars) in which rebellions I commonly find a Macguire, a Mac-Mahon, and O'Neal, in the van, as ringleaders of all the rest, as they were in this last rebellion, wherein most of the native Irish peers and greatest septs have been deeply engaged as principal conspirators. Among other rebellions I find in story, and (which is more authentic) in the express statute made in the parliament at Dublin in Ireland, anno 28 H. 8. c. 1. (k) (but seven years before this law,) that Gerald Fitz-Gerald, Earl of Kildare, the Earl of Desmond, with divers others of the Irish peers and gentry, conspiring together to extirpate the English, and deprive the king of his sovereignty in Ireland, did send to the French king, the emperor, and bishop of Rome, for aid and assistance for taking the same land out of the king's and English possessions; and thereupon, with banners displayed, and great forces, traitorously invaded the king's dominions there, besieged the city and castle of Dublin, murdered the king's good subjects who withstood them, and resisted the king's forces sent from hence, &c. for which they were all, by this act, attainted of high treason. The like general rebellions have there broke forth sundry times, both before and since that act, but none so generally, dangerously, and bloodily, as this for which the prisoner at the bar stands indicted. The treasons, therefore, in Ireland, being commonly so frequent, so general, wherein most of the native Irish peers (and some of the English extraction too) were usually chief actors; there was very great reason, policy, and justice too, why such a law as this should be made to reach Ireland, and why, in such cases as these, (rebellions there being so universal, and most of the Irish nobility conspirators and parties in them) that these peers, and the chiefest conspirators, when surprized, should be presently sent over from thence into England, and tried there for their treasons.

First, To secure their persons from escapes and rescues, which might be there more easily procured, especially when and where the Irish rebels are masters of the field; as the statute of 17 H. 7. in Ireland, c. 14. resolves.

Secondly, To avoid a (1) failure of justice there, when by reason of the many Irish peers there out in actual rebellion, or by means of alliance of most other peers to them, or of the flight of others thence, or the employment of them in service, or places of trust, or by reason of the interposition of the rebel forces between them and the place of their trial there, a competent number of indifferent Irish peers, for a speedy trial; cannot be assembled with safety or conveniency in Ireland, to try a rebellious traitor by his peers there; which obvious defects are all supplied by this act.

Thirdly, To prevent all partiality and injustice in such cases, which might happen in trials by peers in Ireland, either by consanguinity, or alliance of the peer to be tried to the Irish peers who are to try him, or by confederacy of the triers in the same treason with the party tried; or through fear of mischief or revenge upon the triers, jury, witnesses, and judges, by the tried rebel's friends, kindred, and confederates, in case he should be condemned by them, and executed (none being so vindictive and bloody in this kind as the Irish). Upon all which weighty reasons there was a special cause why, both in justice, policy, and prudence, all Irish peers, who by public rebellion commit high treason in Ireland, should be sent over and tried here by ordinary juries, to prevent the fore-named mischiefs and failure of justice, and bring them to condign punishment. Now in this case here in judgment at the bar, all these recited reasons hold: for, first, most of the Irish peers were in actual rebellion when the prisoner was sent over: most of the English and protestant Irish peers there, either murdered, or forced to fly thence, or so dispersed and employed, that they could not assemble a competent number of indifferent peers to any place, with conveniency, to try him in Ireland. Secondly, the enemies and Irish rebels were then masters of the field in most places, the prisoner in danger to be rescued by force from them, or by treachery likely for to escape out of their hands, and the times so troublesome, as would admit no leisure for such a trial. Thirdly, most of the Irish were allied to Macguire, or engaged with him in the self-same treason and rebellion; and so neither in law, justice, or prudence, fit or indifferent persons to pass upon his trial in this case of most public concernment. Fourthly, the judges, witnesses, and peers, that should try him there, would have been in extreme peril of their lives, and of exemplary public revenges from their confederate rebels, who threatened revenge, as appears by MacMahon's speech (Macguire's confederate) to the justices upon his first examination: "I am now (said he) in your hands, and you may do with me what you please; but I am sure, within few days I shall be revenged;" and by like words of revenge used by Owen O'Neil, in Flanders, so soon as he heard Macguire was apprehended. Fifthly, if he should now be sent back from hence into Ireland, to be tried, the rebels, and his party, are there so predominant, that scarce any witnesses, nor peers, nor judges either, would or durst there to appear openly against him; or else such means would be made to delay or elude his trial and execution, that by some device or other there would, questionless, be a failure of justice against him. Therefore, for all these weighty reasons, he may, and ought, by all rules of policy, equity, and justice, to be arraigned and tried only at this bar, by virtue of this act, which so clearly extends unto him; that so the blood of (m) above one hundred and fifty thousand innocent protestants, shed in Ireland, in less than four months space, by means of this rebellion, which cries aloud to heaven and earth for revenge against this great contriver and arch-promoter of it, may not go unrevenge in a way of public justice, to our eternal infamy. I have quite done with the second and main question, and proved an Irish peer to be within the statute, as well as an Irish commoner.

I shall now proceed to the last point, arising from the manner of this plea, that he may be tried by his peers, not expressing where or how, and intimating that he would be so tried here in England. It is briefly this: Admitting an Irish peer to be triable in England for a treason committed by him in Ireland, whether this doth not inevitably out him of his trial by Irish peers, and subject him to a trial at the bar by an ordinary jury, as well as an Irish commoner? And I conceive, without any scruple, affirmatively, that it doth, for these undeniable reasons:

1. Because Irish peers are peers only in Ireland, not in England, and cease to be such in judgment of law so soon as ever they arrive in England, both personally in themselves, and relatively to others, being here in judgment but mere esquires, not lords, and are to be used as such, not as lords or peers, even as peers of Scotland, France, or Spain are, as is resolved and adjudged 11 E. 3. Fitzh. N. Br. 473. 8 R. 2. Process, Fitzh. 224. 20 E. 4. 6. Brook. Nosme de Dignity, 49 M. 19 and 20 Eliz. Dyer 360. b. Coke's 7 Rep. f. 15, 16. Calvin's Case. Co. 9 Rep. f. 117. the Lord Sanquhar's Case in Point, and Coke's 3 Instit. p. 30. The prisoner then being no peer in England, it is impossible that he should be tried in England by his peers.

2. Because no such way of trial was ever yet heard of in any age, of any Irish or other foreign peer, tried here in England, either by English peers, or by his Irish or foreign peers; therefore such a trial shall not, nor can be had or admitted now.

3. Because neither the King's Bench, nor the commissioners before whom the statute limits these foreign treasons to be tried, nor yet the high steward of England (if any such should be created) have any power or jurisdiction to summon a jury of peers out of Ireland to appear before them here in England upon such a trial as this; neither are the peers of Ireland bound by any law to appear or attend as peers on any such service or trial here, being peers, and bound to serve as peers (which their patents express) only in Ireland, and no peers here: therefore a trial by his Irish peers here in England is an impossibility as well as an illegality.

4. Admit a jury of peers might be summoned and sent from thence, yet it would be a great delay of justice, it requiring a long time to procure a full appearance of peers thence; yea, a betraying of Ireland to the rebels at this instant, to send for so many protestant indifferent peers now from thence as might serve to try him here. Moreover, it would be an infinite expence, charge, trouble, besides the danger by sea, to summon a jury of peers from thence; and if they failed to appear in England upon summons, as is probable they would, and lawfully might, they being not bound to it by any law, and so no fine certain to be set upon them for not appearing, nor legal means of coercion to compel them to come over upon such a trial, there should be a failure of justice for want of such a peerage: and therefore no such trial may or can be expected, which would elude and null this law.

5. The statute directs the trial of foreign treasons in express terms, to be before the judges in the King's Bench, or the commissioners appointed by the king in any county of this realm. Now no trial by English or Irish peers was ever heard of either in the King's Bench, or before such commissioners; but it always hath been, and ought to be, either in the House of Peers in Parliament, or before the lord high steward of England, as all former precedents accord; and 15 E. 3, c. 2. 1 H. 4, 1. 10 E. 4, 6, b. 13 H. 8, 12, Brook Treason, 29, 33, Coke's 3 Institute, c. 1 and 2, p. 28, 29, 30. 4 E. 3, rot. Parl. n. 12, resolve: therefore no trial can be in this case by peers, either in this court, or before commissioners, by virtue of this act, or any other law.

6. This statute is introductive of a new way of trying foreign treasons, done out of this realm, by a jury within England; which by the rules of the common law could neither inquire nor take notice of any treasons or matters committed, perpetrated, or acted beyond the seas, is evident by the prologue of this act, the statutes of 26 H. 8, c. 13. 5 E. 6, c. 11, M. 2, and 3 E. 1, Coram Rege Rot. 56, Hereford M. 2 E. 2, Fitzh. Testament. 6. 6 E. 3. f. 17, 18, 27 Ass. 43. 41 E. 3, 19. 48 E. 3, 2, 3. 20 H. 6, 28, 44. 15 E. 4, 14, 15. 20 E. 4, Perkins, Sect. 121, 494, 737, Coke 4 Instit. c. 17, 1 Instit. f. 74, Stamford, l. 2, c. 14, Coke 2 Rep. 49, a. Long and Pecock's Case, 5 Rep. f. 107, a. 3 Inst. f. 48, 49. Whereupon it altering the common law in this particular, it puts all former doubts, and most punctually prescribes all the particulars and appurtenances belonging to the trial of them, from which there neither may nor can be any variation by law.

First, it appoints the place where they shall be tried.

1. In general, within this realm of England.

2. In particular, either in the King's Bench, wherever it sits, or in such county as the king by his commissioners shall assign. 2. The judges, before whom the trial shall be, are thus particularly described, the justices of the King's Bench, or such commissioners as the king shall appoint under the great seal.

3. The jurymen by whom they shall be tried are thus defined, in terminis, in the act, 'By good and lawful men (not peers or commons of Ireland) of the same shire, where the said bench of the king shall sit, if the trial shall be in the King's Bench; and if before commissioners assigned by the king in any shire of the realm, then by the good and lawful men of the same shire where the commissioners sit;' which is doubled (like Pharaoh's dream) to make it more certain; and likewise precisely enacted by the statutes of 26 H. 8, c. 13, and 5 and 6 E. 6, c. 11, in pursuance of this act.

4. The manner how the trial shall be is thus punctually specified: 'In such manner and form, to all intents and purposes, as if such treasons, &c. had been done, perpetrated, and committed within the same (n) shire where they shall be so inquired, heard, and determined, as is aforesaid:' which last words (with the very like in the statutes of 26 H. 8, c. 13, and 5 E. 6, c. 11, extending to our case) put an end to the point in question; for if the Lord Macguire,

(n) See Dyer, f. 31, 232, 298, 360. Coke's 7 Rep. f. 23, 11 Rep. f. 65.

now at the bar, had committed the treasons for which he is now indicted in Westminster, there is no doubt nor scruple of it, but he should have been tried by a jury of Middlesex, notwithstanding his peerage in Ireland; and he could neither have pleaded nor demanded his peerage, as is resolved expressly in Calvin's case, C. 7 Rep. f. 15, 16, and in the Lord Sanquhar's case, Coke's 9 Rep. f. 117, who was tried and condemned by an ordinary jury, for suborning Carliel to murder Turner with a pistol in England, though a peer of Scotland, because he was here no peer; and the fore-cited books are express, that the same law holds in case of a peer of Ireland. Since then this law expressly enacts, that the trial of all foreign treasons shall be by good and lawful men of the same shire where the King's Bench shall sit, in such manner and form, to all intents and purposes, as if the same treasons had been committed here in Middlesex, where the King's Bench sits; there neither may nor can be any other form of trial for the prisoner, nor in any other place, nor before any other judges, nor by any other jury, but such as this statute hath punctually defined, and that is by a jury of Middlesex, to all intents and purposes as if the treasons for which the prisoner stands indicted had been plotted and executed in Middlesex. Therefore, to admit him to a trial by Irish peers, and not by good and lawful men of Middlesex, or to send the prisoner back to Ireland, there to be tried by his peers, is to run quite counter and point-blank against this unanswerable clause of the statute, That he shall be tried by good and lawful men of the same shire where the King's Bench sits, to all intents and purposes as if the treasons had been there committed. And had they been there committed actually, as they are legally by the express purview of this law, it could never so much as be scrupled and made a quere, whether he should be tried by his Irish peers here, or sent over to be tried in Ireland for treasons acted there, after an indictment for them here found against him. In one word, statutes which prescribe new forms of trial in such a particular way as this act doth, are like letters of attorney, or licenses of alienation (o), they must be most strictly pursued, and not varied from in the least punctilio; as was resolved by all the judges of England, Hil. 21 Jac. in the Case of Penal Laws, Co. 7 Rep. f. 36, 37. Therefore no other form of trial ought to be admitted in this case than what the statute prescribes, and that is only by good and lawful men of Middlesex, not by Irish peers.

7. The proviso in this act puts a period to this case:

'Provided always, That if any the peers of this realm shall happen to be indicted of any such treasons, or other offences aforesaid, by authority of this act, that then after such indictment they shall have their trial by their peers, in such like manner as hath been heretofore accustomed.'

From whence I shall observe these five particulars:

1. That treasons committed by English peers in foreign parts are triable here in England, within the very body and purview of this law. Therefore, by the self-same reason, law, and justice, treasons committed out of this realm in Ireland, even by Irish peers, are triable in England by this act, else Irish peers should be quite out of this act, and in better condition than English or any Irish commoners, who are clearly adjudged within it.

2. That trial by peers is saved by this proviso only to the peers of this realm; which both in the prologue and body of this act is expressly styled 'this realm of England.' But the peers of Ireland are no (p) peers at all of this realm of England, as is resolved in 11 Ed. 3, Brief 473, 20 E. 6, 4 Co. 7 Rep. f. 15, 16, and 9 Rep. Lord Sanquhar's case, f. 117, Co. 3 Inst. p. 30, and Dyer, f. 360, b. Therefore no ways within the compass, words, or reason of this proviso, but clearly secluded out of it, and so not triable by their peers. And this statute, prescribing a new way of trial for foreign treasons, not triable here by peers before, had excluded all English peers from trial by their peers, by the body of the law, as some conceive, had it not been saved to them by this special proviso: therefore certainly Irish peers, who are not provided for at all, and no peers in England, must necessarily be excluded from their peerage by it, upon their trial here.

3. The reason why this law doth save the trial by peers to peers of this realm only, and to no others (which, as some conceived, was not saved to them in cases of foreign treasons by the statute of 26 H. 8, c. 13, as appears by the Lord Gray's case hereafter cited), makes an end of the case in question, because peers of the realm of England are peers in every shire and county of England. Therefore, by the Great Charter of England, and all other acts confirming it, and the common law itself, they ought to be tried only by their peers within all counties and places of England; but Irish, Scotch, and foreign peers are no peers in any county of England, as the fore-cited books resolve. Now this statute enacting all foreign treasons to be triable not in Ireland, or any other his majesty's dominions, but in England only, it was necessary and convenient by this special proviso to save the trial by peers to all English peers to be tried for foreign treasons only in England, according to (q) Magna Charta and the Common Law, being their birth-right, because they are actual peers in all places of England, and may have English peers enough at hand to try them without delay upon all occasions. But Irish and other peers being no peers at all in England, and it being a thing improper to try them by English peers,

(o) 21 H. 7, Br. Alienation 9. 30 E. 3, 17. Br. Alienation, 23 and 30.

(q) Cap. 29. See Coke's 2 Inst. p. 48, 49.

being no real peers to them, and a thing impossible to try them here by Irish, or any other foreign peers, for the reasons formerly alleged, and this statute confining the trials within it only to England, it had been a direct contradiction and absurdity to provide that these foreign peers should be tried here by their foreign peers for treasons, and not by an ordinary jury, because they are neither peers themselves in England, nor others who should come hither from Ireland, or other foreign parts, who lose their foreign peerage as soon as they set foot on English ground, with relation unto England, where their peerage presently ceaseth.

4. The statute is, That the trial for such treasons, &c. shall be in such manner and form, to all intents and purposes, as if they had been committed in England. Now if English peers commit treason in England, they shall, by the statute of Magna Charta, cap. 29. (yea by king John's Charter, and by the common law long before, as sir Edward Coke proves in his commentary upon it, and I have at large demonstrated in my (r) plea for the lords and house of peers) be tried only by their peers, and not by any ordinary jury, by English but not Irish peers, as I have formerly proved. Therefore the ground of saving trial by peers to peers of England by this act, is an unanswerable argument to deny such a trial here to any peers of Ireland by Irish or English peers.

5. The last words of this proviso determine the case in question without more dispute: 'Provided always, That if any peers of this realm happen to be indicted of any such treasons aforesaid by authority of this act, they shall have such trial by their peers, in such like manner as hath been heretofore accustomed.' It being always the custom of England (s) since Magna Charta, and long before, in cases of treasons at the king's suit, to try all English peers in England only by their peers, and such a privilege as (t) Sir Edward Coke holdeth, they cannot waive if they would, as it was adjudged in the Lord Dacre's Case, Pas. 28 H. 8, and since in the earl of Castlehaven's Case, 7 Car. But on the other side it is most certain, that it hath never been accustomed heretofore, that Irish or any other foreign peers should be tried for any treasons here committed by English, Irish or any other foreign country peers within the realm of England; nay, no one precedent of this kind was ever heard of; and it is an impossible thing in point of law, as I have proved: Therefore no such trial by any peers can be once thought of or imagined for the prisoner or any other peer of Ireland, within the purview or proviso of this act.

6. I shall add further, ex abundanti, to put this case out of all question, that I have made some cursory search into most of the Irish annals, histories, antiquities, statutes, upon this occasion, and I should have made a further inquisition had I enjoyed any vacant hours to do it, yet I cannot find so much as one precedent of any Irish peer tried in Ireland for treason, or any other offence, by his peers, before this statute of 35 H. 8, and I believe the prisoner's counsel cannot, (as indeed they neither did nor could) produce one example of such a trial there, by peers, before this law, nor any act of parliament in that realm before this statute concerning treasons, which provides, 'That Irish peers shall be tried by their peers, there being no such clause, or least hint thereof, to be found in the statutes of 18 H. 6, c. 2, 3, 10 H. 7, c. 13. 13 H. 8, c. 1. 28 H. 8, c. 1, 2, 7. which makes sundry offences treasons, and extend to and mention Irish lords and rebels by name, as well as commons; all and every of these acts leaving both the Irish peers and commons to the self-same trial by a Jury. And since this act I presume they cannot produce above one precedent, and that a very late one in case of treason, where an Irish peer was tried by his peers, and it was the case of lord Slane, much about twenty years since there tried and acquitted by his peers in Ireland, as I am informed; before which time it was then confessed by the judges there, that they never heard or read of any one such trial used in Ireland; and since it we have heard of no other trial there by peers to second it, but only of one noble lord, the lord of Valentia, viscount Norris, there extrajudicially condemned by mere martial law in a council of war, even in times of peace, by the earl of Strafford, A. D. 1635, but not executed, nor tried by his peers in a legal way; all their peers formerly being there either attainted by act of parliament, as is evident by the Irish statutes of 28 H. 3, c. 1. 3 and 4 Ph. and M. c. 2. 11 El. c. 1. 13 El. c. 6, 7. 27 Eliz. c. 1. 28 Eliz. c. 8, 9. 11 Jac. c. 4. 2 H. 6, rot. parl. n. 8, or executed by martial law, as soon as apprehended in the wars, or else slain in actual rebellion, or pardoned upon their submissions, without any trial for their treasons by their peers.

For attainders of Irish peers, and other traitors and rebels by act of parliament in Ireland, I find the earl of Kildare, with others, attainted for a treason and rebellion, much like this for which the prisoner stands here indicted in a parliament held at Dublin in Ireland, 28 H. 8, c. 1. Since this, in 11 Eliz. c. 1. Shan O'Neale, a bloody desperate rebel, was attainted by parliament after his death, (being hewn in pieces by the Scots) and the name of O'Neale extinguished. it being made high treason for any to assume that name; and I find a Mac-Mahon and Magwire forfeiting land among other rebels in that act; which largely sets forth the queen's title to Ireland. 27 Eliz. c. 1. James Eustace, viscount of Baltinglas, was attainted of high-treason for public rebellion against the queen. 28 Eliz. c. 9. I find John Brown, and near one hundred more Irishmen, by name attainted of high-treason by this act for an open rebellion. In 11 and 12 Jac. c. 4. I find Hugh earl of Tyrone, Jure earl of Tirconnell, Caconagh Magwire, MacMahon, and above twenty more chief Irish gentlemen, attainted of high-treason by this act, for their open rebellions. But for a trial of any Irish peer for any treason in Ireland by his peers, I can meet with no precedent as yet, but that of the lord Slane only, and shall be glad to be informed of any other to parallel it.

Indeed in the printed statute of 2 Eliz. c. 1, made in Ireland, for restoring to the crown the ancient jurisdiction over the state ecclesiastical and spiritual, and abolishing all power repugnant to the same, and in the statute of 2 Eliz. in Ireland, cap. 6, intituled, An act whereby certain offences are made high treason, I met with these two clauses concerning the trial of Irish peers for treasons only within these acts. "And if it shall fortune that any peer of this realm shall happen to be indicted of and for any offence that is made prenuire or treason by this act, that then the same peer or peers so being indicted, shall be put to answer for every such indictment before such peers of this realm, of English blood (not Irish, mark it) as by the lord deputy, governor or governors, of this realm, shall be by commission appointed under the broad seal, and to have his and their trial by his and their peers; and to receive and have such like judgment upon the same trial of his or their peers, or making open confession of the same offence or offences, as in other cases of treason or prenuire hath been used, or is used in other cases of high treason and misprision of treason;" which latter clauses, "as in other cases of prenuire and high treason hath been used," and, "as is used in other cases of high treason, or misprision of treason," relate only unto those words, "to receive and have like judgment upon trial;" and so only to the judgment and sentence given in these new treasons and offences enacted by these acts, not to the manner of trial by peers; which is merely a new kind of trial never mentioned in any other Irish acts before these, and restrained only to the new treasons and prenuires specified in these acts, in imitation of the (u) English statutes made in the self-same cases, which provide a trial by peers for our English peers; which was never heard of in any other acts of parliament in Ireland till these, and never practised that I read of in that realm, either before or since. To clear this up more fully, the statute of 11 E. 3, c. 4, makes mention of prelates, earls, and barons in Ireland, as well as in England: And the statute of 4 H. 5, c. 6, prohibits, "That any one of the Irish nation should be chosen to be an archbishop, abbot, or prior, within Ireland, because many of them, against a former act there made, had been made archbishops, bishops, abbots, priors, whereby they became peers of the parliament in the same land, and brought with them Irish servants to the parliaments and councils there holden, whereby the privities of the Englishmen within the same land have been, and be daily discovered within it to the Irish people rebels to the king, to the great peril and mischief of the king's lawful liege people in the same land." And the statute of 10 H. 7, in Ireland, c. 16, enacts, "That the spiritual and temporal lords of the land of Ireland shall appear in every parliament holden in that land in their parliament robes, in like manner and form as the lords of the realm of England appear in the parliaments holden within the said realm, under pain of forfeiting 100s. to the king." Which use of robes they had there for penury omitted by the space of 20 or 24 years. But there is no mention of any trial by their peers in these or any other English or Irish statutes, but those forfeited of 2 Eliz. c. 1 and 6. Yea the statute of 25 H. 6, in Ireland, c. 28, enacts, "For that there is a law established, That every lord that is called a lord of the parliament, in all pleas, personal as well as real, in which amerancements do lie, shall be amerced 100s. to the great impoverishment of the said lords, forasmuch as their livings are diminished and wasted by war: That no lord of parliament shall be amerced from thenceforward in the said pleas, otherwise than other persons, notwithstanding any law made before to the contrary." The amerancements therefore of Irish lords and commons being alike by this law, it is very probable their trials by jury were both alike, and that they were not tried by their peers.

Now the prisoner's counsel have pleaded in his plea, That Magna Charta gives the trial by peers in Ireland, and no other law but it; and that it was not accepted, received, confirmed, and used as a law in Ireland till the statute of 10 H. 7, and the words thereof, if it be confirmed by that act, are most clear in it, "That all statutes late made, &c. from henceforth be deemed, accepted, used, and executed within this realm of Ireland in all points;" and if it were made a law there by this statute 8 E. 4, c. 1. (which I rather believe) the words of that act are, "That from henceforth all other statutes and acts made by authority of parliament in England, be ratified, confirmed, and adjudged by authority of this parliament in their force and strength, from the 6th day of March." So as Magna Charta was not a general law in force, use, acceptance, or execution in Ireland, at least among the Irish, till 8 E. 4, or 10 H. 7, as is evident by these acts. Because I would leave nothing concealed or unanswered that might make for the prisoner's advantage, I must acknowledge that king Henry 3, in the first year of his reign, sent a roll of the liberties which his father king John and he had granted to this realm of England, unto Ireland, out of his special grace, by unanimous consent of all his lieges, and confirmed the same to all his spiritual and temporal lords and faithful subjects there, for their fidelity to him and him father, to them and their heirs for ever, as a signal badge of his favour, by this patent: (x) 'Rex, archiepiscopis, episcopis, abbatibus, comitibus, baronibus, militibus, et libere tenentibus et omnibus fidelibus suis per Hiberniam constitutis, salutem. Fidelitatem vestram in Domino commendantes, quam domino patri nostro semper exhibuistis, et nobis estis diebus nostris exhibiti; volumus quod in signo fidelitatis vestre tamen præclare tam insigniter Libertatibus regno nostro Anglie à patre nostro et nobis concessis, de gratia nostra et dono in regno nostro Hibernie gaudiat, vos et vestri in perpetuum: Quas distinctè in rotulum redactas, de communi consilio omnium fidelium nostrorum vobis mittimus, signatas sigillo domini Gulonis apostolicæ sedes legati, et fidelissimi, nostri Willielmi Marscalli (y) rectoris nostri et regni nostri, quia sigillum nondum habuimus; eisdem processu temporis majorem consilio proprio sigillo firmandas. After which king Henry having ratified the Great Charter of Liberties in England, in the 9th year of his reign (printed in all our statute books, and in Coke's 2 Institute), in the 12th year he commanded it, or rather that of pat. 6 Johan. reg. m. 6, to be published openly in Ireland by his writ; (a) 'Rex, dilecto et fidei suo R. Burgo. Justic. suo Hiberniæ, salutem. Mandamus vobis firmiter præcipientes, quatenus certo die et loco faciatis venire coram vobis, archiepiscopos, episcopos, abbates, priores, comites et barones, milites, et libere tenentes, et ballivos singulorum comitatum, et coram eis publice legi faciatis Cartam dom. regis Johannis patris nostri cui sigillum suum appensum est, quam fieri fecit jurari a magnatibus Hiberniæ, de legibus et consuetudinibus Angliæ observandis in Hibernia. Et præcipiatis eis ex parte nostra, quod leges illas et consuetudines in Carta prædicta contentas de cætero firmiter teneant et observent. In Coke's 3 Instit. f. 141, b. 4 Instit. p. 329, b. et in 18 H. 3, rot. par. m. 17, n. 21, there is mention made of 'consuetudines et leges regni nostri Angliæ, quas bonæ memoriæ dominus

In the 13th year of Henry 3, all laws and customs of England were established in Ireland by this (b) patent: 'Quia pro communi utilitate terræ Hiberniæ, et pro unitate terrarum, rex vult, et de communi consilio regni provisum est, quod omnes leges et consuetudines que in regno Angliæ tenentur in Hibernia teneantur, et eadem terra eisdem legibus subjaceat, et per eandem regatur, sicut Johan. rex cum ultimo esset in Hibernia, statuit et firmiter mandavit: Ideo volumus, quod omnia brevia de communi jure quæ currunt in Angliæ, similiter currant in Hibernia sub novo sigillo nostro, &c. Teste meipso apud Woodstock, 19 die Septemb.'

The patent of king John, which this patent mentions, is that of Rot. Pat. 6 Johan. regis, m. 6, n. 17, never yet printed. 'Rex, &c. justiciariis, baronibus, militibus, et omnibus fidelibus suis, &c. Sciatis quod dedimus potestatem Justiciariis nostris Hiberniæ, quod Brevia sua currant per terram nostram et potestatem Hiberniæ, scilicet Breve de Recto, de feodo dimidiis militis, et infra; et erit terminus de morte aut post transfretationem Henrici patris nostri de Hibernia in Angliam. Et Breve de nova disseisina, et erit terminus post prima Coronationem nostram apud Cant. Et Breve de Fugitivis et Nativis, et ejus erit terminus post captionem Dublin. Et Breve de divisis faciendis inter duas villas, exceptis baroniis: Et ideo vobis mandamus et firmiter præcipimus, quod hæc ita fieri et firmiter teneri per totam potestatem nostram Hiberniæ faciatis. Teste meipso apud Westm. 2 Novemb.'

In the 41st year of his reign, clause 41 H. 3, m. 11, dors. I find this memorable writ, touching the confirmation and customs of England settled in Ireland, by assent of the prelates and great men thereof: 'Rex, thesaurario et baronibus de scaccario Dublin, salutem. Quia de assensu et voluntate prælatorum et magnatum terræ Hiberniæ dudum fuit provisum et concessum, quod eisdem legibus uterentur in terra illa quibus homines regni nostri utuntur in regno illo; et quod eadem brevia quorundam terras et tenementa recuperanda currebant in terra illa, quæ currunt in regno prædicto, sicut nostis: et dicta provisio et concessio omnibus retroactis temporibus fuerint obtenta et approbata; miramur quamplurimum, quod sicut ex insinuatione venerabilis patris Thomæ Lismor. In the fifth year of king Edward 3, rot. Pat. 5 E. 3, parte 1, memb. 25, it was enacted, in a parliament that year in England, among other things, 'Quod una et eadem lex fiat tam Hibernicis quam Anglicis, excocta servitute vicagiorum penes dominos suos,' &c. by a parliament then holden in Ireland.

Yet notwithstanding all these patents, charters, acts, the benefit of the Great Charter, and of the liberties, laws, and customs of England, extended not to all Ireland, and the Irish therein dwelling, but only to such parts of Ireland as were reduced and divided into counties, and possessed by the English colonies, and to the Englishmen inhabiting in Ireland, and such Irish within the English pale as lived in due subjection and obedience to the kings of England, or were specially endenized by their patents to them, not to the Irish countries and colonies which were not reduced into counties, and under the obedience of the kings of England (amounting to more than two-third parts of Ireland in extent of ground) who had no benefit of the laws or liberties of England, but by special grants and charters of endenization from the kings of England, which some septs of the Irish and others purchased from our kings, as Sir John Davis proves at large in his Irish Reports, in the case of Tanistry, fol. 37, 38, 39, and the records there cited: to which

I shall add these following records, not mentioned by him, fully evidencing this truth. Claus. 37 H. 3, m. 15. Dors. 'Rex Justic. Hiberniæ salutem. Monstravit nobis Marmorth Oserthierim, et Rothericus frater ejus quod antecessores sui et ipse, licet Hibernicenses fuissent, semper tamen firmiter fuerunt ad fidem et servitium nostrum et prædecessorum nostrorum regum Angliæ, ad conquestum una cum Anglicis faciendum super Hibernienses. Et ideo vobis mandamus, quod si ita est, tunc non permittas ipsos Marmorth et Rothericum repelli, quin possint terras vendicare in quibus jus habent, sicut quilibet Anglicus. Quia si ipsi et antecessores sui sic se habuerunt cum Anglicis quamvis Hibernicenses, injustum est, licet Hibernienses sint, quod exceptione qua repelluntur Ibernenses a vendicatione terrarum et aliis repellantur. Teste, &c.'

By this Record it is apparent that all Irishmen but those whose ancestors joined with our kings in the conquest of Ireland, and were loyal subjects to our kings, had no benefit of the king's writs and laws to claim or recover lands in Ireland, in 37 H. 3.

Hereupon divers native Irishmen purchased several patents from our kings, granted out of special grace to enable themselves and their posterity to enjoy the benefit of the English laws in Ireland; for which I shall cite these few ensuing precedents, instead of many of like nature. evidence beyond contradiction, that the Great Charter, liberties, customs, and laws of England, granted to those of Ireland by King John, Henry 3, Edw. 1 and 3, extended only to the English subjects inhabiting Ireland, and to such Irish who lived in English counties in due subjection to the kings of England, or were by special charters of indemnization enabled to enjoy the benefit of them; who were but few, in consideration of the rest of the Irish nobility, gentry, and commons, retaining their ancient Brehon laws, and would not submit to the laws of England, nor government of our kings, against whom they frequently rebelled, being reputed rather enemies than rebels, and usually so styled in the statutes of Ireland, till the statutes of 33 H. 8, c. 9. as appears by the statutes of 18 H. 6, c. 3 25 H. 6, c. 4, 5. 28 H. 6,
c. 1. 3 E. 4, c. 2. 5 E. 4, c. 6. 18 E. 4, c. 2. 10
H. 7, c. 9, 10, 17, 19. 28 H. 8, c. 11. and by Sir John Davis's Irish Reports, in the case of Tanistry, fol. 39. the common laws and statutes of England being not universally received or established throughout the whole realm of Ireland, till after the statutes of 3 and 4 Phil. et Mar. c. 3. 11 Eliz. c. 9. and King James his Proclamation in the third year of his reign; or at leastwise till the statutes of 8 E. 4, c. 1. or 10 H. 7, c. 22. which established all the statutes made in England, concerning or belonging to the good of the same, only as to the Englishry, or English pale and counties, not to the Irishry, as the statutes of 17 H. 7, c. 8, 9, 10, 11, 13, 17, 19. 35 H. 6, c. 3. 5 Ed. 4, c. 3, 4, 5. 1, 3

H. 8, c. 3. 28 H. 8, c. 16. made in Ireland with other acts resolve, which the Lord Macguire confesseth in his plea, and his counsel cannot deny. Now the Lord Macguire being none of the English pale, or Irish septs, liege subjects to our kings, but of the Irishry, and professed enemies to our kings, as the Irish annals and statutes inform us: the statute of Magna Charta, and the laws, liberties, and customs of England, granted to the English and loyal Irish subjects in Ireland; and so this trial by peers could not extend to his ancestors till after the statutes of 8 E. 4, or 10 H. 7, and of 35 H. 8, c. 1, yea, after the statutes of 3 and 4
Phil. and Mar. c. 3. and 11 Eliz. c. 9. for reducing the Irishry into counties, and under the laws and statutes of England, to which they were not formerly subject. And from these patents of king John and Henry 3, fore-cited, and the statutes of 8 E. 4, and 10 H. 7, till 35
H. 8, cap. 1. no one precedent of any one Irish peer's trial by his peers in Ireland, in any case whatsoever, can be produced; therefore certainly there was no such trial known or in use in Ireland, before 35 H. 8, nor any precedent of it since, till one of late; and una hirundo non facit ver.

If then the peers of Ireland, before the making of this act of 35 H. 8, were never actually tried by their peers, for any treason done in Ireland, for aught can be proved, and there be no express act for any trial by peers there, for any treason, but only the act of 2 Eliz. c. 1, and 6, and that only for special treasons within those laws, which are none of those for which the prisoner stands here indicted; I may safely conclude, that this law of 35 H. 8, never intended to prescribe to Irish peers a trial by their peers in Ireland, which kind of trial was never before had, used, or practised in that realm; and therefore the prisoner shall be tried by an ordinary jury at this bar, not by his Irish peers; because, if he were in Ireland (for aught appears yet to me) he should not be tried by his peers there: and in both these points, the books in Dyer, the only authority which seems to be the strongest against, is for me, the words whereof are these in English: The grand chancellor of Ireland moved this question to the queen's counsel, If an earl or lord of Ireland, who commits treason in Ireland, by rebellion, shall be arraigned and put to his trial in England for this offence, by the statutes of 26 H. 8,
c. 13, 32 H. 8, c. 4. 35 H. 8. 2 or 3 E. 6.
And it was held by Wrey, Dyer, and Gerrard, attorney-general, that he could not: Mark now their reasons, for he cannot have his trial here by his peers (which is a full resolution in point of my third question, agreeing with what I have endeavoured with arguments to prove, and is an unquestionable truth, which I submit to). Then it follows, Nor can he be tried here by any jury of twelve; mark the reason, not because he is a peer of Ireland, and therefore ought to be tried by his peers, and not by a jury, for that had been full against me, and it is now the only knot in question, but because he is not a subject of England, but of Ireland, and therefore he shall be tried there; which reason, extending as well to an Irish commoner as peer, hath been since adjudged directly false, absurd, and against the law, both in Orouk's case, and in sir John Perrot's case, and since in Mac Mahon's case. And sir Edward Coke informs us in his Institutes on Lit. f. 261, that Wrey himself, in Orouk's case, where this opinion of his was vouched, did openly disclaim, that ever he delivered any such opinion as this, but ever held the contrary to it; and so it is a misreport in this particular: after which, the book concludes thus: And it is said, that the usage, to wit, in Ireland, to attain a peer, is by parliament, and not by peers, which comes full in terminis to what I have last insisted on, and, I am certain, cannot be disproved. Wherefore this authority in Dyer, as to all that is truth and law in it, is wholly for me, in the reason of the law, and against me only in what hath been since adjudged to be no law. I shall close up all with a stronger case and authority than this in question, which will over-rule this case, and that was in Trinity* Term, an. 33 H. 8, in the King's-bench: Edward lord Gray, immediately before having been lord deputy of Ireland, was indicted, arraigned, and attainted of high treason, by an ordinary jury in the King's bench, in England, for letting divers rebels out of the castle of Dublin, and discharging Irish hostages and pledges, that had been given for the securing the peace of Ireland; and not for punishing one who said, 'the king was an heretick,' whilst he was lord deputy in Ireland: for these treasons, all acted and committed in Ireland, though an English peer, he was tried by an ordinary jury in England, by the statute of 26 H. 8, c. 13, ratified in Ireland by 28 H. 8, c. 7, fore-cited; which secluded him from his trial by peers, being not saved by these acts: therefore a fortiori shall these statutes; and this of 35 H. 8, c. 2, and 5 E. 6, c. 1, made since his judgment, exclude this Irish lord, being no English peer, from any trial by his peers.

Finally, the prologue of this statute, coupled with the body thereof, puts a period to this question, beyond all doubt or dispute. "Forasmuch as some doubts and questions have been moved, that certain kinds of treasons, &c. committed out of the king's majesty's realm of England, cannot, nor may, by the common laws of this realm, be enquired of, heard, and determined within this his said realm of England; for a plain remedy, order, and declaration, therein to be had and made, be it enacted, &c. That all manner of treasons, &c. committed by any person or persons out of this realm of England, shall be from henceforth enquired of, heard, and determined by the king's justices of his bench, &c. by good and lawful men of the same shire, where the said bench shall sit and be kept, in like manner and form to all intents and purposes, as if such treasons had been done within the same shire, where they shall be so enquired of, heard, and determined." The sole scope, end, and purpose then of the king and parliament in this act, being to take away all doubts and questions formerly moved in point of law, touching the trial of treasons done out of the realm, before the king's Justices of his bench, and commissioners in England, by a Jury, and to make and enact a plain remedy and declaration therein for the future in manner aforesaid, I humbly apprehend, there can be no doubt nor question now moved, whether this prisoner ought to be tried by his peers in Ireland or England, for this his most horrid treason committed out of the realm of England; since this statute so clearly declares and resolves the contrary, in most plain and positive words. The rather, because the king's patent, creating him baron of Enniskillin, under the great seal of Ireland, maketh him only a peer in Ireland, and gives him only a place and voice among the peers and nobles of Ireland, in the parliaments of Ireland, not in England, as he sets forth in his own Plea (c), in precise terms; as the patent made by king Henry the 4th, to Robert Bold, created him baron of Rathlouth in Ireland, and constituted him, "Unum dominum et baronem omnium et singulorum parliamentorum et magnorum conciliorum nostrorum in terra nostra Hibernie tenendorum; Habendum, teuendum una cum stilo, titulo, nomine, honore, loco et sessione inde sibi et heredibus suis masculis imperpetuum." And as king H. 8, (d) made Thomas viscount Rochford, by the self-same patent, both earl of Wiltshire "infra regnum nostrum Anglie, and earl of Ormond, "in terra et domini nostro Hibernie" only, with several clauses of investitures; several habendums, and several creation-monies for each title and kingdom: And as the patents of all other Irish earls, viscounts, lords, and barons in Ireland, create and make them peers only in Ireland, not in England, as learned Mr. Selden informs us (c), and their very patents resolve in terminis; and therefore quite exclude the prisoner, and all other peers of Ireland, from any trial by their peers in England, either by the proviso or body of this statute, or their patents, which are point-blank against it.

And now, I hope, I have fully made good the point in question, with all the several branches of it, that this act extends to treason committed in Ireland; yes, to Irish peers, as well as to Irish commoners; and that there can be no trial at all upon it here of an Irish peer by Irish peers, nor in any place else within England, and that only, as the prisoner's case is by a Middlesex jury. And so I have finished my assertive part.

The first and grand objection is that which I meet with in the beginning of this prisoner's plea, the statute of Magna Charta, c. 29. "That no freeman shall be taken or imprisoned, or disseized of his freehold, &c. nor will we pass upon, or condemn him, but by the lawful judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land;" which law and statute is, among others, established for a law in the kingdom of Ireland, there to be put in ure at all times when need is, by the statute made in the parliament held at Droghedah in Ireland, in the tenth year of king Hen. 7, c. 22. and by virtue of these two laws he ought to be tried by his peers in, or of Ireland, in this suit against him by and for the king.

1. That the statute of Magna Charta, in its original creation and confirmation, was made and granted to the archbishops, bishops, abbots, priors, earls, barons, towns, and to all the Freemen of this our realm of England, and to them only, to be kept in our kingdom of England for ever, whence it is entitled, the Great Charter of the Liberties of England, as the prologue of it resolves. The first chapter thereof is peculiar to the church of England, viz. "That the church of England shall be free, and enjoy all her rights and liberties inviolable. We have also granted to our freemen of our realm of England, these liberties under-written, to have and to hold to them and their heirs, of us and our heirs for ever." So cap. 12. "The city of London shall have all her old liberties and customs, and all other cities, boroughs, towns, and the barons of the Cinque-ports, and all other ports, shall have all their liberties and customs." Cap. 35. "One measure of Wine, &c. shall be throughout our realm." Cap. 32. "All merchants, if they were not openly prohibited before shall have safe and sure conduct to depart out of England, to come into England, and to tarry in England, as well by land as by water, &c." In cap. 23. "All Weers shall be utterly put down between Thames and Medway, and throughout all England." And the conclusion, cap. 37, concerns the realm of England and Englishmen only. Neither doth the Charter of king John, nor that of the 11 of H. 3, nor 18 H. 3, rn. 17. nu. 21, nor of 30 H. 3, nor yet of 13 E. 1, cited in Coke's 4 Instit. p. 349 and 350, and in his Instit. on Littleton, f. 141, establish Magna Charta at least in relation to all the native Irish, but English alone, it being made particularly for the realm of England, and Englishmen; and therefore the prisoner pleads, it was settled there only as a law to be received and put in use, in respect of the Irish then living only in the English pale, and the king's loyal subjects, not of any Irish enemies in hostility by the statute of 10 H. 7, cap. 22, but not before: And so is sir Edward Coke's opinion, in express terms, in his 4 Institut. p. 351.

By which it is most clear, that from king

Henry 2nd's days, who first subdued Ireland, A. D. 1171, there were no trials in Ireland of any English or Irish peers, subjects to our kings, for treason by their Irish peers, by virtue of Magna Charta, till after the statute of 10 H. 7, which was made but forty-six years before the statute of 35 H. 8, between which, and this later law, we read not of one trial of any Irish peer for treason there by his peers, nor yet since, that I can find, but only one of late by 2 El. c. 1, 6, till this very day; by which it is most apparent, that this trial by peers in Ireland, a privilege now insisted on, was never actually claimed or enjoyed by any peer of Ireland, especially by those in antient enmity and rebellion against our kings, stiled enemies in the Irish statutes, and English records, before the statute of 35 H. 8, and so it can be no prejudice, nor injustice at all, nor breach of Magna Charta, to out the prisoner of it.

2. It may be questioned upon very good reasons, Whether the statute of 10 H. 7, cap. 22, doth confirm this statute of Magna Charta in Ireland, or not? At least as to Irish peers, especially those of the old Irish blood, to whom it relates not, as I have proved in the point of trial by peers, and that upon these grounds.

First, Because the words of that statute are not, That all laws made in England, shall be confirmed, received, and executed in Ireland in all points; but, that "all statutes late made within the realm of England, concerning or belonging to the commonweal, [not peers], of the same, shall henceforth be deemed good and effectual in law, and received and executed in this realm of Ireland." Now Magna Charta being no law then late made within this realm, but made at least 271 years before it, can hardly (without much straining of the words beyond their proper meaning) be brought within the compass of this act; though sir Edward Coke, in his fourth Institute, p. 351, informs us, That Hil. 10 Jac. it was resolved by the two Chief-Justices and Chief-Baron, that this word 'late,' in this act, hath the sense of 'before,' and shall not be taken in its proper sense or meaning: So that the act, by this construction, against the sense of the words, extends to Magna Charta, and to all the acts of parliament made in England, not only 'late,' but even long 'before,' yea, many hundred years before this act; which, for my part, under the favour of those reverend judges, who thus interpret it, I hold still disputable, yea, erroneous, and no law at all, especially for these two reasons:

1. Because if any law introduced and confirmed Magna Charta, and the other laws of England in Ireland, it is the statute of 8 E. 4, c. 1, which confirms the statute made in England, in the parliament of 6 R. 2, c. 6, concerning Rapes, of which there was some doubt made, whether it extended to Ireland? and then concludes thus; "In avoiding all inconvenience that might happen, because of the mbiguity of the said statute, Be it enacted, confirmed, and ratified by authority of the said parliament, That the said statute be adjudged and approved in force and strength, and may be of force in this land, from the 6th day of March last past; and that from henceforth, be said act, and all other statutes and acts, made by authority of parliament within the realm of England, be ratified, confirmed, and adjudged by authority of this parliament, in their force and strength, from the said 6th day of March." So that this law, if any at all, confirmed Magna Charta, and all the statutes made by authority of parliament in England, to be in force and use in Ireland, (yet only as to the English and Irish subjects under the king's obedience; and none else, as I have proved), and this statute of 10 H. 7, which confirms only the statutes lately made, must needs doth, in truth and reason, relate only to the laws made in England since that statute of E. 4, c. 1, not formerly there confirmed by that act: So that the prisoner's plea, That Magna Charta was confirmed by 10 H. 7, is but a mere mistake, and a void plea; neither do the judges here bound to take notice of his Irish act of 8 E. 4, c. 1, unless pleaded by the prisoner, being no law of this kingdom, and not binding here.

2. Because the forementioned charters of Joh. 12, and 30 H. 3, &c. confirming the use of the laws of the realm of England in Ireland, did not extend to settle Magna Charta here, (at least-wise not as to the benefit of the natural Irish, but to the English and the Irish within the English pale alone) as is agreed by Sir Edward Coke, and in a manner resolved by this act of 10 H. 7, as the words thereof, "From henceforth be deemed good and effectual in the law, and over that be used, accepted, and executed within the land of Ireland, in all points, at all times requisite," import. And if those charters extended not to Magna Charta, which are fuller than this act, I doubt this law will hardly do it.

3. Admit the law of 10 H. 7, extends to Magna Charta in some particulars thereof formerly used in Ireland, yet it reacheth not to the trying of Irish peers by their peers now in question, for these ensuing reasons:

1. Because trial of Irish peers by their peers in Ireland, was never used or heard of, nor is here any one instance to be found before or since Magna Charta, till 10 H. 7, which there settled that Great Charter for a law, nor from 10 H. 7, till 35 H. 8, nor since that, but of late, in one case only, about 20 years since, till this instant. Now what Littleton notes of the statute of Merton, Sect. 108. "That no action can be brought upon that statute for a disparagement, for that since the making of it, it was never seen or heard, that any such action was brought upon it against the guardian; and if any such action might have been brought upon this matter, it will be intended, that some time it would have been put in ure." The like shall I say concerning

Magna Charta, and the trial of Irish peers by their peers in Ireland, That if the trying of Irish peers by their peers had been the common law of Ireland; or if the Magna Charta, and 10 H. 7, had established it there for a law, it would some time or other have been there put in ure, and some peers there would have claimed and enjoyed this their privilege in point of trial: But since it was never yet in use there, I thought I find, nor any one can prove before 35 H. 8. I cannot deem it the common law, nor privilege of the peers of Ireland, but the peculiar privilege of our English peers, both by the common statute-law, and great charter of England, and no trial of right incident to Irish peers, as it is to English: therefore this kind of trial neither is confirmed to, nor intended to be conferred on Irish peers by Magna Charta, which is but a confirmation only of our common laws of England, and no introduction of any new law here; and so should introduce no new law there, but confirm the common laws and customs there formerly used, and so the trial by peers is not there settled in respect of the Irish peers, by the statute of 10 H. 7. Now that which principally confirms me in this opinion, is the two special acts of parliament, made in Ireland in 2 Eliz. c. 1, and 6, already cited, which create a special form of trial of Irish peers, not by their peers there of Irish blood, but by their peers of that realm, of the English blood alone; only in the new treasons and premunires specified in, and created by those two acts, but in no other treasons: which clauses had been merely nugatory and superfluous, had the trial of Irish peers in Ireland, by Irish peers, been the birth-right, and known privilege of Irish peers, either by the common law there used, or by the custom of Ireland, or by Magna Charta, with this act of 10 H. 7, confirming it. It therefore never being the intent of this act, nor of Magna Charta, to grant any new privilege, or form of trial, to Irish peers, which they never formerly enjoyed, neither the one nor other will sufficiently support the prisoner's plea, nor indulge him any trial here or there by his peers of Ireland, at least of Irish blood, for so horrid a treason as this; which I hope is a satisfactory answer to this objection, since custom is the best expositor of all ancient laws, as Sir Edward Coke declares in his Commentary on Littleton, Sect. 108, f. 81, b.

4. Admit the objection true, That Magna Charta extends to Ireland, by virtue of this act of 10 H. 7, so far as to give Irish peers, in Ireland, (though not of the English pale) a trial by their peers, which they had not before its confirmation there; yet then I answer, That this statute of 35 H. 8, c. 2, upon which the prisoner is arraigned, by making all treasons done and perpetrated in Ireland triable in England, when there is just occasion, (as now there is, in this time of a universal, horrid rebellion, and in sundry other fore-mentioned respecta) repeals this clause of Magna Charta, and deprives the prisoner of the benefit of his peerage, if at all conferred on him by it, and the act of 10 H. 7 since it is most certain, that statutes made in the parliaments of England, (being the supreme kingdom and court, to which Ireland, and its courts, are subordinate, and whose erroneous judgments in their high courts and parliaments there, were only reversible here in England, in the King's-bench and parliament of England, as is evident by Claus. 7 H. 3, par. 2, m. 10, and Claus. 29 E. 3, m. 12. 8 H. 6, rot. Parl. n. 69, Coke's 4 Instit. p. 356. Mr. St. John's Argument at law, at Strafford's Att. Rushworth, vol. 8, p. 696, 698. Keilway, f. 202, b. Br. Error, 127, Fitz. Nat. Bre. f. 24, Co. 7 Rep. f. 18, a. Calvin's case, do oblige those of Ireland, not only before, but ever since 10 H. 7, when Ireland is either particularly named, or generally included, as is agreed by Rastal's Abridgment, Title Ireland, 11 E. 3, c. 2, and 10 E. 3, ch. 8. 4 E. 4, ch. 1, 5 H. 7, ch. 8. 14 H. 4, Rastal Parceners 2, 27 E. 3, of the staple, ch. 1, 18. 14 Eliz. ch. 5. 1 H. 7, ass. 3. 3 H. 7, fol. 10. 2 R. 3, f. 12, and Coke's 7 Rep. Calvin's case, f. 17, 22, 23. 4 Instit. p. 35, it being so resolved, as to this purpose, by all the judges of England, in Orouk's, and sir John Perrot's cases, cited in Calvin's case, and adjudged in Mac-Mahon's case, tried at this bar the last term, that this act of 35 H. 8, c. 2, binds those of Ireland, for treasons there committed, and makes them subject to a trial here, whether peers or commoners, as I have already proved.

5. It is unquestionable, That every commoner of Incl and hath as large, as full an interest in Magna Charta, the laws and privileges of England and Ireland, and as much right to be tried in Ireland, for treasons there committed, by an Irish jury, as any peer in Ireland hath in or by them to be tried there by his peers, these laws being no respecters of persons, and every man's birth-right alike, of commons as much as of peers, as the laws and great charter of England are; Magna Charta being as largely made, and as amply granted to the meanest freeman, as to the greatest peers of England and Ireland, as the prologue and 9, 14, 15, 19, 21, 22, 26, 27, 29 chapters thereof resolve.

Since then this act of 35 H. 8, chap. 2, doth, without all controversy, (as hath been resolved in the fore-cited case) deprive the commoners of Ireland of a trial in Ireland by Irish commoners, and subjects them to a trial by an English jury here, for treasons there committed; for which, by the common law, the customs of Ireland, and Magna Charta, before the statute of 26 H. 8, and this act of 35 H. 8, they could be no where tried, but only in Ireland, not in England, as is collected from the case of sir Elias Ashburnham, Tr. 18 E. 3, coram Rege, rot. 14, cited by sir Edward Coke, in his 4 Instit. p. 356, (the principal case that can be objected against me, which makes nothing to the purpose, being long before these statutes were made :) Therefore, by the self-same reason, it shall take away the trial of Irish peers in Ireland and Eugland by Irish or English peers, for treasons perpetrated by them in Ireland, and subject them to a trial by an ordinary English jury at this bar, or before commissioners in any county of England, as I have already proved; which jury here are, in truth, peers to all Irish peers, being here no peers at all, but only commoners.

If it be objected, that this law of 35 H. 8, c. 2, cannot abrogate Magna Charta, all acts and judgments against Magna Charta being declared void, by 25 E. 1, c. 1, 2, 4. 28 E. 1, c. 1, and 42 E. 3, c. 1, therefore it shall not take away the trial by peerage from Irish peers:

I answer, 1. That you may, by like reason, object, that it cannot take away a trial in Ireland, by an Irish jury, from Irish commoners, seeing it cannot repeal Magna Charta, and the common law. But this objection is yielded, and adjudged idle, in case of an Irish commoner; therefore it is, and must be so in case of an Irish peer.

2. The objected statutes do make void and null all acts and statutes made against Magna Charta, before the parliaments wherein they were made; but they extend not at all to future real parliaments and their acts, subsequent parliaments having always had power to controul, alter, and abrogate precedent acts; yea, the very common law, and Great Charter itself, when inconvenient or defective, as all our books accord: therefore sir Edward Cook, in his 4 Institute, p. 42, resolves, and proves at large, by 11 R. 2, c. 3. 5 rot. Parl. n. 22, 48, 49. 1 H. 4, c. 3. 2 H. 4, c. 22. 21 R. 2, c. 16. 1 H. 4, n. 48, 70. 144, 21 R. 2, n. 20, 21, 36, 37, 85, 86, 89, 90, that 'acts, (yea, and oaths) against the lawful power of subsequent parliaments, that they shall not repeal such and such laws (though mischievous or unjust) bind not at all, and are merely idle: for 'eodem modo 'quo quid constituitur dissolvitur; those who have power to make any laws, having as great, as full a power to controul, alter, or repeal them, when they see cause and necessity for it; as you may read in Rastal's and Poulton's Abridgements of Statutes, and the statutes at large, repealing former acts; and how often Magna Charta hath been altered, supplied or (A) repealed, in some particulars, in and by our parliaments, since its making, by subsequent acts, both by prescribing, creating new imprisonments, forfeitures, corporal punishments, fines, executions, treasons, capital offences, customs, and imposts, not then known, or different ways, or places of trial, not then in use, in cases of foreign treasons, and the like, by a jury in England, not then usual, but since confirmed by the statutes of 26 H. 8, c. 13. 28 H. 8, c. 25. 33 H. 8, c. 27. 35 H. 8, c. 2. 5 and 6 E. 6, c. 11, contrary to, or (i) different from Magna Charta, and the common law, 2 E. 6, c. 24, is so well known to all lawyers, that I will not spend breath to prove it.

3. I answer, that this act of 35 H. 8, doth both alter, and in some sort, repeal Magna Charta, and the common law, as to the point and place of trying foreign treasons in England itself, as to English peers and commoners, to whom alone the great charter was first granted, they being not triable in England, by jury or peers, for any foreign treasons, by the common law, or great charter. Therefore, a fortiori, it must both alter and repeal the common law and great charter, as to Irish subjects, for whom the Great Charter was never originally made, nor yet directly confirmed to them by 10 H. 7. but only implicitly and doubtfully at most, as I have proved.

4. I answer that this act of 35 H. 8, doth no ways abrogate or alter Magna Charta, in truth or reality, but rather ratify and confirm it, in the form and manner of this trial, though not in the place: for Macguire being only a peer in Ireland, but not in England, every freeman of England, that shall be impannelled to try him, is, in truth and law, his peer here. And this act, enacting that he shall be tried, not by martial law, or the judges themselves, but by good and lawful men of the shire where the King's-bench shall sit, who are his equals and peers in England, and saving the trial by peers to every peer of this realm, after his indictment found by jury. This way and form of trial, by jury in England, being then and now the law of the land, is no contradiction or repeal at all, but a direct pursuit and confirmation thereof, according to its letter and meaning. And so much in answer to this grand objection, wherein I have been over-tedious, but shall recompence it with brevity in the remainder.

That if Irish peers should be triable by an ordinary jury within this law, for treasons done in Ireland, this might prejudice the whole nobility of Ireland, who, by colour of this act, might be sent for out of Ireland, and tried here for treasons, misprisions, and concealments of treasons there committed, and so quite deprived of their birth-right of trial by their peers, which would be of dangerous consequence.

I answer, 1. That I have manifested, that this trial by peers was never deemed, claimed, nor enjoyed in Ireland, as a privilege, by Irish peers, nor ever used or practised in that land before this act, and but once claimed since, and that in Ireland; therefore it cannot be intended, that this statute, or the makers of it, ever imagined to save this manner of trial by peers only to Irish peers, which they never enjoyed, nor so much as once claimed or possessed before the making of it. Neither can it be any injury or injustice to deprive them of that now, they never heretofore claimed, used, or enjoyed, as their privilege, or birthright, being not indubitably settled on them by any law that I have seen: but only in some special cases of treason, since 35 H. 8, whereof this is none, by the late acts of 2 Eliz. c. 1 and 6, when as this privilege is taken from them, not by a bare-strained exposition or implication, but by this express act of parliament made long since for the common good and safety of England and Ireland, not yet repealed.

2. This objection, with as great or greater strength and colour, might be made for all the commons of Ireland, (far more numerous and considerable than their peers) they being deprived by it of trials by Irish juries in their native country than for Irish peers alone; which trial here against Irish commons, was never of late excepted against, this law having been so often adjudged to reach to them: therefore there is no colour to exempt Irish peers out of it.

3. This pretended prejudice to Irish peers, in point of trial by their peers, is solely in cases of high treason, or misprision and concealments of it, and no other, the statute extending to no crimes, but these alone therefore the mischief is not great in general; and no Irish peers, I presume, but such who have traitorous or disloyal hearts, will deem it a disparagement, or injustice to them, to be secluded of a trial by their peers, only in these cases of high-treason; and if others, who are professed rebels and traitors, murmur at it, (as none else will) we need not much regard it, nor prefer their pretended privilege, before our own kings, kingdoms, religions, yea, Ireland's safety and welfare, in bringing them to a speedy trial and condign punishment for their treasons here in England, by virtue of this law.

4. Even by the very common law, before this act, treasons committed in Ireland by peers or commons, were triable before the marshal of England, in England itself, as is evident by the parliament roll of 2 H. 6, p. 9, (k) where John lord Talbot, being the king's lieutenant in Ireland, accused James Bottiler, earl of Ormond, of certain treasons (there particularly recited) by him committed in Ireland, before John duke of Bedford, constable of England, in his marshal's court; which accusations the king, by the advice of his parliament, did discharge and abolish, to appease the differences between them; upon which else he might have been proceeded against, though an Irish peer, without any trial by his peers (see Coke's 4 Instit. p. 123, 124.) Therefore a fortiori this special act of parliament may subject Irish peers to a trial by a substantial English jury in England, for treasons done in Ireland, since triable for them here before its making even in the marshal's courts.

5. This statute doth not simply take away the trial of all treasons committed in Ireland, from thence, only it makes them all triable here, when the king, state, and parliament shall see just cause or occasion for trial of them here, as now they do in these times of general rebellion there, when the rebels are so predominant, and the times such, that no safe, fair, or indifferent trial of this traitor, can be there had or expected: and seeing the law and common reason will inform every man, that the king and state will never be at the cost and trouble to send for traitors and witnesses out of Ireland, to try them here, but upon a most just occasion, and urgent necessity, to prevent either a failure or delay of justice, in case of horrid treasons and rebellions: and no Irish peer, who hath any loyalty in his heart, or reason in his head, will deem it a dishonour or prejudice to the whole Irish peerage in general, or the traitorous peers, sent hither to be tried, in particular to be outed of a trial by Irish peers, in such cases of necessity, and expediency only; it being better and safer for this realm, and Ireland too, that these native Irish peers, who have been proved to break out into actual rebellion, in all ages, (as this prisoner's ancestors have done, as much, or more than any, his (1) grandfather being the first man that broke forth in Tyrone's rebellion) should be subject to trials for the same, by ordinary English juries here and outed of their peerage, than that such arch-traitors and rebels, as the prisoner and his confederates are, (guilty of the effusion of many thousands of Protestants and Englishmen's bloods) should escape uncondemned, or be executed by martial law. And our law, in this case, which concerns the safety of two kingdoms at once, will rather suffer a particular mischief, especially to rebellious peers, than a general inconvenience to both realms, and all loyal subjects in both.

6. Though the trial of all English and Irish peers, by a legal indictment, presentment, and jury of their peers alone, and not by martial law or commissioners themselves alone, be an essential, fundamental right and privilege, for the security of their lives and estates, which our parliaments, in all ages, have been very curious to preserve, and not to alter; yet the trial of peers by peers alone, (not by a jury of other freemen) for the most part, (if rightly considered) is rather a mere punctilio of honour, than matter of real privilege or benefit to peers; and by intendment of law and common experience, a fair and legal trial, by the oaths of twelve honest, substantial, indifferent English gentlemen, or freeholders, to whom the prisoner may take all sorts of lawful challenges by law (m), which shall be allowed, if there be any just cause of suspicion of partiality, injustice, consanguinity, &c. besides his peremptory challenge of thirty-five jurors, without cause, (which challenges, (n) Cook affirms, shall not be admitted, or granted, in case of trial by peers) it being the usual, ancient (o) trial, in all cases between the king and ordinary subjects, between man and man, peers and commoners, both in all civil and criminal causes whatsoever, it is, and will be every way as just, as beneficial to a peer, in point of law, as a trial by twelve peers, upon their honours only, (p) without oath: and the exchange only of the form of trial, by twelve indifferent English gentlemen of quality, upon their oaths, for twelve Irish peers of English blood, nominated and appointed only by the king, or his (q) lord deputy of Ireland, upon their honours, without oath, in this case of necessity, can be no injustice, injury, or prejudice to the Irish peers in general, nor yet to the prisoner in particular: the rather, if we consider,

1. That every indictment, by which an English, or Irish peer, is, or can be tried, must first be proved before a grand jury of commons, as this very statute prescribes, and found by them upon oath, not by a jury of peers, which is a kind of preparatory trial of a peer by jury, without which there can be no proper trial by peers, as is resolved, Coke's 3 Institute, p. 27, 30, 31, 32, and 1 H. 4, 1.

2. That in cases of appeal (r) brought by a

In this our books are express in point, cited in Coke's 2 Institute on this very chapter of Magna Charta, ch. 29. in his pleas of the crown, or 3 Instit. c. 2, p. 30, 31, and 20 Ed. 4. 6, b. Now this case in question concerning not only the king, but the whole kingdom of England and Ireland, and those many thousands of common persons whose innocent blood hath been shed in Ireland by him and his confederate rebels, crying out for vengeance and justice against him without delay; he may thereupon be justly tried by an ordinary jury of commons, as well as in case of an appeal of murder brought by a common person.

3. Peers of Parliament, even of this realm, not by inherent nobility and birth-right, but only in right of their baronies, which they hold in auter droit, as archbishops, bishops, abbots, priors, and the like, shall not be tried by their peers for treasons, or felonies at the king's suit, but only by an ordinary jury; as archbishop Scroope of York, Crammer archbishop of Canterbury, (s) Adam de Orilton, or Tarlton, bishop of Hereford, Mark, bishop of Carlisle, Fisher bishop of Rochester, and others were tried, 3 Ed. 3, f. 6, Kelway's Reports, f. 181. Stamford's Pleas of the Crown, f. 135. Crompton's Jurisdiction of Courts, f. 12, 19. Hall's Chron. 6 H. 4, f. 25, Co. 3 Inst. f. 36. Now if these very English peers, to whom Magna Charta was immediately granted by name of archbishops, bishops, abbots, being the first persons mentioned in the prologue and ch. 1 and 29 of this charter, shall be outed of their peerage in these cases of indictment at the king's suit, though within the very letter of Magna Charta, because they are no peers of England by blood or birth-right, but in right of their churches, then, a fortiori, Irish peers shall be deprived of their peerage by this special act, who are not within the letter or intent of Magna Charta, never made for them, but for English noble blood. And if it be neither injustice nor injury, nor inconvenience, to deprive these ecclesiastical English peers of a trial by peers in cases of treason or felony at the king's suit, though within the letter of Magna Charta, and to try them by an indifferent jury of freeholders; it cannot be reputed any injustice, injury, prejudice, or inconvenience at all now to out this Irish peer of his peerage here, where he is no native peer, for such a horrid treason as this.

4. Irish peers are no peers at all in England; upon which account and reason if they commit treason here, they shall be tried by an ordinary jury: Therefore to try them only by freeholders, not by peers, in England, can be no injury nor dishonour to their peerage, unless it were in Ireland where they are peers; and yet have been seldom or never hitherto tried there by their peers, as I have proved.

5. The very statutes of Ireland itself, made by the peers and commons thereof to prevent many mischiefs by thieves, murderers, and rebels in that realm, do deprive both the lords and commons there of any legal trial at all both for their lives and estates too; witness the statutes 28 H. 6, c. 1. 3 et 5 E. 4, c. 12, and expose them to the judgment, slaughter, and plunder of particular men, in some cases, authorizing "all manner of men that find any thieves robbing, breaking up houses by day or night, or going or coming to rob or steal, having no faithful man of good name and fame in their company, in English apparel, to take and kill those thieves, though peers, and cut off their heads, without indictment or jury, and seize their goods, without any impeachment of the king, his heirs, officers, or any other, for which they are to receive a sum of money from every plow-land and person of estate within the barony where they shall slay and behead such thieves." And 25 H. 6, c. 4, and 5. "If any Englishman shall have any hair or beard upon his upper lip like the Irish, it shall be lawful for every man to take their goods, as Irish enemies, and to ransom them as enemies: and if any Irish enemies received to the king's allegiance, shall afterwards rob, spoil, and destroy the king's liege people, it shall be lawful for every liegeman that may meet with him afterwards, to do with him, and his goods and chattles, as to enemies who were never liege, and to ransom them at their free will, without any impeachment of the law." And ch. 6. "If any men, except knights and prelates, shall wear gilded bridle, peytrels, or other harness, that it shall be lawful to every man that will to take the said man, his horse and harness, and to possess the same as his own goods, without indictment or legal trial." All which would be monstrous in England. Therefore it is much more legal and just, and no injury at all, to try the prisoner, an arch-rebel, in England (t), in the time of war and combustion in Ireland, for his treasons there perpetrated, by an indifferent, honest, lawful, English jury, upon an indictment found by the grand inquest, than thus to kill or behead such malefactors in Ireland, and seize both them and their goods as enemies, and ransom them at pleasure, without trial, jury, or indictment, and not only to indemnify but reward those that do it, by laws there made by the English and Irish themselves; which will answer all objections, and wipe off the least shadow of injustice in this case and trial.

The third objection is this, That if Irish peers had been within this law, there being so many rebellions in Ireland since its enacting, we should have had some precedents of Irish peers here tried by jury ere this; but there is no such precedent extant; therefore certainly Irish peers, for treasons perpetrated in Ireland, are out of this act.

To this I answer, 1. That no Irish peers have been tried by their peers in Ireland for treasons since this act; ergo they are within it.

2. That this argument is merely fallacious, and non-concludant; for the reasons why no Irish peers have been tried here since this law by virtue of it, is not because they were not deemed within it, but for other reasons.

1. Because most of the Irish peers who have been in actual rebellion since this law, were (u) either actually slain in the wars, or died the kingdom, or else were received into grace, and pardoned before trial upon their submissions; or else attainted and executed by act of parliament, or by martial law in Ireland. And by these means only avoided their trials here.

2. Because some Irish rebels, as great as Maguire, or any of their peers, in power and estate, have been heretofore tried and executed for treasons in England by virtue of this law, though brought over hither from Ireland against their wills: as O'Rourke and sir John Perrot of old, and Mac-Mahon the last term; and the trials of these three here are direct precedents in point, and good warrant by this very act for the trial also of this Irish peer, as I have proved.

3. The statute is not very ancient, yet still in as full force as ever; and if this be the first precedent of an Irish peer that came judicially in question here in England, to be tried upon it since its making, it is no argument he is out of this law, but rather an inducement to make him a leading precedent to those rebellious peers of that nation, who have been the ring-leaders of the ordinary commons there in this grand rebellion, there being no precedent, judgment, nor solid reasons against it; yea some judgments in case of Irish commons, and many unanswerable reasons, for it.

The fourth objection is, The opinion of the book in Dyer, f. 360. 1, forreited, recited in Compton's Jurisdiction of Courts, f. 23, a. and Mr. St. John's argument at law at Strafford's attainder, That an Irish peer cannot be tried here in England for treason done in Ireland, neither by his peers nor by a jury; because he is no subject of England.

To this I have already given an answer, and shall here only add, 1. That the only reason given in the book hath been since several times adjudged to be no reason at all nor law by all the judges of England, a subject of Ireland being a subject of the king of England in all places, as is adjudged in Calvin's case, and that Wrey disclaimed any such opinion delivered by him as is there reported. Therefore the reason of this opinion being adjudged erroneous, and no law, the opinion itself grounded on it must needs be so too; the rather, because the opinion there cited was upon a case casually put and moved out of court by way of discourse, without study or argument, and suddenly delivered only by Dyer and Gerrard (since Wrey disclaimed it), but not given upon any cause actually depending or debated and argued in court. 2. That it is a full authority for me, both because it determines there can be no trial of an Irish peer by his peers in England but only by a jury; and that in Ireland itself peers are not used to be tried by peers, but attainted by act of parliament; therefore an authority point-blank against the prisoner's plea.

The fifth objection is, Orourk's case; which in Judge Anderson's own book of reports is put thus: Whether Orourk, an Irish subject, and no peer or baron of Ireland, might be tried by this act here in England for treasons committed in Ireland? Which words 'nient esteant 'un peer ou baron de Ireland,' in the putting of the case, seem to intimate, that in that case the opinion of the judges was, That an Irish peer was not within this act.

To which I shall return this brief answer, That this clause, Not being a peer or baron in Ireland, in the putting of that case, was only a description of the quality of his person, he being no peer or baron of that realm, not any point in or part of the case, there being not one syllable in the whole debate or argument of it, by way of admission, or otherwise, that an Irish peer was not within this act: and in this very case the judges resolved the book in Dyer to be no law, and Wrey disclaimed any such opinion of his therein reported, as Sir Edward Coke's Institutions on Littleton, fol. 261. b. record.

The sixth objection is this (intimated in an Order of the Lords House) That this may concern the peers of England; for this law for trying foreign treasons is enacted in Ireland; and so, by colour of it, English peers may be sent over into Ireland, to be tried there by a jury of Irish commons, for treasons done in England, as well as Irish peers sent thence to be tried by ordinary juries here in England for treasons committed in Ireland.

I answer, 1. That there is no such law extant in Ireland, that I can find, among all their printed statutes; so as this is a vain surmise.

But, 2. If there were any such law there, yet England, being the supreme realm to Ireland, may make laws in the parliament here to bind the Irish peers and commons; but the parliament in Ireland, being a (x) subordinate realm to England, never yet did, nor can make any laws at all to bind any English peers or commons for things done in England, until the rebels there shall be able to conquer England (which I hope they never shall) as we have conquered them. Therefore we need not fear any such obliging laws of theirs, or the trial of English peers in Ireland. So as this vain fancy is quite out of doors, and the lords themselves, upon conference with the commons, have been fully satisfied that this case no ways concerneth the peers of England, whose trial by their peers is by direct proviso saved to them in this act, and therefore cannot come in question, or be taken from them by pretence of any such law established in Ireland: whereupon they have reserved their order, which seemed to give some colour for this objection.

Pat. 48 H. 3, pars 1. m. 8. I find this memorable record: 'Rex, &c. omnibus salutem. Cum secundum consuetudinem hactenus in Hibernia obtentam, utlagati in regno nostro Angliæ pro utlagatis in Hibernia haberi non conueverunt, et Gregorius le Sommer, ratione utlagarie in ipsum promulgatæ in regno nostro Angliæ, nuper captus fuit in Hibernia et in Angliam reductus et imprisonatus; nolumus quod fidelibus nostris Hiberniæ aliquod præjudicium ex hoc in posterum gravetur. In cujus, &c. Teste rege apud Turrim London, 26 die Junii.' If Englishmen, outlawed in England, could not by the law and custom of Ireland be taken upon a capius utlagatum in Ireland, or reputed as outlawed persons there, as this patent resolves, much less can they there be tried for any treasons acted in England by colour of this law, nor can our English peers be there tried for treasons here by an Irish jury.

A seventh objection, which I have heard made by some, is as vain and absurd as the former: That if Irish peers be within this act for treasons done in Ireland, then by the same reason peers in Scotland might be sent for and brought into England, and there tried by an ordinary jury by virtue of this law, for treasons done in Scotland; which would be a great prejudice to the peers of Scotland, and the privileges of that kingdom.

I answer, 1. That this act extends not to any treasons of Scots lords or commons committed or acted in Scotland, and triable there, though it reach to Irish lords and Ireland.

1. Because this act was made long before the Union betwixt England and Scotland, by 1 Jac. c. 2. 3 Jac. c. 3. 4 Jac. c. 1. and 16 Caroli; whilst that Scotland was under the absolute and immediate power of its own king, and not of the kings of England; and so it cannot extend to them.

(x) See Croke's Rep. p. 264, 511, 512.

2. Scotland, although the (y) kings of it have often done homage to the kings of England in ancient times (as their sovereign lords) was still an absolute, independent kingdom in this respect of being subject only to and governed by its own parliaments and laws; but not subordinate to nor governed by the laws or parliaments of England, which never bound them heretofore, nor now, as they did and do Ireland; their laws and statutes and ours still continuing different. Therefore this act neither did nor could bind the Scots peers or commons in point of trial here for treasons committed in Scotland, as it binds the Irish (still subject to our laws and parliaments) for treasons done in Ireland.

3. The very acts of pacification (x) between both kingdoms, and the solemn league and covenant passed this parliament here and in Scotland too (which do specially reserve the trials of all traitors and delinquents of their kingdom to their trial and judicatory only of their own parliaments and realms), have for ever provided against this vain pretence, and secured not only all Scottish peers, but commoners too, against any trials here by virtue of this act for treasons done in Scotland; therefore I shall give it no further answer.

The last objection I can think of is this: That in every case of treason or felony new made by statute, the lords of parliament in England shall have their trial by their peers saved, notwithstanding the statute provides not for it by express words: so that provisos of trial by their peers inserted into them in such cases are but idle, and, ex abundanti, because it is provided for both by the common law, and by Magna Charta itself, c. 29. and so was it adjudged in the case of the lord Hungerford heretofore, and in the earl of Castlehaven's case of late for buggery, upon the statute of 25 H. 8, c. 6. Stamford's Pleas of the Crown, f. 152, 153, and Crompton's Jurisdiction of Courts, f. 29. Therefore the trial of Irish peers by their peers shall be likewise saved to them within this act, though it be not expressed, as well as the trial by peers is to English peers by express proviso.

I answer, first, That this rule holds generally true in all cases of new treasons and felonies where the offences only are made capital, or punishable according to the ancient, usual, and ordinary proceedings of law, and the manner of the trial of them left at large, and not precisely limited how and by whom they shall be tried; as they are in the objected cases upon the statutes of 25 H. 8, c. 6. and 5 Eliz. c. 17. concerning buggery, where the words are, "That this vice shall be adjudged felony, and that such order and form of process shall thereupon be used against the offenders, as in cases of felony at the common law, and that the offenders being thereof convicted by verdict, confession, or outlawry, shall suffer pain of death," &c. Which words, without the least contradiction, stand as well with trial of peers who are guilty of it by their peers alone, as of commons by a jury, they being both according to the order of our common law, and a verdict by peers is as properly styled a verdict in law, as a verdict by jury; witness 1 H. 4, 1. and Coke's 3 Inst. c. 2. p. 30. But in the statute of 35 H. 8, there is no creation or introduction at all of any new treasons, but only an introduction of a new form and way of trial for treasons formerly made and declared as such, then done, or hereafter to be committed out of this realm, and that new form of trial, precisely limited in all particulars, and especially enacted to be by an ordinary jury, except only in case of our English peers: therefore this statute comes not at all within the objection, because it particularly defines the place where, the judge before whom, the juries by whom, with the whole form and manner how such foreign treasons shall be tried, with all other circumstances of the trial, and expressly prescribes, That all but English peers indicted for foreign treasons shall be tried by good and lawful men of the shire where the king's bench or commissioners sit. Therefore to alter this form of trial, precisely prescribed by this statute, by introducing a new trial by Irish peers, is to run quite cross against, elude, and repeal this statute, as I have argued and proved at large.

I have now quite done with my Argument of this new untrodden case; and I hope therein sufficiently manifested, that this plea of the prisoner is invalid, and such as ought to be over-ruled in point of law: and therefore as he hath been sent for over from Ireland, by the wisdom and justice of our parliament, and by the lords, justices, and council there transmitted hither, to receive a just and speedy trial at this bar for his bloody treasons, which there (in respect of the rebels power, tumults in that realm) he could not conveniently undergo; so I humbly pray on the behalf of the king, kingdom, parliament, and our whole English nation, to all which he hath been such a capital traitor and enemy, that this plea of his may presently be over-ruled, and himself brought to his speedy trial, judgment, and execution, for his unparalleled treasons, and the blood of those many thousands of innocent English protestants shed in Ireland upon this occasion, which cries for justice and execution, against him without further delay; the rather, because nulli differemus justitiam is one clause of that very act of Magna Charta, ch. 29, which he hath pleaded in bar of his trial, of which I pray both he and the whole kingdom may now enjoy the benefit, by his undelayed trial and execution too, in case he shall be found guilty of the treasons for which he stands indicted; of which there is little doubt, since so fully confessed by himself in a writing under his own hand; and we are ready to make them good against him, as we have already done against his confederate Mac-Mahon, by the testimony of a cloud of honourable, pregnant witnesses, in case he shall deny it.

After two Arguments at the bar on both sides of this case, justice Bacon argued it himself, and delivered his Opinion and Judgment against the prisoner's Plea, that though he be a baron of Ireland, yet he was triable for his treason by a Middlesex jury in the King's-Bench, and outed of his peerage, by 35 H. 8, c. 2. Which Judgment was approved by this Order of both houses of parliament:

“Ordered by the lords and commons in parliament assembled, That the said houses do approve of the judgment given by Mr. Justice Bacon, in over-ruling the plea of the lord Maguire, and of the manner of the trial by the indictment of high treason in the King's-Bench: and the judge is hereby required to proceed speedily thereupon according to law and justice.—John Brown, Cler. Parl. Henry Elsing, Cler. Parl. D. C.”

Upon which, on Monday, Febr. 10, 1645, he was brought from the Tower of London to the King's-Bench bar, and there arraigned; where putting himself upon his trial, he challenged twenty-three of the jury, which appeared, peremptorily: whereupon a Distringas was awarded to the sheriff of Middlesex to return Quadraginta Tales the next day; of whom he challenged twelve more peremptorily: and being tried by twelve of the residue returned (against whom he had no legal exception nor challenge), he was upon his own confessions and pregnant evidence of fifteen witnesses, persons of quality, found guilty of the treasons for which he was indicted; and thereupon Feb. 11, was adjudged to be drawn to Tyburn, and there hanged by the neck, and cut down alive, and then his bowels to be taken out, and there burnt before his face, his head to be cut off, and his body to be divided into four quarters, and then to be disposed as the parliament shall appoint. Which was accordingly executed the 20th of February.

At the end of the Argument Mr. Pryne says thus:

To fill up the vacant pages of this sheet, I shall annex this one Record, and also one Irish act, being both very pertinent to my Argument.

An Act that the King and his Successors shall be Kings of Ireland.

“Forasmuch as the king our most gracious dread sovereign lord, and his grace's most noble progenitors, kings of England, have been lords of this land of Ireland, having all manner of kingly jurisdiction, power, pre-eminences, and authority royal, belonging or appertaining to the royal estate and majesty of a king, by the name of lord of Ireland, where the king's majesty and his noble progenitors, justly and rightfully were, and of right ought to be, kings of Ireland, and so to be reputed, taken, named, and called, and for lack of naming the king's majesty and his noble progenitors kings of Ireland, according to their said true and just title, stile, and name, therein hath been great occasion that the Irishmen and inhabitants within this realm of Ireland, have not been so obedient to the king's highness and his most noble progenitors, and to their laws, as they of right and according to their allegiance and bounden duties ought to have been. Therefore, at the humble pursuit, petition, and request of the lords spiritual and temporal, and other the king's loving, faithful, and obedient subjects of this land of Ireland, and by their full assents, be it enacted, ordained, and established by this present parliament, that the king's highness, his heirs and successors, kings of England, be always kings of this land of Ireland, and that his majesty, his heirs and successors, have the name, stile, title, and honour of King of this land of Ireland, with all manner of honours, pre-eminences, prerogatives, dignities, and other things whatsoever they be, to the estate and majesty of a king appertaining and belonging: and that his majesty, his heirs and successors, be from henceforth named, called, accepted, reputed, and taken to be kings of the land of Ireland, to have, hold, and enjoy the said stile, title, majesty, and honours of the king of Ireland, with all manner of pre-eminence, prerogative, dignities, and all other the premisses, unto the king's highness, his heirs and successors for ever, as united and knit to the imperial crown of England. And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That on this side the first day of July next coming, proclamation shall be made in all shires within this land of Ireland, of the tenor and sentences of this act. And if any person and persons, of what estate, dignity, or condition soever they or he be, subject or resident within this land of Ireland, after the said first day of July, by writing or imprinting, or by any exterior act or deed, maliciously procure or do, or cause to be procured or done, any thing or things to the peril of the king's majesty's most royal person, or maliciously give occasion, by writing, deed, print, or act, whereby the king's majesty, his heirs or successors, or any of them, might be disturbed or interrupted of the crown of this realm of Ireland, or of the name, stile, or title thereof, or by writing, deed, print, or act, procure or do, or cause to be procured or done, any thing or things to the prejudice, slander, disturbance, or derogation of the king's majesty, his heirs or successors, in, of, or for the crown of this realm of Ireland, or in, of, or for the name, title, or stile thereof, whereby his majesty, his heirs or successors, or any of them, might be disturbed or interrupted in body, name, stile, or title of inheritance, of, in, or to the crown of this land of Ireland, or of the name, stile, title, or dignity of the same; that then every such person and persons, of what estate, degree, or condition they be, subject or residents within the said land of Ireland, and their aiders, counsellors, maintainers, and abettors therein, and every of them, for every such offence, shall be adjudged high traitors, and every such offence shall be adjudged and deemed high-treason, and the offenders, their aiders, counsellors, maintainers, and abettors therein, and every of them, being lawfully convicted of any such offence, by presentment, verdict, confession, or proofs, according to the customs and laws of this said land of Ireland, shall suffer pains of death, as in cases of high-treason, and also shall lose and forfeit unto the king's highness, and to his heirs, kings of this realm of Ireland, all such his manors, lands, tenements, rents, reversions, annuities, and hereditaments, which they had in possession as owner, and were sole seized of in their own right, of, by, or in any title or means, or in any other person or persons had to their use of any estate of inheritance, at the day of any such treason and offences by them committed and done. And that also every such offender shall lose and forfeit to the king's highness, and to his said heirs, as well all such estates of freehold, and interest for years, of lands and rents, as all the goods, chattels, and debts, which they or any of them had at the time of their conviction or attainder, of, or for any such offence; saving alway to every person and persons, and bodies politic, their heirs, successors, and assigns, and to every of them, other than such persons as shall be so convicted or attainted, their heirs and successors, and all other claiming to their use, all such right, title, use, interest, possession, condition, rents, fees, offices, annuities, commons, and profits, which they or any of them shall happen to have, in, to, or upon any such manors, lands, tenements, rents, reversions, services, annuities, and hereditaments, which so shall happen to be lost and forfeited, by reason and occasion of any of the treasons or offences above rehearsed, any time before the said treasons or offences committed or done.

174. *Proceedings upon a Charge for Breach of the Trust reposed in them by the Parliament, preferred against Mr. HOLLIS and Mr. WHITELOCKE by the Lord Savile. 21 CHARLES I. A. D. 1645. [Whitelocke's Mem. 6 Rushw. 177.]

THE history of this obscure transaction is thus given detachedly by Whitelocke:

March 19th, 1645.

The lord Savile left the Oxford party, and came to London; he was staid by the Guards, and this day examined by a Committee of the Lords, of the grounds of his coming in, and was committed to the custody of the black rod.

March. 31. The lord Savile, in regard he hath not given any satisfaction to the Parliament, for his coming from Oxford hither, but rather many grounds of suspicion, that he came to do ill offices, was ordered speedily to depart the city, and all other the Parliament's Quarters and garrisons; and to betake himself to the king, or whither he pleaseth within one week; after which time, if he stay within the line of communication;—or the Parliament's Quarters, he is to be taken and proceeded against, as one adhering to the enemy.

April 21. The earls of Holland, Thanet, Monmouth, Westmorland, and the lord Savile, took the oath appointed by the Parliament, for such as come in to them, before the Commissioners of the Great Seal.

July 2. Mr. Gourden, a member of the House of Commons, presented to them a Letter from the lord Savile, with a Paper inclosed in it, and desired, That they might be read, and after some debate they were read: The Letter was expressing "his affections to the Parliament, to whom he had come from the king and submitted himself, and taken the oath enjoined; in observance whereof, and of his duty to the Parliament, under whose protection he was, he held himself obliged to discover to them what he knew concerning two of their Members, who had done contrary to their trust, and to the prejudice of the Parliament in the matters contained in the inclosed Paper."

That Paper set forth, "That Mr. Hollis and Mr. Whitelocke being persons well affected to the king, and to his cause, were nevertheless two of the Parliament's Commissioners lately sent to Oxford to his majesty with Propositions from the Parliament for peace: That they being at Oxford did contrary to their trust, and to the prejudice of the Parliament, treat and advise with the king, and some great lords about him, namely, the earl of Lindsey, the earl of Southampton, and others, about the King's Answer to those Propositions, and did give a Paper in writing, what they advised the King's Answers should be: That their advice in the said Paper was followed by the King, and some of the very words thereof were made use of in the King's Answer, and that both before and after that time, they held intelligence and correspondence with the king and his party at Oxford."

Much other matter was in the Paper to the like effect, and upon the reading of it, divers of the house were very high, and moved, That Mr. Hollis and Mr. Whitelocke might make a present Answer to this Paper, or Charge, as some called it.

Mr. Hollis presently in his place made his Answer to the matter of the Paper, and therein unadvisedly and suddenly confessed more than he needed to have done, but denied any intelligence or correspondence by him with any of the King's party.

Mr. Whitelocke was not in town this morning, and knew nothing of this business; but after Mr. Hollis had spoken, Mr. John L'Isle stood up and acquainted the house, that Mr. Whitelocke being then absent, if they pleased he would undertake to give him notice to attend the house the next day, which was ordered.

But some were not satisfied therewith, and they fiercely moved, "That this being a charge of High Treason against two of their Members, in whom the offence was greater than in others, that they would proceed with equal justice; and that both Mr. Hollis and Mr. Whitelocke might be committed to the Tower, Mr. Hollis who was present to be sent thither, and a warrant to apprehend Mr. Whitelocke and to carry him thither also."

Upon this sir William Lewys stood up, and with as much vigour on the other side, said, "He could not wonder at the justice of those who would commit a man to the Tower before he was heard, and the other after he had fully answered that which they called a Charge; That he could not admit it to be a Charge, but a scandalous and libellous Paper against two worthy members of the house, who, they all knew, had served the Parliament faithfully, and to the utmost hazard of their lives and fortunes: And because they had done so, and were so capable of doing further and more service to the Parliament, therefore one of their enemies was come hither to cast a bone amongst them, and to raise differences amongst the members of parliament; a likely way when their other designs failed them, to do mischief to the parliament: He desired them to consider the person of him whom they called the Accuser, who was indeed an Accuser of the Brethren, that it was the lord Savile, now clothed with a new Title from the king of earl of Sussex, and perhaps this present service was to be part of that by which he was yet to merit his new Title: That still he was the same man who was first of the Parliament party, then revolted from them to the King, and now was revolted from the King to the Parliament again, and that a Paper brought in from this person should be looked upon as a Charge against two worthy members of their house, or be in the least a ground to commit them to the Tower, he could not sufficiently wonder at the reason or justice of such a motion as that was: He rather thought it more reasonable and just, and accordingly moved, That this Libel, this Paper might be thrown out of the house, and the contriver of it, the lord Savile, be under more straight custody, and examined who set him on to promote this business; and that Mr. Hollis and Mr. Whitelocke might not be put to the trouble of any further attendance about it."

This smart motion of sir William Lewys, so contrary to the former, being spoken by him with great ingenuity and mettle, and seconded by sir Philip Stapleton and others of that party, so wrought upon the house, that the motion for commitment to the Tower was laid aside, and Mr. L'Isle ordered to give notice to Mr. Whitelocke that the house required his attendance there the next day.

July 3. Mr. Whitelocke attended the house all this morning, and nothing was said to him in public by reason of the other business: about 12 o'clock he acquainted the house that he received a Letter from a worthy member of the house, signifying their pleasure that he should attend them, which he now did accordingly, and humbly desired to know what the business was.

Then it was moved by some that the Letter and Paper of the lord Savile might be read to him, others were for a time to be appointed two or three days after for this business. Mr. Whitelocke desired it might be the next day. Upon his suit, it was appointed for the next day, and that the Paper and Letters of the lord Savile should be then ready, and he to be heard to say what he thought fit to this business.

July 4. About ten o'clock, some friends of Mr. Whitelocke's called upon the business appointed for the day, and the Letter of the lord Savile, with the Paper inclosed, were read in the house to Mr. Whitelocke, after which he stood up in his place, and made Answer to it by way of Narrative to this effect :

“ Mr. Speaker ; I am happy, since I must be under an Accusation (which is no mean thing) in this honourable house, that this gentleman my lord Saville is my Accuser ; and more happy that you, to whom I have been so long a servant, and who know my ways so well, are to be my judges. I shall say nothing concerning my lord Saville, because he is my Accuser, but to the parts of his Accusation I shall give you a short and true Answer, with all ingenuity and submission to your great judgment.

“ His first part of the Accusation is, ‘ That I was a person well affected to the king,’ but he gives no instances thereof, nor is it a crime to be well affected to my sovereign ; we have all expressed the same in our Covenant.—I could give some instances to the contrary effect, as the plunder of my goods, seizing the profits of my lands, indicting my person of High Treason for serving you ; and giving away my inheritance to Sir Charles Blunt a Papist ; which are no great motives to an extraordinary affection, more than a subject is obliged to his prince. But if my lord Saville means ‘ by well affected to the king,’ my being well affected to Peace ; I confess I am a passionate lover of a good peace, and seeker of it, and thereby have testified my affection both to king and parliament ; and the longer our troubles continue, the more we shall all be of this opinion and affection.—Sir, I hope I may be thought capable to know my duty to my king, and to understand what protection I was to have from him, the mutual relations of both ; and further I hold myself disobliged.

“ The second Accusation is, ‘ That I met at the earl of Lindsey’s lodgings in Oxford, to advise about the king’s Answer to your Propositions, and that I there did give advice to the king, contrary to the trust reposed in me by you.’ To this I answer, That when your Commissioners came to Oxford, we consulted together, what (among other things) was fit for us to do in point of civilities and visits whilst we were there ; and it was agreed by us all, that we should not visit any that were excepted in your Propositions ; but that we might visit others, who did visit, or send visits to us.

“ The earl of Lindsey sent to visit Mr. Hollis and me with a compliment, That he was not well, else he would have come to visit us at our lodgings. And I having a particular relation and alliance to him, we went together to return a visit to his lordship, and told our fellow commissioners of our intentions before we gave the visit, and they approved of it. When we came to the earl’s lodging, we found there the earl of Southampton, the lord Saville, and some others ; but it was so far from an appointed meeting, that I knew not of their being there, till I saw them in the chamber.—There was much discourse among us about your Propositions, and they urged ‘ the unreasonableness of them ;’ we affirmed the contrary, and vindicated your honour in them. There was also discourse concerning the Scots Commissioners, whom they affirmed to be ‘ averse to peace,’ we assured them that they were not, but willing to have a good peace.

“ There was likewise upon this occasion, discourse of the Presbytery, and of the point of Jure divino ; we told them that the Scots were off from the ‘ rigid Presbytery,’ and did not insist upon the point of Jure divino.—They were then likewise discoursing of Tumults, and of Persons, and Petitions brought to Westminster in a ‘ violent and disorderly manner ;’ we did not speak of any ‘ violent independent party,’ nor any the words mentioned in the lord Saville’s Paper, nor that the Propositions were unreasonable. They indeed pressed much upon that argument, that they ‘ were unreasonable ;’ particularly the Propositions concerning Religion and the Militia ; we told them, that unless the king would grant those Propositions, it would be in vain to treat of any peace.

“ There was also much discourse about the acknowledging you to be a Parliament ; the earl of Lindsey said, That the king had acknowledged you a Parliament, by the words, ‘ Lords and Commons of Parliament.’ We answered, ‘ That this was the same style his majesty gave to the Assembly at Oxford, and we could not be satisfied with that acknowledgment.’ Then the earl of Lindsey demanded of us, how we would be acknowledged ? We told him thus ; ‘ The Lords and Commons assembled in the Parliament of England at Westminster.’

“ After this we returned to our lodgings, and acquainted our fellow Commissioners with the persons that were at the earl of Lindsey’s chamber, when we were there, and with the matter of our discourse with them. In all our discourses, Mr. Hollis and myself did justify your Propositions, and vindicate your proceedings.

“ Mr. Speaker, It is no small trouble to my thoughts, to have my name questioned in this house, but I am comforted in my own integrity and innocency, and in my Accuser, but chiefly in my Judges, to whom I most humbly and most willingly submit myself.”

After Whitelocke had spoken, there was much debate in the house, whether this Paper of the lord Saville were an Accusation or Charge against them ? Many gentlemen argued, That it was against the privilege of the house to take it for an Accusation, being from the lord Saville, who was an enemy come from the king’s quarters, and one in contempt to both houses of parliament, for refusing to name the person from whom he received the Letter concerning Mr. Hollis, and therefore committed a close prisoner : That he had not discovered this to the Parliament in five or six months together that he had been in their quarters, but after he had been complained of by Mr. Hollis about a Letter, and Mr. Whitelocke was in the Chair of the Committee appointed to examine the business of that Letter.

Then the lord Savile brought in a new Accusation both against Mr. Hollis, and Mr. Whitelocke the chairman, to take off his testimony for Mr. Hollis.

Others went upon this ground, That this business might be committed, to see if the lord Savile would avow his Letter and Paper, and by what testimony he could make it good, and that Mr. Hollis and Mr. Whitelocke might have reparation, and be cleared from this aspersion.

But these were not their friends, and moved this out of a design to bring the business before a Committee to be examined, more than out of respect to them.

After a long debate, it was at last referred to a Committee to be examined in the general, and power given to the Committee to examine any member of the house, and a Message sent to the lords, to desire that the lord Savile might be examined at this Committee.

Those who were of a contrary party to the earl of Essex, set their interest upon it, to ruin Mr. Hollis, whom they found to be a great pillar of that party, and with him to ruin Mr. Whitelocke, they being both involved in this business; but they had not the same envy against Mr. Whitelocke, as they had against Mr. Hollis; nor could they well sever them. But now having got it referred to a Committee, they resolved there to put it home, and were full of expectation to destroy them both, which was their intention.

July 5. The Lords sent a Message to the House of Commons, in answer of theirs yesterday, That the lord Savile, if he pleased, might be examined from time to time at the Committee, to whom the business of his Letter was referred.

July 7. In the afternoon Mr. Hollis and Mr. Whitelocke attended the Committee touching my lord Savile's Accusation, where Mr. Samuel Brown had the Chair, and was no friend to them in this business, but pressed matters against them, more than a Chairman was to do.

The lord Savile was brought into the Committee, and his Letter and Paper read to him, which he owned as his, and his hand to them, and that he would justify them 'to be true 'upon his soul and his life.'

Mr. Hollis and Mr. Whitelocke averred the contrary, but with less passion, and with less indiscretion than the lord Savile, who being put to it by the Committee, could not make any proof of one particular mentioned in his Papers, more than they themselves acknowledged; which was the same in effect that they had said before in their narratives in the house.

Every particular clause in his Papers were severally read, and he heard to them, and they to make their Answers: but they both did it, with this reservation, "That what they did in this, was out of their willingness to give any satisfaction they could to the Committee, or to any particular gentleman; but they hoped that they should not be examined upon this, as a charge against them, which was not allowed to be so by the house." Which after some debate seemed to be admitted, and that in general they should be heard in this business by the Committee, which they themselves freely offered.

The lord Savile insisted upon a Letter from Mr. Hollis to the duke of Richmond in a correspondence with his grace, but that did not touch Whitelocke, nor did he prove by the Letter a correspondence by Mr. Hollis; but by some circumstances raised jealousies of it in some of their minds who were not friends. Nor could his lordship prove any thing of his information, "That they distinguished the parties among them in the Parliament into the Presbyterian and the Independent parties; the earl of Essex and the Scots as the heads of the Presbyterians; and the other party being the Independent party, to be averse to peace: but the earl of Essex and his party (of which Mr. Hollis and Mr. Whitelocke were) to be the friends to peace;" Which words were denied by them.

The Committee adjourned to the next day, and nothing was further done at this meeting.

July 8. In the afternoon Hollis and Whitelocke attended the Committee for the lord Savile's business, which was very full: and many were there to promote the design of ruining them; and to preserve them, there were Mr. Recorder Glynn, sir Philip Stapleton, sir Wm. Lewys, and many other noble gentlemen constantly attending upon this great Committee.

The lord Savile was again brought in to the Committee, and, as before, he justified the Paper; and that in the King's Answer to the Propositions, there were divers expressions and words, the same with those in the Paper which Mr. Hollis and Mr. Whitelocke did give to the earl of Lindsey at Oxford.

Being again shewed his Paper, and demanded by the Committee to say in particular what were the same words he intended, he desired to see the King's Answer; which was delivered to him, and he comparing their Paper, and the King's Answer together, observed several expressions and words in their Paper to be the same, with expressions and words in the King's Paper, and did particularly set forth which they were.

Mr. Recorder asked, If it were proved that Mr. Hollis and Mr. Whitelocke did give in a Paper at Oxford, which had in it those words and expressions which the lord Savile noted to be in the King's Answer. That he had not heard any such thing proved; and then he thought the observations of the lord Savile upon the King's Answer, to be to little purpose.

Others desired to know how the lord Savile, being in those secret Councils at Oxford, should become so well affected, as he pretended himself to be to the parliament. He answered, That he was impeached at Oxford, for something that he spoke at those meetings with Mr. Hollis and Mr. Whitelocke; and that they met more than once at the earl of Lindsey's chamber. To which they made no answer.

Then the lord Savile desired, that Mr. Hollis would produce a Letter which he brought to him from the duke of Richmond from Oxford, by which he believed, much of this business would appear. But it was returned upon the lord Savile, That even then when he came into the parliament, he confessed he was employed to bring letters, and a correspondence from the parliaments' enemies to this place.

Mr. Hollis said little to this Letter, and I suppose, and partly know, that such a Letter was delivered to him by the lord Savile from the duke of Richmond.

Mr. Gourdon at this Committee acknowledged, That the Letter and Paper was brought to him by the lady Temple, who was the messenger and agent of the lord Savile; and that the lord Sey was acquainted with it before the Letter was delivered; and that sir Nathaniel Barnardiston, and sir Henry Vane, jun. were likewise acquainted with it, and wished him to offer the Letter.

That he said the house would be in a grand Committee, and then he could not offer the Letter. They replied, That they would call the Speaker to the Chair purposely to receive the Letter.

That none but these knew Mr. Hollis and Mr. Whitelocke to be the persons charged with having intelligence with the king's party; but only he told others in the general, That he had an Impeachment to deliver against two Members of the house, but did not name them to any others.

July 10. The Committee for the lord Savile's business sat again this afternoon, and Mr. Hollis, and Mr. Whitelocke, offered to make a Narrative to the Committee for their satisfaction, and to answer any questions which should be asked of them by any of the Committee.

Then Mr. Brown the Chairman moved the Committee, whether it were not fit, That as Mr. Hollis and Mr. Whitelocke were present, when the lord Savile was heard; so now the lord Savile should be present, when Mr. Hollis and Mr. Whitelocke made their Narrative.

This held not much debate, it being judged by most of the gentlemen there present, to be improper and unfit, and moved by the Chairman in too much favour to the lord Savile.

It was then taken into debate, Whether Mr. Hollis, and Mr. Whitelocke, should be heard speak by way of Narrative, or whether they should be examined as to a Charge; and it was over-ruled, that they should be heard by way of Narrative.

Then sir Peter Wentworth moved, That whilst the one of them was making his Narrative, the other might withdraw; and that they should not both be present together to hear what one another affirmed or denied. But this was not regarded.

Mr. Hollis began first, and made his Narrative, and after he had done, Mr. Whitelock spake, and both their Narratives were the same in effect with what they had spoken before in the house, and they denied some of my lord Savile's Informations which were not true; and he had no proof but 'his own honour' (which was not in much esteem) of most of them.

July 11. The Committee for the lord Savile's business, sat not this day. Some friends who sounded the Solicitor St. John, and the other great men of this Committee, told Whitelocke that they found them not so sharp against him as against Mr. Hollis, whom they were resolved to ruin if they could: but Mr. Whitelocke being so much involved in this business with him, they could not separate them, but either both, or neither must be ruined.

They prepared accordingly for their Defence, and although many private messages were sent to Whitelocke (and private conferences with him) "That if he would desert Mr. Hollis, and discover what he could say against him, that he should not only be preserved, but be rewarded and preferred;" yet they could not prevail with him to confess any thing against Mr. Hollis, or the trust of friendship wherein he held himself engaged.

July 13. The house went into the Committee of the lord Savile, where Mr. Hollis and Mr. Whitelocke had procured the earl of Denbigh to come, and desired that he, being one of the Commissioners with them at Oxford, would be pleased to declare his knowledge concerning the matters in question before the Committee.

The earl of Denbigh then told the Committee, "That he was desired by them to be there, and had leave of the house of peers to be at this Committee, and would acquaint them upon his honour with the truth of what he knew in this business,—He told them that he did well remember that at their first coming to Oxford, there was care taken by them, for their carriage and discourse there, that they were so punctual that he read the Propositions before-hand, that there might be no mistaking. That it was resolved as a thing of ceremony and respect, that they should make visits, but not to any of those who were excepted persons, and to refuse them being in the enemies quarters, they thought not fit: That they agreed, that by way of discourse, they should endeavour all they could, that the Propositions might be granted in general, that the king should allow them the title of Parliament; next the government and settlement of the church; and lastly, the militia: That they did agree that in all their discourses, this should be the subject matter; and that they should press the obtaining of them. That Mr. Hollis and Mr. Whitelocke did acquaint the Committee, that they had an intention to visit the earl of Lindsey, and he thinks the earl of Southampton; and very suddenly after they did acquaint them that they had been there, and of a long discourse which they had together: That to say particularly what the discourse was, he could not charge his memory, but in general, it was the discourse that passed at that meeting; That he remembers but one visit they spake of, and it was a part of their agreement to acquaint one another with all the circumstances of their visits: that the earl of Lindsey and the earl of Southampton, and he thinks, the lord Savile, were named by Mr. Hollis and Mr. Whitelocke, to have been at that meeting: That he was told by them among other things, that they had little hopes, that they should have satisfaction in their desires: That he doth not remember any mention of a Paper given in by them to the earl of Lindsey: That the intelligence they had there was various; some had hopes of a good issue of the business, others had not: that Mr. Pierpoint had ill relations of the Commissioners to their disparagement: and at the Conference with Mr. Hollis and Mr. Whitelocke, there were very ill characters given of them.—He desired that nothing might be taken as positive from him concerning persons."

After the earl of Denbigh, the lord Wenman told the Committee, "that there was an agreement among the Commissioners of the parliament at Oxford, as the earl of Denbigh had related it, to pay civilities and visits to those that were civil to them, but not to any who were excepted in the Propositions from pardon: That he remembers not whether they did agree to press the granting of the propositions any of them more than the others, only by discourse among themselves, that they should press those that were of most difficulty to be granted: That they were acquainted by Mr. Hollis and Mr. Whitelocke, with their visiting of the earl of Lindsey. That to his best remembrance they said, the earl of Southampton, and the lord Savile, were there, and mentioned the particulars of their discourse, but he did not remember them; nor that they acquainted them with any hopes they had of having the Propositions granted: He remembered that Mr. Hollis said a little before their coming out of town, that he had a Paper again, which he spake publicly: That in their discourse they did insist principally, and they found it was thought fit to do so, upon the Propositions concerning Religion, and the Militia, and he did think that the earl of Lindsey was spoken of, when Mr. Hollis said that he had a Paper again: That he and Mr. Whitelocke were coming by All Souls College, and he intended to visit sir Thomas Aylsbury, but hearing that sir Edw. Hyde was there, who was a person excepted, Mr. Whitelocke did forbear to go in thither."

Others of the Commissioners who were at Oxford with the Propositions did declare themselves to the same effect, that the earl of Denbigh and the lord Wenman had done, and so the Committee rose.

July 14. The Scots Commissioners gave notice to Mr. Hollis and Mr. Whitelocke by their friends, that they had certain intercepted Papers and Letters of the lord Savile's, which he was sending to Oxford; and the chief scope and end of them was to be informed from thence, whether Mr. Hollis or Mr. Whitelocke kept intelligence with the duke of Richmond, the earl of Lindsey, or any others of the king's party, that he might have the more whereof to accuse them here.

It was thought fit by their friends that the Scots Commissioners should be desired to acquaint the house of commons, with the Papers; upon which it should be moved there, to refer them to the Committee for the lord Savile's business; and the same was done accordingly.

This afternoon that Committee met, and these Papers were brought unto them, by the lord Wareston and another of the Scots Commissioners, with a compliment expressing their desire to serve the parliament in any thing within their knowledge and power.—The Papers being read to the effect before-mentioned, the lord Savile was called in, and the Papers shewed to him, and he owned them to be his hand. Being asked what warrant he had to hold intelligence with the king's party at Oxford, he being now within the parliament's quarters, and come in to them, He answered, That he was authorised to do this by the Subcommittee for private and secret intelligence for the committee of both kingdoms.—Being again asked, Who of this Subcommittee by name did know of his this design, and did authorize him to send to Oxford about it: he answered, That the lord Say was from time to time acquainted with this business, and did encourage and authorize him to send to Oxford about it, and that he sent several times by Mr. Howard to Oxford, with much to the same effect.

By this their friends found the bottom of this design against them, to be from the advice, if not contrivance of the lord Say: and the lady Temple, a busy woman and great politician in her own opinion, was made use of by the lord Say to whom she was allied, and by the lord Savile, to be an agent in this matter. The design and endeavour also against them, was by these Papers and Examinations made the more apparent, which took off the edge of divers gentlemen who thought this Prosecution not ingenious, nor handsome against them. Their friends made good use of it, both at the Committee and afterwards in the house, and carried it by vote to have these particulars with the rest of the Examinations reported to the parliament.

July 17. The Report was made to the house about the lord Savile's business, and it was moved, "That there might be a further examination of Mr. Hollis and Mr. Whitelocke in the house, and that any member might have liberty to ask them what questions they pleased;" which the house ordered, and "that they should be severally examined, and to begin with Mr. Hollis."

Mr. Whitelocke sate still in his place, and it was moved, "That he might be ordered to withdraw, whilst Mr. Hollis was in examination;" but that was opposed, as contrary to the privilege of the house; that there being no legal charge against them, they ought to have the same liberty and freedom of sitting in the house as the other members had, and neither of them to be ordered to withdraw.

After much debate upon this point, it was brought to the question, Whether Mr. Whitelocke should be ordered to withdraw, whilst Mr. Hollis was under the examination of the house, and it was carried in the negative, That he should not withdraw.

This question being past, Mr. Whitelocke stood up, and told the Speaker, "That since the house had done him that justice and favour, and themselves that right, in the consequence thereof; yet now to manifest the confidence he had in his own innocency, and that he sought no advantages for his own vindication in this business, he would of himself, with their leave, withdraw, whilst the house should be in the examination of Mr. Hollis." Then he did withdraw, and went up to the committee chamber, at which the house seemed to give a good approbation.

Mr. Hollis was almost two hours under examination in the house, there being some particulars urged against him, which were not against Mr. Whitelocke, particularly in the matter of intelligence and correspondence with the king's party. The questions and matters upon which he was examined, were in effect but the same, which had been formerly mentioned in the house, and at the committee, to which he answered fully and prudently, and with great courage; and when they had sifted the business as much as they could with him, they gave him over, and sent for Mr. Whitelocke down out of the committee chamber to be examined.

He came into the house, and then Mr. Hollis withdrew of himself into the committee chamber, whilst Mr. Whitelocke was under examination. A multitude of questions were demanded of him, insomuch as one gentleman, sir Peter Wentworth, asked him above thirty questions only for his part. The matters demanded of him were but the same in effect that had been mentioned formerly, and what he answered did agree punctually with what Mr. Hollis had said before. It is a very solemn thing to be examined by a house of commons, where there are so many wits, and so much odds and advantage to be taken against one single man; and that in a business of high treason, where honour, fortune, and life, are at stake.

The house sat upon this business till seven o'clock at night, the earl of Essex his party, and all their friends, putting forth the utmost of their power and interest to rescue these two members from the malice and danger they were now under. And the other party of the house as earnestly labouring to be rid of them both, either by cutting off their heads, or at least by expelling of them from being any more members of parliament. They were so eager upon it, that they ordered to resume the debate of this business the next morning.

July 18. The house proceeded upon the report of the lord Savile's business, and passed a vote, "That the same was ripe for judgment," and ordered, That they would proceed to judgment thereupon to-morrow morning.

July 19. The house proceeded in the lord Savile's business, and, after a long debate, upon the result, passed a vote, "That Mr. Hollis was not guilty of holding intelligence with the enemy, as was pretended, and they did fully acquit him thereof."

This gave good encouragement to Mr. Hollis and Mr. Whitelocke, and to all their friends, who would fain have brought on the rest of this business, but that it was almost nine o'clock at night, and therefore too late to proceed further in it this day.

The other party, their adversaries, would have declined any further proceedings of the house in this business at this time, hoping in time to get some further evidence against them, and then to revive it; and doubting, as the present constitution of the house was, that Mr. Hollis and Mr. Whitelocke might be acquitted.

Mr. Hollis and Mr. Whitelocke pressed the more earnestly to bring the business to a final determination, whilst their friends were in town, and the house fully possessed of the business, and in so good a constitution and humour for them, and they desired not to continue under a cloud and the various discourses of people, not to be kept lingering, but to know their doom, either of condemnation or acquittal.

Their friends at last with much earnestness, and against great opposition and debate, carried it by vote, to have it ordered, that the lord Savile's business should be resumed on Monday morning.

July 21. The house of commons, according to their order, resumed the debate of the lord Savile's business, and after a long and warm discussing of all the particulars and arguments relating to it, they at length, upon the question, passed a vote to this effect: "That it not appearing that Mr. Hollis and Mr. Whitelocke had done any disservice in their proceedings at Oxford, that therefore the remainder and whole matter of this report should be laid aside, and not to be further proceeded in. And that the said Mr. Hollis and Mr. Whitelocke should have liberty to prosecute (if they please) the lord Savile, now prisoner in the Tower, for damages."

Mr. Whitelocke absented himself from the House, when they came to give their Judgment.

It was observed, that generally the gentlemen of best interest and quality in the house were all for the acquittal of them, and that it had scarcely been seen before, in any other business, that this holding so many days together, yet even the gallants who used, whatever business was in agitation, to go forth to dinner, and to some other of their refreshments, yet they attended constantly all the time that this business was in debate, and would not stir from it.

175. The Trial of Sir ROBERT SPOTISWOOD, President of the College of Justice in Scotland, and Secretary there to King Charles I. for High Treason, in the Parliament held at St. Andrews, November, December, and January.* 21 CHARLES I. A. D. 1645.

SIR Robert Spotiswood having been sent by the king into Scotland to negotiate matters with the marquis of Montrose, and to carry him, among other things, a Commission to be generalissimo of all his forces there, took the opportunity of the army's marching southward for his more safe return to his master, to whom he was to give an account of his negotiation; but being unfortunately taken prisoner at the battle of Philiphaugh, where Montrose's army was defeated by general Leslie; he was carried first to Glasgow, and afterwards to St. An-draws, where the following Process was prosecuted against him.

DITTAY against Sir Robert Spotiswood.

* "The fury of civil wars," Mr. Laing observes, "when the battle has ceased, is almost invariably reserved for the scaffold. The number selected for execution was reduced to six "[It seems that the number was seven]:" president Spotiswood the archbishop's son, sir William Rollock the attendant of Montrose from England, colonel Nathaniel Gordon, sir Philip Nesbit, Ogilvy of Innercarthy, Guthrie the bishop of Murray's son, Murray the earl of Tullibardine's brother. Their crimes were found in those sanguinary laws against state offences, which are still flexible to the interpretation, and subservient to the interests of the prevailing party, still cruel and inexorable to the unfortunate; but by which the adherents of each may alternately suffer. The execution of Spotiswood was peculiarly unjust. He had framed or brought the commission to Montrose, and accepted the office of secretary, which the parliament had formerly conferred upon Lanerk. He was convicted, therefore, of an obsolete treason, because he impugned the authority of the three estates; but his sentence may be more truly ascribed to the prostitution of his judicial character, in the Trial of Balmerino, A. D. 1634, [ante vol. 3, p. 591.] and to the suspicion to which he was obnoxious, of corruption on the bench.—Baillie, 1. 71. Parl. 1584, ch. 130, 'That none presume to impugn the dignity and the authority of the three estates, or to seek or procure the innovation or diminution of the power and authority of the same, or any of them, under the pain of treason.' So concise, yet at the same time so comprehensive, vague, and arbitrary, were the treason laws of Scotland. This act was passed to preserve the episcopal estate in parliament, against the efforts of the presbyterians, and was employed for the execution of Spotiswood, its most active partisan. The earl of Argyle was afterwards executed on the same act, 'to the reproach of justice.'" [See Argyle's Case, A. D. 1681, infra].

Sir Robert Spotiswood, you are indicted and accused before the committee of estates of parliament; that for summeikless, by the common law, law of nations, laws and acts of parliament, and practick of this kingdom; and by all justice, reasons, equity, and conscience, all that rise in arms, and concur with the adversaries of this kingdom, for subduing of their native country; all invaders, assaulters, or subduers of this kingdom, or any part thereof, by force of arms; all who contribute their help, countenance, and assistance, to the adversaries, assaulters, or invaders thereof in an hostile way: all who are either authors, abettors, maintainers, suppliers, or concur with the adversaries of this kingdom, in the assaulting, or subduing thereof, or any part thereof: and all who are art and part of the said crimes, misdeeds, and malversations above specified, or any of them, incur the pain of high-treason against his majesty, his crown, and against the estates of this kingdom, and the pain of forfeiture of life, lands, estate, and goods to be execute against them, by the estates of this kingdom, and the benefit thereof to be applied to the use of the publick for relief of their burdens: and the committers of the said crimes above specified, or any of them, are otherwise censurable and punishable in their persons, names, and fame, and in their lands, goods, means, and estate, by fining, confining, or otherwise as the estates of this kingdom shall think expedient. And albeit, That by the acts of parliament of this kingdom, especially by the 130th act of the 8th parliament of king James 6, in May 1584, It is statute and ordained, that none of the king's liedges and subjects presume, or take upon hand, to impugn the dignity and authority of the estates of parliament, or to seek or procure the innovation or diminution of the power and authority of the seamen, or of any of the estates thereof in any time coming, under the pain of treason. Likewise, albeit by the fourth act of the third parliament of king Charles, dated 29th of June 1644, all takers up of arms against the kingdom and estates of the country are guilty of treason, and punishable by forfeiture of life, lands, and goods, or any other censure the parliament shall please to inflict. Yet nevertheless, the said sir Robert Spotiswood having shaken off all fear of God, and due respect to the laws of the kingdom, and all duty, that as a subject thereof

you ought to have carried to the kingdom, and to the defence thereof, especially in these troublesome times, when this kingdom has been threatened to be ruined and destroyed, with the hostile invasion of some of her unnatural brood, and some Irish rebels, and forgetting and contemning that gracious favour mentioned in the 33d act of king Charles's second parliament, of date 16 of November 1641, whereby the estates of parliament therein convened did then declare, that for the good and grave considerations mentioned, they would not proceed to a final sentence against you, for such crimes and misdemeanors as at that time you were cited before them, and accused as guilty of, nor would insist upon the punishment thereof. You have presumed and taken upon hand, to abuse the king's majesty, in purchasing from his majesty by your pretended ways, the office of secretary to yourself, and have received the signet thereof, which was formerly kept by the earl of Lanerk, who was appointed by his majesty and the estates of parliament in A. D. 1611, to be secretary to his majesty for this kingdom of Scotland, and that contrary to his majesty's Declaration emitted by his majesty in the said parliament; whereby his majesty did declare, that he would not employ you in any office or place of court or state without consent of parliament, nor grant you access to his person, whereby you might interrupt or disturb the firm peace, was then so happily concluded. Likewise, since your purchasing of the said office of secretary, at least taking the samen office upon you, and of the keeping of the signet thereof, you have docketed with your hand, signeted with the signet of the said office, several commissions granted to James Graham sometime earl of Montrose, a declared and forfeited traitor, and an excommunicated person: and especially, a Commission dated the 5th of June 1645, given by the king's majesty to the said James Graham, making and constituting the said James Graham lieutenant-governor, and captain general of all forces raised or to be raised within this kingdom; and giving power and authority to the said James Graham, to raise and levy forces within this kingdom, and to lead and conduct them against the king's majesty's good subjects, and against the forces raised and levied in arms by authority of the estates of parliament of this kingdom, for the maintenance, defence, and prosecution of the mutual League and Covenant. By which Commission so docketed and signeted by you, as said is, the king's majesty's good subjects who have risen in arms for the defence of the said League and Covenant, and whose rising in arms is allowed and authorized by the estates of parliament of this kingdom, are designed as traitorous and seditious persons. And also, you have docketed and signed with your hand, a proclamation alleged emitted by the king's majesty for holding of parliaments within this kingdom; which proclamation is totally destructive of, and derogatory to the dignity and authority of the estates of parliament presently convened by virtue of the last act of the last parliament 1641, and which proclamation annuls and condemns the procedure thereof. And also, you have docketed and signed with your hand, a commission granted by the king's majesty to James Graham sometime earl of Montrose, to be commissioner for his majesty for holding of the said pretended parliament: in docketing and signing of which proclamation, commissions and warrants, you have abused the aforesaid office of secretary, and that to the derogation and diminution of the honour, dignity, and authority of the estates of parliament of this kingdom. Likewise, you not being contented with your abusing of his majesty, in purchasing of the foresaid office of secretary from his majesty, contrary to his majesty's declaration in parliament, in manner and at the time as said is, at least with the taking the same upon you, and with the docketing the foresaid commissions to the said James Graham, and of the foresaid proclamation for the parliament; which is not only derogatory to the dignity and authority of the estates of parliament, but also destructive of the whole power thereof, and which declares the procedure of the estates of parliament to be treason: you have actually and really joined yourself in an unnatural and traitorous way against this kingdom, with the said James Graham and his rebellious army, wherewith he infested and troubled the peace of this kingdom, and cruelly and unnaturally destroyed and murdered the king's majesty's loyal subjects; and have been with the said James Graham at all the acts of hostility committed by him and his rebellious army within this kingdom, within the months of August and September last 1645, or one or other of them. And in special, you was with him and his rebellious army after the conflict at Kilsyth, which was upon the 15th of August last 1645, betwixt the army and forces of this kingdom, and the said rebellious army conducted by the said James Graham, where you did join yourself with the said James Graham and his rebellious army, and was actually with him thereafter, in his progress going through the country in subduing the same, viz. From Kilsyth, to Bothwell, and from Bothwell to Calder, and from thence to Linphoy, and from thence to Cramston-riddel, and from thence to Torwoodley, and from thence to Kelso, and from thence to Jedburgh, and from thence to Selkirk, and to the fields betwixt Selkirk and Philiphaugh, where the said James Graham and his rebellious army, were upon the 13th of September last, by the mercy of God upon his distressed people, and by the strength of his right-hand against his enemies, defeat and confounded, and where you were actually with the said James Graham and his said rebellious army; at least you the said sir Robert Spotiswood did join with the said James Graham and his rebellious army, at one or other of the saids places particularly above-specified; and during your being with the saids James Graham and the saids rebels the time foresaid, you did subscribe a Letter written by yourself to some nobleman about the king's person in England, of the date, from about Kelso to 10th of September last 1645, which was after the foresaid conflict at Kilsyth; wherein you boast, that you had dispersed the king's majesty's enemies within this kingdom, some of them to Ireland, and some to Berwick; whereby you do expostulate, that no party was sent after lieutenant-general David Lesley, who at that time came in with, and conducted forces within this kingdom for suppressing and subduing that rebellious army, wherein you were for the time: And in which Letter, you professed a resolution to follow that rebellious war whereunto you had associated yourself, and to clear the kingdom of the rebels that had fled to Berwick. By which name of rebels you did mean and express his majesty's best and most loyal subjects, within this said Letter of yours, containing many expressions of your joining the said James Graham and his rebellious army, and of your unnatural and traitorous resolution to assist the prosecution of the ruin and destruction of this kingdom, as the said Letter bears. Which crimes above-specified, or one or other of them, you cannot deny; and therefore you as a traitor to this kingdom have incurred the pain of high-treason, and the pain of forfeiture of life, lands, estate, and goods to be execute against you by the estates of this kingdom, and the benefit thereof to be applied to the use of the public, for the relief of their burdens, or otherwise, in the option of the saids estates of this kingdom, you are censurable and punishable in your person, name, and fame, and in your lands, goods, means and estate, by fining, confining, or otherwise, as the saids estates of this kingdom shall think expedient.

Glascow, 5th November 1645.

The Committee ordains the Dittay to be transmitted, sent and delivered to the above-written sir Robert Spotswood, where he is presently in the castle of Glascow; and ordains the said sir Robert to be ready to answer to the said Dittay. At St. Andrews, upon the 13th of November instant 1645.

J. A. PRYMOSE.

ANSWER to the DITTAY given in against Sir Robert Spotswood.

In regard the defences given in by James Ogilvie, against the relevancy of his Dittay, will militate likewise in my behalf, I repeat the same for me brevitatis causa.

This of mine is founded upon two acts of parliament, the one in May 1584, and the other in June 1644. By the first, it is declared to be treason, to impugn the dignity and authority of the estates of parliament, or to seek and procure the innovation or diminution of the power and authority of the samen, or any of the estates thereof. It is subsumed, that I have defaulted against this act, in so far as I, forgetting and contemning the favour granted to me in the last parliament, 1641, have abused his majesty, in purchasing from him the office of secretary, contrary to the declaration emitted by his majesty in the said parliament. Likeas, since the purchasing thereof I have docquetted and signeted with the signet of the said office, the two commissions and proclamation mentioned in the Dittay: In doing whereof I am alledged to have abused the foresaid office of secretary, and that to the derogation and diminution of the honour, dignity and authority of the estates of parliament of this kingdom.

First, To this act of parliament I answer; It cannot militate against me, in regard of the scope and intention thereof; which was only to restrain the liberty which some in those times took to themselves, to call in question the power that one of the three estates then had to sit and vote in parliament. Which is clear, both by the preface of the said act, viz. "Finding the power, dignity and authority of the court of parliament of late years called in some doubt; at least some curiously travelling to have introduced some innovation thereanent," and by other records of that time; especially a declaration of the king's, yet extant in print, published in anno 1585. In which he who knew best what was meant thereby, declareth this to have been only the parliament's intention in making of this act. So that it cannot be extended to other cases, namely this in hand.

Secundo. Giving, that this act of parliament could be extended beyond the true intent and meaning thereof; yet the particular deeds libelled, whereby I am alledged to have transgressed the same, and consequently to be guilty of treason, are not relevant to import so much. And first, whereas to aggravate the matter, I am charged to have been unmindful and unthankful for the favour I received at the last parliament: Let me say this much without offence, that as I esteem highly of their favour, so I was not obnoxious to their censure at that time: Whereanent I refer myself to that process, wherein nothing was proven of all that was alledged against me.

As to the purchasing of the secretaries office, what passed about that, and how far I had interest therein, I remit to the declaration given in by me to the committee at Glascow, which I use as a part of my defence against this point. The truth is, that the lord secretary being from court at the time, and there being sundry solicitors to his majesty for grants of divers natures, having relation to this kingdom, he was pleased, there being none then about him fit for the employment, to intrust me with a sighting and presenting the same unto him, by sending me a warrant under his sacred hand unto that effect, and the signet withal, to be kept by me during the absence of the secretary, or while his majesty should take further order thereanent. In accepting whereof, I cannot imagine that I did commit any thing worthy of blame; or that his majesty did any thing contrary to the declaration emitted by him in parliament, he having conferred no ordinary place or office upon me, but only a temporary employment in casu necessitatis, having none else for the time to lay it upon. Likens I see not how I can be charged with presumption, as the Dittay bears, in doing thereof; in respect that by natural allegiance, from which no power under Heaven can loose me, I am bound to serve and obey his majesty whensoever he calls upon me for that effect. And as to that part of his majesty's declaration, not to grant me access to his person; it was never his intention otherwise but in the case annexed, viz. whereby I might interrupt or disturb the firm peace then so happily concluded; which, I thank God, never so much as once entered into my thought, as my own conscience, and my behaviour about his majesty this while past doth bear me witness. Besides his majesty's declaration, that he should not give any access to those therein mentioned, is not a penal statute, or act of the estates, disabling or restraining them to repair to his majesty, under any pain or certification in case they should contraveen, but only a declaration emitted by his majesty himself, that he would not admit them to the end expressed in the act. And therefore the same is inept to be the ground or aggravation of a criminal Dittay.

As for docqueting and signeting commissions, and other warrants presented by me, I hope in itself it is no crime, although I was not actual secretary, I having done it by his majesty's special and express command. For the three particulars chopt at in the dittay, I can answer: first, To the commission of lieutenantry docqueted by me, it is but a double, as the docquet, I believe, bears, the principal having been sent long before by the English secretary, who was the sole mover and procurer of it.

Next, To the proclamation for holding a parliament, it was drawn in terminis by his majesty's special direction, and docqueted by me, as it is, blank in day and place, and other circumstances; his majesty's intention in it being only this, to have it come to his hand, to whom it was intrusted, who by special order was to dispose of it, as should be found best for the peace of the kingdom, without derogation to the standing laws thereof: neither hath there any use at all been made of it, he having indicted a parliament before it came to his hands, by virtue of a precedent warrant. Wherein it may seem to annul and condemn the procedure of the estates of parliament presently convened, or be otherwise destructive and derogatory to the dignity and authority thereof, it is not my part to meddle with, his majesty being most concerned therein, whose business it is, I having no further hand in it, but in so far as I was obedient to my master's directions; which by no law or act of parliament can bring me within the compass of the least censure, let be the guilt of treason. For I am not here (neither can be) called in question for that which usually the ministers of princes have been charged with (viz. giving of bad counsel) but only for docqueting and signeting these three warrants, which I could not in duty refuse, being commanded by his majesty to do the same.

To the third and last commission I make the same answer.

The second act of parliament, whereupon this dittay is founded, is in June 1644, bearing, that they who take up arms against the kingdom and estates of the country, are guilty of treason. For answer to this part of the dittay, I say, it is not relevantly subsumed, that I took up arms against the kingdom: only it is alledged, that I was in company with James Graham in his progress through the country, after the conflict at Kilsyth, which by no interpretation, can be thought to be a taking up of arms against the kingdom; especially since I was directed to him from his majesty, and by that occasion, and none other, was with him in company.

Secundo, In the act itself, it being propound in the quere, Whether assisting, or taking arms with those who have invaded the country, shall be relevant to make up a dittay against the doers thereof, no answer is given thereunto by the parliament; which imports as much, that they thought it not reasonable to make the assisters of such as are in arms against the kingdom and estates, guilty of treason: if not their assisters, far less such as were only in company with them occasionally, as I was.

As to the Letter written by me about Kelso, whatever be in it, it cannot be charged upon me; because it went no further than intention, I having upon better thoughts called it back, in regard of some expressions in it, which might seem injurious to those engaged on the other side. For whatever I think of the course, I thank God, I hate no man's person that is embarked therein, nor could wittingly irritate the meanest of them by any opprobrious compellation. Always the most can be in it, is inadvertancy.

To close all, in all this dittay, laying aside the second act, which I hope is sufficiently answered, I am not charged with any thing that is declared by any law or act of parliament to be treason, which by the 28 act, 1641, is required, before any person can be declared a traitor.

These answers for your lordships satisfaction, I have given in presently, under protestation, that (in respect I have been straitened with time, and could not gather my thoughts so well as was requisite) I shall be heard to alledge what further I can bethink myself of, before the closing of the process, either by writ or word, as your lordships shall be pleased to allow.

Where the defender repeats the defence given in by James Ogilvie, against the relevancy of his ditty, alledged by the defender to militate in his behalf. It is replied, That there are no defences given in by James Ogilvie, but only the defence of quarters, which is answered in the reply given in against the defence of quarters.

To the first defence, bearing, That the act of parliament in May 1584, does not militate against the defender, alledging that the scope and intention thereof, was only to restrain the liberty of some who called in question the power of one of the three estates. It is answered, the defence ought to be repelled, in respect of the dispositive words of the said act, militating against all those who should procure the innovation or diminution of the power and authority of the estates of parliament, or any of them; and the parliament are the best judges and interpreters of the acts of parliament, and of the extent of the sense and meaning thereof.

Where the defender in his second defence seems to insinuate, that nothing was proven against him in his process in anno 1642, wherein he received the parliament's favour. It is answered, that the time prescribed by the parliament for the trial of that whole process being but two months, the committee for the incendiaries could not proceed at that time to further trial, and if they had had time, sufficient probation would have been gotten in these processes, for proving of all, or the most part of the points contained therein.

Where, in the said second defence, the defender affirms that he committed nothing worthy of blame, and that he cannot be charged with presumption, in taking upon him the secretary's office; because by his natural allegiance, he was bound to obey the king's majesty. It is replied, That seeing in the parliament 1641, the secretary's office, and all the officers of estate are to be provided and filled by advice and approbation of the estates of parliament, during their sitting, and of the Council, during the interval betwixt the parliaments: it was a high presumption in the defender, to accept of the said office, without advice and approbation foresaid; and his accepting thereof is a presumptive deed in prejudice of the liberty of parliament, by whose advice he should have been chosen and provided to the said office; his presumption being the greater, by the embracing of the said office, the same not being vacant, but was filled by advice of parliament: and therefore he ought modestly to have refused the said office, which he did not, but embraced the samen, and used it in manner libelled in his ditty, to the dishonour of the estates of parliament of this kingdom, by expeding and docqueting commissions and proclamations, declaring their procedures to be seditious and treasonable, chiefly the said commissions being in favour of James Graham a declared traitor.

Where in the said second defence, it is alledged, That his majesty's intention was never to grant the defender access to his person, only in the case annexed to his majesty's declaration in anno 1641, viz. whereby the defender might disturb the firm peace then so happily concluded. It is replied, That these words of the king's majesty's declaration, are not of the nature of a restricting quality of the denied access mentioned in the king's declaration, as if access to his majesty's person had been granted to the defender, upon condition that the defender should not disturb the firm peace: but the words are declaratory, that in respect the estates of the kingdom had upon just grounds conceived, that the defender's access to his majesty's person heretofore, had disturbed the peace, and his access to his majesty's person thereafter would disturb the peace; therefore his majesty was graciously pleased to make the foresaid declaration, That he should not have access to his person, and so the estates would be in security, that he should not disturb the peace by his access. Like as de facto the defender's actions, since his attending his majesty's person, do testify, that he has had no small hand in disturbing the peace, which are presently laid to his charge in his ditty.

Where in the said second defence, it is alledged, that the king's majesty's declaration is no penal statute, restraining the defender from having access to his majesty's person, and therefore is ineptly libelled to be a ground, or aggravation of a criminal ditty. It is replied, That albeit it were granted, that his majesty's declaration were no penal statute restraining the defender; yet the same is pertinently libelled, to aggravate the defender's carriage against the honourable estates of parliament, by his expeding under his hand, as secretary to his majesty, the commissions and proclamations mentioned in his ditty; which office of secretary he did accept, whilst he did accede to his majesty's person, contrary to his majesty's declaration made in parliament.

Where the said second defence bears, That the defender cannot be quarrelled nor challenged for docqueting of the three particular papers mentioned in his ditty, he having done the same by his majesty's special command, and he not being quarrelled for giving counsel to the samen. It is replied, that the defender's docqueting thereof, not only clears his accession to the evil counsel, given to his majesty for granting the said commissions and proclamations, but also is a part of the prosecuting of that evil counsel, and of its desired effect. And it was the defender's part, as the part of a true and loyal subject to his majesty, to have diverted his majesty from giving ear to such evil counsels: but on the contrary, it is acknowledged by the defender in his first section of his third defence, that he was sent by his majesty to James Graham, whereby it is more than evident, that the defender has had a great hand, not only in the framing or advising of the said commissions and proclamations, but also in the conveying of the samen to the said James Graham, he being a declared traitor,

Lastly, the whole second defence ought to be repelled, in respect of the dittay, bearing the defender his acceding to his majesty's person contrary to his majesty's declaration in parliament: his accepting of the said office of being secretary, contrary to the act of parliament, anent the providing of the places of officers of estate; and his abusing of the same office by docketing and signeting commissions and proclamations, destructive of, and derogatory to the dignity and authority of the parliament.

To the first part of the third defence, bearing that the defenders' being in company with James Graham in his progress through the country after the field at Kilsyth, cannot be interpreted the taking up of arms against the country, he being sent to James Graham by his majesty. It is replied, that the dittay is relevantly subsumed from the act of parliament, viz. That the defender did join himself with James Graham and his rebellious army, and was with him and his army at the places libelled in his dittay, at least at one or other of them; which joining of the defender with the rebels, who were in arms against the country, is a taking up of arms against the country. Likeas, the defender in his defence founded upon quarters, grants that he was taken prisoner by an officer of our army, and so grants that he was in the rebel army against ours.

To that part of the third defence, bearing that the act of parliament 1644, makes no answer to that part of the query therein mentioned, anent assisters. It is replied, That the dittay is founded upon the dispositive words of the act of parliament against taking up of arms, and not upon what the act of parliament has not answered. And where the defender affirms, that he was only occasionally in company with James Graham: It is replied, that it is contrary to the preceding article of his third defence, bearing that he was sent to James Graham by the king's majesty, and so cannot alledge that he was there occasionally.

To that part of the said third defence, bearing that the letter mentioned in the defender's dittay, went no further than intention, and was called back again. It is replied, that the letter, albeit found upon the defender himself, is a declaration of the defender's resolutions therein, and is mentioned in his dittay, as an aggravation of his carriage, whereof if he had repented, he would surely have destroyed the letter, and retired himself from the rebels. And where the defender affirms, that he is not charged with any thing that is declared to be treason by any law or act of parliament, except upon the act of parliament 1644, ought to be repelled in respect of the dittay, which is also founded upon the act of parliament 1584.

Item, To the first part of the eik anent the defence of quarters, the procurators for the estates refer the samen to the commissioners for the process.

To that part of the eik given in by the defender upon the 13th of this December 1654, bearing that the proposition of his dittay is not relevant, in so far as it is founded upon the common law, equity, reason and conscience, because it is provided by diverse acts of parliaments, that the king's lieges should be governed by the king's laws, and the laws of the realm. It is replied, That the proposition of the dittay is relevant, as being founded upon the common law, equity, and reason, because, by the 69th act of the 6th parliament of king James 5, it is found by the estates of parliament, that the king's majesty has just action to pursue all summonds of treason done and committed against his person and commonwealth, conform to the common law, good equity and reason, notwithstanding there is no special law, act nor provision of the realm made thereupon before, and the defender's dittay is a dittay of treason.

Item, To that part of the eik given in by the defender upon the 15th of December, bearing that the defender cannot be challenged upon the act of parliament 1614, because the samen was not made by the king's majesty and estates joined together, making 'communem reipub. sponsionem,' which is the ordinary definition of law. It is replied, That the defence clears the defender's carriage, and all the passages libelled in his dittay, to have been clearly against the estates of parliament, he now averring, that it were hard to challenge him upon the act of parliament 1644, because the king's majesty was not present thereat. The defence itself insinuates tacitly, That this present parliament is no parliament: for if this be a parliament, and was a parliament in anno 1644, then the act is obligatory, and does oblige all the lieges, so that the defence is rather a declinator of the honourable estates of parliament, than a defence, and in effect merits no answer, but censure.

Produced by the procurators of the estates, and given up to sir Robert Spotiswood this day, with the papers formerly given in by him, and orders him to give his Duply to this, against Thursday next at ten o'clock in the forenoon peremptorie.

DUPLES given in by sir Robert Spotiswood, to the Replies made by the Procurators of Estates against his Answers to his Dittay.

1st. Whereas it is replied, that the dispositive words of the act of parliament May 1584, militates against those who procure the innovation or diminution of the estates of parliament. It is duplied, That neither the dispositive words of the act, nor the reply militates against me; because neither is it, nor can be subsumed that I have impugned the authority of the estates of parliament, or have procured the diminution of their power, by calling in doubt or in question, or denying their power anent the providing the secretary's office, and all other places of the state by their advice, and by procuring the power and liberty granted unto them by the act of parliament 1641, to be retreated and innovated, and taken from them; which is the only crime forbidden by the dispositive words of that act, as is clear by the samen, and by the narrative of the said act anent the occasion of it, which declares the dispositive. And albeit I had accepted the office of secretary without the advice and approbation foresaid, which is denied, my accepting thereof could not import a contravening of the said act 1584, and a downright treasonable impugning of the authority of the estates, because the contravening of an act of parliament, or the accepting of an office not conform to an act of parliament, is not a direct impugning of the authority of the estates of parliament, but a null act; "et quod est nullum de jure, nullum sortitur effectum:" otherwise if the consequential impugning of the authority of the estates of parliament by contravening of acts of parliament, should fall under the compass of the said act 1584, Treason should be too frequent, in regard the contraveners of any act of parliament does in consequence impugn the authority of the estates.

2dly, Whereas it is replied, That if there had been sufficiency of time, there should have been sufficient probation gotten against me in my former process. It is answered, "De his quæ non sunt, et non apparent, idem est judicium;" and notwithstanding the pretended shortness of time, there was process gotten against others, but none against me.

3dly, Where it is further replied, That it was a presumption in me to accept the said office, being already filled by the advice of parliament. It is answered, that all presumption is not treason, and the act of parliament anent the providing of these places by advice of the estates, does not bear, that if they should be provided otherwise, the acceptors should be punished as traitors.

2d. Repeats the declaration given in by me and my defence, and denys, that I imbraced or accepted the said office; and the doing of acts otherwise incumbent to the secretary, cannot import the accepting of the office, seeing it cannot be denied, but either the necessary absence of a secretary, or in time of sickness, or in the vacancy, before his majesty could acquaint the parliament or council, or have the advice and approbation anent the filling these places, his majesty may command any of his subjects to supply the place, without any hazard of treason.

4thly, Whereas to the defence, bearing, That his majesty's declaration, that he should not grant me access to his royal person, whereby I might disturb the peace, it is no penal statute, and consequently it can be no ground of a dittay: it is replied, that the declaration is not of a restricting quality; and that though his majesty's declaration be not a penal statute, yet the samen may be enough to aggravate my carriage. I duple, that I repeat the defence, and opposes the declaration itself: and if the declaration be not a penal statute, as it is acknowledged, it cannot be libelled pertinently to be a relevant ground of a dittay, and consequently it cannot aggravate the defender's carriage; "et quod non relevat, non aggravat."

5thly, Whereas it is replied, That my docketing the papers mentioned in the dittay, clears, that I gave ill counsel in granting the saids commissions and declarations, and is a part of the prosecuting of that counsel, and that as a good subject I should have diverted his majesty. It is duple, That all these who are employed to docket or sign papers, are not admitted to be of his council, and cannot in good manners intrude themselves to divert his majesty from his resolutions, and refuse to sign or docket such papers as his majesty is pleased to cause present to them, upon pretext, that they in their judgment disprove them; and I repeat my answer, whereunto no reply is made, That what I did in these particulars, was in obedience to his majesty's express commands, and in law "qui jussu judicis aliquid facit (multo magis) of the supreme judge and magistrate non videtur dolo malo facere, qui parere necesse habet." ff. de Regul. Juris l. 167. § 1.

6thly, Whereas it is replied, That the dittay is relevantly subsumed; That I did join myself with James Graham, and was with him in his army, and that in opposing my defence for quarters, grants that I was in the rebels army against our army: The defence is repeated, and that subsumption is no wise relevant, because it is not conform to the act of parliament, that he took arms: And an occasional being in an army cannot import a joining, and taking of arms. And although I have granted that I was taken prisoner, being occasionally in the army, I have not granted that I was in the army as an actual taker of arms against the country.

7thly, And where the reply bears, That I cannot alledge, that I was occasionally in the army, because I have granted in my defence, that I was sent by the king: It is answered, That in affirming that I was occasionally in company with James Graham, I am not contrary to myself, and my meaning being, that I was there being sent, but not there of purpose to join actually with him in taking of arms.

8thly, Whereas it is further replied, That my letter, albeit found upon me, is a declaration of my resolution, and is mentioned as an aggravation of my dittay. The defence is repeated, and the keeping and not sending of that letter, argues my resolution to the contrary.

9thly, Whereas to that part of the defence, bearing, That the proposition of the dittay is not relevant, in so far as it is founded upon the common law, and other grounds not authorized by acts of parliament: It is replied, That by the 69 act of 6th parliament of king James 5th, it is found, That the king's majesty has just occasion to pursue all summonds of treason conform to the common law, equity and reason, notwithstanding that there is no special law

nor act of parliament made thereupon. I duple, that by the said act of parliament in anno 1540, it is provided, that though there be not a special law or act of parliament anent the raising of summonds, and regulating of processes against parties accused of treason, the samen may be done conform to the common law, equity and reason: but it is not meant, that dittays of treason may subsist on these pretended grounds, without an act of parliament prohibiting the lieges, and putting them in malu fide anent the committing of unlawful acts under the pain of treason; which is clear from the act itself, being made upon the occasion of raising of summonds against the heirs of unquhill Robert Lesly, and to see his memory delete and extinct, for certain points of lese majesty. The question was then, and it was murmured, as the act bears, not that he was accused of certain points which were not treason by any act of parliament or law of the country; but only that it was a novelty to raise summonds and move action against a dead person: and therefore the said act being only ordinary quoad the regulation of process, does not derogate from so many fundamental laws, providing, that the king's lieges should be governed by the laws of this kingdom, and of no other; especially seeing it is declared likewise by the 28 act of his majesty's 2d parliament, that no person can be declared traitor but for contravening a law or act of parliament made, under pain of treason. And it were absurd, that the subjects of this kingdom, who cannot in reason be obliged to obey laws, but in quantum sunt notificata, should be judged by laws, which they neither know nor can know.

10thly, Whereas the replyer repeats as a defence, that which is only humbly represented by me, and not proposed by way of defence, in regrating how hard my condition is to be judged upon the late act of parliament made in the time of these unhappy combustions, and draws odious consequences to irritate the estates. I repeat my paper, and conceive, that without giving occasion of such cruel inferences, and without offence, I might regrate my hard fortune, having adhered to his majesty bona fide, and following the light of my judgment, out of confidence that I was not contravening any known law. And now being brought to answer a dittay founded upon a late act of parliament, made before the end of these unhappy distractions re non integra, when I was out of the kingdom, I would have expected, that since these revolutions have brought the replyer and me to appear in other stations than we have been in formerly, that he should have forbore to have used such expressions, as in the end of his reply he hath done.

Although the Answers to these things, wherewith I am charged in my Dittay, be both easy and obvious; yet I do adhere mainly to that defence, founded upon the law of nations and humanity itself: That I cannot be put to my Answer, in regard when I was taken prisoner, I had quarters granted me by an honourable person, an officer of the army, unto whose promise and word of honour I do appeal. As to that which may be said for the equity and necessity of maintaining this universal practice of nations, because it is sufficiently touched in the defences given in by some others at this time, to avoid unnecessary repetition, I refer myself thereunto; whereunto I add this much only.

That hitherto, since the beginning of this unhappy war, quarters and exchange of prisoners too, have been allowed on both sides; which never having been discharged, to deny now to these are in your power, after that by the fortune of war you have got the advantage in the matter of prisoners, I leave it to your lordships' consideration, if it be fair, and how it may be construed in the opinion of the world. Besides, I hope your lordships will use your prisoners no worse than your friends and associates in England (who are in arms for the self-same cause) are accustomed to do; between whom and the king's party, there have always fair quarters been granted. Which makes me wonder the more of the report that is going, of some that come from thence, with instructions to press the execution of justice upon the prisoners. The which advice, if it come from them, being so unsuitable to their own practice, ought to be suspected, as tending to the discredit and weakening of this nation.

Now because upon the decision of this point dependeth much of the welfare of this kingdom, both parties presently in arms, being to take it for a rule hereafter, in the matter of quarters; I hope your lordships will amongst other respects, have before your eyes the safety of many innocent souls, who will be interested in the result thereof; and will not listen to any motions, which instead of curing the sore, will inflame it, and be the ready means to perpetuate our unnatural divisions, and make them irreconcilable.

That he adhereth to the Defence already given in by him, founded upon quarters, and craveith that it may be first discust, being a peremptory defence impediens processum, and eliding both the proposition and conclusion, in so far as capital punishment and forfeiture of life is inferred against him. And as in a criminal pursuit before the justice, if a defence were proponed upon a remission, remitting the crime of treason in so far as may infer forfeiture of life only, and not of lands and goods: The said exception, albeit partial, and not elusory of the whole proposition and conclusion, being proponed primo loco, will be first discust. And therefore the Defender being in the same case, and the exception upon quarters being in effect equivalent to a remission, so far as it secures his life, and elides the conclusion of capital punishment, he ought to have the like benefit.

It is further answered for the Defender, that the proposition of the Dittay is no-wise relevant, in so far as it is founded upon the common law of nations, equity, reason, and conscience; because the foresaid grounds, before they be determined and authorized by positive laws and statutes, are not relevant to be grounds of criminal dittays, whereupon capital or arbitrary punishments are inferred, in regard it is a fundamental law in all well-governed kingdoms, "pœnam alicui non esse indicendam, nisi expresso jure cautum sit." ff. de verb. signif. l. 131. Likewise it is expressly provided by diverse acts of parliament, that the king's lieges should be governed by the king's laws, and laws of this realm allenarly, namely, by an act of the 5th parliament of king James I, c. 48; and another of the 6th parliament, king James 4, c. 79.

Whereas the Dittay is founded upon the 4th act in June 1644. The Defender represents, that as he had no hand in the beginning, and hath never been a fomerter since of this unhappy combustion and division between his majesty and his people, so he will carefully avoid all ticklish dispute anent these questions between them. Nevertheless he is confident, that without offence he may remonstrate how hard his condition is, being put to answer a Dittay, having no other warrant in law but a late act of parliament, not made as all other former acts and laws, by his majesty and the estates joined together, and making communem reipublicæ sponsonem; which is the ordinary definition of laws: but during, and in the time of an unhappy division between his majesty and his subjects, being in arms, as they both profess, for maintaining of their rights and privileges, without intention to prejudice or diminish the known right one of another. When such fatal questions do fall out between such parties, and when necessity involves all men to side with one of them, and men are left to their own judgments and the light of their consciences, without the clear direction of positive laws, determining expressly what the carriage of private men and subjects should be in so unhappy a case: It hath ever been thought excusable, that they should follow the light of their own consciences and judgment, albeit mistaken and erroneous; and therefore should enjoy the benefit and privileges of the law of war and nations, whereof one of the main and principal is, that they should not be judged by the rules and laws of these against whom they have sided; especially such as are made during the dispute, and while the war is not ended, but either by the preceding laws made in time of peace, or by such as are agreed upon by both parties after a happy pacification. The reason of this law and practice of nations is, because "in omnibus statibus controversiarum, fieri potest ut neutra litigantium pars sit improba: et sicut ex probabili causa litigantis in disceptationibus fieri, victi lite etque sententia non condemnantur calumnia, utrinque tamen juratur de calumnia; ita censetur in disceptatione et lite armorum."

REPLIES to the Defences given in by Sir Robert Spotswood, founded upon Quarters.

Whereas his Defence given in upon the 8th of December 1645, hears, that he cannot be put to answer his Dittay; in regard, when he was taken prisoner, he had quarters granted to him by an honourable person, an officer of the army; and referring himself to the defences given in by others, anent the equity and necessity of maintaining the universal practice of nations, anent quarters.

It is replied, The defence founded upon quarters, alledged granted to him, is not relevant as it is set down; the defence not descending upon the person giver and granter of the quarters, and time and place, when and where. 2. Albeit it were descended who gave him quarters; yet the defence bears not what the granter of the quarters promised to the Defender the time of the granting thereof: for at the taking of captives, several takers give several promises to their captives of several and distinct natures. 3. The defence founded upon quarters, as being proposed to liberate the Defender from the crimes libelled in his Dittay, and of the condign punishment thereof, ought to be repelled; because, whatsoever hath been heretofore, or is presently the custom of other nations in their wars, when one nation is in arms against another, the estates of parliament of this kingdom are not to take notice thereof, but in casu de quo nunc agitur, anent the bringing to due trial and condign punishment, these who have risen in arms, and taken arms against the estates of this kingdom. The alledgeance founded upon any promise, pardon, impunity, or quarters given by some particular men, cannot free the Defender from just trial, and condign punishment, seeing the question is not here of any man taken in bello: But the question is anent the punishment of these who have taken arms in a treacherous and unnatural way against their own native kingdom, and joined themselves with a declared traitor, risen in insurrection within the kingdom; who not only has taken arms against the estates of this kingdom, and the liberties of the nation, but also against the religion presently professed within this kingdom, and against the mutual league and covenant established by the parliament and assembly of this kingdom: In defence whereof, many thousands of his majesty's good subjects within this kingdom have been cruelly cut off by that declared traitor James Graham, to whom the Defender did join himself at the times libelled in his Dittay. The case being thus stated, that the Defender is challenged and accused for rising in arms, and joining with James Graham, a declared traitor and enemy to this kingdom, who had taken arms against the estates of the kingdom, for opposing of the mutual league and covenant: There is none who will think, that if any of his adherents, counsellors, or those who are joined with him in arms, being by the Lord's mercy towards his distressed people in this kingdom, delivered into the hands of the estates of this kingdom, should alledge for their defence and impunity, upon this ground, that when they were taken, their takers promised to save their lives, or their fortunes: It cannot be thought that this should free the delinquent, unless it be thought in the power of any private man in the army whatsoever, in his private way, to pardon the greatest offenders against the estates, and opposers of our solemn league and covenant; quod est absurdum. If this evasion be sustained, then, without any great hazard, there is a door open to all close malignants (who in their cautelous way, dare not appear what truly they are) to join in arms with the public traitors, and to have some of their own temper in our army, ready to give them quarters, when an adverse wind blows. Likeas, if this defence of quarters be sustained, then the whole nation, especially the estates of parliament, do violate the oath of the covenant, and the oath of the parliament, aient the prosecuting and censoring of malignants, opposers of the covenant. And therefore there cannot be any impunity promised in the fields to a delinquent, by any private man whatsoever, in prejudice of the solemn league and covenant, and defence and maintenance thereof. But these who have risen in arms against the estates of this kingdom, as they are punishable by the laws of the kingdom, so these laws cannot be evacuate, and made of no effect by any man's protection or promise.

Where in the defence founded upon quarters, an example is cited of the wars of England. It is answered, That the estates of parliament are not to be ruled by the example of the army of the parliament of England, but are to proceed and to judge before God, that all means may be essayed to divert his wrath from this nation; and are to proceed conform to the laws of the kingdom, in prosecution of the solemn league and covenant.

Where in the said defence it is insinuate, that the safety of many innocent souls will be interested in result of the question of quarters. It is answered, that the smen needs no answer in law; but it may justly receive the answer, That if justice be done upon God's enemies, the Lord will let us see judgment upon the enemies of this kingdom, whose terror is now casten up, and upbraided.

And where in the defence upon quarters, it is alledged, that scripture confirms the law and practice thereof, the 22d verse of the 6th chapter of the 2d of the Kings, aient the answer made by the Prophet Elisha to the king of Israel's question, "If he should smite the Syrians whom the Prophet miraculously led blind into Samaria." It is answered, that that passage of scripture does not confirm the law and practice of quarters, because the Prophet thereby does not confirm and allow the law and practice of quarters, but cites a custom of the kings of Israel, which of itself is not allowable: being reproved by the spirit of God, both in Saul for Agag, and in Ahab for Benhadad, in the 15th of the 1st of Samuel, and in the 20th of the 1st of the Kings. And the Prophet Elisha was alledging the kings of Israel their unlawful customs, not to confirm the custom, but to shew the kings of Israel what miracle the Prophet had wrought. And where it may be answered, That there was an express command of the Lord for the not sparing of Agag; yet it is to be remembered, that there is no such express command for Benhadad. 2. The tye of the covenant is no small tye, for punishing the enemies of religion, and these who have risen in arms against the estates of this kingdom; and is a bond tying the estates of parliament to the prosecution of delinquents to their condign punishment.

Item, Albeit quarters were to be sustained within this kingdom, (as they are not to be sustained as aforesaid) yet no quarters could be granted to this defender, he being by the propositions of peace ratified in both parliaments of Scotland and England, put amongst the number of these who should expect no pardon. In prejudice of which declaration of the estates of parliament, none but the estates of parliament, or others having their power, could promise impunity.

Produced by the procurators of the estates, and given up to sir Robert Spotiswood this day, with the papers formerly given in by him, and orders him to give in his Duply to this against Thursday next, at ten o'clock in the forenoon, peremptorie.

DUPLES by sir Robert Spotiswood, to the Replies made against his Defences upon Quarters.

Whereas it is replied, that the defence upon quarters is not relevantly set down, because it is not condescended upon the giver of quarters, and the time and place. It is duplied, that time and place, when and where I was taken, is so nottour, that there needs not any further condescending; it being known that I was taken in the field about Philipphaugh, immediately after the conflict there. And the said defence is relevant, without condescending upon the giver of quarters, because by the law of war and nations, these who are taken in the field, eo ipso that they are taken, by whomsoever, have the right and benefit of quarters; neither are they obliged to take precise notice of the name and quality of these who take them: Neither is it sometimes possible in these occasions, when so many together are promiscuously in action. And yet I condescend that it was my good fortune to be taken by an officer belonging to a man of honour and eminence, both in the state and the army, the earl Lanerk, to whom I was brought immediately thereafter, and had from him that courteous and favourable reception that could be expected from such a man, in being secured from all violence and wrong. And as honour and nobility did weigh down in him these prejudices, which he might have had, upon misinformation, against me; so I am confident that the unquestionable law of arms will not be violated in me, who am prisoner of such a nobleman.

Where it is replied, that the defence bears not what the grantor of quarters promised to me in time of granting thereof, and that at the taking of captives, several takers make several promises of distinct natures. It is answered, that in these occasions, when men are so much taken up with action, they have not leisure, neither are they in use to stand upon promises and capitulations; and the granting of quarters, without any other expression or condition, is as binding by the law of arms, and secureth as much the receiver's life, as if there were a formal instrument upon it: 'Qui enim hostem non interficit, sed capit, tribuit, capto jus ex tacita pollicitatione,' though there were no other expression. Yet to clear this part too, I refer my quarters, and the manner thereof, to the relation of the said noble earl, and of the laird of Silvertounhall, one of his captains, by whom I was first taken.

Where it is replied, that whatsoever hath been, or is the custom of other nations, when one nation is in war against another; 'in casu de quo nunc agitur,' quarters cannot free me, because I was not taken in bello, but in a treacherous way against my country, and have joined myself with a declared traitor. It is replied, 1. Albeit the reply bears, that the estates of parliament are not to take notice of the law and custom of nations: Nevertheless, I, without prescribing or prejudicating what the estates of parliament will, or are to take notice of, do adhere to the common law of nations and war, which hath force every where; 'jus enim gentium omni humano generi commune est.' Neither is the said law limited to the case of a national and foreign war, when one nation is in arms with another; but hath place in omni bello, whether foreign or intestine, which falls under the definition of war. For war is defined, 'publicorum armorum contentio,' upon some probable grounds and motives, which either side conceive they have to be in arms; which agreeth to civil wars as well as foreign. And therefore the necessity and favourable laws of war have place in these civil wars and distractions, and that with greater reason than in any other; because albeit they be called wars, those who are engaged on either side are not properly called hostes, but adversarii; for this reason, 'quia in civilitus dissensionibus, quamvis sæpe res pub. lædatur, non tamen in exitium reipub. contenditur,' as the law saith. So that the benefit of quarters cannot be denied in civil wars, no more than in foreign. Likewise, it was acknowledged elsewhere by the replier, that parties taken in proxinctu of this war, may challenge the benefit of quarters: as appears by the replies and triplies in James Ogilvie's former process, which are in the clerk's hands, and are repeated by me, brevitatis causa.

2. Where the said reply bears, that I was not taken in bello, but in an insurrection, and as the replier states the question, it is affirmed, that none can think that the defence upon quarters should free me; I humbly crave, that what I am necessitated to alledge for my just defence be not mistaken, seeing I have no intention to dispute so high a question as the lawfulness or unlawfulness of the war; but only to vindicate myself, and make it appear that the benefit of the law of nations ought not to be denied to me. Therefore I answer, that I cannot be judged by the replier's thought and assertion, either in stating the question, or deciding it; and I cannot conceive that I can be said to be taken in an insurrection, and not in bello, seeing insurrection in the notion and definition of law is properly, when in time of a happy peace and harmony betwixt a prince and the collective body of his people, private and factious men, for their own ends and designs, Plebem contra Rempub. colligunt; as Sheba the son of Bichri did against David. But when there is a division betwixt the prince and his people, it cannot be said that he or his adherents, who, upon probable (though possible erroneous) grounds, follow their own judgment, are in an insurrection. And the question being stated, as truly it is, when a sovereign prince is in terms of difference with his people, and both profess that they are for the same ends, and that the prince intends nothing but the maintenance of his just right, without prejudice of religion or liberty of the subject established by the laws; and on the other part, these who are on the other side profess, that they intend nothing but the preservation of religion and their liberty, without diminution of the king's greatness, power, and sovereignty, established by so many laws; and none being to interpose themselves to be judges of so high differences, both sides conceive they are necessitated to take arms for these ends respective. If the prince give commission and command to any of his subjects who are of the same opinion with himself to make a diversion; whether or not are these who are taken upon that side, to be thought to be taken in bello, or in an insurrection? The question being so stated, it is evident upon the foresaid grounds, and from the story of all times, and the treatises of these who have written upon war, and the laws thereof, that such a war, by the law and practice of all nations, admitteth and challengeth the privileges of jura belli, whereof that of quarters is a main one. Neither are the persons or conditions of these who are intrusted with the managing of the war to be considered, in prejudice of those who adhere to the prince, and are with these whom he employeth, not out of any personal respect to them, but as they represent the prince by commission. Neither can this war be thought to be of another nature than that in England, where quarters are neither denied nor violated. And what moderation hath been used in the like civil distractions in this country, during that contest and war betwixt the Bruce and the Baliol, and in the times of king James 3, and queen Mary, and in the beginning of king James 6, his reign, and also during the cruel wars in France, or yet in those of the low countries, the histories of those times bear record. It is reported that king Robert the Bruce, having taken many prisoners, dimisit omnes humaniter habitos; which are Buchanan's own words. These who sided with king James 3, and were at the field of Stirling, though not only the greatest part of the nobility and country were on the other side, but also the prince, were not esteemed or designed enemies to the country, but are said to have been of another and of an ill opinion, Act. 3 and 5, of the first parliament of king James 4, and are said by Buchanan to have followed diversam sectam; and divers of the nobility who had adhered to king James 3, did vote in the next parliament held by king James 3, as appears by the 8th act of his first parliament, of the edition of Likprivik. And likewise these who adhered to the queen regent in the beginning of the Reformation, and thereafter in the troubles of queen Mary, divers of them being noblemen of the highest condition, as the earls of Argyle, Glencairn and Cassils, the lord Home, and Boyd, &c. though they proceeded to the highest acts of opposition, and some of them were at the battle of Langside, and indicted and held a parliament at Edinburgh, the same time that another was holden in the Canongate in the king's name, yet were so favourably construed, that Archibald earl of Argyle was in the list to be regent after the death of the earl of Lennox. And what were the happy effects of the moderation used towards them, it appeared by the happy and firm peace that followed, and by the loyal carriage both of them and their posterity ever thereafter. And therefore, for these reasons, and because prisoners have been exchanged in this war, it cannot be denied but the laws and benefit of quarters, being of the same nature, and founded upon the same principles of law and nations, should be received and practised in this war.

Whereas the inconvenience is represented and aggravated, if it should be in the power of private men to pardon the greatest offenders, a door should be opened to close malignants, to use the cautious way mentioned in the reply, to join in arms with the public traitors, upon hope that some of their own temper on the other side will be ready to give them quarters when an adverse wind blows. It is replied, that the question is not of granting an absolute pardon, which is not craved by the defence of quarters, but a securing of the life of these who are taken: and if the defence of quarters should not be sustained, the repelling of it will open a greater door to all sort of cruelty, and to far greater inconvenience than that imaginary one in the reply, seeing it cannot be thought that men will engage and expose themselves to hazard, upon confidence that they might, when they pleased, have recourse to their close friends for quarters, considering the difficulty to find them out in time of such confusion.

Where it is further replied, That if quarters be sustained; the whole nation, and especially the estates of parliament, will violate the oath of the covenant, and that either of the parliament anent the prosecution of malignants; and that there cannot be any impunity granted to delinquents by any private man. It is replied, that though the oaths of covenant and parliament oblige the takers of these oaths to discover malignants, that they may be brought to trial, that they do not prejudice those who are called in question of their lawful defences, competent to them by the law of nations, as that of quarters; neither do they oblige the judges to repel such defences, seeing by the covenant they are not obliged to proceed against those who are questioned as malignants, notwithstanding of such defences. 2. The practice of the estates in some particular cases evinceth, that they do not think themselves so limited by the said oaths, as the replier would have, because they have before this condescended to the exchanging of divers prisoners, and have dismissed divers others who were in the like condition with me, being taken in the field, and have not only spared some who were on the other side, but have employed them thereafter. And it were absurd and injurious to charge upon the estates perjury and violation of their oaths, because of these practices, being founded upon the law of nations and good considerations.

3. The question is not of impunity granted by any private man in the field, as the reply bears, but of quarters granted by the laws of war and nations, which is authorized and approved by the lieutenant-general and commander in chief, the day of the conflict at Philiphaugh, in so far as he gave no command, discharging quarters to be given in general, but only discharging any to be given to the Irish; which exception of the Irish militates in favour of all others not excepted, quia exceptio firmat regulam in non exceptis.

Whereas it is further replied, That the estates of parliament are not to be ruled by the example of the parliament of England, but to judge before God, and to divert his wrath, by proceeding against delinquents, conform to the laws of this kingdom. It is answered, That the practice of England is urged, not as a rule to the estates of this kingdom to regulate their procedure by, but as an instance of the practice of nations, conform to the law of nations; which being received in England in this war, which is principally for obtaining the reformation of religion and settling the liberties of that country, ought with far greater reason to be received by us who were involved in that war, out of our desire to have these ends established there, after we had obtained the same ourselves.

Neither can the laws of this kingdom, and the mutual League and Covenant be still obtruded for the repelling of the defence of quarters, because there is no law of this kingdom discharging quarters to be granted or kept, neither any clause of the mutual League and Covenant against the same; otherwise the whole nation of England, and the estates there, should be involved in perjury; seeing they joined with us in the mutual League and Covenant, and, notwithstanding, think not themselves obliged to refuse quarters contrary to all nations.

Where it is urged by the repier, to make me odious, That the terror of the enemies of this kingdom is casten up and upbraided, and therefore if justice be done upon God's enemies, the Lord will let us see justice done upon the enemies of this kingdom. I am confident, that if my defence and expressions be considered, it will appear they cannot be wrested to import any upbraiding, or casting up of any terror; and whatever odious characters be put upon me, I cannot be thought to be an enemy to God, except it were shown that I had intended something against the honour of God, purity of religion, or the liberty of my country; for in civil combustions, the naked difference of opinion ament civil questions, and adhering of a subject to his prince, was never thought to be enmity against God. This is evident from the 2 Sam. chap. ii. ver. 26 and 27, for in that civil war between David and the house of Saul, though David (God's prophet, and anointed to be king) was on the one side with God's people, yet they who were upon the other side of Ishbosheth were not called enemies to God, but their brethren; and upon that respect Joab did not exhort them that were with him to pursue eagerly their adversaries, as God's enemies, but bid them return from following their brethren. And in chap. iv. ver. 11, David calleth Ishbosheth, though the head of that faction against him, a righteous person. Likewise, when it pleased God to work deliverances for his people, it was not conceived that there was a necessity to divert God's wrath, by proceeding in rigour against those who had fallen in their hands, but by the contrary, David, after that great victory against Absalom, being pressed to that purpose, answered, "Shall there any man be put to death in Israel?" 2 Sam. xix. 22. And Saul, after his victory against the Ammonites, when the people urged that they should be put to death who had been against Saul, and had said that he should not be king, he answered, "There shall not a man be put to death this day, for to-day the Lord hath wrought salvation in Israel." 1 Sam. xi. 13.

Where it is further replied, That the passage of Scripture cited in the defence, out of 2 Kings chap. vi. doth not confirm the law and practice of quarters, but that the prophet citeh a custom of the kings of Israel, which of itself is not allowable, being reproved by the spirit of God, in the case of Agag and Benhadad; and that that unlawful custom is alledged not to confirm the same, but to shew

what miracle the prophet had wrought. It is answered, That the text itself is opposed, whence it is clear, that the prophet useth an argument 'a majori; quasi dicat, ne eos quidem occideres quos abduceret gladio tuo et arcu tuo; ergo multo minus alieno beneficio comparatos fas est occidere.' So it is understood by Tremellius commenting upon that place, and Diodati in his annotations upon the same. And therefore the gloss of the reply, bearing that nothing is meant by the prophet but to shew what miracle he hath wrought, is absurd, seeing there needed no probation of that which was evident and undeniable; and is contrary to the express words of the text, which containeth a question moved by the king of Israel unto Elisha, whether he should smite the Syrians or not; and a negative answer of the prophet, that he should not, fortified with an argument by way of Euthymeme: 'capti in bello non sunt occidendi; ergo multo minus alieno beneficio et miraculo comparati.' Which should be an ill argument, if the antecedent were only founded upon an evil and reproved custom: and the prophet cannot be thought to use an ill custom, to enforce a good conclusion; it being as much against rules, both of goodness and good reasoning, to use an argument from that which is evil, to prove that which is good, as to do ill that good may come of it. And that it was not only the custom of the kings of Israel to spare captives, but an universal and antient custom of nations, it is evident, not only from innumerable passages, as well of the civil law, as of history, but from the 14th of Genesis, where it is clear, that these who were taken by Chedorlaomer were taken captives and carried away with Lot.

Where the reply bears, that the said custom is reproved in the case of Agag and Benhadad. It is answered, that for the first, it is acknowledged by the repier himself, that there was a great disparity betwixt the case of Agag, and of these who have gotten quarters, because Agag was in that condition, that he was incapable of quarters, in regard God commanded Saul expressly to go and smite Amelek, and destroy all that they had, and spare neither man, woman, infant, ox, or sheep; so that this was an extraordinary case of a person by God's command devoted to destruction, 1 Kings 15. As for the case of Benhadad, it is clear from the text, that he was appointed to destruction by the lord, for his arrogance and blasphemy against God: and the word in the 42 verse chap. xx. of the 1st of Kings, used by the prophet when he told Ahab that he had let go a man whom God had appointed to utter destruction, "Anathemati devotum," as it is rendered by Tremellius, evinceth that there was an extraordinary warrant for destroying of Benhadad; because that word is only used in such cases, as when there was an extraordinary command to destroy and devote Jericho and Agag; 'nunc abi ut percutias Amalechum et anathemati devoveas;' which is likewise more clear from the whole context of 1 Kings chap. xx, for after Benhadad was foiled the first time by Ahab, a prophet came to the king of Israel, and told him that the king of Syria would come up against him at the return of the year, and advised him to mark and see what he should do. And when the prophet came thereafter to Ahab, after he had dismissed Benhadad, to convince him, did suppose the case of a man that had brought to him a prisoner, and said 'keep this man,' and that upon condition, if by any means he should be missing, his life should be for his life. In which case there was an express charge given to keep the prisoner, and not let him go: which must be understood likewise in the true case of Benhadad, otherwise there should not be a parity between the cases; neither could Ahab have been convinced, but might have had an evasion and pretext, that he had not got the like charge, and that God's will concerning the destruction of Benhadad had not been intimated to him.

I humbly represent how hard it is that such arguments should be brought from extraordinary cases of blasphemous pagans, devoted and anathematized by God, and enforced upon people at such times and places, where they whom it concerns cannot make answer; whereas it may be evinced from diverse places of Scripture, what moderation was used in times of civil distraction, and that these who had been active, and leading on the other side, were not only spared, but advanced: witness the civil war betwixt the Israelites and the Benjamites; in which, though the cause was most unjust upon the Benjamites' part, and that they had provoked mightily the rest of the tribes, by reason of two great overthrows they had given them; yet after the Israelites had got the better of them, their revenge went no further, than to kill such as they could overtake in the battle: but as for them that escaped to the rock Rimmon, they called peaceably to them, and notwithstanding of their oath, provided wives for them, and made up again the breach of that tribe. The fair quarters Abner and his men had from Joab (though in flying he had killed Asahel) is toucht before. Though Adonijah exalted himself against king Solomon, and usurped the kingdom, yet upon his submission he was spared and dismissed: so was cursed Shimei. Amasa captain of Absalom's host, was received into favour, and made captain over Judah. These and many more places clearly evince, that Scripture is on our side, and that not one passage thereof can be wrested against us.

Whereas it is replied, That quarters could not be granted to me, because I am excepted in the propositions of peace, and declared to be such a person as could expect no pardon. It is answered, first, The question is not of pardon, which is not craved, but of quarters already granted for securing my life: and the said propositions of pence, are not a positive declarator of my incapacity and exception in case of a happy peace, but only contains the desires and propositions of the estates to be made to his majesty, which may be altered upon a mutual condescending betwixt his majesty and them, before they be settled by an act of pacification; and the said exception is only to take effect against such as should be processed and condemned, and therefore is to be understood without prejudice of their lawful defences, and namely that of quarters; seeing by no act of parliament, nor by the foresaid propositions, it is declared, that these who are excepted should be incapable of quarters, and of the benefit of the law of nations. And that this was not the intention of the estates of either kingdom, is clear by their practice; for notwithstanding of the said propositions contained in the said exception, some of these who are excepted, have been exchanged, as the laird of Drum younger with us, and col. Goring and others in England.

My Lords; I conceive that my answer to the dittay may be very short, and that I need not enter in a subtle dispute of law against it; the subject is so tender and ticklish, that I shall be loth to be put to the question, unless I be necessitate.

My answer then at this time is, that I conceive, that by the law of nations and by the law of war, I cannot be brought to answer a dittay of treason upon hazard of my life and estate, as long as I am in this condition; because I am a prisoner of war, and was taken by the Lancashire forces, with my sword in my hand, and upon quarters and assurance that my life, and such stuff and other things as I had about me, should be safe and unquestioned. War, albeit with its noise it seem to cry down all other laws, wants not its own necessary and inviolable laws, without which it should be rather a bloody and brutish butchery, than a lawful war, which God himself is pleased to own, entitling himself The God of hosts and battles. That the law of quarters amongst all other jura belli, is the most necessary and equitable, it cannot be called in question: the issues of life and of death are in God's hands, who is pleased to dispense with that which is called the fortune of war in so variable a way, that it may be justly said, 'Inter utrumque volat dubiis victoria pennis;' to the end, that neither side should refuse to the other that humanity and favour which they may have occasion possibly the next day to desire themselves. And it is not to be conceived that quarters consist in the favour only and grant of the giver, but as founded rather upon the equity and obligation of a mutual faction, whereby the receivers of quarters redeem their own safety, with the safety of more who would be in hazard upon the other side; it being always to be presumed, that men being prodigal of themselves, and despairing of their life and quarters, though in the end they may be overcome by multitudes, will sell their lives at a dearer rate, than those who would live to enjoy the victory would be content to have it. This law, as in all other wars, so more especially is to be kept in civil dissensions, in regard the ties and interest both parties have in others, plead both for excusing those who are taken, by reason of interest they conceive they had to adhere to the side which they followed, and likewise for favour of those who have taken their friends, in respect of the interest they have in their prisoners. I may instance many practicks in these late troubles in England, but shall only remember one, because it is famous and notorious. One captain Lilburn was taken by some of his majesty's forces; the gentleman being both a parliament man and a commander, had been so active in both ways, that he wanted not powerful enemies, who upon probable grounds and motives, moved his majesty to put him to a trial for divers high points of treason. The gentleman alledged the inviolable privilege of a prisoner of war, and the law of nations, and that he could not be put to answer any charge, though never so just, until he were dismissed. General Ruthven, and all other soldiers of fortune did interpose themselves, and solicited that the law of war should not be violated. In end, justice did prevail with his majesty's all other respects, and the gentleman was upon the said ground acquit. Upon these grounds I conclude, that I am in the like case, and cannot be holden to answer to this dittay: And yet, lest I should seem to shidow myself only under the said privilege and defence, and that my actions may not appear still to your lordships so ugly and horrid as they look in my dittay, being represented naked, and without the vesture of the favourable circumstances and probable grounds and motives, and the sincerity of my intentions, whereupon they proceeded without any thought of treason or hostility: I have joined with this defence, a short and true Relation of my carriage in these late troubles, for information to your lordships.

Whatever the world may conceive of me and my carriage in the first and late troubles, my conscience bears me witness, and I may appeal to the knowledge of all those who have had the occasion to know me inwardly, how free I have ever been of disaffection either to the purity of religion established here, or to my native country; and that I never countenanced nor complied with any thing which was conceived to be a corruption neither in church or state, but was one of the first who petitioned for redress of the samer during the first troubles, though some of our houses suffered the extremity of war and hostility: It cannot be instructed, that I appeared, in any hostile way, or did any act against my country. After the pacification of these troubles, the rebellion of Ireland having fallen out, I resolved to take hold of that occasion, to express to the world my constant zeal for religion and my country. And to that purpose there having past some discourse betwixt general Lesley, and me, concerning the expedition for Ireland, which I conceived to imply an invitation to engage in that service; I sent therefore a gentleman of my own name, to show him, that I should be content to serve in that war, upon such terms as others of my quality were to have. But having found, that the general had not absolute power to dispose of places, and to prefer officers; and not presuming to have the like way and favour with others who had a vote in the disposing of them, I retired and lived quietly at home, without any meddling, until the combustions in England broke out, and came to such height, that they were like to involve this kingdom, and to occasion a rupture betwixt his majesty and us. Then I began to bethink myself what my carriage should be: and in end I thought it best to keep myself free, and to convoy myself out of his majesty's dominions, until it should please God to put an end to these unhappy differences. Upon this resolution I went to England intending thence to go to France; but having gone to take leave of his majesty, I was commanded to stay and wait upon him. Being his majesty's subject, and commanded to wait upon his royal person, at such a time, when he was in distress and hazard, I neither did, nor can conceive how I could disobey, without rubbing upon myself the imputation both of dishonour and baseness. This country at that time had not entered in covenant with the parliament of England: I know not any law obliging Scots-men his majesty's native subjects, trusted by his majesty in places of respect and eminence about his person, wherein they may be useful to their country, to desert his majesty's person and their places, upon any occasion of rupture betwixt his majesty and his subjects of England. I conceive then, that his majesty's command did oblige me as well as others to wait upon his person. The article of the treaty, which I am charged to have contravened (though I profess I was altogether ignorant of it, holding it no shame for one of my way to be unacquainted with some particular laws) appears to me, having looked upon it upon this occasion, not to mean or include the case of personal attendance, and service of private subjects, who in a private and personal way, adhere to his majesty in the time of troubles and question with his people of England, as I did: For I went to England without forces, yea without my ordinary train, and accompanied only with one servant. During my being in the South, I had no charge but to wait upon his majesty; I neither commanded forces, nor was inrolled in any regiment, or under the command of any.

This was my carriage in the South, until my master commanded me, with Montrose and all our countrymen who were about him, to go homeward. The marquis of Newcastle being then in the fields with an army for his majesty, I could not have passed without seeing of him; my stay with him was so short, that I neither had, nor could have had any charge or employment under him. I do not deny but I came to this country, but I profess it was by his majesty's express warrant and command, and without any sinister intention against my country and countrymen. I came to Dunfries without any purpose of hostility, but only to accommodate myself: and I believe none can complain of any injury done at that time by me. Finding that the country was displeased, I returned immediately, without doing harm to any. After my return I was necessary to neither of these exploits libelled in the ditty, of taking of Morpeth and the Sheills; neither was I present at either of these places when they were taken: but I am able to make good, that I was at Newcastle at 6 or 7 o'clock at night, that day the castle of Morpeth was taken, it being taken at 1 or 2 o'clock in the afternoon: And having heard at Newcastle that it was taken, and being solicitous for my countrymen, that they should not have been well treated by the English, who had been irritate by them, in regard they had lost some men of quality at the place, I went of purpose at 7 o'clock at night from Newcastle, to procure favour to them; and I am confident, that these whom I found there will not deny, that they received such tokens of my favour as they stood in need of, and as I at that time was able to give. I neither had, nor could have had any employment under colonel Slavering, being a gentleman beneath my own quality.

When it was my fortune to be taken, it was not in any service or hostile intention, but being upon my way to his majesty, with such a small number of people as appeared afterwards not to be sufficient for a convoy, I was surprized and forced to bestir myself for my just defence, and safety of my life, wherein it pleased God so to assist me, that these who were at the taking of me, were content to offer and give me quarters; whereupon I suffered myself to be taken, and doubt not but that I may expect, that the law of nations and war, which is observed as sacred and inviolable, when all other laws are silent inter arma, shall not be broken in my behalf.

This is the true relation of my carriage in these troublesome times: for my carriage before I should be sparing to speak of it myself, if my after actions were not painted with so foul and ugly colours. To my knowledge, before these times, it cannot be condescended that I have offended any by any scandalous or injurious act. And I am confident, that with God's assistance I might have regulate so the whole course of my life to the end, that I should not have seemed to have failed to any, much less in my duty either to my prince or country, if the times had not fallen out so irregular, that I could not witness my respect to either, without seeming to fail to the other. It being then my misfortune to have fallen in such hard times, having so much interest on both sides, I have not been suffered to have been an idle spectator; I followed the light of my conscience, which bindeth even when it is mistaken, as divines hold. I believe none will suspect me to have been a contriver, plotter or fomentor of this unnatural war, and am assured, that if from this relation it may appear, that I have been in any wise an actor, there was never one more harmless. None of my countrymen may charge me with any act of insolency, wrong or prejudice to them; and I doubt not but some will bear me witness, that I have shown them favour. Though I conceived, that my adhering to my prince in his distress by his special command, was incumbent to me by my oath of allegiance, and in duty, conscience and honour; yet if any thing may be thought to have escaped me, being a young man, and not acquainted with subtleties and laws, in a business of so tender a nature, which hath, both in the dispute of the question in the general, and in this particular case, divided so many lawyers, statesmen, divines, and others, in their opinions, and hath set a-work their tongues, pens and swords, to maintain the same, I may say with far better reason than an old statesman and lawyer did in the like case of civil dissensions; 'Erat obscuritas, erat certamen inter clarissimas duces: multi dubitabant quod optimum esset, et si aliquâ culpâ tenemur erroris humanita scelere certi liberi sumus.'

It is answered, That he cannot be called in question of life and fortune, and forced to answer at this time to this ditty; because he is prisoner of war taken upon quarters, and express capitulation with his takers for his safety; and by the law and received customs of all nations, where war is not turned in a downright butchery, there he jura belli held sacred and inviolable: whereof a main one is "captivus parcendum, et sicut resistenti violentia redditur, ita captivo misericordia debetur," which are, Augustin's words repeated in C. 3, 23, 4, 1. "Danda enim est ad minimum vita his qui vitam hostibus et capientibus reliquerunt." This was the law of Lycurgus, of the Romans, and other warlike nations, as is clear from history and writers, de jure belli. It is founded not only upon common equity, but upon the special equity of an express paction, where any capitulation is made; and where there is no express capitulation, it is founded upon a tacite and presumed paction, 'nam qui hostem non interficit, sed capit, videtur velle cum vivum habere: et capto est jus ex tacita pollicitatione non possit postea interfici, et qui se dedit cum hoste pacisci de vita videtur.' especially where captives have rendered themselves in arms, 'qui pugnando potuerunt non capi, aut non sine sanguine.'

Scripture itself confirmeth this law and practice: for the Syrians being stricken blind, and brought captives by Elisha, to the king of Israel at Samaria, he enquires at Elisha, whether he should smite them or not? He answers negative, saying "Would thou smite those whom thou hast taken with thy sword and bow?"

This law thus confirmed, is most observable in a civil war, betwixt a prince professing nothing but the maintenance of his just power, without prejudice of religion, and his people's liberties, to whom adheres a part of his subjects: and his people on the other side professing loyalty to his majesty, maintenance and reformation of religion, betwixt whom there is a concurrence of so many relations and interests public and private, as not only quarters, but exchange of prisoners, both flowing from one fountain, should necessarily be observed. This is the case of our unnatural war: prisoners have been exchanged: and it should be a stain to the kirk and kingdom, if quarters should not be inviolably kept. The consequence also may prove dangerous, the fortune of war being ambulatory; what is now the defender's case, may possibly be the condition of others who appear secure for the present.

The history of wars betwixt the Swedes and Russians sheweth, That these nations who at first have been so full of animosity as to refuse quarters, finding in the progress so great inconveniences to follow, have been forced to acknowledge the necessity.

And therefore the defender upon quarters, having rendered himself, cannot now be processed upon life and fortune; but before any procedure whatsoever, he ought to be dismissed and conveyed to a place of safety.

The first defence founded upon the course of martial law, in giving quarters and conditions to parties taken, and keeping of the samen, can have no place for freeing of my lord Ogilvie from answering to the crimes contained in his ditty. 1. Because the crimes whereupon he is challenged are these which were not only committed by him before his apprehending, but also for which he was cited to compare before the parliament, long before his apprehending, and from trial whereof he did withdraw himself by flying to England; wherein no accident occurring to him occasioned by his own misdemeanor can furnish to him any shadow of excuse. 2. The benefit of quarters founded upon martial law, is only considerable, when the samen are granted in ipso procinctu, and by those having power, neither of which my lord has, nor can alledge; but by the contrary in his defences, he grants that he was not in any service, but upon his way to his majesty. Likeas, they who took him found about him certain instructions from the earl of Montrose to his majesty, whereof the copies were sent to the committee of estates. 3. By the martial law, the quarters alledged given, cannot be further extended, than to the freedom from all challenges within that kingdom, within which the quarters were granted: and my lord being taken in England, might have had some colour (having cleared and verified the quarters made to him) to have craved the benefit of the martial law, which either he has not craved, or if craved, has been judged to be unjust; because the estates of the kingdom where he was taken have transmittit him to the estates of this kingdom whereof he is a subject.

Item. As to the second part of my lord's defence, which is anent his carriage, opposes the ditty and probation thereof.

February 19, 1645. This day about half hour to ten in the forenoon, the replies given in by the procurators of estates for eliding of the defences given in by the late lord Ogilvie are delivered to him about ten of the clock, before noon, and ordains him to give in his duplies, together with all other defences he has, either in the principal cause, or against the probation, against Friday at two o'clock in the afternoon.

REASONS why the Defenders cannot be urged to give in any other Defences, till that of Quarters be discussed.

First, the defence proponed is inconsistent with other defences, because the defence is, that the defender is not obliged to answer at all to a ditty, so long as he is in this condition, for the reasons adduced in the defence; and therefore he cannot be urged to give in other defences. For albeit defences in causa may be proponed together, yet a defence of this nature, which is not an exception in meritis causa, but is exclusive of process, 'et quæ impedit litem ingressum,' cannot consist with other defences in causa, because the proposing of other defences would be a tacite passing from the same; and the defender is in the like case, as if being pursued before the justice, he would alledge to a remission; in which case, he could not be urged in justice or form of process, to give in other defences before the said defences were discussed.

2. This defence is so material, that if it be found relevant, as it ought to be, the defender will possibly use no other defences at all; and he is so confident of the relevancy of it, that he has not thought upon, nor desired his advocates to think upon his other defences in causa.

3. It is not usual before any judicatory to cause the defender give in all his defences at first, especially where a material defence elusory of the instance is proponed, which before giving in of any other defences should be answered and discussed.

ANSWERS to the Reasons given in by James Ogilvie, Milliam Murray, Sir Robert Spotiswood, and Nathaniel Gordon, why they cannot be urged to give in any other Defences, till that Defence anent Quarters be discussed.

To the first reason, where it bears, that the defence of quarters is exclusive of process, 'et impedit litem ingressum.' It is answered, That the defence of quarters is not exclusive of process, 'nec impedit litem ingressum,' because albeit it were sustained to the defenders, that these who are taken in war, and get the benefit of quarters, cannot be killed or slain; yet they who are taken in bello (albeit quarters were granted to be lawful, which is denied (in nostro casu) are still captivi; and being captives, the procurators of the estates, in name of the public, may crave process against the captives, 'ut iudex procedat ad sententiam,' that it may be clear to the world that the captives are guilty of such and such crimes; which guilt is neither pardoned, nor taken away by the giving of quarters (albeit it were granted that quarters were lawful in hoc casu, as it is not, as shall be cleared in the discussing of the defence founded upon quarters), but the giving of quarters 'impedit tantummodo executionem Sententie, eamque parialem duntaxat quatenus ea est extendenda ad vitam;' but impedes not the criminal pursuit itself, whereby it is craved to be found that the delinquents have committed such and such crimes.

And where the foresaid first reason bears, That the defence of quarters cannot consist with the other defences in causa, because the proposing of other defences should be a tacit passing from the same. It is answered, the reason of the foresaid inconsistency is not relevant; for albeit the proposing of other defences before the defence founded upon quarters might seem to the defenders to prejudice the defence of quarters, as they conceive the defence of quarters to be "contra litis ingressum" (which it is not, for the answer above-written); yet proposing of the rest of the peremptory defences simul et semel with the defence of quarters, the defence of quarters preceding cannot be a passing from that defence which is proposed 'primo loco et per expressum;' but to eschew cavillation, the defenders procurators know very well, that they may propose the rest of the peremptors with this caution (adhering to the defence of quarters, and may protest that the proposing of the rest shall not prejudice them of the defence of quarters), like as the procurators of estates declare, that the proposing of the rest of the defences shall not prejudice their defence of quarters, but the same shall receive its own answer with the rest.

To the last part of the first reason founded upon the simile of a remission. It is answered, That the same cannot be respected, 1. Because an alledgeance upon a remission was never alledged, but where it was instantly verified by production of the remission. 2. A remission 'perinit totam instantiam,' for it frees the defender from all sentence, or execution, of the crime laid to his charge: and it is truly 'contra a litis ingressum,' because it discharges the judges to proceed. But the defence of quarters is as above written, 'nullo in processum partem impedit,' but is only effective, when the sentence of the process is to be put to execution.

To the second reason, bearing, That if the defence of quarters be sustained to the defenders as relevant, whereof they are confident, that possibly they will use no other defences at all. It is answered, The procurators of estates are not to make answer to any thing that the defenders mind possibly to do; but this answer they make, that this same may be alledged in all other peremptory defences: for if any peremptory defence be sustained relevant and proven, the defender needs propose no other defences; which is absurd, unless they will omit the proposing of them upon their own peril, seeing it has ever been the custom of all commissions from the parliament, that all the defences are proposed together, as has been in use to be proposed before the justice.

To the third and last reason, opposes the custom of the justice court, and of all preceding commissions flowing from the parliament for trying of delinquents. For before the justice court, the justice usually urges the pannel's procurators to propose all the defences, unless sometimes the king's advocat, for his own behoof, and in favours of the pursuer, will make a reply to a peremptor, before he hear the rest proposed: and before the commissions of parliament for trying of delinquents, it has been always the custom to propose all the defences together. And where the said third reason bears, that a material defence elusory of the instance, ought to be discussed before the defenders be urged to propose any further defences. It is answered, 1. That the defence of quarters is not elusory of the process, or any part thereof. 2. All total exceptions are elusory of the instance. And therefore, in no case in the defenders judgment, can the defenders be urged to propose their peremptory defences 'simul et semel: quod est absurdum.' 9th December, 1645. Sent at half past one of the clock.

DUPRIES for Ogilvie, William Murray, Sir Robert Spotiswood, and Nathaniel Gordon.

To the answer to the first alledgeance, it is duplied; that the defence founded upon quarters, not only impedes the execution of the sentence, but elides the very proposition of the libel, and impedes the sentence itself, at the least in so far as the proposition of the libel carries, that whosoever are art and part of the crimes libelled, incur the pain of treason, and fore-faulture of life: which is expressly libelled in the proposition of their libel. And the life being the greatest of all pains, a defence alledged for safety thereof, and elusory of that part of the proposition and conclusion foresaid against the samen, should first, and per se be discussed: especially in regard that the defenders are very loth to entangle themselves in a dispute with the estates concerning the relevancy of the libel, wherein many tender points may occur to be agitate, and it should tend to an unnecessary protracting of them, if the defenders should be forced to give in all their defences; which the defenders procurators have not as yet thought on, being confident that the defence upon quarters will be found relevant, and ~~carry~~ that whereof the defenders should be most careful, viz. Safety of their life. And it is known, that before the justice, and other inferior judicatories, defences are most frequently proponed and discussed in the same order. And it is time, after this material defence shall be discussed, then to urge the defenders to give in all their defences. Likeas, in the former process pursued against Ogilvie, there being one of the same nature given in by him; there past in that process, replies, duplies, triplies, and quadruples, before he was urged to give in any further defences.

Secundo, Whereas it is alledged, That in all commissions from the parliament, it has been the custom to propone all defences together, just as before the justice general. The defender denies any such custom; but by the contrary defences have severally, and without cumulation, been proponed and discussed, as in Ochiltrey's process, Toschock's, Meldrum's, and many others.

The same duply the defenders repeat against the remanent members of the reply: and humbly represents to the honourable lords of the committee the expediency of discussing of this defence primo loco, seeing the discussing thereof in their favours (which they expect) will shorten the process, and make them ready to give all possible content to the estates, and no wise to vex them with many more defences, or tedious dispute.

At Sanct-Andrews the eighth day of January one thousand six hundredth and forty-six years, the lords and other commissioners under written, appointed by the estates of parliament for the process, they are to say, William earl Marishal, William earl of Glencairn, John earl of Cassils, John earl of Weymes, Robert lord Burghly, James lord Coupar, sir Archibald Johnston of Wariston, one of the lords of session, sir William Cochran of Collduon, Mr. George Dundass of Maner, sir Thomas Ruthven of Frieland, sir John Weyms of Bogie, James Mackdougall of Garthland, John Kennedy burges of Air, George Gairden burges of Bruntisland, Mr. Robert Cunningham burges of Kinghorn, Mr. Robert Barclay, burges of Irwing, William Glendinnin burges of Kirkdubright, Mr. James Campbel burges of Dumbarton, and Mr. Alexander Colvil of Blair, one of his majesty's justice deputes, not as ordinary judge in the office of judiciary, but as one of the commissioners delegate by the saids estates of parliament with the remanent commissioners foresaid, Anent the ditty given in by Mr. Roger Mowat, Mr. James Baird, and Thomas Nicolson, procurators for the estates of this kingdom to sir Robert Spotswood, 'Makand' mention, &c. as in the Ditty itself is more fully contained. The said Mr. Roger Mowat, Mr. James Baird, and Mr. Thomas Nicolson procurators for the saids estates, 'compearand' personally, who for instructing of the points of the said ditty produced the foresaid commission granted by the king's majesty to the said James Graham, making and constituting him lieutenant governor and captain general of all the forces raised or to be raised within this kingdom; and giving him power and authority to raise and levy forces within this kingdom, and to lead and conduct them against the forces raised and levied by authority of the estates of parliament of this kingdom, as the samen of the date, tenor and contents foresaid, signeted, docketed and subscribed by the said sir Robert, at more length bears. And likewise produced the foresaid proclamation for holding of parliaments within this kingdom, together with the foresaid commission granted by his majesty, to the said James Graham to be commissioner for his majesty for holding of the said parliament, as the samen of the tenor and contents foresaid, docketed and subscribed by the said sir Robert, also at more length bears. And in like manner likewise produced the foresaid missive letter written by the said sir Robert Spotswood during his being with the said James Graham, to some of the noblemen about the king's person in England, as the samen of the date, tenor and contents foresaid, subscribed by the said sir Robert, likewise at more length bears. And the said sir Robert Spotswood defender 'compearand' personally, who acknowledged judicially the signeting of the foresaid first commission, and the docketing and subscription thereof; the docketing and subscribing of the foresaid proclamation, and second commission to the said James Graham for holding of the parliament; and the foresaid missive letter and subscription thereof, to be all the said sir Robert's own proper hand-write; whereupon the saids procurators of estates asked instruments. Thereafter the rights, reasons and allegations, together with the alledgances, replies and duplies given in by the said parties hinc inde, with the hail writs foresaid, and other probation deduced by the saids procurators of estates, being at length heard, seen and considered by the saids commissioners, and they being therewith ripely advised, the saids commissioners according to the power and authority given to them by the saids estates of parliament, makes their report as follows, viz. They find the said ditty founded upon the foresaid act of parliament made in May 1584, anent the impugning the dignity and authority of the estates of parliament, seeking or procuring the innovation or diminution of the power of the samen, being subsumed upon, and qualified in manner contained in the said ditty, relevant to infer against the said defender any arbitrary censure or punishment the saids estates of parliament shall think expedient. And in the like manner find the said ditty founded upon the act of parliament above-written made in June 1644, anent the taking up of arms against the kingdom and estates of the country, relevant to infer the conclusion contained in the said act, notwithstanding of the hail defences and duplies proponed for the part of the said sir Robert in the contrary. And repels the defeuce founded upon quarters proponed by the said sir Robert, as the samen is proponed by him against the said dittay, to stay and impede the foresaids commissioners to proceed to discuss the relevancy and probation of the said dittay: But the said commissioners remits and refers the saids defences given in by the said sir Robert or James Ogilvie, to which the said sir Robert adheres, and which he repeats founded upon quarters, to be discussed and decided by the honourable estates of parliament before the pronouncing of any sentence of condemnation to follow here-upon. And finds that member of the assumption of the said dittay, bearing sir Robert has docketed and subscribed with his hand, signeted with the signet of the office of secretary, the foresaid commission granted to the said James Graham upon the first of June 1645, for raising and levying of forces within this kingdom, leading and commanding them against the forces raised and levied by authority of the estates of parliament, and sike-like, bearing that the said sir Robert Spotiswood has docketed and subscribed with his hand the foresaid commission granted by his majesty to James Graham, to be commissioner for his majesty for holding the said pretended parliament, sufficiently proven against the said sir Robert, to infer any arbitrary censure or punishment the foresaids estates of parliament shall think fit. And in like manner find that member of the said assumption of the foresaid dittay, bearing that the said sir Robert has joined himself with the said James Graham and his rebellious army, and his being with him at acts of hostility committed by him in the month of September last, at the battel of Philiphaugh, being taken in the battel, and his sword drawn in his hand; and so having taken up arms against the kingdom and estates of the country, sufficiently proven against the said sir Robert, to infer the pain and punishment of treason, and that therethorow he is punishable by forfeiture of life, lands and goods, or any other censure the parliament shall please to inflict, the defence of quarters being first discust as aforesaid. Sic subscribitur, CAS-TILIS I. P. D. Com.

Read in Audience of the Parliament, and remitted to the several Bodies.

The estates of parliament having heard the whole dispute contained in the alledgeance, reply and duple, above and aback written, founded upon the exception of quarters, proponed for sir Robert Spotiswood, Nathaniel Gordon, William Murray, and Mr. Andrew Guthrie, and after full reading of the samen hail dispute in plain parliament, and after full debate there, the saids estates repel the alledgeance and duple contained in this paper, and in the other papers produced, in respect of the reply proponed for eliding of the alledgeance; whereupon Mr. Thomas Nicolson, one of the procurators for the estates, asked instru-

16 January, 1646.

The report above written produced from the commission for the process, against sir Robert Spotiswood, together with the interlocutor of parliament given this day, repelling the defence and duple proponed by him, founded upon quarters, in respect of the reply proponed for eliding of the same defence, being read, heard, considered and advised by the estates of parliament; they approve the same report and interlocutor of parliament foresaid, and find and declare that the said sir Robert Spotiswood has incurred the capital punishment of death, in respect the Dittay founded upon the act of parliament in May, 1584, is found relevant and proven against him by the foresaid report. And als find and declare, That the said sir Robert Spotiswood has incurred the pain and punishment of treason, and forfeiture of his life, lands and goods, in respect the Dittay founded upon the act of parliament made in June, 1644, anent the taking up of arms against the kingdom and estates of this country, is also found relevant and proven against him by the report above specified. And therefore the estates declare him a traitor to this kingdom and estates thereof, and forfeit him in life, lands and goods, to be applied to the use of the public; and ordain his arms to be riven, and delete out of the book of arms, and himself to be execute to the death, by striking of his head from his shoulders at the Mercat Cross of St. Andrews, upon Tuesday next, the 20th day of January instant, at 12 o'clock that day, and ordain the magistrates of St. Andrews to see the same done. Sic subscribitur, CRAWFURD LINDSAY, I. P. D. Par.

The Procurators of the States presented to the Commissioners, the Form and Directory for proving Sir Robert Spotiswood's Dittay.

St. Andrews, 27 December, 1645, The Subscription of Sir Robert Spotiswood's Dittay, in the several Members and Aggravations thereof libelled, is proven as after follows.

The gracious favour mentioned in his Dittay granted by the estates of parliament in 1641, is contained in the 33rd act of king Charles his second parliament dated the 16th of November, 1641.

The nomination of the earl of Lanerk to be secretary by the king's majesty and parliament is proven by the act of king Charles his second parliament in 1642.

The king's majesty's declaration anent the Defender is in the act of king Charles his parliament in 1641.

The Defender his docketing and signeting of the two commissions, and of the proclamation mentioned in the Defender his Dittay, are proven by the saids two commissions and proclamation produced.

ham and his army is proven by his own declaration of the second of January, 1646.

The writing of the Letter by the Defender of the date the 10th of September, 1645, is proven by the production of the letter.

DOUBLE of the King's Majesty his Commission to the Marquis of Montrose, to be Lieutenant-Governor, and General of all his Majesty's Forces in Scotland:

C. R. Charles by the grace of God, king of Great Britain, France and Ireland, defender of the faith, &c. To our right trusty and right entirely beloved cousin James, marquis of Montrose, greeting. Whereas divers traitorous and seditious persons of our kingdom of Scotland, have levied war against us, and to the manifest forfeiture of their allegiance, and the breach of the act of pacification, lately made between the two kingdoms, have invaded our kingdom of England, and possessed themselves in divers places therein, to the great disturbance of our peace, and the destruction and spoil of our people: And yet further, if no course be taken by us to prevent that, intend to make a new invasion upon this our kingdom, and bring in forces for the assistance of the rebels here. Know ye therefore, that we reposing especial trust and confidence in your approved wisdom, courage, fidelity and great ability, whereof you have given hitherto most extraordinary and undeniable proof, do by these presents name, constitute, ordain and authorise you the said James, marquis of Montrose, to be our Lieutenant Governor, and Captain General of all our forces raised, or to be raised in our kingdom of Scotland, and of, and over all others brought, or to be brought thither out of our kingdom of England and Ireland, or from any part whatsoever. And we hereby give you power and authority to raise and levy forces meet and apt for the wars within all the parts of our said kingdom of Scotland, and to command and enjoin the sheriff lieutenants, magistrates of cities and towns, and all others having power and authority under us, within every several county of our said kingdom, to send, or cause to be sent unto you such number of our said subjects apt and meet for the war, to such place, or places, and at such time as you shall think expedient. And we do further by these presents, give you full power and authority to put in readiness the persons so by you raised, or to be raised, levied, or assembled, sent, conducted, or brought unto you; and then, from time to time, to arm, lead and conduct against all and singular enemies, rebels and traitors, and every of their adherents attempting any thing against us, our crown and dignity, within any part of the said kingdom; and the saids enemies, rebels and traitors, to invade, pursue, repress, and in case of opposition or resistance, to slay, kill, and put to execution of death, by all ways and means, according to your good discretion: And to do, fulfil and execute all and singular other things, which shall be requisite for the levying, conducting and government of the said forces, particularly to make, constitute and ordain laws, ordinances and proclamations from time to time, as the case shall require, for the good government and order of all the forces that are, or shall be under your command; and the same also, and every one of them to cause to be duly proclaimed, performed and executed. And likewise to punish all mutinies, tumults, rapines, murders, and all other crimes and misdemeanors of any person under your command in your army, according to the course and custom of the wars and the laws of the land. As also for us, and in our name, as you in your discretion shall think fit, to save such as you please of these traitors, rebels, and offenders as shall be apprehended or brought into prison, and make tender of our royal grace and pardon to such of them as shall submit to us, and desire to receive our mercy. And further, we do give unto you full power and authority, for the better execution of this our commission, to appoint and assign all commanders and officers necessary and requisite for the government and command of our saids forces, and to command all cities, towns, castles and forts within our said kingdom of Scotland, to place governors and commanders within the same, and to remove, displace or continue such as are in any of them already, according as you shall think meet for the good of our service, and safety of that our kingdom. And our further will and pleasure is, and we do by these presents give unto you full power and authority, not only to repress and subdue such as are in arms against us within our said kingdom of Scotland, but also to advance your forces into such parts of our kingdom of England, or any other of our dominions as are intested and oppressed by any of our Scottish subjects already brought, or hereafter to be brought in for assisting the rebels of this kingdom, and there to pursue and beat out of such towns, castles and forts, as they have got possession of, without any part of our said kingdom of England, or other our dominions, to recover the same for our use, and to relieve and free our English subjects, and others, from the heavy yoke that by that means lieth upon them. And because of the ample testimony you have given us of your singular wisdom and fidelity in the ordering and disposing of our great and weighty affairs hitherto, to the end you may reward and encourage such as have given, or shall give assistance unto you towards the advancement of our service; We do hereby give unto you full power and authority from time to time to confer the title, degree and honour of knighthood upon such persons, either natives or others employed under your charge and command, whom you in your discretion shall conceive fit to receive the same; and whatsoever you shall do herein, according to the true intent and meaning of these presents, we do for us, our heirs and successors, ratify and confirm upon the great trust and confidence which we repose in you, that ye will make such use of this power given to you as may best conduce to the advancement of our service, and honour. Wherefore we will and command you our said lieutenant-governor, with all diligence duly to execute the premises with effect. And whatsoever you shall do by virtue of this our commission, and according to the tenor and effect of the same, touching the execution of the premises, or any part thereof, you shall be for the same discharged, by these presents in that behalf against us, our heirs and successors. And therefore we will and command all and singular our subjects within this our said kingdom of Scotland, of whatsoever degree and quality, whether noblemen, gentlemen, burgesses, magistrates in the country or towns, privy-counsellors, officers of state militant, commanders and soldiers, to whom it shall appertain, that they and every of them shall be from time to time attendant, aiding, assisting and helping to you, and at the commandment of you as aforesaid in the due execution hereof, and that they diligently and faithfully perform and execute such commands as you shall from time to time give them for our service, as they and every of them tender our displeasure, and will answer the contrary at their utmost perils. And these presents shall have continuance during our pleasure, and ever while they be expressly revoked by us. Given under our sign manuel, and privy signet: At our court at Hereford the twenty-fifth of June 1645, and of our reign the one-and-twentieth.

May it please your majesty; This is a double of the former commission granted by your majesty to the marquis of Montrose, to be lieutenant-governor and general of all your majesty's forces in Scotland.

ROBERT SPOTISWOOD.

C. R. Charles by the grace of God, of Great Britain, France and Ireland king, defender of the Faith, &c. To our Lovits, Lyon king of arms, heralds, pursuivants, messengers and officers at arms, our sheriffs in that part, conjunctly and severally greeting. Whereas by the seventh act in the first session of our late parliament in that our kingdom, we with advice of our estates there, did statute and ordain that in every three years, once at least, a parliament should be kept within that our kingdom, in such a convenient place and time as we with advice aforesaid should at the close of every parliament determine and appoint; likeas by the last act of our said late parliament, it was appointed, that the next triennial parliament should meet and convene at Edinburgh upon the first Tuesday of June last 1644. Which date, in regard of the great distempers both of this and that kingdom, we could not keep at that time, neither in our own person nor by our commissioner. But now amidst the many and weighty affairs we have in hand, not laying aside the care of that our antient and native kingdom, we have thought good not to frustrate any longer the expectation and desires that our good subjects there may have of such a parliament; and that the rather, lest any of them should be abused in thinking, that we do or ever intend to acknowledge for lawful the meeting begun at Edinburgh the first Tuesday of June last, and continued since under the name of a parliament; which howsoever the appointing of it to convene by us at that day and place, might have been a sufficient warrant to them for their first meeting; yet to continue the same in absence of us, or some one at least to represent our royal person amongst them, and by themselves, without our concurring authority to make pretended laws and ordinances is such a presumption as we are resolved never to endure. For these therefore and other causes us moving, but chiefly out of the tender affection we carry to that our native kingdom, the present distracted estate whereof we much pity, and think it cannot better be remedied than by the wisdom and authority of a lawful and free parliament, by whose counsel and advice we will be governed in what may conduce to the perfect settling of peace and tranquility there. We will and require you and every one of you conjunctly and severally to pass to the Mercat-Cross of our town of _____ and there by open reading of this our proclamation, summoned and warn all and sundry dukes, marquises, earls, viscounts and lords within that our kingdom, to give their personal appearance within the _____ of our said town of _____ the _____ day of _____ next, where and when we intend to hold our high-court of parliament by ourself or our commissioner to be appointed by us for that effect; as also that ye make intimation of and warning to the sheriffs and freeholders of every shire within that our kingdom, and to the magistrates of all our burroughs royal within the same, having place, and voice in parliaments to elect and choise commissioners to be sent from their several shires, and burroughs respective, that they may give their opinion and counsel in such things as shall be proposed in the said parliament, and concur with our nobility aforesaid, to make such acts and statutes as may conduce most to the peace and welfare of that kingdom, and shall be approved and ratified by us or our commissioners aforesaid in our name: Likeas we will and command you to intimate publicly to all our lieges of whatsoever quality and condition, that may have any suits complaints or grievances to be represented to us in parliament, that they resort for that effect to our said town of _____ at the day aforesaid, and have their recourse no where else within that our kingdom, especially to the pretended parliament kept by the rebels there at Edinburgh, as they would not have of us to esteem of them as persons disaffected to our royal person and government. Furthermore, it is our pleasure, that this being done, you pass immediately to the Mercat-Crosses of all the head-boroughs within every several shire of that our kingdom, (or at least to so many of them as are presently under our obedience) and publish this our proclamation; provided always, that the publication thereof at the Mercat-Cross of our said town of alleuarily shall be a sufficient intimation to all our lieges to repair thither; and that such of our nobility and commissioners of shires and burroughs as shall conpear and attend upon us or our commissioner at the day and place appointed hereby, shall have power with the consent and approbation of us or our commissioner foresaid, to make laws and acts of parliament, that shall bind all our subjects of that kingdom in the same manner that any preceding acts of parliament, either in our time or our predecessors, have done: And that you report this duly execute and indorsed day and place above written, as you and every one of you will answer upon your perils; whereanent these presents shall be a sufficient warrant. Given under our royal hand and signet at

May it please your majesty; This is a proclamation for calling of a parliament to meet in the town of upon the day of next. ROBERT SPOTISWOOD.

Follows the King's Majesty his Commission to James Marquis of Montrose, to be Commissioner to the foresaid Parliament.

C. R. Charles, by the grace of God, king of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith, &c. To our right trusty and right entirely beloved cousin, James Marquis of Montrose, lieutenant governor of our kingdom of Scotland, greeting. Whereas, for the settling of the present distractions within that our kingdom, we have thought fit to call a parliament, which is to meet and begin the day of next, within our town of And in regard of the great and weighty affairs we are taken up with here at this time, we not being able to be present in our own person at that meeting; therefore we, reposing a special trust and confidence in your approved wisdom and fidelity, do by these presents name, constitute and ordain you our commissioner at the said parliament, authorizing you, at the day and place above mentioned, for us and in our name to meet and convene with such of our nobility and commissioners of shires and boroughs as shall give their appearance for holding of our high court of parliament in our said town of there to advise and consult with our said nobility and others, of all such things as may tend to the peace and welfare of that our kingdom; and in our name to propone unto them such things as you shall think expedient to be enacted in our said parliament, which may conduce to the good of our service and happy state of our said kingdom: giving you hereby full power and authority for us and in our name to approve and ratify all such acts and statutes as shall be agreed upon by you and them, and to give them the strength of laws to bind and oblige all and whatsoever our subjects of that kingdom; with power also to you to adjourn and continue the said parliament from time to time, or to dissolve the same as you shall find it meet and expedient; and generally to do all and every thing that any commissioner from us heretofore hath had power and authority to do. Likewis also we give you full power and authority, in absence of our chancellor, to appoint a vice-chancellor to supply his place, and to do and perform such things as any chancellor, heretofore in preceding parliaments, have been in use of: as also, in absence of the clerk-register and other necessary members of parliament, to appoint such as you shall think fit to fill their places, and execute their charges during the sitting of the said parliament. And furthermore, we will and ordain you to make public intimation to all our lieges within that our kingdom of all such acts, statutes and ordinances as shall be enacted and concluded in the said parliament, and generally to use all solemnities requisite for giving of them the strength and power of laws, which may bind all our subjects of that kingdom, in the same manner that any preceding act of parliament in our time or any of our predecessors have done. Given under our royal hand and signet.

May it please your Majesty; This is a warrant for the marquis of Montrose, to be your majesty's commissioner in this next parliament, giving him power to appoint a vice-chancellor, in case of the chancellor's absence, and other officers, during the sitting of the said parliament, in case they that are now in place to absent themselves. ROBERT SPOTISWOOD.

In presence of the Laird of Bogie and Mr. Robert Barclay, two of the Commissioners for the Process.

Sir Robert Spotiswood, being examined and interrogative when he went into James Graham's army, declares he went in to him at Bothwell upon the first day of September last by past, and went along with the said James Graham and his army all the way, till he came to Philiphaugh, and being in Selkirk the time of the alarm, he followed down to the Haugh after James Graham had drawn down all his men to the Haugh; and when the deponer was come down, he found the armies ready to join, and before he could come through the Haugh to the other side where the baggage stood, James Graham's army was put to flight, and the deponer seeing them flee, resolved to flee also, and was thereafter taken by the laird of Silvertonhill, and some of his accomplices, holding his sword in his hand. Robert Spotiswood, Jn. Weems of Bogie, Robert Barclay.

For clearing the generality of that part of my deposition, bearing that I was taken with my sword in my hand, the manner of it was this: By the time that I came from the town of Selkirk down the Philiphaugh, the fight was begun (wherein I was never engaged) and the flight taken, in the which I was carried along with the throng, having nothing but a cane in my hand; but being upon a borrowed nag, that was not able to take me off, and being pursued close by some troopers with their drawn swords, seeing no means to get free of them, I then drew my sword to keep them off, if possible I might, until I had obtained quarters of them; which I did, and in that posture was taken.

ROBERT SPOTISWOOD.

Sir Robert Spotiswood's Letter to the Laird of Bogie and Mr. Robert Barclay, from St. Andrew's Castle, 4th January, 1646.

Right Worshipful; Having berthought myself of my deposition last day before you, lest I might be prejudged by the generality thereof, in regard of my answer made to your question, That I was taken with my sword in my hand, I humbly desire that this specification of my said deposition may be admitted at the time of the advising thereof, to wit, That as I have deposed already, I was not engaged in the fight, neither ever drew sword till after the fight begun; in the which I being carried away with the rest, and my nag not being able to take me off, when I saw sundry troopers coming upon me with their drawn swords, then I drew mine, to keep them off, if I could, until I had obtained quarters, in which posture I was taken. This being the truth, I hope to clear my carriage in that place the better: your worship will allow me the favour to let me eik this to my former deposition, re adhuc integra, before the concluding of my process. In expectation whereof, I rest your worships' very humble servant,

ROBERT SPOTISWOOD.

Directed thus: "For the Right Worshipful the Laird of Bogie and Mr. Robert Barclay."

Sir Robert Spotiswood's Letter to the Lord Digby.

My Lord; We are now arrived ad columnas Herculis, to Tweed-side, dispersed all the king's enemies within this kingdom to several places, some to Ireland, most of them to Berwick, and had no open enemy more to deal with, if you had kept David Lesly there, and not suffered him to come in here, to make head against us of new. It is thought strange here, that at least you have sent no party after him, which we expected: although he should not come at all. You little imagine the difficulties my lord marquis hath here to wrestle with; the overcoming of the enemy is the least of them, he hath more to do with his own seeming friends: Since I came to him (which was but within these ten days, after much toil and hazard) I have seen much of it. He was forced to dismiss his Highlanders for a season, who would needs return home to look to their own affairs. When they were gone, Abeyn took a caprice, and had away with him the greatest strength he had of horse: notwithstanding whereof he resolved to follow his work, and clear this part of the kingdom (that was only resting) of the rebels that had fled to Berwick, and kept a bustling here. Besides, he was invited hereunto by the earls of Roxburgh and Home, who when he was within a dozen miles of them, have rendered their houses and themselves to David Lesly, and are carried in as prisoners to Berwick. Traquair hath been with him, and promised more nor he hath yet performed. All these were great disheartenings to any other but to him, whom nothing of this kind can amate. With the small forces he has presently with him he is resolved to pursue David Lesly, and not suffer him to grow stronger. If you would perform that which you lately promised, both this kingdom and the north of England might be soon reduced, and considerable assistance sent from hence to his majesty; however, nothing will be wanting on our parts here: these that are together are both loyal and resolute, only a little encouragement from you (as much to let it be seen that they are not neglected, as for any thing else) would crown the work speedily. This is all I have for the present, but that I am your lordship's most faithful servant, Robert Spotiswood. Dated, near to Kelso, September 10, 1645.

These are the evidences whereupon the sentence condemnator is founded, in pronouncing of which there was much division in the court; and though many liked not sir Robert's party, yet they loved his person, which made him many friends, even among the covenanters, in so much, that after the sentence was read, some of the nobility spoke in his behalf, and intreated the house to consider the quality and parts of that excellent gentleman, and most just judge, whom they had condemned, and begged earnestly his life might be spared: but an eminent knowledge and esteem, which in other cases might be a motive to save a criminal, was one cause of taking away his life. For these gentlemen who spoke were told, That the authority of the then established government was not secure, while sir Robert Spotiswood was spared. Whereupon these noblemen who presided in the meeting of the estates at Glasgow, and in the parliament at St. Andrews, when they signed the respective sentences, openly declared to the rest of the members, That they did sign as preses, and in obedience to the command of the estates, but not as their particular judgment.

The day before his death, he wrote a letter to the marquis of Montrose, telling, "That he was condemned to die for being faithful to the king, and because he had shewn an inviolable respect to his lordship's pardon. That whatever the estates might pretend, he believed his taking part with his lordship, was the only motive which made them determine his destruction, and he hoped by his death he would contribute more to his majesty's service, than he could have done, had it pleased the sovereign Providence to have prolonged his life. He intreated his lordship to notice one thing he found necessary for the king's service, which was, to continue his gentleness and moderation of conduct, and not to imitate the barbarous inhumanity of their enemies, who gave his lordship but too great cause to follow their example. And as a mark that his services were not disagreeable to his lordship, he conjured him to take under his protection his poor orphans, and the afflicted family of his brother sir John Spotiswood of Dairsey."

Sir Robert Spotiswood's EXECUTION.

The day of sir Robert Spotiswood's Execution being come, the people were surprised with astonishment, when they see appear upon the scaffold, a person whom in former time they had with love and admiration seen preside in the Supreme Judicature of the nation, with great sufficiency, and much honour. He appeared with the same gravity and majesty which did ever shine in his countenance; and as he was about to speak to the people, a minister of the place, knowing that the last words of this great man would make impression on the minds of all the Spectators, caused the Provost of the town to impose on him silence. But sir Robert foreseeing this treatment, had put in writing what he had proposed to speak to the people; so that finding himself interrupted, he threw among the multitude the following Paper:

"Ye will expect something from me of the cause for which I am brought hither at this time to suffer in this kind; which I am bound to do for clearing the integrity of my own proceedings, vindicating his majesty's just and pious intentions, and withal to vindicate you that are misled in ignorance, and made to believe that you are tied in conscience to set forward this unnatural Rebellion, masked under the covert and pretext of propagating Religion, and maintaining of the Public Liberties. You have perceived by the fact that is gone before, viz. carrying arms, &c. that I stand here adjudged to die by this pretended Parliament, as a traitor to the estates, and an enemy to my native country. This is a treason unheard of before in this kingdom, against the Estates; a thing of a late creation, which I believe there be some would have erected in opposition to the just and lawful authority of the king, under which we and our predecessors have been so many hundreds of years governed. To come to my treasonable demeanor (as they esteem it), the main one is, That I did docket and bring down a Commission of Lieutenantry from his majesty, to the lord marquiss of Montrose, with a Proclamation for indicting a parliament by the king's authority, wherein the said lord marquiss was to be commissioner. Not to excuse myself upon the necessity laid upon me to obey his majesty's command in a business of that nature, in regard of the charge I had about him, I cannot so far betray my own conscience, as to keep up from you my judgment of the thing itself, seeing it may tend to the justifying of the king's part, and your better information; for lack whereof, I know many are entangled in this Rebellion unwittingly: And who knoweth, but God in his merciful providence hath brought us hither, to be instruments of freeing you from the manifold delusions that are made use of to ensnare you. I say then, it was just and necessary to his majesty to grant such Commissions, and by consequence an act of duty in me to perform what he pleased to command me. It is known well enough what contentment his majesty gave to this kingdom at his last being here, both in the affairs of Church and Policy; notwithstanding whereof the world seeth what meeting he hath gotten from us. When the Rebellion burst forth in England, all that he desired of us, was only to stand neutral, and not to meddle between him and his subjects there: Of which moderate desire of his little reckoning was made; but on the contrary, at the request of these rebels, by the power of their faction amongst us, an Army was raised and sent to England, to assist them against our own native king. His majesty being reduced to this extremity, what expedient could be find so fair and easy, as to make use of the help of such of loyal subjects here, as he knew had such an unparalleled disloyalty in horror and detestation? Amongst whom that matchless mirror of all true worth and nobility, the lord marquiss of Montrose having offered himself, it pleased his majesty to give him a subaltern commission at first: which he having execute with such unheard of success, that his memory shall be had in honour for it in all ages; his majesty for the better furthering of his own service, and to countenance and encourage him the more in it, gave him an absolute and independent one thereafter, which is that I delivered into his hands by his majesty's command. Herewithal his majesty pitying the misery of this poor kingdom, occasioned by the rebellious stubbornness of a few factions spirits, thought fit to give power to the said lord marquiss to call a Parliament in his majesty's name, to try if by that means a remedy might be found against the present evils, and to have all his subjects of this kingdom reduced by one means or other under his obedience. In all this I see not what can be justly charged upon his majesty, or upon me as his servant, who have done nothing against any authorized law of the kingdom, but have served him faithfully, unto whom by trust and natural allegiance I am so much bound.

"Whereas I am declared an enemy to my native country, God be so propitious to me, as my thoughts towards it have been always public, and tending to the good and honour thereof! I do profess, since the first time I had the honour of that noble marquiss's acquaintance, I have been a favourer of his designs, knowing them to be both loyal and honourable: Beside that I knew his affection towards his country to be eminent in this especially, that he did ever show himself passionate to vindicate the honour of this kingdom, which suffereth every where, by this strange combination of theirs with the Rebels of another kingdom against their own prince; wherein I concurred in judgment with him, and thought there was no other way to do it, but by setting up a party of true and loyal-hearted Scots men for his majesty, whereby it might be seen that it is not a national defection, but only stirred up by a Faction therein, who for their own ends have dishonoured their native kingdom, and disturbed the peace thereof. In enterprizing and prosecuting of which heroical design, God hath so favoured that noble lord, that he hath righted our country in the opinion of all the world, and discovered where the rottenness lieth.

“ Thus far I am content to be accounted a Traitor, in their opinion that have condemned me, being fully assured that God, the righteous Judge of all, who knoweth the uprightness and integrity of my intentions, will impute no fault to me in this kind; since to my knowledge I have carried myself according to the direction of his Word, and the practice of all good Christians before these miserable times we are fallen into. My Exhortation therefore (which coming from one at the point I am at, will, I hope, have some weight) shall be this unto you; That you will break off your sins by repentance, and above all, free yourself of this master sin of Rebellion that reigneth in this land: whereunto most part are either forced, or drawn unawares, chiefly at the instigation of those who should direct you in the way of truth. It cannot be but a great judgment upon a land, when God’s singular mercies towards it are so little valued. He hath not given us a king in his wrath, but one for piety, bounty, and all virtues both Christian and moral, may be a pattern to all princes besides. How thankful we are to God for so great a blessing, our respect towards him manifesteth. Yet I fear there is a greater judgment than this upon it, which occasioneth all the mischiefs that afflict this poor land, such as was sent upon Ahab: God hath put a lying spirit in the mouths of the most part of your Prophets, who instead of the doctrine of Salvation, labour to draw your hearts unto the condemnation of Core. God Almighty look upon this poor miserable Church and kingdom, and relieve you out of the intolerable servitude you lie under, which I do heartily wish for in your behalf! So let me have the assistance of your prayers, that God would be pleased to pardon all my sins in Jesus Christ, and gather my soul with the saints and martyrs that are gone to their rest before. So I bid the world and you farewell.”

Sir Robert was not disturbed at the unmanly interruption he met with, when he was about to address himself to the people; so that turning from them, he wholly bestowed himself in devotions and prayers to Almighty God. The same Minister having asked, if he would have him and the people to pray for the salvation of his soul, he made answer, That he desired the prayers of the people, but was not solicitous for his prayers, which he believed were abominable unto God: for, added he, of all the Plagues with which the offended majesty of God had scourged this nation, this was much the greatest (greater than the Sword, Fire, or Pestilence), that for the sins of the people, God had sent “ a lying spirit into the mouths of the Prophets.” With which saying this preacher finding himself touched, grew so extremely in passion, that he could not forbear scandalous and contumelious language against sir Robert’s father, who had been long dead, and against himself, who was now a dying: which this mild gentleman took no notice of, having his mind fixed upon higher matters. At last with an undaunted air he advances towards the instrument of his Execution, and shewing no alteration either in voice or countenance, he laid down his neck to the fatal stroke, and uttered these his last words: “ Merciful Jesu, gather my soul unto thy saints and martyrs, who have run before me in this race.”

THE PREFACE.

Ingenuous reader; Thou hast here presented to thee a sad emblem of the strange sleights and cunning subtilties, whereby Satan labours to ensnare souls, and at last to bring them to utter ruine; who being that grand impostor, soone began this worke, even in the morning of the creation, in the body of a serpent

* From a Pamphlet entitled, ‘ A true and exact Relation of the several Informations, Examinations, and Confessions, of the late Witches, arraigned and executed in the county of Essex; who were arraigned and condemned at the late sessions, holden at Chelmsford, before the right hon. Robert Earl of Warwick, and several of his majesty’s justices of the peace, the 29th of July, A. D. 1645. Wherein the several murders, and devilish witchcrafts, ‘ committed on the bodies of men, women, and children, and divers cattle, are fully discovered. Published by authority. London, printed by M. S. for Henry Overton and Benj. Allen, and are to be sold at their shops in Pope’s-head-alley. 1645.’

† See the Case of Mary Smith, A. D. 1616, ante, vol. 2, p. 1050, and the notes to that case; and the Trials of Amy Duny and Rose Cullender, A. D. 1664; of Lloyd, Tremble, and Ed-miraculously, to reason, dispute, speake, and confesse with Evah; and never ceased till he had laid the honour of those glorious creatures in the dust: and therefore is called that old serpent, that deceiveth all the world, by whose deceitful promises and subtil devices, for his own end, and desire of their destruction, hath ensnared and drawne these poore silly creatures, into these horrid and detestable practices, of renouncing God and Christ, and entering into wards, A. D. 1682; and of Jane Wenham, A. D. 1712. post. Witches seem to have abounded in Great Britain more than usually about the middle of the 17th century. The passages of Howell referred to in the Note to Mary Smith's case may amuse, though they should leave the extent of the writer's faith in witches doubtful:

'I return you the Manuscript you lent me of Dæmonology, but the author thereof and I are two in point of opinion that way; for he seems to be on the negative part, and truly he writes as much as can be produced for his purpose. But there are some men that are of a mere negative genius, like Johannes ad oppositum, who will deny, or at least cross and puzzle any thing, though never so clear in itself, with their but, yet, if, &c. they will flap the lye in Truth's teeth, though she visibly stand before their face without any vizard: such perverse cross-grained spirits are not to be dealt withal by arguments, but palpable proofs; as if one should deny that the fire burns, or that he hath a nose on his face; there is no way to deal with him, but to pull him by the tip of the eare, and put his finger into the other. I will not say that this gentleman is so perverse; but to deny there are any witches, to deny that there are not ill spirits which seduce, tamper and converse in divers shapes with human creatures, and impel them to actions of malice; I say, that he who denies there are such busy spirits, and such poor passive creatures upon whom they work, which commonly are called witches; I say again, that he who denies there are such spirits, shews that he himself hath a spirit of contradiction in him, opposing the current and conscientious opinion of all antiquity. We read that both Jews and Romans, with all other nations of Christendom, and our ancestors here in England, enacted laws against witches; sure they were not so silly as to waste their brains in making laws against Chimeras, against non-entia, or such as Plato's Kterismata were. The judicial law is apparent in the holy Codex, Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live: the Roman law, which the Decemviri made, is yet extant in the twelve tables, Qui fruges incantassent, penis dento: they who shall enchant the fruit of the earth, let them be punished. The Imperial law is known by every Civilian; Hi cum hostes naturæ sint, supplicio afficiantur: these, a solemn league and contract with the Devil; the thought whereof is sufficient to cause a man to be filled with horror and astonishment. The lawe and expresse command of God doth allow of no familiarity or inquiry of any other spirit, but from himselfe; as Isa. 8. 19. 'And when they shall say unto you, seek ye unto them that have familiar spirits, and unto wizards, that peep and that mutter, should not a people seeke unto their God,' &c. Under this inter-

'meaning witches, because they are enemies to nature, let them be punished. And the acts of parliament in England are against those that invoke ill spirits, that take up any dead man, woman or child, to take the skin or bone of any dead body, to employ it to sorcery or charm, whereby any one is lamed or made to pine away, &c. such shall be guilty of flat felony, and not capable of clergy or sanctuary, &c.—What a multitude of examples are there in good authentic authors of divers kinds of fascinations, incantations, prestigations, of philtres, spells, charms, sorceries, characters, and such like; as also of magic, necromancy, and divinations! Surely the witch of Endor is no fable; the burning of Joan d'Arc the maid of Orleans in Rouen, and of the marchioness of d'Ancre of late years in Paris, are no fables: the execution of Nostredamus for a kind of witch, some fourscore years since, is but a modern story. who among other things foretold 'Le senat de Londres tuera son roy,' the senate of London shall kill their king. [N. B. This letter bears date Feb. 20, 1647-8.] The best historians have it upon record, how Charlemain's mistress enchanted him with a ring, which as long as she had about her, he would not suffer her dead carcase to be carried out of his chamber to be buried; and a bishop taking it out of her mouth, the emperor grew to be as much bewitched with the bishop; but he being cloyed with his excess of favour, threw it into a pond, where the emperor's chiefest pleasure, was to walk till his dying day. The story tells us, how the Waldenses in France were by solemn arrest of parliament accused and condemned of witchcraft. The Maltese took St. Paul for a witch. St. Augustin speaks of women who could turn men to horses, and make them carry their burdens: Danæus writes of an enchanted staff, which the Devil, summoner-like, was used to deliver some market-women to ride upon. In some of the Northern countries, it is as ordinary to buy and sell winds, as it is to do wines in other parts; and hereof I could instance in some examples of my own knowledge. Every one knows what Olaus Magnus writes of Eric's (king of Sweethland's) cornered cap, who could make the wind shift to any point of the compass, according as he turned it about. —Touching diviners of things to come, which is held a species of witchcraft, we may read they were frequent among the Romans; yea, they had colleges for their augurs and astro-rogative is understood this affirmative, a people should inquire of no other spirit, but of their God onely. By which also it is evident, that all spirits that doe suffer themselves to be inquired at, are evil spirits, and therefore devills. And though these devillish practices were frequent and common amongst heathens and infidells, who usually held familiarity with these spirits, and many inquired of them in their oracles; and therefore called those spirits

‘ sometimes by fire, sometimes by flying of ‘ fowls, sometimes by inspection into the en‘ trails of beasts, or invoking the dead, but ‘ most frequently by consulting with the ora‘ cles, to whom all nations hath recourse except ‘ the Jews. But you will say, that since Chris‘ tianity displayed her banner, the Cross hath ‘ scared away the Devil, and struck the oracles
‘ dumb: as Plutarch reports a notable passage ‘ of Thamus an Italian pilot; who a little after ‘ the birth of Christ, sailing along the coasts of ‘ Calabria in a still silent night, all his pas‘ sengers being asleep, an airy cold voice came ‘ to his ears, saying, Thamus, Thamus, Thamus,
‘ The great God Pan is dead, who was the ‘ chiefest oracle of that country. Yet though ‘ the light of the gospel chased away those great ‘ owls, there be some bats and little night-birds, ‘ that fly still abroad, I mean petty spirits, that ‘ by secret pactions, which are made always ‘ without witness, enable men and women to ‘ do evil. In such compacts beyond the seas,
‘ the party must first renounce Christ, and the ‘ extended woman, meaning the blessed Virgin;
‘ he must contemn the Sacrament, tread on the ‘ cross, spit at the Host, &c. There is a famous ‘ story of such a paction, which Fryar Louis ‘ made some half a hundred years ago with the ‘ Devil in Marseilles, who appeared to him in ‘ shape of a goat, and promised him the enjoy‘ ment of any woman whom he fancied, with ‘ other pleasures, for 41 years; but the Devil ‘ being too cunning for him, put the figure of ‘ 1 before, and made it 14 years in the con‘ tract, (which is to be seen to this day, with ‘ the devil’s claw to it) at which time the Fryar ‘ was detected for witchcraft, and burnt; and ‘ all those children whom he had christened
‘ during that term of 14 years, were re-bap‘ tised: the gentlewomen whom he had abused, ‘ put themselves into a nunnery by themselves.
‘ Hereunto may be added the great rich widow ‘ that was burned in Lions, because it was ‘ proved the Devil had lain with her; as also
‘ the history of lieutenant Jaquette, which ‘ stands upon record with the former: but if I ‘ should insert them here at large, it would ‘ make this letter swell too much.—But we ‘ need not cross the sea for examples of this ‘ kind; we have too too many (God wot) at home.
‘ King James a great while was loth to believe ‘ there were witches; but that which happened
‘ to my lord Francis of Rutland’s children con‘ vinced him, who were bewitched by an old ‘ woman that was servant at Belvoir-Castle;

that gave answer by them, Daemons, of their skill and knowledge in foretelling things to come: yet now when the light of the gospel shineth so gloriously, that such a generation of poore deluded soules, and to such a number as hath of late been discovered should be found amongst us, is much more matter of admiration and astonishment. I doubt not but these things may seeme as incredible unto some, as they are matter of admiration unto

‘ but being displeased, she contracted with the ‘ Devil (who conversed with her in form of a ‘ cat, whom she called Rutterkin) to make away
‘ those children, out of mere malignity and thirst
‘ of revenge.—But since the beginning of these ‘ unnatural wars, there may be a cloud of wit‘ nesses produced for the proof of this black ‘ tenet: for within the compass of two years, ‘ near upon 300 witches were arraigned, and
‘ the major part executed in Essex and Suffolk
‘ only. Scotland swarms with them now more ‘ than ever, and persons of good quality exe‘ cuted daily.—Thus, Sir, have I huddled toge‘ ther a few arguments touching this subject;
‘ because in my last communication with you,
‘ methought I found you somewhat unsatisfied, ‘ and staggering in your opinion touching the ‘ affirmative part of this thesis, the discussing ‘ whereof is far fitter for an elaborate large ‘ treatise than a loose letter.’

‘ Here are started up some great knowing ‘ men lately, that can shew the very track by ‘ which our Saviour went to hell; they will tell ‘ you precisely whose names are written in the ‘ book of life, whose not. God deliver us from ‘ spiritual pride, which of all sorts is the most ‘ dangerous. Here are also notable star-gazers,
‘ who obtrude on the world such confident bold ‘ predictions, and are so familiar with heavenly ‘ bodies, that Ptolemy and Tycho Brahe were ‘ minnies to them. We have likewise multi‘ tudes of witches among us, for in Essex and ‘ Suffolk there were above 200 indicted within ‘ these two years, and above the one half of them ‘ executed: more, I may well say, than ever
‘ this island bred since the creation, I speak it ‘ with horror. God guard us from the Devil, ‘ for I think he was never so busy upon any ‘ part of the earth that was enlightened with ‘ the beams of Christianity; nor do I wonder ‘ at it, for there is never a cross left to fright

A great collection of such Legends as those mentioned by Howell may be found in “Burton’s Anatomy of Melancholy,” part 1, § 2, memb. 1, subsect. 2, 3.

Whitelocke, in his Memorials, bears frequent testimony of the state of Witchcraft about this time: thus, July 25th, 1645, “twenty witches in Norfolk were executed.” December 13, 1649, “many witches apprehended of late about Newcastle: the Witch-tryer thrusting a pin into the skin in many parts of their bodies, they were insensible of it, which is one circumstance of proof against them.” Same year, July 2d, “five witches were burned at Edinothers. Nolle nimis sapere, saith the poet, it is true wisdom not to be too wise; that is, not to know nor desire to know more than is allowed or needfull; needfull not in our desires, but in Gods decree: Here then let reasonable men be persuaded not too much, as is usual to swell with indignation, or to be puffed with impatience, where God doth not aptly reveale and plainly, as they desire and thinke needfull the subtile engines and mysticall craft of the devill in the machinations of witches and sorcerers; but soberly, modestly, and discreetly so far forth be contented to pursue the trial and just way of their discoverie, as with sense, with reason, with religion, is just and righteous; knowing, that whatsoever is beyond these lists, is reasonlesse, senselesse and impious. The greatest doubt and question will be, whether it be in the power of the devil to perform burgh, who had the marks upon them which they had from the Devil." April 15th, 1650, "at a little village within two miles of Berwick, two men and three women were burned for witches, and nine more were to be burned, the village consisting but of fourteen families, and there were as many witches." Same year, July 24, "one man and two women, about Boston, committed for witches: the man confessed he had a Familiar sucked him at some paps, which he then shewed. He had signed a writing to the Devil, to deny God and Jesus Christ, and the Familiar drew blood from those paps and appeared to him in the shape of a white chicken: that he signed the Devil's covenant with a piece of a stick, with the same mark he now made at the bottom of his examination; and both the women confessed the like." Under date October 4, 1652, he tells us, that "sixty men and women were accused before the commissioners for administration of justice in Scotland, at the last circuit, for witches; but they found so much malice and so little proof against them, that none were condemned." But again, Oct. 29th, of the same year, after mentioning, That "the commissioners for administration of justice in Scotland sat at Edinburgh, and had many criminal matters brought before them, sixty in a day, for adultery, incest, &c. (he had on a former occasion made mention of the frequency and malice of such charges, and of the antiquity of the facts alleged) in the court, and proofs against few of them, and the malice of people against one another so great, that they brought accusations for facts done 20 years past, and the greatest proof against them, was a forced confession before the Kirk." He proceeds to tell us, "That some accused for witches, had been tortured to make them confess, by tying their thumbs behind them, and then hanging them up by their thumbs, while two Highlanders whipped them; after which, they set lighted candles to the soles of their feet, and between their toes, then burned them, by putting lighted candles into their mouths, and then burning them in the head: That six of them were accused, of whom four of them died of the torture. The judges resolved to examine the business, and to find out these Scots tormentors; that another woman being accused for a witch, was kept 28 days with only bread and water, and stripped naked and laid upon a cold stone, with only hair-cloth over her; that among the accused, others had hair shirts slipped in vinegar put over them, to fetch off the skin." Again, under date Nov. 28, 1653, he tells "of divers witches examined and sent to prison, some of them called Black Witches, who killed men, women, and children, and cattle, by their witchcrafts; and others of them called White Witches, who healed them that were bewitched by the other, and that this was confessed by them." See also under dates July 3rd, Sept. 3rd, and Oct. 4th, 1649; Jan. 22nd, and Feb. 15th, 1649-50. While witchcraft thus flourished, it will not excite wonder that Astrology was respected. The predictions of Lilly (the Sidrophel of Hudibras) are respectfully mentioned by both Rushworth and Whitelocke, see 7 Rushw. Coll. 1263, 1264. Whitelocke's Mem. 144, 329, 332. Lilly, who as an Astrologer, appears to have been consulted by Charles the First, published in 1651, a Collection of predictions, under the title of "Monarchy or No Monarchy in England," to prove that there would never be another king in England. Some nonsense of king James's about witching and unwitching is to be found in the Case between Lord and Lady Essex, A.D. 1613, ante, vol. 2, p. 800, 801, 814. See, too, the Case of Anne Turner, for Overbury's murder, vol. 2, p. 929. Arnot in his "Collection and Abridgement of celebrated Criminal Trials in Scotland," distinctly mentions upwards of 30 prosecutions for witchcraft, in most of which capital punishment appears to have been inflicted, besides alluding to many others.

At Huntingdon, Spring assizes, 1593, before Mr. Justice Fenner, the three Witches of Warboise (John Samuel, Alice his wife, and Agnes their daughter) were arraigned and convicted (they were afterwards executed) for bewitching five daughters of Robert Throckmorton, esq., and divers other persons with sundry devilish and grievous torments, and also bewitching to death the lady Cromwell. See "Complete History of Magic, Sorcery, and Witchcraft," vol. 1, p. 49 et seq. On March 11th, 1619, Margaret and Philip, daughters of Joan Flower (who died marvellously while in custody) having been convicted at the assizes at Lincoln, held before Chief Justice Hobart and Mr. Baron Bromley, of bewitching the earl of Rutland his wife and children, were executed. See their cases in the same work.

In the year 1441, Eleanor Cobham (the wife of Humphry, duke of Gloucester, uncle of Henry the sixth) together with other persons, were convicted of Witchcraft. Hall in his Chronicle, p. 202, ed. 1809, briefly mentions the transaction. Stow in his Annals, p.

such asportation and locall translation of the bodies of witches; it seemeth in reason a thing whereunto the devill is unable: And whether these supernaturall works, which are above the power of man to do, and proper only to spirits, whether they are reall, or only imaginary and fained. In answer to which, it is very probable that the devill hath power to dispose and transport the bodies of men and women, where God himself doth not countermand or prohibit: as instance, when hee took the body of our Saviour and set it upon a pinnacle of the Temple; and these supernaturall acts may appear to the outward sense, as histories, and many other true reports and records of other wonderful works and supernaturall feats all alike offered to the outward sense. It is true, that a spirit, and a spirituall work simply in itself, in the own nature and substance cannot be seen by any bodily eye, or

“Roger Bolinbrooke a great astronomer, with Thomas Southwell a chawon of Saint Stephens Chappell at Westminster, were taken as conspirators of the King's Death, for it was said, that the same Roger should labour to consume the king's person by way of Negromancie, and the said Thomas should say masses in the lodge of Harnesey parke beside London, upon certaine instruments with the which the said Roger should use his craft of Negromancie, against the faith, and was assenting to the said Roger, in all his workes; and the 25th day of July being Sunday, Roger Bolinbrooke, with all his instruments of Negromancie, that is to say, a chayre paynted wherein he was wont to sit, upon the foure corners of which chayre stode foure swords, and upon every sword an image of copper hanging, with many other instruments, hee stode on a high scaffold in Paules Churchyard, before the crosse, holding a sword in his right hand and a sceptre in his left, arrayed in a mervellous attire, and after the sermon was ended by maister Low bishop of Rochester, he abjured all articles longing to the craft of Negromancie or misowning to the faith, in presence of the archbyschop of Canterbury, the cardinall of Winchester, the byshop of London, Salisbury and many other.

“In the meane time, Roger Bolinbrooke was examined before the king's counsaile, where he confessed that he wrought the saide Negromancie at the stirring and procurement of the said dame Elianor, to know what should befall of her, and to what estate she should come, whereupon shee was cited to appear before Henry Chicheley archbishop of Canterbury, Henry Beaufort bishoppe of Winchester cardinall, John Kempe archbyschop of Yorke cardinall, William Aseoth byshop of Salisbury, and other, in Saint Stephens Chappell at Westminster, there to answer to certaine Articles in number 28, of negromancie, witchcraft, sorcerie, heresie, and treason, where when shee appeared, the foresaide Roger was brought forth to witnes against her, and said, that shee was cause and first stirred him to labour in the said art. Then on the 11th of August, shee was committed to the ward of sir John Steward, sir William Wolfe, knights, John Stanley esquier, and other, to be conveyed to the castle of Leeds, there to remaine till three weekes after Michaelmas.

“Shortly after, a Commission was directed to the earles of Huntington, Stafford, Suffolke, and Northumberland, the treasurer sir Ralph Cromwall, John Cornwall lord Fanhope, sir Walter Hungerforde, and to certaine judges of both benches, to enquire of all manner of treasons, sorceries and other things, that might be hurtfull to the king's person; before whome, the said Roger, and Thomas Southwell as principals, and dame Elianor as accessary, were indicted of treason in the Guilde Hall of London.

“There was taken also Margery Gurdemaine, a witch of Eye besides Westminster, whose sorcerie and witchcraft the said Elianor hadde long time used, and by her medicines and drinckes enforced the duke of Gloucester to love her, and after to wedde her, wherefore, and for cause of relapse, the same witch was burnt in Smithfield, on the 27th day of October.

“The 23rd of October, dame Elianor appeared againe, and witnesses were brought forth and examined: and she was convict of the saide Articles: then was it asked if she would say any thing against the witnesses, whereunto she answered nay, but submitted herself. The 27th day of October she abjured the Articles, and was adjoynted to appeare againe the 9th of November. In the meane tyme, to wit, on the 26th of October, Thomas Southwell dyed in the Tower of London, as himselfe had prophesied that he should never die by justice of the law.

“The 9th of November dame Elianor appeared before the archbyschop and other, in the said Chappell, and received her penance, which shee performed.

“On Monday the 13th of November, she came from Westminster by water, and landed at the Temple bridge, from whence with a taper of wax of two pound in her hand, she be deprehended by any outward sense, notwithstanding, as they do mix themselves with bodily substances, are certainly tried and subject to the sense: For illustration hereof, instance may be given in holy Scripture, as the sorcerers of Egypt, where water was turned into blood, the rod into a serpent, &c. By a spirituall power their eyes did manifestly see the water, and as apparently after see the blood, and the rod turned into a serpent, the eye being a true and undeceived witness of both: things imagined and fancied, are easily discerned from these things that are real and true objects. But it may be demanded, whether a Spirit or Devill can cause such a transmutation of the bodies of witches into those severall shapes and forms of cats, dogges, birds, and other creatures, as is often reported, where witches and sorcerers have lived. The answer is, that it is impossible in nature, and in the ordinary went through Fleet-street, hoodlesse (save a kercheffe) to Pauls, where she offered her taper at the high altar. On the Wednesday next shee landed at the Swan in Thamis-street, and then went through Bridge-streete, Gracechurch-streete, strait to Leaden Hall, and so to Christ-church by Aldegate. On Friday she landed at Queen Hive, and so went through Cheape to Saynt Michaels in Cornehill, in forme aforesaid: at all which times the maior, sherifes, and crafts of London, received her, and accompanied her. This being done, shee was committed to the ward of sir Thomas Stanely, wherein shee remained during her life, in the castle of Chester, having yeerely 100 markes assigned for her finding: in the 22nd of Henry the sixth, shee was removed to Kenilworth, there to be safely kept, whose pride, false covetise, and lechery, were cause of her confusion.

"The 18th of November Roger Bolinbrooke, with sir John Hum, priest, and William Woodham, esquier, were arraigned in the Guildhall of London, where the said John and William hadde their charters, but Roger Bolinbrooke was condemned, and had judgment of sir Jo. Hody, Chiefe Justice of the King's Bench, and the same day he was drawne from the Tower to Tyborne, and there hanged and quartered: and when the said Roger should suffer, he said that he was never guilty of any treason against the king's person, but hee had presumed too far in his cunning, wherefore he cryed God mercy: and the Justice that gave on him judgement, lived not long after."

See Shakespear's second part of Henry 6th, acts 1st and 2d. So too Richard duke of Gloucester accused Elizabeth the widow, and Jane Shore the mistress, of his brother king Edward the 4th, of having by sorcery shrunk up his arm. See Shakespear's Richard the 3rd, act 3, sc. 4.; and sir Thomas More, Hall, and Holliashed, as referred to in Mr. Malone's Note on the Passage.

Dr. Nash, in his "History of Worcester-shire," vol. 2, p. 38, says, "That May 14, 1660, four persons accused of Witchcraft were brought from Kidderminster to Worcester gaol, one widow Robinson and her two daughters, and a man. The eldest daughter was accused of saying, that, if they had not been taken, the king should never have come into England, and though he now doth come, yet he shall not live long, but shall die as ill a death as they; and that they should have made corn like pepper. Many great charges against them and none proved; they were put to the ducking in the river; they would not sink, but swam aloft. The man had five tents, the mother three, and the eldest daughter one. When they went to search the woman, none were visible; one advised to lay them on their backs, and keep open their mouths, and they would appear; and so they presently appeared in sight. [From some MSS. sent me belonging to the Townshends of Elmly.]

"Before this, in the year 1649, four persons were tried at Worcester for this supposed offence, and all executed, two of them confessing their crime, viz. Margaret Landis and Susan Cook: Rebecca West and Rose Holybred died obstinate.

"In the year 1716, Mrs. Hicks and her daughter aged 9 years were hanged at Hunting-ton for witchcraft, for selling their souls to the devil, tormenting and destroying their neighbours, by making them vomit pins, raising a storm, so that a ship was almost lost, by pulling off her stockings and making a lather with soap. They were committed by one justice Wilmot. [London, printed by Mathews, in Long Acre]."

The statute against Witchcraft was not repealed till the 9th George 2, 1736; and even still an unhappy prejudice prevails in many places against unfortunate old women. It is not many years since a poor woman, who happened to be very ugly, was almost drowned in the neighbourhood of Worcester, upon a supposition of witchcraft; and had not Mr. Lygon, a gentleman of singular humanity and inducance, interfered in her behalf, she would certainly have been drowned, upon a presumption that a witch could not sink.

Mr. Pennant, in his Tour to Scotland, says, "that the last instance of these frantic executions in the North of Scotland was in the year 1727, as that in the South was at Paisly in 1696, where, among others, a handsome young woman suffered." Arnot says, that the last person who was brought to the stake in Scotland for the crime of witchcraft was condemned by capt. David Ross of Little Daan, sheriff depute of Sutherland, A. D. 1722, Crim. Trials in Scotland, 367. He proceeds, "While we reflect upon the blind and barbarous superstition of our ancestors, while we bestow the tribute of applause on those humane and liberal senators who introduced this law, st. 9 G. 2, c. 5, we cannot help lamenting that a sect among us looks upon the abolition of the penal statutes against witchcraft, not only as an evil, unchangeable course of all things created by God, that one individuall and continued substance or entire thing should be wholly divided from itself, and yet be itself; for there can be no reall or true transmutation of one substance, or nature into another, but either by creation or generation. Now creation is the worke of an infinite power, and therefore of God alone. The Devill then cannot create, neither can he do it by any course of true generation, because a true and real generation hath many precedent alterations, and by little and little, in space of time growes unto the perfection of that kind unto which it doth tend, or is begotten; therefore they are but seeming and juggling transmutations of the Devill: And here that saying of Augustine may be alledged, 'De civit. Dei, lib. 18, cap. 18. (Nec sanè Dæmones naturas creant, sed specie tenus, quæ à Deo creata sunt commutant, ut videantur esse quæ

but a sin.—The Seceders published an act of their Associate Presbytery at Edinburgh, A. D. 1743. This act, which is full of the most illiberal and absurd doctrines, the most seditious and intolerant spirit, was reprinted at Glasgow so late as the year 1766. In it there is contained the annual confession of sins, which to this day they read from the pulpit.—Among the sins national and personal there confessed, are the act of queen Anne's parliament for tolerating the episcopal religion in Scotland, the act for adjourning the court of session during the Christmas holidays; 'as also the penal statutes against Witches have been repealed by parliament, contrary to the express law of God*.—The Seceders comprehend a very large body of the populace in Scotland."

A peculiar hardship upon Scottish witches arose from the indelibility of their character. In the Roman law prescription of crimes was established. See the Encyclopædia Britannica in voc. "Prescription;" and the authorities referred to in Arnot's Collection of Criminal Trials in Scotland, p. 232. This doctrine was adopted in many of those countries the municipal institutions of which were to a greater or less extent derived from the Roman law. In Scotland vicennial prescription seems to prevail even in cases of murder; (See the Case of Malcolm M^r Gregor, alias John Grant, A. D. 1773, Arnot, 229.) But "once a witch, always a witch." In the case of witchcraft no prescription was allowed; Arnot, 233. Mr. Burke in his Reflections on the Revolution in France, (Burke's Works, vol. 5, p. 276, edition of 1808) says, "Domat, one of the greatest of the French lawyers, tells us with great truth, that the doctrine of Prescription is a part of the law of nature." I have not been able to find in Domat any passage expressly asserting the proposition which Mr. Burke thus ascribes to him. But in Book 3, Tit. 7, sect. 4, he speaks very strongly of the reasonableness and justice, the advantages and natural necessity of such a doctrine, as to property.

It is, indeed, sufficiently clear that the first evidence of property must be possession; and that this evidence must be very much corroborated by long duration of possession. Whether the doctrine of Prescription be, or not, part of the law of nature, it is certainly agreeable to that law, and to the fundamental principles of justice. The operation of time is to destroy by natural and accidental decay all the proofs which might be afforded by oral testimony or written documents. Men and women die; papers and parchments rot and are devoured. And it is most reasonable and most agreeable to the eternal principles of equity, that the lapse of time should be allowed in contemplation of law to supply those deficiencies of proof of which it is thus the cause. In the law of England there is no prescription of crimes. At Nottingham Summer Assizes, A. D. 1759, William Horne was tried for a murder alleged to have been committed in February 1724. He was convicted of this murder, and executed on the eleventh of December following. And much more recently, at the January Sessions in the year 1802, Lieutenant Colonel Joseph Wall was convicted at the Old Bailey (and he was afterwards executed accordingly) of a murder committed in Africa twenty years before. All indictments are preferred and prosecuted in the name of the King, and the maxim of the law is, Nulium tempus occurrit regi. But the periods within which certain criminal prosecutions may be commenced have been limited by different statutes: thus by the stat. of Gloucester, 6 Ed. 1, c. 9, all appeals of death must be sued within a year and a day after the completion of the felony by the death of the party (which indeed Blackstone suspects may have been only declaratory of the old common law). By 7 W. 3, c. 3, (extended to Scotland by the tenor of the Act of Union 7 Ann. c. 21, See 6 G. 3, c. 53, and East's Pleas of the Crown, c. 2, s. 45; and altered by st. 40 G. 3, c. 93.) no person shall be tried for High Treason working corruption of blood (except attempts to assassinate the king, and counterfeiting the king's seals or coin) or misprision of such treason, unless the indictment be found by a grand jury within three years after the offence committed. By 31 Eliz. c. 5, no prosecution upon any penal statute giving a forfeiture or penalty can be brought by a common informer later than one year, or on the part of the crown later than three years (or than two if the whole forfeiture be originally given to the crown) after the commission of the offence. And very many penal statutes specifically prescribe short periods within which the offenders against such statutes are to be prosecuted. So by 27 G. 3, c. 44, prosecutions in the ecclesiastical courts (which courts preceed, it seems, upon the maxim that nulium tempus occurrit ecclesiæ) for defamation must be commenced within six months, and for incontinence and

'non sunt') that is, Devils cannot create any nature or substance, but in juggling shew, or seemingly only, whereby with false shadowes covering those things which are created of God to cause them to seem that which they are not indeed. Take one instance of the jugglings and illusions of the Devill above all the rest, which doth most palpably detect him herein, is a history related by Johannes Baptista Porta, in his second book, de Magia naturali; hee there witnesseth, that upon the Devil's suggestion, a witch believed firmly and perswaded herself, that all the night shee had rid in the aire, over divers great mountaines, and met in conventicles with other witches, when the same night, the mentioned author himself, with others that watched her and saw her all that imagined time of her transvection in the aire, to be within her chamber profoundly sleeping; yea, had smitten her, made her flesh blew with strokes, and could not awake her, nor perswade her afterward when she was awaked that they had so used her, or at all had scene or beheld her; thus prevalent was the juggling power of the Devill.

Many other like instances of like nature might be added, only what here is published and communicated unto the world, may sufficiently discover those strong delusions which these poor soules were given up unto, who now according to their demerits, and according to the lawes of God and this kingdome established, have received their just reward. H. F.

Taylor, taken before Sir Harbottell Grinston, Knight and Baronet, one of the Members of the Honourable House of Commons; and Sir Thomas Bowes, Knight, another of his Majesties Justices of Peace for this County, the 21th of March, 1645.

This informant saith, That about Christmas last, his wife was taken sicke and lame, with such violent fits, that this informant verily conceived her sickness was something more than meeny naturall: whereupon this informant, about a fortnight since, went to a cunning woman, the wife of one Hovye, at Hadleigh in Suffolke, who told this informant, that his wife was cured by two women who were neer neighbours to this informant, the one dwelling a little above his house, and the other beneath his house, this informant's house standing on the side of an hill: whereupon he beleered his said wife was bewitched by one Elizabeth Clarke, alias Beddingfield, that dwelt above the informant's house, for that the said Elizabeth's certain other offences within eight months after the offence committed. For particulars respecting the operations of time upon civil rights according to the law of England, which operations for the most part depend upon certain statutes of limitation, as they are called; see Blackst. Comm. Introd. sect. 3, book 1, c. 7, s. 2, book 2, c. 3, s. 2, c. 17, c. 18, s. 3, c. 21, s. 3, book 3, c. 10, c. 11, s. 2, c. 16, s. 4, c. 20. The law of England admits prescriptive titles to all sorts of property except advowsons, and (since the stat. 9 G. 3, c. 16.) against the king as well as all other persons, excepting ecclesiastics, and persons claiming under them in right of the church: in which exception to the operation of this law of nature, as Mr. Burke calls it, there seems to be no small hardship.

The Information of Matthew Hopkins, of Mannintree, Gent. taken upon oath before us, the 25th day of March, 1645.

This informant saith, That the said Elizabeth Clarke (suspected for a witch as aforesaid) being by the appointment of the said justices watched certaine nights, for the better discovery of her wicked practises, this informant came into the room where the said Elizabeth was watched, as aforesaid, the last night, being the 24th of this instant March, but intended not to have stayed long there. But the said Elizabeth forthwith told this informant and one Master Sterne there present, if they would stay and do the said Elizabeth no hurt, shee would call one of her white imps, and play with it in her lap; but this informant told her, they would not allow of it: and that staying there a while longer, the said Elizabeth confessed she had had carnall copulation with the Devill six or seven years; and that he would appeare to her three or foure times in a weeke at her bed side, and goe to bed to her, and lye with her halfe a night together in the shape of a proper gentleman, with a laced hand, having the whole proportion of a man, and would say to her, 'Besse, I must lye with you;' and she did never deny him: and within a quarter of an houre after there appeared an impe like to a dog, which was white, with some sandy spots, and seemed to be very fat and plumpe, with very short legges, who forthwith vanished away: and the said Elizabeth said the name of that impe was Jarmara: and immediately there appeared another impe, which shee called Vinegar Tom, in the shape of a greyhound with long legges: and the said Elizabeth then said that the next impe should be a black impe, and should come for the said Master Sterne, which appeared, but presently vanished: and the last that appeared was in the shape of a polcat, but the head somewhat bigger. And the said Elizabeth then told this informant that shee had five impes of her owne, and two of the impes of the old beldam Weste (meaning one Anne Weste, widow) who is now also suspected to be guilty of witchcraft; and said, sometimes the impes of the old beldam sucked on the said Elizabeth, and sometimes her impes sucked on the old beldam Weste. And the said Elizabeth further told this informant, that Satan would never let her rest, or be quiet, untill shee did consent to the killing of the hogges of one Mr. Edwards of Mannintree aforesaid, and the horse of one Robert Tayler of the same towne. And this informant further saith, That going from the house of the said Mr. Edwards to his own house, about nine or ten of the clock that night, with his greyhound with him, he saw the greyhound suddenly give a jumpe, and ran as shee had been in a full course after an hare; and that when this informant made haste to see what his greyhound so eagerly pursued, he espied a white thing about the bignesse of a kit-lyn, and the greyhound standing aloofe from it; and that by and by the said white impe or kitlyn daunced about the said greyhound, and by all likelihood bit off a piece of the flesh of the shoulder of the said greyhound; for the greyhound came shrieking and crying to this informant, with a piece of flesh torne from her shoulder. And this informant further saith, That coming into his own yard that night, he espied a black thing, proportioned like a cat, onely it was thrice as big, sitting on a s'raw-berry bed, and fixing the eyes on this informant; and when he went towards it, it leaped over the pale towards this informant, as he thought, but ran quite through the yard, with his greyhound after it, to a great gate, which was under-set with a paire of tumbrell strings, and did throw the said gate wide open, and then vanished; and the said greyhound returned againe to this informant, shaking and trembling exceedingly.

The Information of John Sterne, Gent. taken upon oath before us, the 25th day of March 1645.

This informant saith, That watching with Elizabeth Clarke, (suspected of witchcraft, as aforesaid) shee confessed that the Devill had had carnall copulation with her in the likeness of a man; and that the said Elizabeth desired this informant, and the rest that were in the room with her, to sit downe, and said, shee would shew this informant and the rest some of her impes: and within halfe an houre there appeared a white thing in the likeness of a cat, but not altogether so big: and being asked, if she would not be afraid of her impes, the said Elizabeth answered, 'What, do yee think I am afraid of my children?' And that shee called the name of that white impe, Houlte. And this informant further saith, That presently after there appeared another white impe, with red spots, as big as a small dog, which shee then called Jarmara: and that immediately after, there appeared at the threshold of the doore another impe about the bignesse of the first, but did presently vanish away. And then the said Elizabeth being asked, if any more impes would come? she answered, 'That Vinegar Tom would come by and by.' And forthwith there appeared another in the likeness of a dumb dogge, somewhat bigger than any of the former. And the said Elizabeth also told this informant, that shee had three impes from her mother, which were of a browne colour, and two from the old beldam Weste: and that there had five impes appeared; but shee had one more, called Sack and Sugar, which had been hard at worke, and it would be long before it came, but it should teare this informant. And a while after, the said Elizabeth said, That it was well for this informant he was so quick, otherwise the said impe had soone skipped upon his face, and perchance had got into his throate, and then there would have been a feast of toades in this informant's belly. And the said Elizabeth further confessed to this informant, that shee had one impe for which she would fight up to the knees in blood, before shee would lose it; and that her impes did commonly suck on the old beldam Weste, and that the said old beldam's impes did suck on her the said Elizabeth likewise.

The Information of Frances Milles, Grace Norman, Mary Phillips, and Mary Parsley, taken upon oath before the said Justices, the 25th of March, A. D. 1645.

These informants say jointly, That watching with the said Elizabeth Clarke, suspected as aforesaid, about twelve of the clock last night, the said Elizabeth smacked with her mouth, and beckned with her hand, and instantly there appeared a white thing about the bignesse of a cat; and that these informants saw five impes more, which the said Elizabeth named as aforesaid; and that the said Elizabeth told these informants, that the old beldam (meaning the said Anne Weste) did by witchcraft kill the wife of one Robert Oakes, of Lawford in the county aforesaid, and was the death of a clothier's childe of Dedham in the said county of Essex; both which dyed, as these informants very well know, about a weeke since. And the said Elizabeth told these informants, that the said old beldam Weste had the wife of one William Cole, of Mannintree aforesaid, in handling, who dyed not long since of a pining and languishing disease.

This informant saith, That going to the said Elizabeth Clarke alias Bedingfield, after shee was apprehended, and asking her whether shee had any hand in the drowning of one Thomas Turner, this informant's brother, who was cast away at sea about thirty moneths since; the said Elizabeth answered, That the old beldam Weste raised that winde that sunke his hoy: And that shee the said Elizabeth had no hand in that businesse.

The Information of John Bankes of Mannintree, taken upon oath before the said Justices the 25th of March, 1645.

This informant saith, That watching with the said Elizabeth, he doth informe and confirme all the particulars expressed and set downe in the information of the said Mr. Sterne.

The Information of Edward Parsley of Mannintree, taken upon oath before the said Justices the 25th of March, 1645.

This informant saith, That watching with the said Elizabeth Clarke, alias Bedingfield, the last night, he asked the said Elizabeth if he should continue still in the roome with her; And the said Elizabeth desired he should, if he would fight for her with the Devills, for they would come this night, and that which shee called Hoult would come first, and then that which shee called Jarmara; which did appeare in the likeness of a white dogge, with red spots; and presently after there appeared that impe which shee called Vinegar Tom; and then that which shee called Sack and Sugar: And the said Elizabeth then told this informant, that the Devil had had possession of her six or seven years. And that he had oftentimes knocked at her dore in the night time; and that shee did arise, open the dore and let him in; and that he went to bed to her three or foure times in a weeke, and had the carnall knowledge of her as a man.

The Examination of the said Elizabeth Clarke, alias Bedingfield, taken before the said Justices the 25th of March, 1645.

This examinant saith, That about six moneths since shee met with the said Anne Weste, widow, (who is now likewise apprehended) in a field neere the house of the said Elizabeth, where the said Elizabeth was picking up a few sticks; The said Anne Weste seemed much to pitie this examinant for her lamenesse (having but one leg) and her poverty; And said to this examinant, That there was wayes and meanes for her to live much better then now shee did: And said, that shee would send to this examinant a thing like a little kitlyn, which would fetch home some victuals for this examinant; and that it should doe her no hurt. And this examinant saith, that within two or three nights after there came a white thing to her in the night, and the night after a gray one, which spake to this examinant, and told her they would doe her no hurt, but would helpe her to an husband, who should maintaine her ever after: And that these two things came into this examinant's bed every night, or every other night, and sucked upon the lower parts of her body.

This informant saith, That about nine weekes since, Elizabeth, the wife of Edward Gooding (who is accused by the said Elizabeth Clarke to be a confederate with her) came to the shop of this informant, and desired to be trusted for half a pound of cheese, which being denied, shee went away, muttering and mumbling to her self, and within a few houres came again with money, and bought a pound of cheese of this informant, and the same night this informant having an horse standing in his stable, the said horse was taken in a strange manner sick and lame; whereupon this informant sent for four farriers to have their best advice, who could not discover the cause of the disease; but the said horse about foure dayes after died: And this informant also saith, that it was observed by himself, and divers others who often went to see the said horse, that still upon their coming into the stable, he lay quiet, and looked cheerfully, but as soon as the door was shut, and the horse alone, hee did violently beat himself, and that the belly of the said horse would rumble and make a noyse, as a foule chimney set on fire: And this informant further saith, that hee is induced to believe, that the said Elizabeth Gooding was the cause of the death of his said horse; for that this informant hath heard, that Elizabeth Clarke and Anne Leech widow, (who stand both accused for Witchcraft, and have confessed themselves guilty) have impeached the said Elizabeth Gooding for killing of this said horse, and that the said Elizabeth Gooding is a lewd woman, and to this informant's knowledge, hath kept company with the said Elizabeth Clarke, Anne Leech, and Anne West, which Anne West hath been suspected for a witch many yeers since, and suffered imprisonment for the same.

This examinant saith, That shee is not guilty of any one particular charged upon her in the information of the said Robert Tailer.

The Information of Richard Edwards of Mannintree aforesaid, taken before the said Justices the 23rd day of April, 1645.

This informant saith, That about twelve moneths since, upon a Sabbath day, after the afternoon sermon, driving his coves home by the house of Anne Leech of Misley widow, about forty yards from her said house, a black cove of this informant's, (being very well to his thinking) fell down, and within two dayes after died. And the very next day driving his coves from the same pasture, this informant had a white cove that fell down within a rod of the same place where the other cove fell, (being also, as this informant conceived, sound and well) and within a week after dyed; and hee further saith, that hee caused both the said coves to be opened, and that there could be no disease discovered, which might occasion their death: And this informant likewise saith, that about August last hee had a childe nursed by one goodwife Wyles, dwelling near the houses of the said Elizabeth Clark and Elizabeth Gooding, and that his said childe was taken sick, and had very strange fits, extending the limbs, and rowling the eyes, and within two dayes after dyed: And this informant doth verily believe, that Anne Leech and the said Elizabeth Gooding were the death of his said child, as is confessed by the said Anne Leech in her own Confessioun and Examination.

The Examination of Anne Leech of Misley in the county aforesaid, widow, taken before the said Justices, April 14, 1645.

This examinant saith, That she had a grey imp sent to her, and that this examinant, together with the said Elizabeth Clark, and Elizabeth the wife of Edward Gooding, did about a yeer since, send their imps to kill a black cove and a white cove of Mr. Edwards, which was done accordingly: And this examinant saith, that she sent her gray imp, Elizabeth Clark a black imp, and Elizabeth Gooding a white imp: And this examinant saith, that about thirty yeeres since, shee sent a gray imp to kill two horses of one Mr. Bragge of Misley, which were killed accordingly; and that the occasion of her malice was, because Mistress Bragge had told this examinant, that shee suspected her to be a naughty woman; and this examinant confesseth, that she and the said Elizabeth Gooding, sent either of them an imp to destroy the childe of the said Mr. Edwards; this examinant's imp being then a white one, and Elizabeth Gooding's a black imp; and that about thirty yeers since, this examinant had the said white imp and two others, a grey and a black imp of one Anne, the wife of Robert Pearce of Stoak in Suffolk, being her brother; and that these imps went commonly from one to another, and did mischief where ever they went; and that when this examinant did not send and employ them abroad to do mischief, she had not her health, but when they were employed, she was healthfull and well, and that these imps did usually suck those teats which were found about the privie parts of her body; and that the said imps did often speak to this examinant, and told her, she should never feele hell torments, and that they spake to her in an hollow voyce, which she plainly understood: And this examinant also confesseth, that she sent her gray imp to Elizabeth, the daughter of Robert Kirk of Mannyn-tree, about three yeers since, to destroy her; and upon the sending of the said imp, the said Elizabeth languished by the space of one whole yeer untill shee dyed, and that the occasion of offence this examinant took against her the said Elizabeth was, for that she had asked a coife of the said Elizabeth, which shee refused to give to this examinant. And further, this examinant saith, that long since, but the exact time she cannot remember, she sent her gray imp to kill the daughter of the widow Rawlyns of Misley aforesaid; and the reason was, because this examinant was put out of her farm, and the said widow Rawlyns put in, where shee dwelleth at this present. And moreover, this examinant confesseth, that she was acquainted with the sending of an imp by the aforesaid Elizabeth Gooding, to vex and torment Mary the wife of John Tayler of Mannyn-tree aforesaid about three yeers since; and this examinant being asked why she did not discover it to the said Mary, she said, the Devil would not suffer her, and that the cause of the said Elizabeth Gooding's malice against the said Mary was, because the said Mary refused to give to the said Elizabeth some beere-good. And lastly, this examinant saith, that about eight weeks since, this examinant, the said Elizabeth Gooding, and one Anne West of Lawford widow, met together at the house of the said Elizabeth Clark, where there was a book read, wherein shee thinks there was no goodnesse.

The Information of Grace the wife of Richard Glascock of Mannyn-tree, taken upon oath before the said Justices the 11th day of April, 1645.

This informant saith, that there being some falling out between Mary the wife of Edward Parsley of Mannyn-tree, and one Hellen Clarke, the wife of Thomas Clarke (which said Hellen is the daughter of the said Anne Leech, whose confession doth immediately precede) this informant heard the said Hellen to say, as the said Hellen passed by this informants door in the street, that Mary the daughter of the said Edward and Mary Parsley should rue for all, whereupon presently the said Mary the daughter, fell sick, and died within six weeks after.

The Information of Edward Parsley of Mannyn-tree, taken upon oath before the said Justices, April 11, 1645.

This informant saith, that his said daughter sickned very suddenly, as the said Grace Glascock hath before informed, and died about six weeks since; and this informant doth verily believe, the said Hellen Clark was the death of his said daughter.

The Examination of Hellen Clark, taken before the said Justices the 11th of April, 1645.

This examinant confesseth, that about six weeks since, the Devill appeared to her in her house, in the likeness of a white dog, and that she calleth that familiar Elimanzer; and that this examinant hath often fed him with milk-pottage; and that the said familiar spake to this examinant audibly, and bade her deny Christ, and shee should never want, which shee did then assent unto, but doth altogether deny the killing of the daughter of the said Edward Parsley.

The Information of Prudence Hart, the wife of Thomas Hart of Lawford, taken upon oath before us the 13 of April, 1645.

This informant saith, that about eight weeks since, being at her parish church, on the Sabbath day, half a mile distant from her house, and being about twenty weeks gone with childe, and to her thinking, very well and healthfull, upon the sudden shee was taken with great pains, and miscarried before shee could be got home; and this examinant saith, that about two moneths since, being in her bed, in the night, something fell down upon her right side, but being dark, she cannot tell in what shape it was; and that presently she was taken lame on that side, with extraordinary pains and burning, but recovered again within a few dayes after; and this informant further saith, that she verily believeth, that Rebecca West, and Anne West her mother, were the cause of her pains; for that the said Rebecca hath in part of her confession expressed, that she had much maliced this informant, because the said Rebecca West ever thought this informant to be her greatest enemy.

This informant saith, That Rebecca West confessed unto him, that about seven yeares since, shee began to have familiaritie with the Devil, by the instigation of her mother Anne Weste; who hath appeared unto the said Rebecca at severall times, in diverse shapes: at one time in the likeness of a proper young man, who desired of her, that he might have the same familiaritie with her, that others that appeared unto her before had had: promising that if shee would, he would then doe for the said Rebecca what she desired, and avenge her on her enemies; but required further, that shee would deny God, and relie upon him. Now there was one Thomas Hart of Lawford, where the said Rebecca lived, with her said mother, Anne West, and the said Rebecca told this informant, that shee required of him, that hee would avenge her on the said Hart by killing his son, who not long after was taken sick, and dyed, whereupon the said Rebecca told this informant, that she conceived hee could do as God; after which time she gave entertainment to him, who lay with her as a man; and the said Rebecca further confessed to this informant, that whilst she lived at Rivenall in the said county of Essex, the said Anne her mother, came to the said Rebecca, and told her the barley corn was picked up (meaning one George Frances (the only son of one George Frances, one of the chief inhabitants of that town, where the said Anne West dwelt) and that his father thought the said George his son was bewitched to death; and the said Anne then said unto the said Rebecca, be it unto him according to his faith.

The Confession of Rebecca West, taken before the said Justices at Mannyn-tree, the 21 of March, 1645.

This examinant saith, that about a moneth since, the aforesaid Anne Leech, Elizabeth Gooding, Hellen Clark, Anne West, and this examinant, met all together at the house of the aforesaid Elizabeth Clark in Mannyn-tree, where they together spent some time in praying unto their familiars, and every one in order went to prayers; afterwards some of them read in a book, the book being Elizabeth Clarks; and this examinant saith, that forthwith their familiars appeared, and every one of them made their severall propositions to those familiars, what every one of them desired to have effected: and this examinant saith, that first of all the said Elizabeth Clark desired of her spirit, that Mr. Edwards might be met withall about the middle bridge, as hee should come riding from Eastheryhoul in Suffolk; that his horse might be scared, and he thrown down, and never rise again: and this examinant saith, that the said Elizabeth Gooding desired of her spirit, that shee might be avenged on Robert Tayler's horse, for that the said Robert suspected the said Elizabeth Gooding for the killing of an horse of the said Robert formerly: and this examinant saith, that the said Hellen Clark desired of her spirit, that shee might be re-revenge on two hogs in Misley street, (being the place where the said Hellen lived) one of the hogs to die presently, and the other to be taken lame; and this examinant further saith, that Anne Leech desired of her spirit, that a cowe might be taken lame of a man living in Mannintree, but the name of the man this examinant cannot remember: and this examinant further saith, that the said Anne West, this examinant's mother, desired of her spirit, that shee might be freed from all her enemies, and have no trouble: and this examinant saith, that shee desired of her spirit, that shee might be revenged on Prudence the wife of Thomas Hart, and that the said Prudence might be taken lame on her right side. And lastly this examinant saith, that having thus done, this examinant, and the other five, did appoint the next meeting to be at the said Elizabeth Goodings house, and so departed all to their owne houses.

This informant saith, that not long since, about three moneths to his best remembrance, as he was coming from Eastberyholt in Suffolke, halfe an houre within evening; within ten score of the middle bridge (according to the desire of the said Elizabeth Clarke, as is declared in the confession of the said Rebecca Weste) this informants horse started with him, and greatly endangered him; and he heard something about his horse cry, Ah, ah; much like the shriek of a polcat. And this informant saith, That with much difficulty he saved himselfe from being thrown off his horse. All which, this informant reported to his wife and neighbours as soone as he came home.

The Information of Matthew Hopkins, Gent. taken upon oath before the said Justices the 18th of April, 1645.

This informant saith, That being lately at Colchester, he went to the castle, where the said Rebecca Weste, with the other five, are secured untill the next gaole delivery: and this informant going to Rebecca Weste, and asking her how shee came first to be a witch, the said Rebecca told this informant, that about a yeare since, or thereabouts, halfe an houre before sun-set, the said Anne Weste (her mother) carried the said Rebecca Weste towards Mannintree, (which is about a small mile from the place where the said Anne dwelt) and the said Rebecca told this informant, that as her mother and shee walked together, the said Anne told the said Rebecca, shee must keepe secret whatsoever shee saw, whither they were then going; and the said Rebecca promised so to doe; and the said Rebecca told this informant, that her mother and shee went to the house of the aforesaid Elizabeth Clarke, where at their comming in they found the aforesaid Anne Leech, widow, Elizabeth Gooding, Hellen Clarke, and the house-keeper Elizabeth Clarke, and that forthwith the Devill appeared to them in the shape of a dogge; afterwards in the shape of two kittyns; then in the shape of two dogges; and that the said familiars did doe homage in the first place to the said Elizabeth Clarke, and skipped up into her lap, and kissed her; and then went and kissed all that were in the roome, except the said Rebecca: and the said Rebecca told this informant, that immediately one of their company asked the said Anne her mother, if shee had acquainted her daughter (the said Rebecca) with the businesse; and her mother answered shee had, and told them all, they need not feare her the said Rebecca for revealing any thing: and the said Rebecca told this informant, that forthwith the said Anne Leech pulled out a booke, and swore the said Rebecca never to reveale any thing shee saw or heard; and if shee should discover any thing, they all told the said Rebecca, shee should endure more torments on earth, then could be in hell: and the said Rebecca told this informant, that shee promised to keepe all their secrets; and moreover they all told her, that shee must never confesse any thing, although the rope were about her necke, and shee ready to be hanged: and that after she had consented to all these things, the Devill came into her lap, and kissed her, and promised to doe for her what she could desire; and that within halfe a yeare after the Devill appeared to her the said Rebecca, as shee was going to bed, and told her, he would marry her, and that shee could not deny him; shee said he kissed her, but was as cold as clay, and married her that night, in this manner; he tooke her by the hand and lead her about the chamber, and promised to be her loving husband till death, and to avenge her of her enemies; and that then shee promised him to be his obedient wife till death, and to deny God, and Christ Jesus; and the said Rebecca told this informant, that shee sent the Devill to kill the sonne of the said Thomas Hart, which he did within one fortnight; and that after that shee tooke him for her God, and thought he could doe as God.

The Information of Susan Sparrow, taken upon oath before the said Justices the 25th day of April, A. D. 1645, at Little Bentley.

This informant saith, That about thirty yeares since, living under the same rooffe with Mary Greenleif of Alresford, either of them had a daughter of about thirteen or fourteen yeares of age, and being one night in bed with their children, this informant heard the childe of the said Mary Greenleif to cry out in a fearefull manner; oh mother, now it comes, it comes, oh helpe mother, it hurts me, it hurts me: whereupon this informant called to the said Mary, and said, good-wife Greenleife, good-wife Greenleife, if your childe be asleepe, awaken it, for if any body comes by, and heare it make such moane (you having an ill name already) they will say you are suckling your impes upon it: whereupon the said Mary replied; I doe so indeed, and I will see with them (meaning her said impes,) that they shall suck my daughter one night, and thine another: and this informant saith, that the very next night, her childe cryed out in the same manner, and clasped her arms about this informants necke, being much affrighted, sweating, and shrieking in a terrible manner, complaining that shee was nipped and pinched on her thigh; and that the next morning searching what the cause should be, shee found above the right knee of her childe, a black and blew spot, as broad and long as her hand: and this informant saith, that her childe did complaine on that leg, at least a moneth after. And this informant saith, that the house where this informant and the said Mary did dwell together, was haunted with a leveret, which did usually sit before the dore: and this informant knowing that one Anthony Sharlock had an excellent greyhound that had killed many hares; and having heard that a childe of the said Anthony was much haunted and troubled, and that the mother of the childe suspected the said Mary to be the cause of it: this informant went to the said Anthony Sharlock and acquainted him, that a leveret did usually come and sit before the dore, where this informant and the said Mary Greenleife lived, and desired the said Anthony to bring downe his greyhound to see if he could kill the said leveret; and the next day the said Anthony did accordingly bring his greyhound, and coursed it, but whether the dog killed it this informant knows not; but being a little before coursed by good-man Merrills dog, the dog ran at it, but the leveret never stirred, and just when the dog came at it, he skipped over it, and turned about and stood still, and looked on it, and shortly after that dog languished and dyed. But whether this was an impe in the shape of a leveret, or had any relation to the said Mary, this informant knows not, but does confesse she wondered very much to see a leveret, wilde by nature, to come so frequently and sit openly before the dore in such a familiar way.

The Information of Elizabeth Hunt and Priscilla Brigs, taken upon oath before the said Justices the 25th day of April, 1645.

These informants say, That being by the said justices employed to search the said Mary Greenleife, upon suspect for being a witch, these informants found that the said Mary had bigges or teates in her secret parts, not like emerods, nor in those places where women use to be troubled with them; and that they verily beleve, these teates are suckled by her impes; for that these informants have been formerly employed to search other women suspected for witchcraft, who have had the like bigges, and have afterwards confessed themselves to be witches.

The Examination of Mary Greenleife, taken before the said Justices, April 25, 1645.

The examinant being asked how she came by those teats which were discovered in her secret parts, she saith she knows not unlesse she were born with them: but she never knew she had any such untill this time, they were found in those parts upon the said search; And she does deny that ever she had any impe sucked on these teats; But she does confesse she hath seen a leveret once sitting before her doore within a yard of the threshold; and that she wondered much at it, being about noon time as she remembreth. And further saith, she is not guilty of any accusation charged upon her this examinant.

The Information of Elizabeth Otley of Wyvenhoe, taken upon oath before the said justices, April 25, 1645.

This informant saith, that Alice Dixon, who now stands committed for a suspected witch, did in the presence of Mary Johnson of the same town, charge and accuse the said Mary Johnson to be the death of this informant's child, saying, that the said Mary Johnson did carry an impe in her pocket to this informant's house, and put the said impe into the house, at an hole in the doore, bidding it go rock the cradle, and do the businesse she sent it about, and return to her again: And this informant saith, that upon a Munday before Michaelmas last, the said Mary Johnson came to the house of this informant, and gave her child an apple, and kissed it; And within a short time after the said child sickned and died; And the said Alice Dixon did also affirm, that the impe which the said Mary Johnson sent to this informant's house, was in shape somewhat like a rat, but without a tayl and eares. And this informant saith, that the said Mary Johnsons answer was, that if she did it, she did it, she could but receive punishment for it. And at the said time the said Mary Johnson said, the said Alice Dixon did the mischief to this informant's child herself. And this informant further saith, that after the said Alice Dixon had made this discovery, she, this informant, was taken with extreme pains in her body, and that during the time of her extremity, the said Mary Johnson did many times come to this informant's house, perswading her, that she was not the death of this informant's child: But this informant could not be satisfied untill she had gotten the blood of the said Mary Johnson; And meeting with her after long scuffling, this informant made the said Mary Johnsons teeth to bleed, and immediately after, this informants extraordinary pains left her, and her stomack came to her, having eat little or nothing a fortnight before, and slept very well the night following, having been restless by reason of her extreme pains all the time aforesaid. And this informant further saith, that the next day after the said Mary Johnson had given this informants child the apple, the child was taken with very violent fits, and in the fits, although the child was but two yeers old, yet this informant could very hardly with all her strength hold it down in the cradle, and so continued untill it died.

The Examination of Mary Johnson, taken before the said Justices the 25 of April, 1645.

This examinant saith, that she is not guilty of any one particular charged upon her in the information of the said Elizabeth Otley touching the killing of the child of the said Elizabeth.

The Information of Joseph Long, Minister of Clacton in the County of Essex, taken before the said Justices April 29, 1645.

This informant saith, that Anne the wife of John Cooper of Clacton aforesaid, being accused for a witch: Confessed unto this informant, that she the said Anne was guilty of the sin of Witchcraft; and that she hath had three black imps suckled on the lower parts of her body; called by the names of Wynowe, Jeso, and Panu: And this informant saith, that the said Anne told him, that once she cursed a colt of one William Cottingams of Clacton aforesaid, and the said colt broke his neck presently after going out of a gate: And the said Anne further confessed unto this informant, that she the said Anne offered to give unto her daughter Sarah Cooper an impe in the likeness of a gray kite, to suck on the said Sarah; which imps name the said Anne called Tom boy: and told the said Sarah, there was a cat for her; And this informant saith, that the said Anne confessed unto him, that she the said Anne about ten years since falling out with Johan the wife of Gregory Rous of Clacton aforesaid; the said Anne Cooper sent one of her imps to kill the daughter of the said Gregory and Johan, named Mary: And this informant saith, that to his own knowledge about the same time the said child was strangely taken sick, and languishing, within a short time died.

This informant doth confirm the information of the said Joseph Longe, and concurs in every particular.

The Information of Roger Hempson, taken upon oath before the said Justices, April 29, 1645.

This informant saith, that Mr. Longe telling Elizabeth Hare, that she was accused by one Mary Smith, for giving of her the said Mary two imps; And that the said Elizabeth Hare, praying to God with her hands upward, that if she were guilty of any such thing, he would shew some example upon her; And this informant saith, that presently after she shaked and quivered, and fell down to the ground backward, and tumbled up and down upon the ground, and hath continued sick ever since.

This informant saith, that about ten moneths since, going from Wivenhoe towards Fingering-hoe, in the county of Essex, by the way Mary Johnson the wife of Nicholas Johnson met with this informant, whom this informant never saw before to her knowledge; And this informant leading her child upon her hand, being about two yeers old, and perfectly well: the said Mary Johnson took occasion of her own accord to commend the said child, saying, it was a pretty child; and stroaked it upon the face, and gave it a peece of bread and butter, and so left this informant. And this informants child did eat a peece of the said bread and butter: and within half a quarter of an houre after, her said child shrieked and cried out it was lame. And this informant carried her child home, and had the advice of one Mr. Dawber a chururgeon, who could find no naturall cause of its lamenesse; and so the said child continued for the space of eight dayes shrieking and tearing it self, and then died.

And further, this informant saith, that immediately after the death of her child, she was taken with extreme pains in her body, some times every day or at least every third day, for the space of seven or eight moneths together, as if she had been to be delivered of a child, but was not with child; and this informant saith, that setting up of broome in an out-house presently after her child was dead, she had the perfect representation of a shape, to her thinking, like the said Mary Johnson, and was struck with a lamenesse in her arms, and such a stiffnesse that three or foure that came to help her, were not able to bow her arms: and this informant continued speechlesse all that day and the night following, and had such a weaknesse in the rest of her limbes, that she was carried into her house by some of her friends, and continued by the space of a fortnight, being before untill this present (as she conceived) in perfect health and strength: and further this informant saith, that she being charged by the constable by vertue of a warrant to give this her information before the said justices against the said Mary Johnson this day; this informants husband called her up in the morning, wishing her to make her ready to go before the said justices; and presently after he gave a great shriek, and said the said Mary Johnson would be his death, and had a great swelling risen up in his breast, and now lies sweating, and in great extremity. And at this very instant a noise was heard in the room where her husband lay like an hornet, and thereupon her husband cried out, It comes, it comes; Now goodwife Johnsons impe is come, now she hath my life: and forthwith a great part of the wall in the said room fell down. And this informant saith, that she doth verily beleieve the said Mary Johnson was the cause of her childs death: and that she is now the cause of her husbands extremity.

The Information of Ric. Carter and Henry Cornwall of Thorp, taken upon oath before the said Justices, April 29, 1645.

These informants say, that being appointed to watch Margaret Moone, after she was accused and apprehended for a witch, the said Margaret going about the room, these informants did see a thing drop from under her coats (as they thought) in the likeness of a rat for bignesse and shape, but of a grayer colour; and presently there was such an extreame offensive stink in the room, that these informants were scarce able to endure to stay in it; and these informants asking the said Margaret what it was that dropped from her, she bids them coop it up and catch it if they could. And this informant Henry Cornwall saith, that the said Margaret did confesse to him that she had twelve imps, and called them by their names; of which he remembers onely these following: Jesus, Jockey, Sandy, Mrit. Elizabeth, and Collyn.

The Information of Will. Dammon, Hen. Cornwall, Bevis Vincent, and Tho. Burles, taken upon oath before the said Justices, April 29, 1645.

These informants say, that upon the 21. day of April last past, they heard Margaret Moone confesse, that she was a witch, and that she had twelve imps, that she had killed a cow of Stephen Cookers, and had two coves more of the said Stephen in handling; that she had killed a cow and a sow of Henry Robertsons. That she was partner with the aforesaid Eliz. Clark of Mannintree, in killing of a child of one Mr. Edwards of Mannintree aforesaid, and spoiling of 3 brewings of beere of the said Mr. Edwards. That she the said Margaret Moon spoiled a batch of bread of one Philip Berrimans; that she was the cause that one Philip Daniels horse broke his neck going down an hill in his wagon. And the said informant saith, that the said M. Moone did freely and voluntarily confesse unto him, without any question being asked, that she was the cause of the death of Johan Cornwall this informants daughter. And this informant saith, that the said Margaret Moone before his child fell sick, sent for this informant to do some work for her, and then she desired to buy an hooke which he carried with him in his hand; and they agreed she should have the said hooke for half a peck of apples: and as this informant went home he did eat one of the said apples, and was presently taken sick with an extreme shaking and pain in all parts of his body; and his informants wife knowing the said Margaret Moone to be a woman of a very bad fame and suspected for a witch, and had formerly been questiond at an Assize for the same, she flung away the apples. And this informant saith, that he continued in great extremity for the space of twelve weeks, and most part of that time deprived of his senses. And at the same time his wife was taken in the same manner, and is not yet perfectly recovered. And lastly this informant saith, that the next day after he had been at the said Margarets house as aforesaid, that his child (which the said Margaret confessed she was the death of) was taken sick with strange fits, and shriekings out,

The Information of Richard Caley of Thorpe, taken upon oath before the said Justices, April 29, 1645.

This informant saith, that being called into the house where Bevis Vincent, and Henry Cornwall were appointed by the neighbours of Thorpe aforesaid to watch Margaret Moone, the said Margaret did confesse before this informant, that she had by witchcraft killed a cow and a sow of one Henry Robertsons. And that one Henry Dorr being then called to write what she should confesse, the said Margaret refused to make any further discovery, before this informant; but fell upon other discourse, saying, that she had been told forty times, that this informant thought in his conscience she was no witch: and that this informant knew that one William Caley his brother let the said Margaret an house about twenty yeers since, and afterwards warned her out of the said house; and that then she went into an house that was built for her by one Thomas Turner, and being also turned out of Turners house, that one Rawbood and his wife gave ten shillings more for the said house, then the said Margaret, and came and dwelt in the said house: But the said Margaret said, they (meaning the said Rawbood and his wife) had as good they had not medled with the house, for they did never thrive after. And this informant saith, that after the said Rawbood had taken the said house, he and his wife were always lame or sick untill they died: and that the wife of the said Rawbood being a very tydy and cleanly woman, sitting upon a block after dinner with another neighbour, a little before it was time to go to church (and as he remembers) upon an Easter day, the said Rawboods wife was on the sudden so filled with lice, that they might have been swept off her cloaths with a stick; and this informant saith he did see them, and that they were long, and lean, and not like other lice. And this informant being asked, whether the said Margaret were at this time sensible, he saith that she spake very plainly and very intelligently, discoursing of some things done long before, her memory serving her very exactly.

The Information of Francis Milles, taken upon oath before the said Justices, April 29, 1645.

This informant saith, that being employed by the neighbours of Thorpe aforesaid, to search Margaret Moone who was suspected for a witch, she found three long teats or bigges in her secret parts, which seemed to have been lately sucked; and that they were not like pyles, for this informant knows well what they are, having been troubled with them herself. And this informant saith, that she asking the said Margaret for her imps, which sucked those teats: she said, if she might have some bread and beere, she would call her said imps; which being given unto her, she put the bread into the beere, and set it against an hole in the wall, and made a circle round about the pot, and then cried, Come Christ, come Christ, come Mounsier, come Mounsier: And no impe appearing, she cried out and said, she had devilish daughters which had carried her impes away in a white bagge, and wished they might be searched, for they were naught: And upon the searching of her daughters, this informant found that two of them had biggs in their privy parts as the said Margaret their mother had.

The Information of Mary Philips, Elizabeth Harris widow, Susan Burles and Philip Turnor, taken upon oath before the said Justices, April 29, 1645.

These informants do all and every of them concur with Frances Milles in her said information, in that particular concerning the teats of the said Margaret Moone, and her two daughters; and the said Mary Philips doth also confirm and concur with that part of the information of the said Frances Milles, touching the pot, the circle, and the calling of the impes by the said Margaret Moone.

And this informant Mary Philips doth also say, that being sent for to search the said Margaret Moone, as she was coming towards Thorp aforesaid, and going over a broad foot bridge, this informant sensibly felt a great blow on her head, which strook her into a ditch up to the neck. And this informant and the said Francis Milles doe both of them say, That as soon as they came into the room where the said Margaret Moone was, she called these two informants, Mannintree rogues (they both dwelling at a town so called), and said, Who a devill sent for you? But I hope I have met with some of you.

The Examination of Margaret Moone, taken before the said Justices, the 29th day of May, 1645.

This examinant being examined to all the particulars charged upon her, in all the aforesaid severall informations, denies every particular.

The Examination of Judith Moone, daughter of the said Margaret Moone, taken before the said Justices, the 29th day of Aprill, 1645.

This examinant (being a single woman, and having such marks of a witch as aforesaid) saith, that about a fortnight before her mother was apprehended for a witch, the said Margaret bid this examinant goe and fetch a bundle of wood, and this examinant told her mother shee would not fetch any wood: Whereupon the said Margaret threatned this examinant, and told her shee had as good have gone for some wood; and that the next night as this examinant lay in her bed, she felt something come into the bed, about her legges, being at that time broad awake, and that shee searched to see what it should be, but could not finde any thing.

VOL. IV.

The Information of Bridget Reynolds, the wife of Edward Reynolds of Ramsey in the said county of Essex, taken upon oath before the said Justices, the 3rd of May, 1645.

This informant saith, That she with some other women, were required to search Sarah Hating the wife of William Hating, Elizabeth Harvy widow, and Marian Hocket widow, who are all suspected for Witchcraft, and upon her said search (being a midwife) found such marks or bigges in their privy parts, that she never saw in other women: for Sarah Hating had foure teats or bigges in those parts, almost an inch long, and as bigge as this informant's little finger: That the said Elizabeth Harvy had three such biggs, and about the said scantling: And that the said Marian Hocket had no such bigges; but was found in the same parts not like other honest women. And this informant further saith, That the said Elizabeth Harvy said (since she was found with the said suspicious marks) unto this informant, That if she were a witch, she was so made by the said Marian Hocket; for that the said Marian brought unto her the said Elizabeth Harvy, three things about the bignesse of mouses, and willed the said Elizabeth to make much of them, for they were pretty things; which the said Elizabeth received: And the said Elizabeth told this informant, that ever since she received those three things which the said Marian delivered unto her, she hath been much torn and troubled in her privy parts, where the said bigges were found. And that the said three things were delivered to her the said Elizabeth about six or seven years since.

The Information of Elizabeth Durden, the wife of Edward Durden, and Mary Philips, taken upon oath before the said Justices, the 3rd day of May, 1645.

These informants do concur in every particular with the said Bridget Reynolds, in her information touching the search of the said Sarah Hating, Elizabeth Harvie, and Marian Hocket: And this informant Elizabeth Durden further saith, that the said Elizabeth Harvie told her, that if shee were a witch, shee was so made by the said Marian Hocket.

The Information of Francis Stock and John Batilly, taken upon oath before the said Justices, May 3rd, 1645.

These informants say, that the said Elizabeth Harvie confessed to them with many teares, that shee had three marks, two before and one behinde (as is already informed by Bridget Reynolds and others), and that the said Marian Hocket made her have the said marks or biggs, by bringing of three things to her the said Elizabeth, and telling her, if shee would receive them, shee should never want so long as she lived; which three things have since made the said marks in her privie parts, and the said Elizabeth told these informants, that the said three things were of a reddish colour, and that since, the said Marian and the said Elizabeth falling out, she the said Elizabeth would have put away and sent home the three things which the said Marian brought to her, and that ever since the said things have tormented her in her bed, in the places aforesaid, as if they had pulled her in pieces.

The second Information of Francis Stock, taken before the said Justices upon oath, May 3d, 1645.

This informant saith, that about five yeers since, being one of the constables of Ramsey aforesaid, hee impressed William Hating, husband to the aforesaid Sarah Hating for a soldier, whereupon the said William threatened this informant very much, and not long after, this informant's wife told him, shee espied a snake lying upon a shelf in this informant's house, about three yards high from the ground, which falling down into the house, shee endeavoured to kill with a spade; and striking at it, the snake suddenly vanished away, and could no where be found: And this informant saith, that presently after his said wife was taken sick with extraordinary fits, pains and burnings all over her body, and within one week dyed: And further this informant saith, that within two or three dayes, after the death of his said wife, hee had a daughter taken sick after a very strange manner, who in all the time of her sickness, cryed out much on the said Sarah, the wife of the said William Hating, saying, that the said Sarah was the cause of her death, and dyed presently after; and that within two or three dayes after the death of his said child, this informant had another child taken sick in the same manner, and within a few dayes dyed also: And lastly, this informant saith, that about three quarters of a yeer after, he had a man-servant, that for some ill language given to him by John Hating, one of the sons of the said William and Sarah Hating, his said servant did beat the said John, and the very next day hee was taken sick, and so continued in a pining and languishing condition, crying out often of the said Sarah, that she had bewitched him, and was the cause of his death, which soon after ensued.

The Information of Francis Stock, and John Felgate, taken upon oath before the said Justices, May 3, 1645.

This informant John Felgate saith, that speaking with one Sarah Barton, the sister of the said Marian Hocket (which said Sarah is now imprisoned in the gaole at Harwich upon suspicion of Witchcraft), who told this informant, that the said Marian had cut off her bigs, whereby she might have been the more suspected to have been a witch, and laid plaisters to those places: And the said Francis and John say, that the said Sarah Barton, told them, that the said Marian had given and delivered unto her the said Sarah three imps, and that the said Marian called them by the names of Littleman, Pretty-man, and Dainty.

The Examination of Marian Hocket, Sarah Hating, and Elizabeth Harvie of Ramsey within the County aforesaid, taken before the said Justices, May 3, 1645.

This examinant, Marian Hocket saith, that shee is not guilty of any of the particulars charged upon her, touching witchcraft, notwithstanding the severall accusations against her.

This examinant, Sarah Hating saith, that shee is not guilty of any particular wherewith shee stands charged in the information of Francis Stock and others.

This examinant, Elizabeth Harvie saith, that about halfe a yeer since, the said Marian Hocket brought three things to her house, two of them being smaller then mouses, and the other somewhat bigger and longer; and that the said Marian told this examinant they were pretty things, and would do her and this examinant good, if shee this examinant would keep them; and that afterwards shee was very much pained in those parts of her body where the said teats or bigs were discovered by the said searchers, as aforesaid.

The information of Robert Turner of St. Osith Carpenter, taken upon oath before the said Justices, May 6, 1645.

This informant saith, that about eight dayes since, his servant was taken sick, shaking and shrieking, and crying out of Rose Hallybread, that shee had bewitched him: And this informant saith that sometimes his said servant, since hee was taken sick, as aforesaid, hath crowed perfectly as a cock; sometimes barked like a dog; sometimes violently groaned beyond the ordinary course of nature; and struggling with such strength (being but a youth), that four or five strong men were not able to hold him down in his bed; and sometimes sung divers and sundry perfect tunes: And that this informant could not perceive his mouth to open, or so much as his lips to stir all the time of his singing.

The Examination of Rose Hallybread, taken before the said Justices, the 6th of May, 1645.

This examinant saith, that about fifteen or sixteen yeers since, there was an imp brought to her house by one Goodwife Hagree, which imp this examinant entertained, fed it with oatmeale, and suckled it on her body, for the space of a yeer and a halfe, or thereabouts, and then lost it: And this examinant further saith, that about half a yeer since, one Joyce Boanes (who is now also accused for Witchcraft), brought to this examinant's house another imp, in the likenesse of a small gray bird, which this examinant received, and carried it to the house of one Thomas Toakley of St. Osyth, and put the said imp into a cranny of the doore of the said Toakley's house, after which time the son of the said Thomas languished, and dyed, crying out of this examinant, that shee was his death: And this examinant further saith, that about eight dayes since, Susan

Cock, Margaret Landish, and Joyce Boanes, (all which stand now suspected for Witchcraft) brought to this examinants house each of them an imp, (in all three) to which this examinant added one of her own imps; and then he said Joyce Boanes carried the said four imps to the house of one Robert Turner, to torment his servant, because he had refused to give unto her this examinant, the said Susan Cocks, Margaret Landish and Joyce Boanes a few chips: And this examinant further saith, that the said Robert Turners servant forthwith fell sick, and oftentimes barked like a dog: And this examinant saith, that she believeth that the said four imps were the cause of his barking and sicknesses.

This examinant saith, that about thirteen yeeres since, shee had two imps which came into the bed to her in the likenesse of mouses, and that they sucked on this examinants body; and that afterwards this examinant employed and sent the said imps to a farm house in St. Osyth, called Cocket-wick, where one Richard Welch then lived, where the said imps killed ten or twelve lambs of the said Richards: And this examinant saith further, that a little while after, shee sent her said two imps to the house of one Thomas Clynych, where they killed a calf, a sheep and a lamb: And this examinant also saith, that shee carried one of her said imps, called Rog, to the house of the said Rose Hallybread; and that her said imp Rug, with three imps of the said Rose Hallybread, Susan Cock, and Margaret Landish, each of them sending one, were carried by this examinant from the house of the said Rose Hallybread, to the house of the said Robert Turner to kill the servant of the said Robert; whereupon his said servant hath oftentimes crowed like a cock, barked like a dogge, sung tunes, and groaned: And this examinant saith, that her said imp made the said servant to barke like a dog; the imp of the said Rose Hallybread enforced him to sing sundry tunes in his great extremity of paines; the imp of the said Susan Cock, compelled him to crow like a cock; and the imp of Margaret Landish made him groan in such an extraordinary manner.

The Examination of Susan Cock, taken before the said Justices the 6th day of May 1645.

This examinee saith, that about three or four yeeres since, one Margery Stoakes, this examinants mother, lying upon her death-bed, and this examinant coming to visit her, shee the said Margery desired this examinant privately to give entertainment to two of her imps, and withall told this examinant, they would do this examinant good; And this examinant saith, that the same night her said mother dyed, the said two imps came to her accordingly, and sucked on her body; And this examinant saith, that one of the said imps was like a mouse, and the name of that was

Susan: that the other was of a yellow colour, about the bigness of a cat; and that the name of that imp was Besse: And this examinant saith, that she employed her said imp called Besse, together with the imps of the said Rose Hallybread, Joyce Boanes, and Margaret Landish, each of them one, to the house of one where the said imps killed ten or twelve sheep of the said John Spalls; John Spalls; and that the cause of this examinants malice was, because she being with child desired to have some curds of the said Spalls wife, which she refused, either to give or sell to this examinant: And further, this examinant saith that about a week since, she, together with Joyce Boanes, Rose Hallybread, and Margaret Landish sent four imps to the house of one Robert Turner, by the said Joyce Boanes to torment his servant, for that the said servant of the said Robert Turner refused to give this examinant a sack full of chips: And this examinant further saith, that she, together with the said Margaret Landish, sent her imp to the house of one Thomas Mannock in St. Osyth aforesaid, where their said imps killed six or seven shoots or hogges of the said Mr. Mannock; and that the occasion of offence was, because the wife of the said Mr. Mannock refused to give to this examinant such relief as she desired, telling this examinant, that shee was a young woman, and able to worke for her living.

The Examination of Margaret Landish, taken before the said Justices the 6th day of May, 1645.

This examinant saith, that about eight or nine weeks since lying sicke by the fire side in her owne house, something came up to her body, and sucked on her privie parts, and much pained and tormented her: And this examinant saith, that if it were an imp that came and sucked her as aforesaid, that the said Susan Cock sent it to her: And this examinant denieth, that ever shee joyned with the said Joyce Boanes, Rose Hallybread, and Susan Cock, in the tormenting of the servant of the said Robert Turner, and doth utterly deny the sending of any imp to destroy or kill the hogges of the said Mr. Mannock, as the said Susan Cock hath charged her withall in the examination of the said Susan.

The Examination of Rebecca Jones of St Osyth, taken before the said Justices the 9th of May, 1645.

This examinant saith, that about 24 or 25 yeeres since, dwelling with one John Bishop, of Much-Clacton in the county of Essex as his servant, there came one morning one to the doore of the said John Bishop and knocked, and that this examinant going to the doore, shee saw there a very handsome young man, as shee then thought but now shee thinkes it was the devill; who asked this examinant how shee did, and desired to see her left wrist, which shee shewed unto him: and that he then tooke a pin from this examinants owne leeve, and pricked her wrist twice, and there came out a drop of blood, which he took off with the top of his finger, and so departed. And this examinant saith that about a quarter of a year after, as shee was going to St. Osyth, (where this examinant doth now dwell) to sell her said masters butter, a man met with her, being in a ragged sute, and having such great eyes, that this examinant was much afraid of him; who came to this examinant and gave her three things like to mouses, having foure feet a piece, but without tayles, and of a black colour, and bid this examinant nurse the said three things, untill he did desire them againe; And this examinant asked the said man, what she should give them to eate, and he told this examinant milke, and that they would not hurt her, and wished her not to be afraid of them: And the said man told this examinant, that those three things which he gave her, would avenge her on her enemies, and bid her murder some, but not too many, and he would forgive her; and then went away from this examinant: And this examinant saith, that the first time she employed any of the said things, shee sent one of them to kill a sowe of one Benjamin Howes of Little-Clacton in the county aforesaid; and the said sowe was killed by the said impe accordingly: And this examinant saith, that the names of her three imps were Margaret, Amie, and Susan: And that a while after, this examinant and one Joyce Boanes, now in prison, did send each of them an impe to kill one Thomas Bumstead of St. Osyth aforesaid, who died about three weekes after. And this examinant saith, that shee beleeveth that the said two imps did kill the said Thomas Bumstead; and the imps name which this examinant sent to destroy the said Bumstead was Margaret: And that the impe which the said Joyce Boanes sent was a dund one like unto a mouse. And this examinant saith, that she did send another of her imps called Amie, to the said Bumsteads house, which did kill the wife of the said Bumstead within a short time after: And this examinant confesseth, that the cause of offence shee tooke so to destroy and kill the said Bumstead and his wife, was because the said Thomas Bumstead did beate the sonne of this examinant for eating up of some honey which he found about the house of the said Thomas Bumstead. And this examinant further confesseth, that shee did send her other third impe called Susan, to afflict the childe of one Mistriss Darcy of St. Osyth aforesaid: But did withall bid the said impe it should not hurt the said child too much, and come away againe: And this examinant saith, that the said imp is come again from the said Mistriss Darcies childe.

The Examination of Johan Cooper, widow, taken before the said Justices, May 9, 1645.

This examinant saith, That she hath been a witch about twenty yeers, and hath three familiars, two like mouses, and the third like a frog; the names of the two like mouses are Jack, and the other Prickeare, and the name of the third, like a frog, is Frog. And this examinant saith, that shee sent one of her said imps to kill a child of one Thomas Woodward, which her said impe did kill a fortnight after. And this examinant saith, that shee did send her said impe called Frog, to kill two of John Cartwright's children, of Much-Holland in the county of Essex aforesaid, which said imp did kill the said two children within a fortnight or three weeks after. And this examinant saith further, that at another time shee sent her said imp Frog, to destroy the wife of one George Parby, of Much-Holland aforesaid, which did kill her within three dayes after.

This examinant saith, That she hath four familiars, which shee had from her mother, about two and twenty yeeres since, and that the names of the said imps are James, Prickeare, Robyn, and Sparrow: and that three of these imps are like mouses, and the fourth like a sparrow, which shee called Sparrow. And this examinant saith, that to whomsoever shee sent the said imp called Sparrow, it killed them presently; and that, first of all, shee sent one of her three imps like mouses, to nip the knee of one Robert Freeman, of Little Clacton in the county of Essex aforesaid, whom the said imp did so lame, that the said Robert dyed on that lamenesse within half a yeere after. And this examinant saith, that she sent her said imp Prickeare to kill the daughter of John Rawlins, of Much-Holland aforesaid, which died accordingly within a short time after; and that shee sent her said imp Prickeare to the house of one John Tillet, which did suddenly kill the said Tillet. And this examinant saith, that shee sent her said imp Sparrow, to kill the childe of one Geore Parby, of Much-Holland aforesaid, which child the said imp did presently kill; and that the offence this examinant took against the said George Parby, to kill his said childe, was, because the wife of the said Parby denied to give this examinant a pint of milke. And this examinant further saith, that she sent her said imp Sparrow to the house of Samuel Ray, which in a very short time did kill the wife of the said Samuel; and that the cause of this examinant's malice against the said woman was, because shee refused to pay to this examinant two pence, which shee challenged to be due to her; and that afterwards her said imp Sparrow killed the said child of the said Samuel Ray. And this examinant confesseth, that as soon as shee had received the said four imps from her said mother, the said imps spake to this examinant, and told her, shee must deny God and Christ, which this examinant did then assent unto.

That a very honest man of Mannintree, whom he knew would not speake an untruth, firmed unto him, that very early one morning, as he passed by the said Anne West's re, about foure a clock, it being a moonlight night, and perceiving her dore to be open early in the morning, looked into the house, and presently there came three or four little things, in the shape of black rabbits, leaping and skipping about him, who, having a good stick in his hand, struck at them, thinking to kill them, but could not; but at last caught one of them in his hand, and holding it by the body of it, he beat the head of it against his shank, intending to beat out the braines of it; but when he could not kill it that way, he took the body of it in one hand, and the head of it in another, and indeavoured to wring off the head: and as he wrung and stretched the neck of it, it came out between his hands like a lock of wooll; yet he would not give over his intended purpose, but knowing of a spring not farre off, he went to drowne it: but still as he went he fell downe, and could not goe, but downe he fell againe, so that he at last crept upon his hands and knees till he came at the water, and holding it fast in his hand, he put his hand downe into the water up to his elbow, and held it under water a good space, till he conceived it was drowned, and then letting goe his hand, it sprung out of the water up into the aire, and so vanished away: and then coming backe to the said Anne West's dore, he saw her standing there in her smock, and asked her, why shee did set her impes to molest and trouble him? to whom she made answer, that they were not sent to trouble him, but were sent out as scouts upon another designe.

ON June 15, 1647, was presented to the parliament a long and bold Remonstrance, entitled A Declaration or Representation from his Excellency sir Thomas Fairfax, and of the Army under his command, Humbly tendered to the Parliament," It contained many com-

* As to Delinquents and Malignants, see Hume and Clarendon as cited in the Notes to pp. 22, 11, of this volume. Oldmixon thus explains these terms: "By Delinquent and Malignant, be language of those times, are to be understood persons who endeavoured to introduce arbitrary power, as well ecclesiastical as civil, and to sacrifice the privileges of parliament, and the rights, properties, and liberties of the people to the king's will and pleasure, and under him to their own." 1 Hist. of England, during the reigns of the Royal House of Stuart, 109.

† "In the House of Commons, which was now the scene of all the action that displeased and incensed the army (for the House of Peers was shrunk into so inconsiderable a number, and their persons not considerable after the death of the earl of Essex, except those who were affected to, or might be disposed by the army) they were wholly guided by Hollis and Stapleton, Lewis and Glynn, who had been very popular and notorious from the beginning, and by Waller and Massey and Brown, who had served in commands in the army, and performed at some times very signal service, and were exceedingly beloved in the city, and two or three others who followed their dictates, and were subservient to their directions. These were all men of parts, interest, and signal courage, and did not only heartily abhor the intentions which they discerned the army to have, and that it was wholly to be disposed according to the designs of Cromwell, but had likewise declared animosities against the persons of the most active and powerful officers; as Hollis had one day, upon a very hot debate in the house, and some rude expressions which fell from Ireton, persuaded him to walk out of the house with him, and then told him, 'that he should presently go over the water and fight with him.' Ireton replying, 'his conscience would not suffer him to fight a duel.' Hollis, in choler, pulled him by the nose; telling him, 'if his conscience would keep him from giving men satisfaction, it should keep him from provoking them.' This affront to the third person of the army, and to a man of the most virulent, malicious, and revengeful nature of all the pack, so incensed the whole party, that they were resolved one way or other to be rid of him, who had that power in the plaints and required among other things,

 'First, That the houses may be speedily purged
 ' of such members as for their delinquency, or
 ' for corruptions, or abuse to the state, or undue ' elections, ought not to sit there: Where-
 ' of the late elections in Cornwall, Wales, and ' other parts of the kingdom, afford too many ' Examples, to the great prejudice of the peo' ple's freedoms in the said Elections. Secondly,
 ' That those persons who have in the ' unjust and high proceedings against the army

 ' appeared to have the will and confidence
 ' credit and power, to abuse the parliament
 ' and the army, and endanger the kingdom ' carrying on such things against us (whole ' army,) may be some way speedily disabled
 ' from doing the like, or worse to us, when dis' banded and dispersed, and in the condition of ' private men, or to other the free-born people
 ' of England, in the same condition with me house, and that reputation abroad, that when he could not absolutely controul their designs, he did so obstruct them, that they could not advance to any conclusion.—They resorted therefore to an expedient, which, they had observed, by the conduct of those very men against whom they meant to apply it, had brought to pass all that they desired; and, in the council of officers, prepared an impeachment of high treason in general terms against Mr. Hollis, and the persons mentioned before, and others, to the number of eleven members of the house of commons. This impeachment twelve officers of the army, colonels, lieutenant colonels, majors, and captains, presented to the house; and within few days after, when they saw the same members still inveigh against and arraign their proceedings, the general and officers writ a letter to the house, ' that they ' would appoint fit persons on their and the ' kingdom's behalf, to make good the charge ' against those members whom they had ac' cused; and that they desired, that those mem' bers impeached might be forthwith suspended ' from sitting in the house; since it could not ' be thought fit that the same persons who had

 ' so much injured and provoked the army,
 ' should sit judges of their own actions.' This was an arrow that the house of commons did not expect would have been shot out of that quiver; and though they were unspeakably dismayed, and distracted with this presumption, they answered positively, ' that they nei' ther would, nor could, sequester those mem' bers from the house, who had never said, or
 ' done any thing in the house worthy of cen' sure, till proof were made of such particulars
 ' as might render them guilty.' But the officers of the army replied, ' that they could ' prove them guilty of such practices in the ' house, that it would be just in the house to ' suspend them: that by the laws of the land,
 ' and the precedents of parliament, the lords
 ' had, upon the very presentation of a general
 ' accusation without being reduced in form,
 ' sequestered from their house and committed
 ' the earl of Strafford, and the archbishop of ' Canterbury; and therefore they must press,
 ' and insist upon the suspending at least of those ' accused members from being present in the ' house, where they stood impeached; and ' without this, they said, the army would not ' be satisfied.' However the house of commons seemed still resolute, the accused members themselves, who best knew their temper, thought it safer for them to retire, and by forbearing to appear in the house, to allay the heat of the present contest.—Upon this so palpable declension of spirit in the house, the army seemed much quieter, and resolved to let other agents on their work, that they might not appear too busy and active upon their own concernment. It is very true that the army, upon whose influence the parliament much depended, appeared now entirely Presbyterian;

 the court of aldermen, and common council, consisted chiefly of men of that spirit; the mu-litia of the city was committed to commissioners carefully and factiously chosen of that party; all those of another temper having been put out of those trusts, at or about the time that the king was delivered up by the Scots, when the officers of the army were content that the Presbyterians should believe, that the whole power of the kingdom was in them; and that they might settle what government they pleased.
 If there remained any persons in any of those employments in the city, it was by their dissimulation, and pretending to have other affections; most of those who were notorious to be of any other faction in religion, had been put out; and lived as neglected and discountenanced men; who seemed rather to depend upon the clemency, and indulgence of the state, for their particular liberty in the exercise of that religion they adhered to, than to have any hope or ambition to be again admitted into any share, or part in the government: yet, after all this dissimulation, Cromwell and Ireton well knew, that the multitude of inferior people were at their disposal, and would appear in any conjuncture they should think convenient; and that many aldermen and substantial citizens were quiet, and appeared not to contradict or oppose the Presbyterians, only by their directions; and would be ready upon their call. And now, when they saw those leading men, who had governed the parliament, prosecuted by the army, and that they forbore to come to the house, there flocked together great numbers of the lowest, and most inferior people, to the parliament, with petitions of several natures, both with reference to religion, and to the civil government; with the noise and clamour whereof, the parliament was so offended and disturbed, that they made an Ordinance, ' that it should be criminal to gather,
 ' and solicit the subscriptions of hands to peti' tions.' But this order so offended all parties and that for that purpose the same persons may not continue in the same power, especially as our and the kingdoms judges in the highest trust, but may be made incapable hereof for the future."—It then proceeded; And if it be questioned who these are, we thought not fit particularly to name them in this our representation unto you, but shall very speedily give in their names, and before long, shall offer what we have to say against them to your commissioners, wherein we hope so to carry ourselves, as that the world shall see we aim at nothing of private revenge or animosities, but that justice may have a free course, and the kingdom be eased and secured by disabling such men, at least, from places of judicature, who desiring to advantage and set up themselves and their party, in a general confusion have endeavoured to put the kingdom into a new flame of war, than which nothing is more abhorring to us."

On June 24th, was read in the House of Commons, "An Humble Remonstrance from His Excellency sir Thomas Fairfax, and the Army under his Command, concerning the present state of Affairs, in relation to themselves and the Kingdom; with their Desires and present Resolutions thereupon." This Remonstrance is at large in 6 Rushworth Collections, p. 585, and 3 Cobbett's Parliamentary History, p. 640. The following are the material contents of it relating to this Case.

"Our Desires, as soldiers, in behalf of ourselves and other soldiers that have faithfully served the parliament in this kingdom, as also our remaining dissatisfactions in relation thereto, may be clearly collected out of our several Papers that have been formerly presented to the parliament concerning the same; to which particulars we have not yet received any further satisfaction.—In our last Representation it may appear what our desires are as members of the common-wealth, in behalf of ourselves and all others, for the clearing, settling, and securing of the rights, liberties, and peace of the kingdom, for the justness, reasonableness, necessity, and common concernment whereof unto all, we dare appeal to the whole kingdom, and the world; yet we have hitherto received no answer thereunto, nor can bear of no consideration taken thereupon, to put the things contained therein into any way of resolution or dispatch.—We have since that, in pursuance of the first and second Heads of our Desires in the said Representation, delivered in a Charge against divers Members of the House of Commons, for divers Designs and Practices to the abuse and dishonour of the parliament, the insufferable injury of the Army, the infringement of the rights and liberties both of soldiers and subjects, the breach or hazard of the peace of this kingdom, and the hindering of the relief of Ireland, &c. Upon which, though the main things charged, with the mischievous designs, and further dangerous consequences of them; as also the constant and continued activity of all or most of the persons charged in relation to those things, be for the most part sufficiently and notoriously known, especially to the parliament itself; yet we find neither any thing done, upon what is so known, nor any way resolved on, or admitted by the parliament, for the examination or discovery of what is less evident unto them; But rather, as if neither the things charged, nor the present sad effects, nor future ill consequences thereof were at all considerable, the whole business seems to be slighted, past over, or set aside.

"Now whereas we find that our first Desire in the paper, for the present suspending the persons impeached from sitting in the house, is judged by some to be against the course and privilege of Parliament, or of ill consequence in the precedent of it, the Charge being but general, and no particular Proof as yet produced to render the proceedings legal, we cannot but remind the parliament,

1. "That as the most and many things charged, with the sad effects and consequences of them, so the constant and continued activity of all or most of the persons charged in relation thereto, in misinforming, deluding, abusing, or surprising the house, and otherwise, are sufficiently known to the parliament itself, so as the house might upon their past and present cognizance of the same, most justly proceed to suspend them, as in many other cases upon far less occasions, (which never could have produced such sad effects to the kingdom) they have done many other of their members, merely for words spoken, or things moved in the house, alledged to be but against order or custom of the house, and this without any Trial, Proof, or Charge, but merely upon the houses own Cognizance of the things, as we could instance in many Cases since the Parliament began.

2 "Whereas many of the things to which the Charge relates, are things spoke, moved, or done in the house, so as we have yet no clear way opened, particularly to charge or mention them, or to produce proofs to them without some pretence against us of breach of privilege; and therefore, though we think no privilege ought to protect evil men in doing wrong to particulars, or mischief to the public, yet, we have been hitherto so tender of parliament privileges, as that we have only remonstrated the evil of such things done; and supposing the house to have been, as we did and do believe, and if the way were open, without breach of privilege, should not doubt to prove it was, someways misinformed, deluded, surprised, or otherwise abused, in those things by evil members we have frequently, in former papers, before the Charge, put the parliament upon it, (who without colour of breach of privilege might do it) to find out and discover who they were that had so abused them, and to disengage the honour of parliaments from the evil practice and designs of such incendiaries.

"Now since the same difficulties or preju-

general Cromwel, commissary-general Ireton, col. Fleetwood, col. Rainsborow, col. Harrison, col. sir Hardress Waller, col. Rich, col. Lambert, col. Hammond, and major Rainsborow, to treat and debate with the Commissioners of Parliament, upon the Papers and Desires sent from the Army to the Parliament, and the Votes sent to the Army, according to the order of both houses, of the 26th of June, 1647. And the other Letter was in Answer to the Vote of the house on Tuesday last, that a particular Charge should be delivered into the house against the Eleven Members by this day: the General returning this Answer thereunto, "That as he finds a great willingness in his Council of War, to answer the expectation of the House in all things, so in this particular, but the things being of that importance to the kingdom, and the persons charged so many in number, hath taken up more time than was expected; and therefore desire that it may be respited until Tuesday next, at which time they will not fail to bring it in; and that the kingdom shall then see they have not impeached the gentlemen out of any private respects, but in affection and duty to the public."

July 6. This day the Particular Charge against the Eleven Members, was brought to the House of Commons, by col. Scroop, col. Okey, col. Hewson, col. Pride, lieutenant. col. Bowen, lieutenant. col. Goffe, major Rainsborough, captains Berry, Clerke, Carter, Ralph, Saxby, and Mr. Gettings, who attended at the Commons door, and the House having notice thereof, they were called in; col. Scroop spake to this effect. "That by the appointment of the General and Army under his command, and in their names, they were to present a Particular Charge or Impeachment against the Eleven Members." Which being done, and they desired to withdraw, the Members impeached were sent for in, and the Charge read in the house, but the day being far spent, the debate thereupon was put off till Thursday next; at which time the Officers of the Army were to attend, and receive an Answer from the house. The following is a copy of the said Articles:

"A particular CHARGE or IMPEACHMENT, in the Name of his Excellency sir Tho. Fairfax, and the Army under his Command, against Denzil Hollis, esq. sir Philip Stapleton, sir Wm. Lewis, sir John Clotworthy, sir Wm. Waller, sir John Maynard, knights, major-general Massey, John Glynn, esq. recorder of London, Walter Long, esq. col. Edw. Harley, and Anth. Nicholl, esq. Members of the House of Commons.

"Whereas on the 15th day of June last, the Heads of a Charge were delivered, in the name of the said Army, unto the Commissioners of Parliament, to be sent up to the Parliament against the persons above-named:

now, in prosecution and maintenance thereof, and according to the power thereby reserved, it is, in the name of the said Army, more particularly charged against the said persons as followeth:

I. That the said Mr. Denzil Hollis, during the late war, in prosecution of the evil designs expressed in the general heads or Articles formerly exhibited, contrary to the trust reposed in him, contrary to his oath taken in June 1643, and contrary to the Ordinance of parliament, dated in Oct. 1643, hath assisted the king in the late unnatural war, and held correspondence and intelligence with the enemy against the parliament, in manner following, viz. He, being one of the special commissioners for the parliament, to present Propositions of both houses to the king at Oxford, did privately, and contrary to his Instructions, at several times, make his addresses unto the king's party there, then in arms against the parliament, namely, to the earl of Lindsey, the earl of Southampton, the lord Saville and others; and did secretly plot and advise with them against the parliament; and did intimate unto them, or one of them, that the said Propositions, then sent unto his majesty by the parliament, were unreasonable: and being demanded what Answer he would advise the king to make to the said Propositions, he did advise that the king should demand a Treaty however, and then declare how unreasonable the Propositions were; and that yet, for the peace of the kingdom, his majesty would treat upon them; but withal wished the Treaty might be in London, whither the king himself should come upon security: Adding, That there was nothing in the world that the violent party (meaning the well-affected party to the parliament against the enemy) did so much fear as his majesty's coming to London, which would be a certain dissolution of their authority and power: and the said Mr. Hollis bad those said persons, or one of them, assure the king, That if his majesty knew as much as he knew, his majesty would take his horse and be at London the next day, or words to that effect. —And it being again demanded, Whether (if the king should be willing to come) it would be accepted of? He thereto answered, That certainly it would be much opposed, but yet he was confident, that he and his party (meaning some of the members above-named, and others) should carry it, and wished the king to put it upon that trial. And the said Mr. Hollis was desired by the earl of Lindsey, earl of Southampton, and lord Saville, or one of them, that he would be pleased to draw such an Answer in writing to the said Propositions, as he desired the king should send; and the said earl of Southampton, who was that night to lie in the king's bed-chamber, would persuade the king to condescend unto it; and thereupon he withdrew, and, either the same day or the next, accordingly carried unto the said lords, or one of them, a Paper ready written; which, as he said, was such an Answer to the said

Propositions as he had drawn for the king to send to the Parliament; which was taken by the said lords, or one of them, and carried to the king to be considered of; and so much thereof as advised the king's coming to London was laid by, the king fearing to adventure himself, but the rest of the said Paper the lord Digby (who wrote the king's Answer to the Propositions) made use of, in the same words as Mr. Hollis had set down; who, to ingratiate himself with the king's party, did, about the same time, revile the well-affected members of the house of commons, declaring unto the king's party at Oxford, or some of them, that those well-affected Members (which, to render them the more odious as he conceived, he named the violent Independent Party) had ill intentions, and great averseness to peace; and that nothing would be more pleasing to them than for the king to refuse the Propositions, how unreasonable soever the same were: and he also then said, That the Commissioners of Scotland were very weary of that violent party; and that they, being desperate to establish their Presbytery here as in Scotland, made their addresses to him and his party. All which tended to the protracting of the said late war, and to the hindrance of an happy peace.—And the said Mr. Hollis did also, after that, receive from the earl of Lindsey, at Oxford, a Letter written in white ink, concerning some secret design; and kept it from the knowledge of the house from February till about July after, when it was discovered by him that brought it; but the Letter itself was by Mr. Hollis, after he had read it, burnt; and the earl of Lindsey moved the king for a pass for Mr. Hollis to go to Oxford; but the king refused to grant it, saying, That Hollis did him better service in the parliament than he could do him at Oxford.

II. That the said Mr. Hollis and sir P. Stapylton, during the said late wars, when the earl of Lindsey went from the Tower of London to Oxford, sent several messages of intelligence to the earl of Dorset and lord Digby; thereby assuring them, that they did better service for the king here in parliament than they could do him if they were at Oxford; and sir P. Stapylton desired that the earl of Dorset would preserve him and his friends in the good opinion of the party at Oxford, which was then the king's garrison, and he would do as much for his lordship and his friends here with the parliament.—And the said Mr. Hollis and sir P. Stapylton, the more to ingratiate themselves into the favour of the enemy, did, of their own accord, without any direction of the parliament, draw up other Propositions than those mentioned in the preceding Articles, which they affirmed were, in their judgments, fit for the king to grant, and for the parliament to desire; and being so drawn up, sent them privately to his majesty, without any authority of parliament to warrant the same.

III. That the said Mr. Hollis, sir P. Stapylton, sir Wm. Lewis, sir J. Clotworthy, sir

Wm. Waller, sir John Maynard, major-general Massie, Mr. Glyn, Mr. Long, colonel Edward Harley, and A. Nicholl, in March, April, May, and June last past, and at other times, in prosecution of the evil designs in the several general Heads mentioned, have frequently assembled and met together at the lady Carlisle's lodgings in Whitehall, and in other places, with divers other persons disaffected to the state, (without any authority of parliament) for holding correspondence with the queen of England now in France, and her participants; with an intent, by such secret and clandestine Treaties amongst themselves, to put conditions upon the parliament, and to bring in the king upon their own terms; and having a great power upon the treasure of this kingdom, have therewith maintained and encouraged, by pensions and otherwise, the queen's party in France, thereby to beget a second and more bloody war in this kingdom: and they, or some, or one of them, assured the queen of 40,000*l.* per annum, if she would assist them in their design; and that they would do more for the king than the army would do; and that they would find out some means to destroy the army and their friends.

IV. That in further pursuance of the same evil designs, the said Mr. Hollis, sir P. Stapylton, sir Wm. Lewis, sir J. Clotworthy, sir Wm. Waller, and major-gen. Massie, by the combination aforesaid, within three months last past, without any authority of parliament, invited the Scots and other foreign forces to come into this kingdom in a hostile manner, to abet and assist them in the prosecuting and effecting of their said designs.—And the said Mr. Hollis very lately sent to the said queen of England, then and still in France, advising her, among other things, speedily to send the Prince into Scotland, to march into this kingdom at the head of an army; and did send a special messenger to her for such ends and purposes.—And the said Mr. Hollis, sir P. Stapylton, sir Wm. Lewis, sir J. Clotworthy, sir Wm. Waller, sir J. Maynard, Mr. Glynne, major-gen. Massie, Mr. Long, col. Edw. Harley, and A. Nicholl, have under-hand, of their own accord, without authority of parliament, listed, or caused or procured to be listed, divers commanders and soldiers, endeavouring thereby to levy and raise a new war in this kingdom, to protect themselves in their unjust oppressions and factious designs; and have, at several times within two months last past, invited, encouraged, abetted, and counselled multitudes of Reformed officers and soldiers, and other rude persons, tumultuously and violently to gather together at Westminster, to affright and assault the members of parliament in their passage to and from the house; to offer violence to the house itself, by locking the door thereof upon them, and so imprisoning them; and, by such violences, outrages, and threats, to awe and enforce the parliament.

V. That the said Mr. Hollis, sir P. Stapylton, and Mr. Glynne, have been, and are, obstruc-

general Cromwel, commissary-general Ireton, col. Fleetwood, col. Rainsborow, col. Harrison, col. sir Hardress Waller, col. Rich, col. Lambert, col. Hammond, and major Rainsborow, to treat and debate with the Commissioners of Parliament, upon the Papers and Desires sent from the Army to the Parliament, and the Votes sent to the Army, according to the order of both houses, of the 26th of June, 1647. And the other Letter was in Answer to the Vote of the house on Tuesday last, that a particular Charge should be delivered into the house against the Eleven Members by this day: the General returning this Answer thereunto, "That as he finds a great willingness in his Council of War, to answer the expectation of the House in all things, so in this particular, but the things being of that importance to the kingdom, and the persons charged so many in number, hath taken up more time than was expected; and therefore desire that it may be respite until Tuesday next, at which time they will not fail to bring it in; and that the kingdom shall then see they have not impeached the gentlemen out of any private respects, but in affection and duty to the public."

The Charge against the ELEVEN MEMBERS

July 6. This day the Particular Charge against the Eleven Members, was brought to the House of Commons, by col. Scroop, col. Okey, col. Hewson, col. Pride, lieutenant. col. Bowen, lieutenant. col. Members of the House of Commons.

"Whereas on the 15th day of June last, the Heads of a Charge were delivered, in the name of the said Army, unto the Commissioners of Parliament, to be sent up to the Parliament against the persons above-named:

now, in prosecution and maintenance thereof, and according to the power thereby reserved, it is, in the name of the said Army, more particularly charged against the said persons as followeth:

II. That the said Mr. Hollis and sir P. III. That the said Mr. Hollis, sir P. Stapylton, sir Wm. Lewis, sir J. Clotworthy, sir

Wm. Waller, sir John Maynard, major-general Massie, Mr. Glynn, Mr. Long, colonel Edward Harley, and A. Nicholl, in March, April, May, and June last past, and at other times, in prosecution of the evil designs in the several general Heads mentioned, have frequently assembled and met together at the lady Carlisle's lodgings in Whitehall, and in other places, with divers other persons disaffected to the state, (without any authority of parliament) for holding correspondence with the queen of England now in France, and her participants; with an intent, by such secret and clandestine Treaties amongst themselves, to put conditions upon the parliament, and to bring in the king upon their own terms; and having a great power upon the treasure of this kingdom, have therewith maintained and encouraged, by pensions and otherwise, the queen's party in France, thereby to beget a second and more bloody war in this kingdom: and they, or some, or one of them, assured the queen of 40,000*l.* per annum, if she would assist them in their design; and that they would do more for the king than the army would do; and that they would find out some means to destroy the army and their friends.

IV. That in further pursuance of the same evil designs, the said Mr. Hollis, sir P. Stapylton, sir Wm. Lewis, sir J. Clotworthy, sir Wm. Waller, and major-gen. Massie, by the combination aforesaid, within three months last past, without any authority of parliament, invited the Scots and other foreign forces to come into this kingdom in a hostile manner, to abet and assist them in the prosecuting and effecting of their said designs.—And the said Mr. Hollis very lately sent to the said queen of England, then and still in France, advising her, among other things, speedily to send the Prince into Scotland, to march into this kingdom at the head of an army; and did send a special messenger to her for such ends and purposes.—And the said Mr. Hollis, sir P. Stapylton, sir Wm. Lewis, sir J. Clotworthy, sir Wm. Waller, sir J. Maynard, Mr. Glynn, major-gen. Massie, Mr. Long, col. Edw. Harley, and A. Nicholl, have under-hand, of their own accord, without authority of parliament, listed, or caused or procured to be listed, divers commanders and soldiers, endeavouring thereby to levy and raise a new war in this kingdom, to protect themselves in their unjust oppressions and factious designs; and have, at several times within two months last past, invited, encouraged, abetted, and counselled multitudes of Reformado officers and soldiers, and other rude persons, tumultuously and violently to gather together at Westminster, to affright and assault the members of parliament in their passage to and from the house; to offer violence to the house itself, by locking the door thereof upon them, and so imprisoning them; and, by such violence, outrages, and threats, to awe and enforce the parliament.

V. That the said Mr. Hollis, sir P. Stapylton, and Mr. Glynn, have been, and are, obstruc-ters and prejudgers of several Petitions to the parliament for Redress of public Grievances. And the said Mr. Hollis and sir P. Stapylton, in May last past, did abuse and affront divers petitioners, who, in a peaceable manner, then attended the committee, whereof col. Lee was chairman; not only reviling and reproaching them, but violently haling and boisterously assaulting them, and offered to draw their swords upon major Tuleday and others of the said petitioners; and without any power or authority, committed Nicholas Tew, one of the said petitioners; and, soon afterwards, by the procurement of Mr. Hollis and sir P. Stapylton, and upon their misinformation to the house, the said major Tuleday and Nicholas Tew were imprisoned, not being permitted to speak for themselves. And Mr. Glynn, about three months since, caused the said Tew to be imprisoned in Newgate, and to be detained a long time there, for no other cause but for having a Petition about him which was to be presented to the house.

VI. That the said sir J. Clotworthy, sir W. Waller, and major-gen. Massie, have lately, in prosecution of the said designs, in the said general Heads mentioned, (against the known laws of this realm, and rules and articles of war made by the parliament) by an arbitrary power imprisoned some members of the Army without any authority; particularly ensign Nichols, whose pockets they, without authority, caused to be searched, and several Papers to be taken from him, contrary to the liberty of every subject; and caused him to be sent a prisoner from the head-quarters to London, without the authority or privity of the general, or the chief officers of the army commanding in his absence.

VII. That in or about March last, there being a Petition intended from the officers and Soldiers of the Army to their General, for such things only as were justly due unto them, and concerning them merely as soldiers, the said sir Wm. Waller, sir J. Clotworthy, and col. Edw. Harley, a member of the army, having gotten into their hands a copy of the said Petition, by combination with the other members above-mentioned, and with an intent to abuse the parliament into prejudices and jealousies against the proceedings of the Army concerning the said Petition, (they well knowing that the said Army stood in their way, and hindered them from bringing to pass the designs in the said general Charge expressed) did untruly and maliciously inform the house, That the said Petition was contrived and promoted to debauch and disoblige the Army from the parliament; and that it was managed and carried on by divers principal officers in the Army; that orders were given out for reading of it in the head of every regiment, and whosoever would not subscribe it should be put out of the musters, and cashiered the Army; and, by those and other aggravations, did represent it to the house as a design against the parliament; further adding, That some regiments, which were remote, were sent for to join with the rest of the Army for that purpose; by which misinformation they did, the same day, procure a peremptory order to the general to suppress the said Petition.

VIII. That, some few days after, col. Ed. Harley, by the combination aforesaid, and in pursuance of the same designs, did produce to the house a letter, supposed to be written from within the quarters of the army to him, by a person not named; whereby it was informed, That col. Harley's lieutenant-col. had drawn his regiment to a rendezvous, and had caused the said Petition to be read at the head of it; and that he threatened to cashier and put out of the musters all that would not subscribe it; and that the design of the Army therein was to enslave the parliament and kingdom, if the parliament proceeded not to some high resolutions, or to that effect, as by the said letter, relation being thereunto had, may appear. And although the substance of the said letter was most untrue, and no author thereof appeared, nor could be produced, although a committee was appointed for examination thereof, and it was much pressed the author should be discovered; yet the said col. Harley, sir J. Clotworthy, and sir Wm. Waller did so avow the reality of the said letter, and that the contents thereof would be made good, as that the eby, and by other false suggestions of theirs against the army, they procured the house (upon long debate, which held till about eight at night) to order, That a committee of five members, whereof the said Mr. Hollis was one, should prepare a declaration to be brought into the house the next morning, signifying the house's dislike of the proceedings of the army upon that petition, as by the said order, dated the 30th of March last, may appear; upon which settling of the said business for that night, most of the members departed, as conceiving nothing would be done thereupon till the next day, and that then they might have a free debate concerning the same; but the house still continuing to sit upon dispatch of some letters formerly ordered, the said Mr. Hollis, by the same combination, and in further prosecution of the said evil designs, having of himself, without the committee, prepared a declaration against the petition itself, contrary to the intention and direction of the said order, and contrary to the rules of justice and usual course of parliament, did, the same night, about ten of the clock, on purpose to surprise the house, present the same declaration to the house, whereby the said petitioners were, without being heard, declared enemies to the state, and obstructers of the relief of Ireland, if they still persisted therein, as by the same declaration, whereto relation being had, may appear; and did procure it to be then passed accordingly, to the great dishonour of the parliament and their proceedings; to the insufferable injury, the just provocation, discouragement, and discontent of the army; to the trouble and danger of the whole kingdom; to the hindering of the relief of Ireland, and other the evil consequences in the said general charge expressed.

IX. That by the same and the like false informations and suggestions, the said col. Harley, then a member of the anny, sir J. Clotworthy, sir Wm. Waller, and the said other persons, did, shortly after the said declaration so made as aforesaid, procure divers eminent and faithful officers of the army, namely, lieutenant. gen. Hammond, col. Hammond, col. Lilburne, lieutenant. col. Pride, and others, to be sent for from their charges in the army, to appear at the bar of the house, to make answer in relation to the said petition; against whom, when they came thither, they could charge or prove nothing at all; insomuch as the house thought fit immediately to discharge them. And whereas there was a committee appointed to examine and consider of the truth or falsehood of them, and the said members informing were appointed to produce their proofs and evidence to the same before the committee; though they have since then been often urged, called upon, and demanded to produce their proofs and evidence thereto, if they had any, and have been plainly told, That if they did not proceed effectually to do it, they should be accounted the authors and devisers of the said falsehood, and reparation would accordingly be demanded against them; yet they have not to this day produced any proofs or evidence to any of the said informations or suggestions, whereby the parliament and the army were so much abused as before is declared; nor could they, or any of them, be hitherto persuaded to give into the said committee any charge against the said officers of the army, which they had then or since procured to be sent for as aforesaid; but have held divers of them in a long and chargeable attendance upon the house, without any thing laid to their charge, until the house was pleased to discharge them.

X. That the said Mr. Hollis, sir P. Stapylton, sir Wm. Lewis, sir Wm. Waller, sir J. Clotworthy, and major-general Massie, in further pursuance of the designs mentioned in the general heads charged against them, have been great instruments in the obstructing the relief of Ireland, and, within two months last past, did untruly inform the house, That, by their procurement, there were fifty companies of foot and ten troops of horse of this army engaged for Ireland, upon the terms and under the conduct then by the parliament propounded; and, the more to delude the parliament therein, they, or some of them, by the combination aforesaid, did procure divers officers then in this army, namely, col. Butler, lieutenant. col. Jackson, major Gooday, and others, to let the said members give in the said officers' names, as listing themselves for Ireland on the said terms and conduct propounded; when as those officers did at the same time declare themselves unwilling thereunto, and resolved not to go to serve in Ireland on any terms whatsoever, though they the said members under hand assured them, That though they made use of their names, yet they should not go for the service.—They have likewise untruly informed the house, and given in the names of many considerable officers of this army, namely, capt. Pennyfather and capt. Burges, of col. Butler's regiment, capt. Clarke, and four or more commission officers of sir Hardress Waller's regiment, and others, as having been subscribed for Ireland, who did not so engage or subscribe, nor give any consent thereunto; but did then, and have ever since, utterly disavowed and denied the same.—And about the same time they also reported to the house the name and offer of lieutenant. col. Farrington, as being then lieutenant-colonel of this army, and engaging for himself and his regiment for Ireland; whereas the said Farrington had been cashiered the army a year and a half before. By which, and other their untrue informations and reports of that nature, the parliament was abused and misled into a conceit and confidence of a strength out of the army, then supposed to be engaged and ready for Ireland, on their own terms; when as, in truth, the same was but a mere delusion, and which was so contrived on purpose to occasion a slighting and neglecting of the army, as supposing no further use for them.

XI. Whereas part of three regiments of foot, viz. col. Herbert's, col. Kemp's and col. Graye's, were, by order of the house, advanced towards the relief of Ireland, as far as Bromesgrove, in the county of Worcester; the said sir P. Stapylton, Mr. Hollis, sir J. Clotworthy, sir Wm. Lewis, maj. gen. Massie, sir Wm. Waller, and Mr. Glynne, by combination aforesaid, did, of their own accord, without the knowledge or direction of the house, on the 6th of June last, (being Sabbath-day, and without summoning a committee) command those forces back again as far as Reading, with an evil intent to draw forces together to beget a new war in England.

XII. That the said sir J. Clotworthy, in prosecution of the designs in the said general charge expressed, hath, in the years 1642, 1643, 1644, and since, converted several great sums of money (which, by several orders of parliament, and of the Irish committee, were designed for the relief of Ireland, to his own particular use, namely, the sum of 280*l.* which, by order of both houses, dated 11th of Feb. 1642, was to be paid for 20 butts of sack for Ireland; 700*l.* which the same day was also ordered for 2,000 swords; 300*l.* which by order of the said Irish committee, dated the 5th of April 1643, was designed for 120 pair of pistols; and divers other sums of money, upon several Orders, which he, from time to time, received for the use and relief of Ireland; but were not employed to the uses by the said orders intended and directed, but to his own private use as aforesaid; and that he hath, within two years last past, received several sums of money, arms, and other provisions for a troop of horse, which he pretended he had raised in Ireland; whereas he had not, nor did raise or furnish any such troop as he pretended. And that he, for Money and other rewards, hath preferred John Davis, William Summers, and others, to be intrusted with the Irish affairs, who have kept correspondence with the enemy, and have defrauded the state of other great sums of money; and he hath been privy to, and a sharer in, such their actions.

XIII. That, about November last past, the said sir J. Clotworthy being, by the parliament, sent a commissioner, with others, into Ireland, who all had a joint power and authority to treat with the earl of Ormond for the space of four days, and no more; he, contrary to the special trust reposed in him, held secret intelligence with the said earl, by cypher or character, without the consent or knowledge of those others in commission with him, many weeks after the time so limited was expired; and about the same time he held the like secret intelligence with the lord George Digby, then in Ireland, beyond the time prefixed, and without the consent of the said other commissioners; and, in order thereunto, the lords Ormond and Digby lately employed one Slingsby, who pretends a design about the Prince, to come into this kingdom.

XIV. That the said sir J. Clotworthy, Mr. Hollis, and sir P. Stapylton, by combination with the rest of the members before-named, in further prosecution of the designs mentioned in the same, well knowing that the lord Lisle, late president of Ireland, was both faithful and vigilant while he was trusted in the same kingdom, and had now this last spring made provisions ready to march into the field; and that the lord baron of Broghill, general of the parliament's horse in Munster, and col. sir Arthur Loftus, persons of honour and reputation, and of great fortunes in the said kingdom, lately came purposely into this kingdom to exhibit, and did exhibit, many Articles of High Treason against the lord Inchiquin, for betraying the parliament's army to the enemy, as formerly he had done; yet, by the great power and violent interposition of the said sir J. Clotworthy, Mr. Hollis, and sir P. Stapylton, by the practice and combination aforesaid, the said Articles have been obstructed, and the business not suffered to come to a hearing, and the said lord Lisle hastily called out of Ireland, and the power and command of the parliament's forces in that kingdom committed to the said lord of Inchiquin, to the loss of this summer's service, and the expence of much treasure to make new preparations of war. And whereas the said lord Lisle, being so suddenly called from thence as aforesaid, did design and depute sir Hardress Waller, knight, major-general of the forces there, a man of known integrity and courage both for his service in England and in Ireland, and of considerable fortune there, to take care of the said lord Lisle's forces till the pleasure of the parliament might be further known, the said lord Inchiquin, upon the receipt of a letter from the said sir J. Clotworthy, Mr. Hollis, and sir P. Stapylton, or one of them, or from some other person by their, or one of their, direction, privy, or procurement, did express that he had an order or direction from London that no man that favoured the Independents (under which name the said lord of Inchiquin hath comprehended all men that have shewed themselves opposite to tyranny and arbitrary government) should have any trust or command there; nay, though they were of another judgment, yet if they would not prosecute the Independents, they should not be employed there, or words to that effect; and, under colour thereof, the said sir H. Waller, and all others that formerly had held their commissions from the said lord Lisle while he commanded, were displaced, to the discouragement of those and other faithful persons to the parliament, and to the great disservice and danger of losing that kingdom.

XV. That whereas a committee of the house of commons hath been lately appointed by the parliament, to consider of Propositions for the settling and preservation of Wales, whereof the said sir Wm. Lewis and Mr. Glynn were and are members, and to report the same to the house; they, the said sir Wm. Lewis and Mr. Glynn, with others of the said committee, did, on the 30th of April now last past, without any authority of parliament, before any report made to the house, of their own accord (instead of settling and preserving Wales) order that all committees for sequestration should forbear all proceedings of sequestration against all, or any, of the inhabitants of Wales; and although some few persons were upon general heads excepted, yet, by virtue of that illegal order, all the commissioners of the peace and commissioners of associations, who were as active in raising money and pressing men to serve against the parliament as any others; all the commissioners of array, that did or should at any time come in and submit to the parliament, or their commanders in chief, without any limitation of time; all that had borne arms against the parliament, unless they were governors, and other officers of war, that held out some town, castle, or fort against the parliament; all disaffected and scandalous ministers, though in their sermons they usually reviled and scandalized the parliament and their proceedings, calling them rebels and traitors, and not only incensing the people against the parliament, but usually taking up arms, and leading their parishioners in arms upon any alarm against the parliament; and many other desperate delinquents, have been, and still are, taken off and freed from sequestration; and the said order was sent to every committee in Wales in several letters, contrary to several orders and ordinances of parliament, and contrary to the rules of justice and equity, which should impartially be administered as well in Wales as in other places of this kingdom; whereby the ill-affected gentry and ministry of that country are grown so high and insolent, that honest men dare scarce live amongst them; so as that which was intended by the parliament, to settle and preserve Wales, is, by the practice of the said sir Wm. Lewis and Mr. Glynn, perverted to the danger and destruction of it.

XVI. That the said sir Wm. Lewis and Mr. Glynn, have farther ingratiated themselves with the delinquents of Wales, and prepared them for their said designs in manner following. viz. He the said sir William Lewis hath, within two years last past, countenanced and protected many of the most notorious and dangerous delinquents within the several counties of South-Wales; namely, the lord Carbery and others in Caermarthenshire; Mr. Carew, and others in Glamorganshire; Mr. Morgan, late knight of the shire, Mr. John Herbert, and others in Brecknockshire; Mr. Gwyn, Mr. Lewis, and divers others in Radnorshire; by freeing some of them altogether from compositions, though sequestered; by labouring with divers members of the house and of committees to be favourable in compounding with others, and to admit of such to their compositions as were incapable thereof; and he hath animated and encouraged some of the said persons to continue their fidelity to the king's cause, promising them, that if they would engage their friends with the king for him, he and his would be their friends in the parliament; in so much as his friends, the delinquents in those parts, have lately looked upon him as a rising man when the king shall come to London; which hath lately been their constant boasting. And the said sir Wm. Lewis hath, within two years last past, caused divers that had been commissioners for the king, and pressed men and raised money to promote the late war against the parliament, namely, his brother, Mr. Tho. Lewis, Mr. Gwyn, Mr. C. Walwyn, Mr. Meredith Lewis, Mr. Edw. Williams, and many others, to be commissioners of the peace, and also committee-men for the said county of Brecknock; inasmuch as those that have been most active and faithful to the parliament, have been, and still are, out-voted in those places, and can do no considerable service for the parliament; and the rather for that he hath also procured one Edw. Williams, his own kinsman, and one much disaffected to the parliament to be solicitor of sequestrations in the said county, who is, and hath been, very remiss and corrupt therein. And the said sir Wm. Lewis hath, by the means aforesaid, lately procured Mr. Edw. Lewis, his son, though unfit for that employment, to be chosen and returned burress for Brecknock; which that he might the better effect, he kept the writ for election of the said burress above eight months in his own custody before it was delivered to the sheriff of the said county. And likewise that the said Mr. John Glynn, within two years last past, hath procured several persons, that have lately been commissioners of array, and in arms against the parliament in North-Wales, to be named in the commissions of the peace for the counties of Denbigh and Caernarvon, and other counties there, and to be put in other great places of trust and command there; and, amongst others, col. Glynn, his brother, who was lately a colonel in the king's army, is, by his procurement, become governor of the town and Castle of Caernarvon, and admiral or vice-admiral of the Irish seas; to the endangering of those counties lying upon the coasts towards Ireland, and to the fear and discouragement of the well-affected inhabitants of those places.

XVII. That the said sir Wm. Lewis, being heretofore, during these troubles, governor of Portsmouth, a garrison for the parliament, (in which time he received much of the public treasure, for which he hath not yet given an account) did, while he was governor there, frequently hold correspondence and intelligence with the king's party, about the delivery up of the said garrison; inasmuch as, although sir Wm. Waller, and divers others in that garrison, were proclaimed traitors to the king, yet he, by the king's special command, was spared; the king affirming he was his friend, and that he was confident he would do him good service, or to that effect: and although he then was a parliament man and governor of Portsmouth as aforesaid, and was three years in the king's quarters, yet his estate in the county of Brecon, being of the value of above 600*l.* per annum, was never sequestered. And since the parliament hath prevailed, col. Herbert Price, (having been governor of Brecknock for the king against the parliament) being sequestered, the said sir Wm. Lewis, by his solicitations to the committee, procured the personal estate of the said colowel Price (which the committee of the county had found out, and caused to be brought to Morgan Aubrey's house in Brecon) to be restored unto him without any satisfaction to the state; and hath caused the said colowel Price's lands in the said county of Brecon, being worth about 300*l.* per annum, to be lett to a friend of the said colowel Price, to his wife's use, at 50*l.* per annum, contrary to the directions of several ordinances of parliament made in that behalf.

XVIII. That the said Mr. J. Glynn, or some other person or persons by his direction, consent, or privy, or to his use, hath, during his being a member of the house of Commons, taken rewards of several persons for services done them in the house; as namely, amongst others, divers drovers from Wales, who, by his means and procurement, had an allowance by order of the house, for 3,000*l.* in satisfaction of losses they had sustained by the enemy, and did pay unto the wife of the said Mr. Glynn the sum of 100*l.* as a reward for his said service.

XIX. That the said Mr. John Glynn, as he hath been most active to bring into the commissions of Peace, and into other places of authority, divers notorious delinquents in North-Wales as aforesaid, so he hath been as active, as much as in him lies, to put out and keep out of the militia and common council of the city of London, and out of the commission of the peace for Middlesex, many eminent and faithful men that have laid out their estates, and adventured their lives for the defence of the parliament and city in the time of their greatest necessity; namely, alderman Pennington, col. Tichborne, Mr. Eastwick, Mr. Moyer, and others, contrary to the Declaration of both kingdoms: which hath assured all lawful favour and encouragement to those that have been faithful, and shall so continue, to the parliament; which doings must needs tend to the giving a fresh occasion and power to the enemy against the parliament's best friends, to the dishonour of the parliament, and the endangering of the kingdom.

XX. That the said sir P. Stapylton, Mr. Hollis, and sir Wm. Lewis, have, by their power and countenance, as members of the house of commons, both jointly and severally, used means to obstruct the course of justice, and have interposed themselves in several causes, and by word of mouth, moved and persuaded judges and other officers on the behalf of such as they conceive to be their friends; amongst others, in the great cause that was lately depending in the house of lords, between alderman Langham and captain Lymery, when counsel was met for the pleading thereof, they did repair to the earl of Rutland about the same; and the said sir P. Stapylton told him that they were fully satisfied concerning the justness of Langham's cause, and therefore, as the said earl did respect them, he should give his vote for Langham, or used words to that effect; which also was seconded by the said Mr. Hollis in words, and agreed unto by the said sir Wm. Lewis, as appeared by his presence and gesture; and the said sir Wm. Lewis did exercise the same power in a cause of John Gunter and others.

XXI. That the said Mr. Anthony Nicholl, although, about four years since, he was, by the committee of privileges, voted not a fit member to sit in the house, by reason his election was void; yet the said Mr. Nicholl doth not only sit and vote there as a member, but, by his power and threats in the West countries, and by his solicitations and indirect practices, hath brought in, or procured to be brought in, about 28 members more out of Cornwall, on purpose to carry on the designs and practices before-mentioned, and to make a faction in the said house; and, notwithstanding the Self-denying Ordinance, he doth still hold a place in the Tower, formerly conferred upon him by the house, and receiveth the profits thereof to his own use.

XXII. That the said Mr. Nicholl hath, since his sitting in the house as aforesaid, taken rewards for service done there; namely, whereas sir Wm. Uvedall, knight, for deserting the parliament, and going to York with the king, was suspended the house; he, for the sum of 100*l.* or 150*l.* paid unto him, or to his use, did, by misinformations to the house, procure the said sir Wm. Uvedall to be re-admitted a member. And the said Mr. Nicholl, while he was a member of the Committee for Safety, he and others of the said committee having issued forth a warrant for searching Greenwich-House, did, underhand, acquaint one of the queen's officers therewith; and thereby prevented the design of the said committee, to the great disservice of the parliament and kingdom.

XXIII. That the said Mr. Long, at the beginning of the late wars, not having courage sufficient to perform his duty in military affairs, did, out of covetousness, or other unworthy ends, procure a command of a troop of horse under his excellency the late lord-general the earl of Essex; but whenever his said troop came upon any service, he, out of fear or treachery, unworthily absented himself, and never was seen or known to charge the enemy in person, though his troop often engaged; namely, at the Battle of Edgehill, when he saw there were like to be blows, he left the field, and never charged before his troop; and at the battle or fight at Brentford, though his troop was there, yet he staid at London till the danger was past and fighting done; And when his troop was sent into the West, he took no other notice of it, but to receive his pay; and in the mean while he repaired into the county of Essex, and procured a commission to be a colonel of horse, and, instead of fighting against the parliament's enemies, he betook himself to plunder and oppress the parliament's friends there; and, contrary to order, and without any authority, or exigencies of war compelling him thereunto, enforced great sums of money, and many horses and other provisions from the country: namely, from Mr. Tho. M-nwood, a man well affected, who had the General's protection, and whose horses were taken from the plough, and others; to the great losses and oppression of the people, and to the great dishonour of the parliament, whose service he nevertheless neglected, and hath not hitherto given an account of the great sums of money and other things that he so exacted from the country as aforesaid.

XXIV. That the said Mr. Long afterwards, upon pretence of some losses sustained by the enemy, and some great service he had done for the state, did procure of the house a great office in the Chancery; namely, to be the chief Register of that court, wherein his skill was little, and whereof he was, and still is, altogether incapable; and although for a time, upon the Self-denying Ordinance, he was displaced, yet, upon the motion, or by the power and means of the said Mr. Hollis, he hath obtained the said office again; to the great prejudice of skilful clerks that have been bred up in the said court, to the disservice of the commonwealth, and the dishonour of the house.

XXV. The said Mr. Long, on purpose to drive on the designs in the said several Charges expressed, hath for two years last past, usually pressed and urged several members to give their Votes such ways as he pleased; and to that end and purpose, doth constantly place himself near the door of the house; and, when any debate is concerning any design wherein his party is engaged, he hath used such tamperings and violence to such of his own party as would go out of the house, and hath persuaded them to continue there for their votes; and he, in case any such have gone out of the house, hath been very inquisitive where they might be found, that so he may go for them when the business in debate comes near to be put to the vote; and, when they come not according to his expectation, doth ordinarily and speedily run out of the house himself to call them and drive them in again, so that he hath been commonly called (by those that are without the house and have taken notice of his actions), the Parliament Driver; whereby the freedom of the members is taken from them, the manner of the parliament's proceedings much scandalized, and many times evil and dangerous designs drove on in a faction by votes, to the great prejudice of the common-wealth.—All which matters and things the said Army will be ready, in convenient time, to make good, by proof upon oath, as this honourable house shall direct. And for that by reason of the straitness of time, and other more weighty affairs of the Army, they could not so fully finish and accomplish the said Articles; therefore the said Army still reserve further liberty to add other Articles against the said Members, or any of them, at any time before their trial, as occasion shall serve.

By Appointment of his excellency sir Thomas Fairfax, and the Council of War. Jo. RUSHWORTH, Secretary.*

* Besides the general motives to this transaction of the Army (arising from its being at this time guided entirely by Cromwell and the Independent party, as the house of Commons, through the influence of these Members, was by the Presbyterian) there were not wanting private resentments among particulars: For lord Clarendon writes, "That Mr. Hollis had one day, upon a very hot debate in the house, and some rude expressions which fell from commissary Ireton, persuaded him to walk out of the house with him, and then told him, 'That he should presently go over the water and fight with him.' The commissary replying 'His conscience would not suffer him to fight a duel,' Mr. Hollis, in choler, pulled him by the nose; telling him, 'If his conscience would keep him from giving men satisfaction, it should keep him from provoking them.' His lordship adds, "This affront to the third person of the Army, and to a man of the most virulent, malicious, and revengeful nature of all the pack, so incensed the whole party, that they were resolved, one way or other, to be rid of him, who had that power in the house, and that reputation abroad, that when he could not absolutely controul their designs, he did so obstruct them that they could not advance to any conclusion." This anecdote is, in some measure, confirmed by July 9. Ordered, That the Charge of the Army shall be debated to morrow morning the first business, and nothing to intervene.

July 10. The House this day again read the particular Charge against the Eleven Members, and had a large debate thereupon, forenoon and afternoon, but came to no conclusion, referring the further debate till Monday next.

July 12. The House of Commons (as was ordered) further proceeded in the debate of the Particular Charge against the Eleven Members, and upon the result of all, they voted it a Charge, and that the said Eleven Members should give in their Answer thereunto by Monday next, at which time the house will consider of putting the same into some speedy way of trial, as is desired.

The House ordered, that Master Chute, Mr. Prynn, Master Glover, Mr. Hales, shall be Council for the accused Eleven Members of the House, that were included in the late Votes of adhering to the King's Party, were ordered to present their cases to the house on this day; but by reason of other extraordinary occasions, the house ordered the Cases of those Members should be read and debated on to morrow morning.

ANSWER of the Eleven Members impeached by the Army.

July 19. This day the Eleven Members, impeached by the Army, delivered to the House of Commons their Answer to the Charge against them, which was read the first time in their presence; and then, they having of themselves withdrawn, the said Answer was read a second time; as follows:

A full VINDICATION and ANSWER of the Eleven accused Members to a late printed Pamphlet, intituled, 'A particular Charge

An anonymous Writer of these times † frequently quoted by lord Hollis in his Memoirs, informs us "That Cromwell confessed he had nothing against sir John Maynard, another of the impeached Members, but that he was put up amongst the rest, because he was a busy man against the lieutenant-general and his faction."

or Impeachment, in the name of sir Thomas Fairfax and the Army under his command, by his appointment and the Council of War.*

"Although we be not ignorant of the illegality and insufficiency of that which is printed and published for our Charge, seeming unto us, for the greatest part thereof, rather an arraignment of the proceedings of the house of commons, as supposing them to be acted and carried on in a design, by the interest and prevalence of the persons charged; and that all the particulars mentioned in this Charge should be, by them, committed and done in pursuance of that design; a thing so contrary to the nature, and derogatory to the honour, of a free parliament, and of a dangerous consequence, to render all suspected and invalid which this parliament hath done or shall do: and that this Charge is brought in the name of an Army, and so is an accusation enforced by power, contrary to the statute of 31 Hen. 6, c. 1, and no accuser appearing liable to satisfy the parties grieved for their damages and expences, if the accusation prove false and untrue, (as this most certainly is) against the tenor of several statutes made in that behalf.* Nor is it unknown that many indirect and unjustifiable ways have been practised in providing the materials of this Charge, by tampering with persons to become our accusers; setting general inquisitions upon some of us, who have faithfully served our country, (most of us for the space of near seven years in that house, and the rest of us the time of our being members) to the wasting of our estates, prejudice of our healths, and many inconveniencies to our persons by much travel and labour, without those advantages by way of gift or otherwise, which some of our accusers, and divers others, have had, for which we bear them no envy at all; yet books have been searched, proceedings at committees viewed, the king's and Digby's cabinets and private papers (of which our accusers had the maidenhead) searched for intelligence, yet not one syllable found against us in them; servants and attendants examined to rake up matter against us (an absolute breach of privilege of parliament, and not well consistent with the liberty of the subject): all this notwithstanding, which we might very well take exceptions at, and besides that we now lie under that great disadvantage which the philosopher did, who disputed with the Emperor who commanded thirty legions, so that all his arguments were too weak, nor could he make use of that strength of reason and truth which his cause did afford; yet we, presuming upon our innocence and the justice of those who must judge us, but principally upon the goodness of the great God, who is the support and avenger of the oppressed, and hath protected, for several years, some of us, when we have been the object of malice and power, and marks set up to be shot at for destruction; to which purpose our actions, speeches, and our private conversations have been, as narrowly as could be, observed and inquired into; prisoners, discontented persons, friends and foes, examined upon us; all manner of persons dealt with, that could be imagined willing to betray, and able to say any thing against us, yet God having preserved us, as he did David from the bear and lion, which encouraged him likewise to promise himself deliverance from the uncircumcised Philistine, though so much more mighty than he; in like manner we trust for his assistance and protection at this time, and shall apply ourselves to the particulars insisted upon, and not formerly cleared and discharged upon a strict examination and debate in parliament; and shall give, we doubt not, a satisfactory account of our integrity and innocence in them all, in order as they lie.—

The first Article of the Charge, which concerns Mr. Hollis singly, is partly of 'Passages at Oxford about three years since.' With these he cannot undertake to charge his memory at this time, to give particular and positive Answers thereunto; but he saith, There is no new matter at all in this Charge, and that the whole business received a full and perfect disquisition in the house of commons, in July, 1645, now two years past; when, as near as he could remember, of all done and said by him concerning the particulars, then and now laid to his charge, he gave an account, together with another gentleman, a very worthy member of the house, and his fellow-commissioner at Oxford,* who was then accused by the lord Saville to have joined with Mr. Hollis in all the parts of this Charge; and the house was so fully satisfied of their good intentions in their transaction of that business, that, after a very long debate of several days, they ordered it, upon the question, the 19th day of that July, 'That the matter of the report' (which was this whole business now endeavoured to be revived in this Charge) 'should be totally and finally laid aside'—As for the particular Answers which he gave in the vindication of his innocency, asserting the truth, and discovering the malice and falshood of his then accuser, the lord Saville, he refers himself to the public Examinations, Proceedings, and Resolutions in the house, and what was then and there delivered, both by him and the other gentleman together with him, at that time most falsely accused by the lord Saville; who hath since so far bethought himself, and testified a remorse for the injury he then did unto these two gentlemen, that it is not very long since he sent a person of honour, a peer of the realm, unto Mr. Hollis, assuring him, 'That when his composition was once made and perfected,' (for this was at the time that the lord Saville was upon compounding for his delinquency) 'he would then discover unto him,' meaning Mr. Hollis, 'how that whole business was laid against him, and who they were that laid it; which when he knew, he would see he had no cause to be so angry with him; and therefore desired him not to be against him in setting the fine for his composition.' Adding withal, 'He durst not discover it till he was out of their danger,' meaning those who had laid that design against Mr. Hollis; 'for if they had the least inckling of it, they would certainly ruin him.' This was the substance, and, as near as can be remembered, the very words, which were delivered unto Mr. Hollis by that lord, in the name of the lord Saville, and from him. But Mr. Hollis was so far from being vindictive against those who had expressed so much malice against him, and endeavoured his ruin, as he wholly put it out of his thoughts, never so much as sending to the lord Saville after his composition was past; in the making whereof he did him no disservice at all, as in truth scorning it.—Another clause in the first Article is concerning a 'Letter sent from the earl of Lindsey unto Mr. Hollis, containing,' as is laid in the Charge, 'some secret Design.' This was likewise examined in the house, and by Mr. Hollis himself first discovered unto the house, contrary to what is in the printed Paper most falsely suggested, and this done by him as soon as it came into his mind; for when he received it, which was very late one evening by a servant of lord Saville's, he immediately after fell sick, which made him clean forget it; nor doth he know what became of the Paper, whether or no he burnt it; The contents of it were only one line, a recommendation of the bearer from the lord Saville, the very words whereof were then fresh in his memory, and by him repeated in the house; when such satisfaction was given, as that there passed a Vote the 19th of July 1645, 'That the receiving of that Note in the manner Mr. Hollis did, was no holding intelligence with the enemy.'—There is another part of this first Article, 'of the earl of Lindsey's moving for a Pass for Mr. Hollis to go to Oxford;' and the king's saying, 'He did him better service in the parliament than he could do there,' which was likewise, by the lord Saville, informed to the committee appointed for the examination of that business, and so reported to the house; at which time Mr. Hollis said, and still doth, That he knew nothing of it, and was, and is, most confident that it is most false; for that he never signified any such desire to the earl of Lindsey, or to any body else, nor ever had it in his thoughts.

To the second Article, which charges Mr. Hollis and sir P. Stapylton, jointly, with 'sending several messages to the earl of Dorset and lord Digby,' and sir P. Stapylton singly 'to have sent one to the earl of Dorset;' and then both Mr. Hollis and sir P. Stapylton to have 'joined in drawing Propositions, and sending them privately to his majesty; they both of them say, for what concerns both, and sir P. Stapylton, for what concerns himself, (this being the only thing in all the Charge that is singly objected against him) That the whole Article is false and untrue in all and every part of it.

The third Article lays a Charge on the 11 Members jointly, 'for meeting together at lady Carlisle's lodgings, in Whitehall, and other places, with other disaffected persons; for holding correspondence with the queen, to put conditions upon the parliament, to bring in the king upon their own terms; and do such other things, in prosecution of their evil designs,' as are in that Article mentioned. To all and every branch whereof they do all jointly, and each of them severally, give a full, positive, and absolute denial; and affirm, That the whole Charge in that Article is scandalous and false in matter and form. Most of them declare, That within the time there limited for those meetings to have been, and at no time before or since, they have at all been at her ladyship's lodgings; only Mr. Hollis, sir Wm. Lewis, and sir P. Stapylton do acknowledge that, by her ladyship's favour, they have many times waited upon her, both at her own lodgings in Whitehall, and elsewhere, yet never to any such intent and purpose, as is in the Article most falsely suggested; but only to pay unto her ladyship that respect which is due unto her (a person of so great honour and desert) from them, and in truth from all others who are well-wishers to the welfare of this kingdom.—And whereas it is said, 'That they had a great power upon the treasure of this kingdom, and thereby maintained the Queen's Party; assured her a pension and undertook to do more for the king than the Army would do,' who it seems are now ambitious in out-stripping all others in acting for his majesty: it is very well known that these persons have not all meddled in money businesses; have had least to do, with disposing of the public treasure, and therefore could not pleasure others with it; and least of all have they received any part of it for their private uses, some of them having declared themselves in the house, when the house was pleased to vote them considerable sums in recompence for their very great sufferings for the commonwealth, That they would receive nothing till the public debts were paid; and none of them are the men that have grown great in these calamitous times, and been enriched upon the ruin of others, nor preferred themselves and their friends to higher fortunes than otherwise they could ever have aspired unto; therefore there is neither truth, nor semblance of truth, that they should be guilty of engaging the public treasure and stock, as the Article charges; nor would any have believed them if they had been so false and foolish as to have offered it. In conclusion they say, The whole Charge in this Article is utterly false.

The fourth Article, which chargeth Mr. Hollis, sir P. Stapylton, sir Wm. Lewis, sir J. Clotworthy, sir Wm. Waller, and major-general Massey, to have, 'within the space of three months last past, invited the Scots, and other foreign forces to enter this kingdom,' is by them averred to be utterly false; as likewise that part of it which charges Mr. Hollis to have 'sent unto the Queen, to advise her to send the Prince into Scotland, to come into this kingdom at the head of an army,' is by him declared to be most untrue, and a mere invention of malice against him. And, in the last place, where it chargeth the 11 Members, 'to have listed, or caused to be listed, divers commanders and soldiers without authority of parliament, and to have encouraged Reformado officers and soldiers to gather together tumultuously at Westminster, to affright and assault the members of parliament,' there is nothing of truth in it, and reflects more upon their accusers than on them.

To the fifth Article, which charges Mr. Hollis, sir Philip Stapylton, and Mr. Glynn, to have 'been obstructors of Petitions to the parliament for Redress of public Grievances,' they say, That what hath been done by them, or any of them, in matters of petitions, was done in the house of commons, and only there; where they have, upon occasion, delivered their opinions concerning some seditious petitions, which they suppose to be the petitions intended by the Article. And for what is said of Mr. Hollis and sir P. Stapylton's 'affronting some Petitioners attending a committee, as major Tuleday, and committing Nicholas Tew without authority,' they do say, That Tuleday and Tew affronted the committee; that Tew endeavoured to raise a tumult in the Court of Requests, to the disturbance and danger of the committee; whereupon the committee thought fit to restrain him until the next morning, when they would acquaint the house with it: that all, both concerning him and Tuleday, was reported unto the house, and both of them were, by the house, committed upon just reasons, and afterwards both of them discharged or bailed; the one upon the motion of Mr. Hollis, and the other of sir P. Stapylton.—And whereas it is said, 'That they were not permitted to speak for themselves,' it is notoriously untrue, for Tuleday was heard at the bar of the house of commons, and Tew was heard at the committee as long as he would speak, until he refused to answer any more questions, saying, He was not bound to accuse himself.—In the last place, where Mr. Glynn is charged 'to have committed Tew to Newgate, for no other cause but for having a Petition about him, which was to be presented to the house,' Mr. Glynn doth answer, That being Recorder of London, and in the commission of the peace, he knows it not to be a crime to send such persons to the gaol, as be brought before him for misdemeanors, and may have committed Tew, as he hath done many others; but he doth believe it to be a mistake in the accusers, not remembering any such thing, and doth boldly affirm, That if he did commit him, it was not for the cause laid down in the Article, but upon just grounds of law.

To the sixth Article, touching 'the Imprisonment of ensign Nichols by sir Wm. Waller, sir J. Clotworthy, and major-general Massey,' they answer, That they, being, by Instructions of the 9th of April, 1647, from the committee at Derby-House, for the affairs of Ireland, authorized to draw off from the rest of the army such as should except of the service of Ireland, and quarter them in such places as they should think fit, upon the engagements of divers officers of col. Lilburne's regiment to go for Ireland, they gave orders to lieutenant-col. Kempton to march with such soldiers of that regiment as should engage for Ireland, to Evesham; and the soldiers so engaging separated from the army; and, on their march towards Evesham, they, on the 24th of April, 1647, at Saffron-Walden, after the general's departure towards London, having received several informations that ensign Nichols (ensign to capt. Dormer, one of the captains of the said regiment) repaired into the quarters of those forces drawn off from the army, in order to the service of Ireland, there dissuading the soldiers to go for Ireland; encouraging them mutinously to demand their pay of the said captain Dormer, and then, by falsehoods and cunning practices, endeavouring to entice them back to the army; undervaluing those that went for Ireland, and incensing them against the Propositions of parliament for that service; and also reading to the said soldiers the Petition of the army, after the same was then lately prohibited, by both houses of parliament; and being certified that, for those miscarriages, the said captain Dormer had secured his person till further order, the lords and commons, who were commissioners, did thereupon, on the said 24th of April, give directions to lieutenant-col. Kempton to take order that the said ensign Nichols should be sent up to London, with the first opportunity, to be disposed of by the committee of lords and commons for the affairs of Ireland at Derby-House, which was accordingly done; and, upon the report of the business, the said ensign was committed by order of the house of commons, and the persons that brought him rewarded for their service therein: in all which proceedings they know of nothing done, but what their duty and instructions, in relation to the service of Ireland, required at their hands, being contrary neither to the laws of the land nor articles of war; but conceive, upon these informations, (ready to be produced and testified upon oath) that the said ensign, according to the martial law, for his said offences, deserved death for endeavouring a mutiny as abovesaid; and therefore there is no cause for the army to complain, in that the house was so merciful to him as to remit that punishment. Whereas it is charged, 'That the pockets of ensign Nichols were searched, and divers Papers taken from him; and that 'he was sent a prisoner to London from the head-quarters, without the authority or privacy of the general,' they say, 'That no order was given by them for searching his pockets, or taking away his papers; and believe no such thing was done: that he was secured by capt. Dormer, being found in the quarters of those forces that were drawn off for Ireland, actually endeavouring to put the soldiers into a distemper, and so to withdraw them from that service; and was sent from those quarters (not the head-quarters, as is falsely suggested) to London. And for the privacy or authority of the General, if he had been then present, they conceive their authority from the parliament, on that behalf, was sufficient without the General's; and, as the case stood, they thought it not reasonable to consult the army in the matter of disturbing the Irish service, when they had there found so little encouragement before.

To the seventh Article, sir Wm. Waller, sir J. Clotworthy, and col. Harley, say, They are very sensible the particulars charged in the seventh Article do specially relate to things said or done in the house of commons; and so not liable to any censure, having passed the approbation of that house, which hath already acquitted them, by their Votes of the 25th of June, from all things done and spoken by them in this house, contained in this and the three ensuing Articles; and so ought not to have been recited in this Charge; yet to vindicate themselves from the scandal of design and combination against the Army, they shall give this true account of what induced them to endeavour the suppressing of that Petition:—Sir Wm. Waller and sir J. Clotworthy, being commissioners of parliament with the army for the service of Ireland, and col. Harley being there to attend the same service, March 27, 1646, at a convention of officers for the service of Ireland at Walden, the Petition was produced, as the Petition of the Soldiers, to be approved by the officers there; and was pressed with such eagerness, that an officer of quality offering some reasons against it, was told, He deserved not to live in an army; they taking notice of the subtle and violent managing of that Petition, pretended to be the Petition of the Soldiers, but in truth framed then, as they can prove, by some officers at Walden, at a time when the parliament only proposed the service of Ireland, and the soldiery had neither disposition nor cause to petition; the army being well paid for several months then past, especially the foot, consisting much of recruits, had little cause to complain for pay; thereupon they represented this information to the General, as that which required his care to suppress timely. But after they returned to London, they received several informations, of which they have good proof, that the Petition was agitated in several regiments, and proposed by the officers to their soldiers: that some officers threatened that those who did refuse to subscribe it should be cashiered; and directions were given to return the subscriptions to some principal officers at the head-quarters. What passed in the house of commons, they presume not to relate without the leave of the house; but by these particulars, which are ready to be attested by persons of worth, the design of raising jealousies between the parliament and army, will really be fixed upon those who have falsely imposed it on the accused Members, to carry on their own designs, which are since more visible.

To the eighth Article, whereas col. Harley is charged, 'That, by combination, he produced to this house a Letter which could not be made good,' he affirms, He did acquaint the house with a Letter received as he was coming to the house, and sent to him from an officer of worth in the Army, who was and is ready to justify the substance of the Letter to be most true, That lieutenant col. Pride* drew col. Harley's regiment to a rendezvous, read the Petition in the head of his company, and that the Petition was then subscribed by most of the regiment; and that lieutenant col. Pride said, 'Such as would not subscribe the Petition should be cashiered.'† That in this, colonel Harley did nothing but his duty, and what the house of commons approved by their public thanks to him and another worthy member, an officer of the army, who produced another Letter concerning the same business.—For that which is laid to Mr. Hollis's charge in this Article, concerning the drawing of that Declaration, he answers, That it was done in the house; and the house did allow of, pass it, and afterwards sent it up to the house of peers, where it was likewise past; and that any should question it, being become and made the act of both houses, and so a Charge rather against them than himself, seems strange unto him, whose part in it was only to draw up that Declaration according to the sense of the house, in obedience to a general call upon him for it, being exceedingly pressed and urged to do it, when himself was very unwilling to take that task upon him.

To the ninth Article, wherein it is said, 'That col. Harley, sir J. Clotworthy, sir Wm. Waller, and the said other persons, did procure divers eminent and faithful officers of the army, viz. lieutenant gen. Hammond, colonel Lilburne, lieutenant col. Pride, and others, to be sent for to appear at the bar of the house, against whom they could charge nothing at all; inasmuch that the house thought fit immediately to discharge them,' it is answered, That the said colonel Harley, sir J. Clotworthy, and sir Wm. Waller, having been informed that those who stile themselves such eminent and faithful persons of the army, with some others, being very active in promoting the Petition mentioned in the former Articles, did, in discharge of their duty, faithfully represent to the house what they had heard; and whilst the house was in consideration thereof, divers letters were brought to several members of the house, from several parts of the kingdom, declaring the apprehension which many faithful officers of the army had taken up, if such a Petition should be permitted to go on; as, particularly, a Letter of the 28th of March last, directed to colonel Rossiter, an eminent member of the army; wherein it is desired, by such as promoted this Petition, that the names of such officers and soldiers as subscribed the Petition should be sent to colonel Hammond, lieutenant general Hammond, commissary-general Ireton, colonel Lilburne, lieutenant colonel Grimes, or any three of them. On the consideration of what was mentioned in this and other letters, in confirmation of what was formerly presented by the gentlemen articulated against, the house of commons did send for several of the persons before-mentioned; and, as is conceived, had very good reason so to do.—And whereas it is said, ‘That a committee was appointed to examine the truth or falsehood of them.’ If by the truth or falsehood of them is meant, the truth or falsehood of the persons styled divers eminent and faithful officers of the army, then how could they be said to be immediately discharged as such, against whom nothing could be charged or proved at all?—The gentlemen articulated against do further say, That it is a very ill use that is made of the parliament’s indulgence, not to proceed with such severity against those persons convened before them, as aforesaid, as to affirm, That, therefore, nothing can be said against them: the like ill use was formerly made of the parliament’s so far condescending to the desires of another paper, said to come from the Army, concerning the obliterating of the Declaration relating to the Petition; both which expressions might well, in modesty and duty, have been spared.—And whereas this Article is stuffed with great swelling words of vanity, as though the gentlemen charged by this Article were pressed to produce their proofs and evidence, if they had any, before the committee; it is answered, That the persons brought up to the bar were, by their own confession in this Article, immediately discharged. What need then was there, or to what purpose was it, to bring any such proofs against them, when as the clemency of the house discharged them?—In a word: It is most demonstrable it was the parliament’s indulgence, not the innocency of several, if not all, of those who were questioned, which brought them off from punishment; and it were to be wished, in regard of these and their subsequent proceedings, that some proportion of meekness and ingenuity towards the houses, did accompany so much professed integrity, as is vaunted of by the framers of this Article and Pamphlet.

To the tenth Article, which charges Mr. Hollis, sir P. Stapylton, sir Wm. Lewis, sir Wm. Waller, sir J. Clotworthy, and major-general Massey, ‘to have been instruments in ‘obstructing the Relief of Ireland;’ and then relates some passages of theirs in the house, which could not be discovered to the army by any but members, contrary to their oath and duty, an high violation of the house’s privileges) they say, That they have faithfully, cordially, and industriously, at all times, and upon all occasions, to the best of their understandings, promoted the service of that poor bleeding kingdom; that they did desire supplies might have gone in an intire body out of the army, and that as speedily as possibly could be; so as some of them took the boldness to move, That sir Thomas Fairfax might have been sent thither; which not succeeding, yet the house resolving 8 regiments of foot, 4 of horse, and 1 of dragoons should be sent out of the Army, they, as zealously as they could, endeavoured the putting of it in execution, and attended the committee to which it was referred, constantly and diligently: and they doubt not but the great God, who will not be mocked, will judge them according to their deserts who have obstructed it, by discountenancing and affronting them who offered to embrace that service at the Convention of Officers, March 22, 1646,* by cashiering, assaulting, and turning out of their quarters such as declared their readiness for that service, under the ignominious notion of Deserters of the Army, and as men untrue to the common interest of the soldiers; and by a positive Declaration, ‘That whatsoever faithful commander should be appointed for the service of Ireland, they must shew themselves averse to that service,’ as is expressed in a Letter of the Agitators to lieutenant general Cromwell, dated April 30, 1647. And, in truth, colonel Robert Hammond’s high and unreasonable Propositions concerning the present service of Ireland, viz. ‘That the time of his employment, and those of this army going with him in this service, exceed not 2 or 3 months at the furthest; that the forces going over with him be not obliged to any other service whatsoever, more than the possessing or defending of Dublin; that colonel Hammond himself may have the command of the garrison of Dublin, and all the forces in it, during the said term; that shipping be ready in the harbour of Dublin, victualled at the parliament’s charge, with sufficient convoy, 14 days before the expiration of the said term, to transport the said forces back again for England, &c. and that upon other terms than these he doubts the number would not be considerable that would go over for that space,’ clearly demonstrates his and the army’s strange averseness to Ireland’s relief; and that all they aimed at was but to possess themselves of Dublin for the present, for what ends, themselves and their proceedings since can best discover.—The informations which they gave into the house, concerning the engagement of divers officers both of horse and foot for the relief of Ireland, they avow to be true; but are extremely misrepresented in this Article: For whereas it is falsely suggested, 'That they informed the house that, by their procurement, there were 50 companies of foot and 10 troops of horse of the army ingaged for that service upon the terms propounded by the parliament;' the truth is, That divers officers of horse, relating to so many troops, and some of the officers of about 50 companies of foot were, by subscription, personal promise, or assurance from others, really and truly ingaged, as may appear by the report made unto the house, unto which they refer themselves; but afterwards many were drawn off again by the artifice of those, who, though they pretended Ireland's relief, have their ends rather upon the confusion of England than the relief of Ireland, as their proceedings do manifest.—Concerning the Subscriptions of colonel Butler, lieutenant colonel Jackson, major Gooday, and others, for that service, supposed to be procured in delusion of the parliament, to mislead it into a vain imagination of a strength out of the army, which had nothing of reality in it, in regard those officers did then declare their unwillingness to go into Ireland upon any terms whatsoever; truly we conceive that Declaration from the Officers, bearing date the 22nd of March, will sufficiently clear both from any dishonourable combination; wherein it will appear that they obliged themselves no further, than either to ingage in their own persons, or to improve their interests in their respective commands, for that service; which last obligation they have made good like men of honour.—As for those Officers of colonel Butler's and sir Hardress Waller's regiments; their names might be given in by those who knew, or might justly suppose, that their inclinations led them to embrace that service; if their friends were mistaken in them, or their minds since altered, we know not what crime can be imputed to any. Lieutenant colonel Farrington was never presented by them to the house as a lieutenant colonel of the army, and ingaging for himself and his regiment for Ireland; but only as a gentleman that had formerly held the quality of lieutenant colonel, and yet did retain a very great and deserved interest in that regiment, and with whom they conceived the regiment would be very willing to engage.

To the eleventh Article, which charges sir P. Stapylton, Mr. Hollis, sir J. Clotworthy, sir Wm. Lewis, major general Massey, sir Wm. Waller, and Mr. Glynn, 'with commanding part of three regiments, advanced for Ireland from Broms-grove in Worcestershire, back to Reading, with an evil intent to draw forces together for a new war, and this being done upon the Sabbath-Day; they answer, That, out of their zeal to promote the service for Ireland, they met at all times when they were summoned at Derby-house, where the council sat early and late; and some times on the Sabbath-day, being in truth a work of the greatest piety and mercy; which certainly was not for their ease, and they hope rather a merit, than to be reputed a crime; That that business was transacted at a full committee, whether upon the Sabbath-day or no they know not; but they know, and affirm, that the reason why those regiments were ordered to come to Reading, was only that money might be sent to them for their pay; the officers representing to the committee the great necessities of the soldiers, and that where they were then quartered in Worcestershire, they did not know how to convey it thither with safety, in regard it must pass through the quarters of the army, who had expressed great displeasure to those forces which were drawn off for Ireland; and the committee was the rather induced to it, because they knew the money which was sent to Oxford, for disbanding a regiment there quartered, when, upon their refusal to disband, it was ordered to be brought back, was violently taken away by the soldiers from those intrusted with that service; and the committee feared some such attempt for the intercepting of this money, which occasioned that calling back to Reading; and not any such design as is, most falsely and maliciously, in the Article suggested.

To the twelfth Article, wherein sir J. Clotworthy is said to 'to have converted several great sums of Money to his own particular use in the years 1642, 1643, 1644, and since; which, by several orders of parliament, and of the Irish committee, were designed for the Relief of Ireland;' first, he answereth, That he never received any money from the beginning of the war until this day for the relief of Ireland in general; but only for the particular charge he hath in that kingdom, wherewith he was honoured in the beginning of the war by a special order of parliament. And for the particular sums in that Article suggested to be received by him in money, he saith, That he never received any such money, and was so far from making any particular use of such, either money or provisions, as were designed for supporting the soldiers under his care, to their prejudice in the least degree, that he hath disbursed above 3,000*l.* out of his own purse, and by his credit, for their support and relief, more than was received. He further saith, That for the sum of 280*l.* in the Article mentioned, by an account delivered to the committee of Accounts in June 1644, he was so far from intending the least prejudice, either to the state here, or that kingdom of Ireland, that, amongst other sums, he charged himself with the said 280*l.* for 20 butts of sack, which he should have received from one Whitscot; who failing therein, the said sir John converted the credit of the ordinance for the said 280*l.* into clothes for his soldiers, as, upon full examination and debate several years since had thereof, before the committee of accounts, may appear.—And by the said account he is likewise charged with 300*l.* in the article mentioned for 190 pair of pistols, the most whereof he exchanged, by order, out of the stores of this kingdom for firelocks, which he sent over to the soldiers of his regiment, and the remainder of the said pistols were delivered to his troop; and he never converted any of the said pistols to his own use, though he conceives he might have done, having given allowance for them on his account: and for the money for the said pistols, as no part thereof ever came to his hands, so he conceives the same is yet due and unpaid to one Abraham Vandenbeind, who provided the said pistols on the credit of the state.—For the sum of 700*l.* for 2,000 swords, he knoweth nothing thereof, nor ever received any such sum; but acknowledgeth that he is charged by the said account with 175*l.* for his part of 2,000 swords; which, as the former sum of 880*l.* hath been laid out, with much more of his own, for the service of the state; so as the said sir J. Clotworthy having prevented the informers by his account long since given in, and there remaining so great a sum disbursed by him, over and above what he hath received; had he retained any part towards his own disbursements, which he conceives he might justly have done, yet could it not have been charged against him for so heinous a crime, and that in prosecution of the design in the general charge mentioned, as is impertinently laid down in the said article.—And for the other divers sums of money, suggested in general to have been received, from time to time, by the said sir John for the use of Ireland, which are alleged not to be employed as by the several orders was directed and intended; when he knows the particulars, he hopes to give a satisfactory answer therein; and wishes that some few of his many accusers may be able to give as just an account for the many sums they have received, in relation to their employments, as he hath done, and is ready to do, for those few sums directed for his and his soldiers' support in that hard war of Ireland.—And whereas, by this article, it is suggested, 'That the said sir J. Clotworthy hath, within two years last past, received several sums of money, arms, and other provisions, for a troop of horse, which he pretended he had raised in Ireland;' he saith, That he never pretended to have raised any such troop, though he may, with some confidence, affirm, he hath, to his great charge, these five years last past, maintained a troop of horse, which was formerly under the command of capt. Upton, deceased, and after his death conferred on him; which troop he hath often recruited since his command thereof, being about five years space, during which time there was never received from the state, in money, above seven weeks pay, with some little provisions of clothes and arms, which he duly returned to the said troop, with some addition of his own, for their better support in service; judging it a most abominable act to detain any thing at all, especially of so little, designed for such necessitous soldiers.—And whereas, by the latter part of the article, it is most scandalously suggested, 'That the said sir J. Clotworthy, for money and other rewards, hath preferred John Davis and Wm. Sommers, and others, to be intrusted with the Irish affairs, who have kept correspondence with the enemy, and defrauded the state of other great sums of money; and that he hath been privy to, and a sharer in, such their actions,' he saith. That the said charge is most false and untrue in all the parts thereof wherein he is concerned: and for the said Wm. Sommers, he saith, He never preferred him to be intrusted with any of the Irish affairs, nor knoweth of any employment he ever had in that way, it being notoriously known he never had such employment since the rebellion of Ireland began; so as he was not in any capacity to defend the state. The said sir John further saith, That John Davis hath been contracted withal for great proportions of victuals, arms, and clothes, for Ireland, as a merchant; wherein the committee of both kingdoms, and the committee for the affairs of Ireland, the consent of the houses first had, have dealt with him after others refused such contracts, as he then accepted, and since performed; to most of which the said sir John was not privy, and no participant at all with the said John Davis in any of the particulars contracted for, as is now, and hath been formerly in printed pamphlets falsely suggested; but that the said John Davis was ever trusted with the affairs of Ireland other than as a merchant, (whereby he had the opportunity, in performance of his contracts with the state, to lay out his own money by great sums, and get it again as he can, (whereof there may be now some doubt) the said sir John is totally ignorant.

To the thirteenth Article, wherein, among other things, 'secret intelligence to have been held with the lord of Ormond, by cyphers, is laid to the charge of the said sir J. Clotworthy,' his answer is, That he, together with sir Thos. Wharton, sir Robt. King, sir Robt. Meredith, and Rd. Salway, esq. or any three of them, being appointed commissioners, but not jointly as is pretended, to treat with the lord of Ormond, for the delivery of the sword, &c. of the city of Dublin; after four days treaty, according to their Instructions, the treaty not taking effect, the commissioners resolved, That three of them should go for Belfast, and two of them come to London: and whilst the commissioners were in preparation for their departure, upon several just and warrantable occasions, they repaired jointly and severally to the lord of Ormond, who seemed to be much troubled that the treaty took no effect; professing the only cause thereof to be the want of the king's assent, which he said he hoped to gain; desiring to have it so presented to the parliament, and that he might acquaint the parliament, and the commissioners then going for Belfast, with the king's Answer; and, lest letters should be in-

teroepted by the rebels, there was a cypher agreed on, which was known to several of the commissioners when it was delivered, and of which the said sir John minded the other commissioners at Belfast after their arrival there, and before any thing was written by the same from the lord of Ormond; and, about a fortnight afterwards, the lord of Ormond, by the means of one capt. Ward, conveyed a little open Paper in cypher, directed to the said sir J. Clotworthy; who, as soon as he received it, did communicate the same to the rest of the commissioners; which being decyphered, there was thereby intimated, That he was more than hopeful they should shortly hear from him to their content; to which the commissioners returned an answer, That they should be glad to hear of the content he was hopeful to give: with all which, and the other transactions of that affair, the committee of Derby-House were made acquainted, and reported the same to both houses before sir John Clotworthy came out of Ireland; and the houses, having approved of the carriage and endeavours of the commissioners upon the whole transaction of the business, have long since so far owned them therein, that they have given thanks unto them for the same.—This being the only particular wherein the said sir John is, by this Article, charged to have held intelligence with the lord of Ormond; and that being by the advice of the rest of the commissioners, in manner as aforesaid, and for so good an end, as the giving his lordship an opportunity of new application to the parliament for rendering to them the city of Dublin and the other garrisons under his command; which hath, since that time, taken effect accordingly, to the exceeding great advantage and strengthening of this kingdom's interest in Ireland; the said sir John leaves it to the judgment of all equal minded men, whether or no there be any just cause to exhibit such a Charge against him for the same, especially by an army pretending such good affections to Ireland's welfare.—For the other part of the said Article, 'concerning the said sir J. Clotworthy's holding intelligence with the lord Digby;' he directly denieth any such thing, as being utterly false and untrue; for he never saw the said lord Digby these many years, but one night accidentally, when being last at Dublin with the other commissioners aforesaid, he was sent to the Castle of Dublin, by the said commissioners, concerning an officer of col. Moore's, that had received an injury by some persons that related to the lord of Ormond; at which time the said lord Digby came into the room where he was, but he had no discourse with him in private, nor at all; other than common talk, several persons being present: neither hath the said sir John, since the said lord Digby deserted the parliament, ever exchanged letter, message, or word with him, directly or indirectly, otherwise, or at any other time, than is hereby declared.—And whereas, by this Article, it is charged, That, in order to such secret intelligence,' (of which he admires a whole Army residing in England should have such certain and public notice, as to make it a positive Charge, and undertake to prove it upon oath, were it so secret as they charge it, as the Article alledgeth to have been held by the said sir John with the said lord Digby,) 'the lord of Ormond and the said lord Digby lately employed one Slingsby, who,' as the Article saith, 'pretends a design about the Prince, to come into this kingdom;' the said sir John utterly denieth to have had any thought of any such design, or any knowledge of the said Slingsby, or of his coming into the kingdom, until he heard that one Slingsby, whom he yet knoweth not, had been examined before the committee at Derby-House. And the said sir John presumeth he hath, to the said committee, confessed who employed him, and to whom he was employed here.

To the fourteenth Article, which charges sir J. Clotworthy, Mr. Hollis, and sir P. Stapylton, 'with obstructing Articles exhibited against the lord Inchiquin; calling back the lord Lisle from the government of Ireland; causing the command of the forces in that kingdom to be committed to the lord Inchiquin, he writing a Letter to his lordship, upon the receipt whereof he should express he had rection to put out all those who favoured Independents;' they do say they were so far from keeping off any proceedings upon those Articles, that they furthered it all they could, and several times moved it in the house; being desirous to have all cleared concerning the lord Inchiquin, whom, as they believed to be a man of honour and fidelity, so if upon examination of his actions, he appeared to be other, they were resolved to declare their sense of him accordingly.—As for what concerns the lord Lisle, they say, His lordship's time expiring, which was but for one year, either for himself or any one else to continue in that command, the parliament was pleased to dispose of the affairs of Ireland in another way; in the agitation whereof in the house they went according to their judgments and consciences, without respecting any person living.—For the Command of the Forces of that kingdom, which, as to the lord Inchiquin, can only be understood of Munster, they do not know that ever any thing was here done in it at all, there having been no occasion for it, as to their knowledge: and as for the Letter mentioned to have been written by them, or any of them, or from some other person by their, or all of their, direction, they say, As it is altogether uncertain and illegal, so it is a mere fiction, (for they never did any such thing) and tends to draw the odium of Independents upon them; to worse advancement, both in Ireland and elsewhere, they fear they may prove obstructive, as this Article clearly insinuates.

To the fifteenth Article, sir W. Lewis and Mr. Glynn say, That the Order of the 30th of April, in the Article, mentioned, (if there were any such) relates to them only as members of the committee, for whom they intend not to answer: But in truth there was no such order; it was only a report, not an order, and intended only for the county of Caermarthen, however it came to pass the words were general; and that was done in order to be reported to the house, and accordingly was reported, and after repealed by the committee, as they were informed. And as for the publishing and sending thereof unto every committee in Wales, they know nothing thereof; neither was it done by their, or either of their, directions or consents.

To the sixteenth Article, sir W. Lewis denieth his protecting any Delinquents in South-Wales, as is untruly alledged. And as for the earl of Carbery; he did no more than move in the house of commons to make good what major-general Laugharn had promised and pressed for on his behalf, by his Letters to the Speaker and committee of both kingdoms; representing the advantages that came to the parliament by his conformity, and how it would further their service to oblige him.—For Mr. Carew of Glamorgan and Mr. Herbert of Brecknockshire; after their long imprisonment, they being upon their compositions at Goldsmiths-Hall, he did but move the ascertaining of their fines according to the rules prescribed to the committee there; having observed that delays brought a prejudice both to the parliament and the parties sequestered, by abusing the one in their authority, the other in their estates. And for Mr. Herbert; after his sight of some high Articles drawn up against him by Mr. Rumsey, he never spake in his behalf, and he yet continues a prisoner in Ely-house. For Mr. Morgan of Brecknockshire; he is one the said sir William hath ever used with no more than a civility suitable to their being country-men, and of many years acquaintance; which he believes no good man can look on as an offence. For Mr. Gwyn and Mr. Lewis of Radnorshire, two of the committee in that county, and those that, by major-general Laugharn's certificate and colonel Birch's public testimony, had furthered the reducing of that county; he did but publicly move in the house that some disputes concerning them, and some differences between them and others of the committee for that county, might be referred to the committee for Gloucester, sitting in Channel-Row; which he did out of his desire to serve the parliament, by keeping peace in those remote parts, and for no ends at all of his own.—And further saith, He was never so much as present at any debate concerning the Sequestration of any other person whatever in either of the fore-mentioned counties, save those above-named; nor ever so much as motioned to any member of either house, committee-man or other, either the remitting or favourable compounding with any, upon any terms not warrantable by the rules prescribed, or their compounding with any that were incapable thereof; nor ever did animate or encourage any, since this unhappy difference, to continue their fidelity to the king's cause, by promising them, that if they would engage their friends with the king for him, he and his would be their friends in the parliament, as untruly suggested: looking upon that kind of conditioning as a thing below the thoughts of a gentleman.—What the Delinquents in those parts say of him, or how they look upon him, or how they or any others look upon those that charge him, or what shall be his or their lot at his majesty's coming to London, he is ignorant of; but hopes that a little time will discover both him and them in their true colours; and wisheth every man's return may be according to the singleness and integrity of his affections to the public peace and welfare of the kingdom.—And farther he saith, That there being an Order for the nomination of Justices of the Peace for the county of Brecknock, he humbly named Mr. Roger Vaughan, now high sheriff of that county, to be added to the committee formerly named by the house; also Mr. Meredith Lewis, Mr. George Parrey, and Mr. Edw. Williams, as the fittest persons he knew of to supply the necessity there was of justices in that county: and although he cannot say that when the king's forces had a power in those parts, but that many of them may have done that which is not justifiable; yet for his brother Mr. Tho. Lewis, who was formerly one of the committee, he is confident his innocency is equal with any man's in that county, and his sufferings as great as any of double his fortune inhabiting there; he having been carried prisoner, by sir Wm. Vaughan's command, to Ludlow-Castle, with one Mr. Hugh Williams, where they continued till he laid down eight score pounds for their enlargement; and he can confidently affirm that no man is left out of commission, that any honest man can pretend, either by his estate or affections to the parliament to deserve to be therein employed; and he could heartily wish that he or they that gave information on this Article, would have advised who else should have been recommended for committee-men or justices. And for Mr. Edw. Williams being made solicitor; his commission was delivered upon certificate from three of the four gentlemen who are the only persons resident in the county of those that are named for the committee there; and he believes he hath been so careful in his duty, that neither corruption nor remissness can be justly charged or proved against him.—And the said sir William saith, That his son was chosen Burgess for the borough of Brecknock by the unanimous assent of the burgesses, who adjudged him a fit person to serve for them; and his fitness for that place he desires may be determined of by those amongst whom he hath the honour to sit, who have seen his demeanor, and are the only proper judges thereof; but that he kept the writ 8 months in his custody, in order thereto, is most untrue; for at his being in Brecknockshire in July 1646, having carried the writ down with him; and finding, at Ragland, that Worcester was then but upon delivery to the parliament, and that the commissioners of peace for that county were those that continued in their authority by their old commission, he thought it then no fit time for a public meeting in that town upon such an occasion, lest some ill consequence might have followed thereon; and thereupon, at his return, acquainted Mr. Prideaux, one of the then commissioners for the great seal, therewith; and, with his approbation, returned the writ to Mr. Scobel, the register, in whose custody it continued till he called for it again some five weeks before the election.

To the seventeenth Article the said sir Wm. Lewis acknowledgeth that, by the ever-honourable the earl of Essex's commission, and the approbation of both houses of parliament, he was, in the beginning of these troubles, made governor of Portsmouth; though not only without his desire but against it, as it is well known to sir John Evelyn of Wilts, a member of the honourable house of commons: That during his service there he received much of the public treasure, for which he gave such an account, as that he had his discharge from the committee for accounts, bearing date the 15th of March, 1644; and the said committee, coming to the house of commons with their certificates of that Account and others, did there publicly attest it to be both just and frugal; whereupon the house was so favourable as to vote, on the 3d of April, 1645, their approbation of his account so presented unto them, and to order 'That the committee of the Revenue should, with their soonest and best convenience, pay unto him the sum of 415*l*. 10*s*. 8*d*. part of what remained due unto him 'upon his said Account,' as appeared by the certificates above-mentioned; which evidently disproves that part of the Charge, which doth most unjustly accuse him for not accounting; of which he believes his greatest accusers are far more guilty than himself, since he never heard of any certificate made to the house of their accounts. And whereas he is likewise charged, while he was Governor there, 'frequently to have held correspondence and intelligence with the king's party, 'about the delivery up of the said garrison,' some such aspersions having been very undeservedly raised on him, during his command there, the committee of lords and commons for the safety of the kingdom were pleased to write to him to come up to London, by their letter dated the 8th of June, 1643; where the said sir William pressing, by his importunity, the said committee and earl of Essex that they would examine whatever could be alledged against him, to punish him if faulty, and right him if injured; upon the earl of Essex's Letter to the said committee, after a full examination of the business, the committee, by their letter, gave his lordship this Account following: 'Westminster, July 29, 1643.

'May it please your excellency; We have 'examined and debated the business concerning sir Wm. Lewis, as your lordship did desire; and out of all those jealousies and allegations which have been offered against him, there amounts nothing, as we can gather, which can derogate from his honour, or the public confidence reposed in him in his command at Portsmouth. This account we render to your excellency, as well to answer that which hath been referred to us by your excellency's Letter, as that which is required from us by sir Wm. Lewis's innocency. This being the state of this business, it is left in the hands of your excellency to repair this worthy gentleman in what manner you shall please; and so we take our leave, and rest, &c. Bedford, Pembroke and Montgomery, B. Denbigh, W. Say and Sele, Jo. Pym.'

The which Letter being carried to his excellency, after his perusal thereof, he wished the said sir Wm. Lewis to repair again to Portsmouth, and to take care thereof; but he having vindicated his innocency, and to manifest how little he regarded either places of honour or gain, (which others aspire to) desired to be excused, and quitted the employment.—Why, or upon what grounds, the said sir William, with divers other persons who faithfully served the parliament, was left out of the Proclamation mentioned, he knoweth not, being no ways privy to their councils, nor what his majesty was pleased to say of him; but this he knoweth, and it is generally known to that part of Hampshire where he lived, that, about October, 1643, there was plundered from him by the king's party to the value of between 2 and 3,000*l*. by means whereof, his lands being unstocked, he made not three pence of them in three years. For his estate in Brecknockshire, which by the charge, is allowed to be worth about 600*l*. per annum, it was not held worth sequestering in those parts, in regard of the taxes laid upon it; and during the time of the troubles he made little profit of his estate there or elsewhere.—And as it is no argument that some malignants in arms against the parliament did hold correspondency with them, because their estates in some places have not been yet sequestered, through negligence of the officers, or want of evidence; so he presumes it can be no proof of his complying with the king or his party, in the judgment of any indifferent person, or of his accusers, who now profess their correspondency with his majesty without the houses privy, in their late printed Letter, of July 8, 1647, to both houses, because he was not sequestered upon the same or any such like occasion; which, for ought he knows, may be the case of some other well-affected members.—As concerning colonel Price's Estate; upon the sad complaint of Mrs. Price of her necessities, he wrote a Letter to the committee only to allow unto her the fifth part of her husband's estate, according to the ordinance of parliament in that behalf, and to restore her wearing apparel which had been taken from her, (an extremity he had not heard of before used to any other) which he hopes his accusers, who now desire justice for, and indulgence towards, delinquents, which they charge as a crime in others, cannot dislike: but for the letting of colonel Price's estate, he did not intermeddle therein; but believes the tenant that rents it at 50*l.* per annum pays a full value for it to the state, considering it is charged with annuities of 120*l.* per annum issuing out of it, his wife's fifth part, and all taxes and contributions.

The said Mr. Glynn, as to the Charge in the sixteenth Article, whereby he is charged 'To procure several persons that have been commissioners of array in North Wales, to be named in commissions of peace, and other places of greater trust and command,' saith, The Article gives not any instance of any such person that he hath procured to be named a justice of peace, or any other place of trust or command, except colonel Glynn, his brother, made governor of the town and castle of Caernarvon. And for the said colonel Glynn, he avers he was never any colonel in the king's army, but constantly declared his affection to the parliament: and for that cause he was, in the beginning of the troubles, besieged in his own house, with cannon planted against it; where he was taken prisoner, his arms seized upon, himself charged with treason, and intended to be proceeded against at Shrewsbury, had not some persons interposed and procured his enlargement, upon security that he should not bear arms for the parliament; and as he hath suffered for his affection to the parliament, so he hath advantageously acted for them, by inviting major-general Mitton to come into North Wales; joining his forces with the said major-general, and relieving the parliament's forces with money; by reason whereof the county and castle of Caernarvon was reduced to the parliament's obedience, of whose eminent services the house of commons took special notice, in a Letter written unto him; and, for recompence of his sufferings for the parliament, and the great service done for them, he was made governor of Caernarvon, for the safety of those parts, and encouragement of the well-affected there.

To the eighteenth Article, whereby Mr. Glynn is charged 'To have taken Rewards of several persons for service done them in the house; and, in particular, 100*l.* paid unto his wife by the drovers of Wales, for service done them,' he saith, That the same is a false and slanderous Charge; and for the 100*l.* supposed to be given to his wife, who is dead and cannot answer for herself, the same is untrue; for Mr. Glynn lent those poor men 100*l.* out of his own money, to find them bread, which was afterwards repaid him, when they procured money upon the credit of the Excise, as will be justified by many persons of quality; besides which there was no other 100*l.* that came to his wife's hands.

Charge is general, and therefore he can make no particular Answer, but generally not guilty. Secondly, concerning the putting out of the Militia; That he was no way concerned in it; they were presented by the common-council, and chosen there when he was not present, and afterwards approved by both houses; and he cannot take upon him to give reasons to justify the acts of both houses or the common council, who are only impeached by this Charge, and must plead not guilty of intermeddling with putting in or putting out.

To the twentieth Article, where it is said, 'That sir P. Stapylton, Mr. Hollis, and sir Wm. Lewis, have, by their power and countenance, obstructed justice in the cause between alderman Langham and capt. Limery, and that of J. Gunter;' they answer, That Mr. Hollis and sir P. Stapylton, being one afternoon in the court of Requests, heard that the house of peers were then to sit, which made them go to see what the occasion was; and, coming into the lobby, found there the earl of Rutland, who told them their house met about a great business betwixt Langham and Limery, and some discourse passed concerning it; when Mr. Hollis and sir P. Stapylton said, They understood that the merits of the cause was not at all in question, only the entertaining of it upon an appeal, which they conceived was the common justice of the kingdom, and not to be denied to any: which having said, they went away; nor was it done in secret, but spoken publicly, and in the hearing of some of the counsel for Limery: and they do utterly deny the speaking of any such words as are alledged to be said by them; for they were so far from engaging their interest in it, as they do not to this day know what the lords did upon it. And sir Wm. Lewis doth absolutely deny his being there present at all, when any such conference was with the earl of Rutland; and cannot but observe there should be that signification attributed to his presence and gesture, as thereby to discover his thoughts and inclination, especially when he was not there in person. And as for the cause instanced concerning John Gunter, he conceives it to be a suit depending in chancery betwixt the father and son, both nearly related to him, but no further proceeded in than bill and answer, that he knows of; and what influence his countenance could have, so early days in the beginning of a suit, let all the world judge.

To the twenty-first Article, which concerns Mr. Nicholl only, he saith, That although his election was voted to be void by the committee of privileges, whose mere votes exclude no members from sitting in the house, where no witnesses were heard on his behalf; yet he conceives his election good, and hopes it will be thought so by the house, when they hear a true state of the cause. And whereas they object, it hath lain four years unreported; Mr. Nicholl appeals unto the house, and that worthy gentleman in whose hand that report lay, being never prosecuted by his competitor, whether he hath not endeavoured to have that report made, and the business determined: and still continues his humble request to the house for the speedy determining of the same. To the second clause Mr. Nicholl answers, That he never used any threats, menaces, or indirect practices, for the bringing in of any members, either out of Cornwall or any other country in the West: And it is well known that those worthy gentlemen there elected, and now excepted against, were fairly and duly chosen by their own interest and public demerits; and their unbiassed integrity is such, that they detest the maintaining of a faction, or carrying on of any design other than the common good. To the third clause of that Article Mr. Nicholl saith, That he continues in an office of Master of the Armory in the Tower, wherein he hath faithfully served the state for their advantage; and that since the Self-denying Ordinance passed the houses, he never received one penny of his fee from the Committee of Revenue; but confesseth to have received a rent of 34*l.* a-year, or thereabout, and a fine for two houses, which he is to be accountable for to the parliament: And it is well known that Mr. Nicholl lost a far better office, both for profit and esteem, than this, (the Customers Place of Plymouth and of all the ports in the county of Cornwall) for his fidelity to the parliament; and hath received no reparation for the same, as divers others have had for their lost offices. Besides, he hath been employed in many long and chargeable journeys, and hath expended divers great sums of money in them, which he hath borrowed of his friends; and hath yet had no satisfaction from the parliament in consideration thereof, as some of his accusers have had for meaner services.

To the twenty-second Article, Mr. Nicholl saith, That neither himself, nor any other for him, ever took one penny, directly or indirectly, for any thing done in parliament, or in any of their committees; wherein he hath had the honour to serve in some of the greatest Trust. And whereas he is charged to bring sir W. Uvedale into the house upon his coming from York, for the sum of 150*l.* it is altogether false and scandalous. Upon sir W. Uvedale's return from York, he came into the house, and sat there without any question; some time after, he had leave to retire himself into the country; and at his return to London, near two years after, the dispute grew about his admittance into the house; and he was admitted into it upon a solemn and serious debate, without the motion or procurement of Mr. Nicholl; which admission, if undue, is a charge against the whole house, not Mr. Nicholl. True it is, that when sir W. Uvedale was at York, and treasurer of the army there, Mr. Nicholl (having an assignment made him by his brother captain Humphry Nicholl, to receive an arrear due to him for his service in the north), wrote to sir W. Uvedale to send him that money: whereupon sir W. Uvedale, when he came to London sent him a sum of money as an arrear due to, his brother; but whether so much as is specified in the Article, he knows not, by reason his papers and accounts of that business are not in town. As for Mr. Nicholl's receiving of Rewards; he challenges all his accusers, (many of them having had occasion to use his poor service) and all others, to prove him guilty of receiving the least reward for any thing done by him in discharging of his public Trust. And whereas it is charged, That he discovered a Design for the searching of Greenwich-House; he saith, That about midnight, in August, as he takes it, 1642, there came an officer, with some soldiers, to his lodging, and brought with them a warrant for him to sign for the searching of Greenwich-House; which warrant he signed, and by the same officer, he sent three lines, written on an open paper, to a noble lady who lodged in the house, that she should not be frightened with the coming of soldiers in such an unseasonable hour; which lady was no servant of the queen's, but one who had given a clear demonstration of her affection to the public, by a large voluntary contribution upon the Propositions of Money and Plate: So that he hopes this will not be thought a fault to send an open paper to a person of that quality, for such purpose, by the same officer that was to put the design in execution.

As to the 23*d*, 24*th*, and 25*th* Articles, which waste themselves in a scandal touching Mr. Long alone; for to a printed imputation of Cowardice, Covetousness, and Treachery, where no particular person appears to avouch the truth, or give satisfaction for the falsehood, of such an assertion, no better name can be given; yet he, to give the world a taste of what truth they may expect in the rest, returns unto these three this Answer, That howbeit his education had not much acquainted him with military employments before the late unhappy wars, which he thinketh to be the case of many who now reckon well of their abilities in that profession; yet (through the invitation of his excellency the late lord general the earl of Essex, and the committee for the safety of the kingdom, who thought it of some importance at that time to interest persons of estate and relations, though not bred soldiers, in that employment) he did accept the command of a troop of horse under his excellency, the greatest part whereof were raised by himself and his friends; and, in the head of that troop, he charged at Edge-Hill, in the regiment then under the command of sir William Balfour, which was the first that brake into the enemy; in which charge he lost his horse, and, being left dismounted, did yet, with his single pistol in his hand, give quarter to several of the enemy; and was then, by capt. Harcourt, quarter master of his troop, remounted; continued out the service of that day and the next, and was one of the last troops that brought away the ammunition; a thing happily not known to them who gave the information for this article, seeing it was the ill-hap of some commanders that day to make an over-hasty retreat: and of some others, of no little eminency now, never to come there; much less to charge, though they quartered very near the field.—When the unexpected skirmish at Brentford happened, his troop, as the greatest part of the army besides, was dispersed: but so soon as he could get it together, he went thither and stayed there till the business was at an end: shortly after, his troop being to march towards Bristol, where some of his fellow captains, whose experience he thought as little as his own, received sudden and great commands; he declined that service under them, and intended to return to his other in the house of commons; but some disaffections and backwardness to contribute to the public service appearing in some persons of quality in the county of Essex, he was, by commission from his excellency the earl of Essex commanded thither, and authorized, with other gentlemen of that and the counties of Hertford and Bedford, to raise horse, arms, &c. upon such as had not contributed; touching which employment, without drawing the particulars into a long discourse, he saith, That he acted nothing without the concurrence of two gentlemen, at least, of his fellow commissioners; and thereof, and of what had been raised by them for the public service under that authority, he, long before any committee of accounts was settled, did publish the particulars in print; and thereof did, immediately after that committee was settled, give and pass an account upon oath; which course had others taken, who have greater accounts than these, there would hardly have been less room for this accusation: The plundering and oppression in the article mentioned, he reckons as odious as it is an untrue suggestion.—As for Mr. Thomas Manwood in the article mentioned; he much doubteth whether there be any such man residing in the county of Essex; sure he is that no protection from the then lord general's excellency was disrespected by him; and upon the best enquiry Mr. Long can make, the person intended by Mr. Thomas Manwood is no way eminent for his good affection: and what was done towards him was well warranted by the commission under which Mr. Long and those other gentlemen of that country were employed; and nothing, by countenance of that authority, was converted to Mr. Long's private advantage; And so little hath the humour of covetousness, with which the printed articles charge him, prevailed, that there will be nothing found in his accounts to be demanded for his colonel's pay; an omission of which he dares undertake to excuse them that are most willing to accuse him.—The damages sustained by Mr. Long, (not pretended, but real) mentioned in the 24th article, to be the inducement of that favour conferred upon him by the chancery-office, were under-considerations; and, together with his four years imprisonment and sufferance for his public service in former parliaments, weighed by the wisdom of that house, and his capability to execute that place, (usually discharged by able deputies, as now it is) determined by that judgment which he dares not, and thinks no men or company without these walls ought, to dispute:—And therefore to that quarrel, more against both houses than himself, he thinks himself not bound to give, and believes no wise honest Englishman will expect, or well receive, any other answer. This only he saith, That neither the eminency nor profit of the office can surely be the cause, that it only, of all the offices and benefits accepted from the parliament by other members, should be now subject to observation, and made a matter of charge.

In Answer to the twenty-fifth, and, perhaps, for the weight of it, the last Article in that printed Paper; he saith, That if any man hath, which is not known to him, seriously, or in scorn, used that scurrilous phrase of 'Parliament-Drivers,' towards him, (by reason of his more than ordinary diligence in persuading and pressing his fellow members of the honourable house of commons, according to their trust and duty, to remain in that house or return to it, when any thing hath been in debate; which in his apprehension and conscience, required their judgment, wisdom, and suffrage there), he is contented to own the fact, and leave the abuse to the author: Any unlawful carriage, in that particular, without the house, he doth deny; his demeanor within those walls, in that or aught else, no man without them ought to question or control, or he to give account of. And, for a close, he saith, That these his accusers, who have, against reason and justice, driven so many members out of the house at once, deserve the name of Parliament-Drivers, or Parliament-Riders, much more than he who desired only to continue the members within the house, according to his own and their duty.

To conclude: Upon the whole matter we do say, That it is our misfortune, not our misdoings, that we stand in this matter accused. Power may seize upon us and destroy us; but not justice, we mean the justice of man, for and in respect of these pretended crimes; not the justice of God, which we tremble at, and submit unto; and see it reach unto us, for our sins, this cup of persecution and affliction by the hands of men, the men of the world; who are themselves but the hand of God to correct his children for their good; their good is the end, though for the present it be grievous unto them; and befalls them many times occasionally, and in the eye of men, where they think themselves to be least deserving it, to make them examine themselves, and enquire where man cannot come, into their own hearts, to find out the true cause which hath provoked their God to afflict them; and so come to the knowledge of those evils and repent of them, which, otherwise, would have lain undiscovered, and, like a sleeping serpent, awaken afterwards to do them a greater mischief; which is at present our case, and we trust God will give us the grace to make this use of it: For certainly, upon the strictest scrutiny of our consciences, and enquiry into our past actions and intentions, we cannot find we have deserved this return from any that can pretend themselves to be well-wishers to the parliament and to the peace of the kingdom. We can speak it for a truth, we are of those who are peaceable and faithful in Israel: We never sought great things for ourselves: We have mourned for the desolations of this kingdom, of three kingdoms: We have endeavoured our utmost, according to our several talents, as it hath pleased God to enable us in our several places and callings, as members of the parliament, as members of the commonwealth, to do all we could, to procure a settlement in church and state; We have desired a peace; we have laboured for peace, and, willingly, have never done the least thing to keep it off: We have all of us taken the Covenant; we dare not say that we have kept it to God-ward so well as we should: but we will say, no man can lay the breach of any part of it, as to the king, parliament, or kingdom, to our charge; nor, we hope, ever shall. Nothing in this world have we more heartily desired, than to see a happy and firm reconciliation between the king and his people; him on his throne, them in their liberties; both of them encompassed with righteousness and peace, and glorying in the parliament, as the foundation of both their happiness.—Yet how we are aspersed and misrepresented, by several pamphlets and papers concerning us, and by this printed charge, let the world judge. We dare appeal even to the consciences of our accusers, if they would speak out; perhaps with some it is in truth our crime, that they know us to be such as we are; perhaps we stand in the way, and prevent some destructive designs, therefore we must be removed; and that we may so be, we must be represented to be hinderers of peace, obstructors of justice, invaders of the liberty and freedom of the subject, abusers and misleaders of the parliament: In sum, whatsoever is amiss in the kingdom, we are made the cause, and must bear the blame of it.—“Christianos ad ignem:” What public calamity soever befell in the time of the primitive persecutions, the poor Christians were said to be the cause, and must be the expiatory sacrifice: But let men say what they will, Elijah was never the more the troubler of Israel, because he was so called.—We will say with Job, ‘Our Witness is in Heaven, and our reward is on High.’ This is our comfort and our confidence; we shall be acquitted before the tribunal of heaven: and we trust in the Divine Protection to have our deliverance and justification, even here upon earth, by the judgment of man; that is, by the justice of the parliament, notwithstanding the malice of all our enemies.

The Eleven Members offer freely to withdraw.

July 20. This day Mr. Green, a member of the House of Commons, acquainted the House that he had a Message to deliver the house of the Desires of the Eleven Impeached Members, which the house voted to receive, and to be read, which was as followeth, “Whereas his excellency sir Thomas Fairfax, and the Army do declare, that the proceeding upon particular Proofs to make good the Charge, will probably take up much time, and the present affairs of the kingdom, in relation to those great matters proposed by them, do, as they say, require a speedy consideration, and that they propound, that those greater and general matters of the kingdom be first considered of and settled: and in regard it is supposed, that the absence of these Members will make way for the present more quiet proceedings, to settle the perplexed affairs of the kingdom. That they are so far from making any interruption or disturbance to the proceeding upon, or settlement of the general affairs of the kingdom, that they desire, 1. That they may have leave to be absent themselves from the house for the space of six months, to go about their particular business. 2. That they may have liberty, or so many of them as shall desire it, to go beyond the seas, and have passages granted during that space of time. 3. That by that time the said six months shall be expired, they conceive, that the great and weighty affairs, tending to the Peace and settlement of the kingdom, will be over, and the house judge it reasonable to call them to a trial.”

Votes concerning the Eleven Members.

The house debated their Desires, and upon the whole passed these votes following.

1. “That leave be given to Denzil Hollis, esq. sir Philip Stapleton, &c. for the space of six months, to be absent from the house, and to go into the country, to follow their necessary occasions of business, as they shall think fit. 2. Secondly that Denzil Hollis, sir Philip Stapleton, &c. or any of them, have leave to go beyond the seas, provided, that they return to the parliament within the space of six months after this present, to attend the house upon the business concerning the charge brought into the house, from sir Thomas Fairfax and the army, against them. 3. That Mr. Speaker grant warrants to Denzil Hollis, esq.; to sir Philip Stapleton, &c. or any of them, that shall desire to go beyond the seas, and to return within six months after this present time*.”

* The motives to these Resolutions of the commons we find thus set down by lord Hollis himself, one of the impeached Members; “These gentlemen thought it best, rather that a breach should be made upon their occasion, that through their sides the parliament should be stuck to the very heart, and die for ever, to make it their own act of forbearing the house: and therefore they told the house, they saw

July 30. Resolved upon the question by the Commons in Parliament assembled, "That Denzil Hollis, esq.; sir Philip Stapleton, sir W. Lewis, sir John Clotworthy, sir Wm. Waller, sir John Maynard, major general Massey, John Glynn, esq. Recorder of London, Walter Long, esq. col. Edward Harley, and Anthony Nicholl, esq. be received into this house to sit and vote as members thereof."

On the 2nd of August following, the Army presented to the Commissioners whom the City of London had sent to them, "A Declaration of his Excellency Sir Thomas Fairfax and his Council of War on behalf of themselves and the whole Army; shewing the grounds of their present advance towards the City of London," in which these Members are reproachfully alluded to.

August 16. Mr. Anthony Nichols, one of the Eleven Impeached Members, who had a pass from the Speaker to go into Cornwall, and two or three days since writ a letter to a commander in the army, to procure him the general's pass, he engaged not to act any thing prejudicial to the army, but was not granted him; and on his way for Cornwall was stopped by some troopers of the army, and this day brought back to the head-quarters at Kingston.

August 17. Mr. Nichols was brought to the General.

August 18. A letter was read in the house from Mr. Nichols, under restraint by the army, and it was ordered thereupon, that a letter should be written to the general, to desire that he may be discharged, or sent up to London, to answer such things as shall be objected against him.

August 21. This day we had certain intelligence of the apprehending six of the Eleven Members as they were going beyond sea, being taken within six miles of Calais: In brief it was thus; major Redman being upon the guard at Gravesend, had notice that some of the Eleven Impeached Members were passed by, and gone to Margaret's in Kent, hereupon he sent post after them, and as the messenger came to Margaret's, they hoisted sail, and were a mile at sea, inquiry being made of the fishermen what their carriage was, they replied, 'The gentlemen that went aboard were in very great haste:' One fisherman saying to them, they were in that condition they could neither protect them nor themselves: that if they would not do as Achish did to David, who bid him begone because the princes of the Philistines loved him not; yet that they would, at their humble suit and desire, be pleased to give them leave to withdraw; and to such as desired it, passes to go beyond the sea: which at last they did agree to, though truly I must say, unwillingly; but which, all said, they looked upon as a good service done to the house for preventing greater inconveniences."

* This very audacious instrument is given at large in 7 Rushw. Coll. 744, 3 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 746.

'I do not think but these are some Parliament-men flying.' Whereupon one captain Bennet who was in their company, drew his sword at him, but the fisherman being nimble of his heels escaped. The town understanding by the messenger what they were, very readily, at the beat of a drum, repaired to their colours, and forty of them, under the command of captain Lanning, a valiant seaman, put to sea in a small vessel, and within six miles of Calais overtook them, who seeing themselves pursued, made hard to windward to escape, but could not: captain Lanning plying them hard with small shot, and a frigate man of war, one captain Pierson, coming in to the assistance, the Six Members pulled down sail and yielded, viz. Mr. Denzil Hollis, sir Philip Stapleton*, sir William Waller, sir William Lewes, sir J. Clotworthy, and Mr. Walter Long, and demanded by what warrant they were apprehended; answer was made, pretending it to be by sir Thomas Fairfax his warrant. They earnestly prest a free passage beyond sea, and great invitations had the seamen to let them escape, but it would not be, so they desired to be brought aboard captain Batten at Deal, which accordingly they were, but they were dismist and sent to sea by captain Batten, and the seamen who apprehended them found threatened, and sufficiently reviled against by parson major Kem.

August 24. This day a Letter was read in the House of Commons from his excellency sir Thomas Fairfax, and it was concerning Mr. Anthony Nicholls, one of the Eleven Impeached Members sent up prisoner from the Army on Saturday last, and committed to custody with the grounds of his detainment by the Army, and a further Accusation of High Treason against him: The House had debate of the General's Letter, and ordered that master Nicholls should be continued in safe custody.—But after a short time, the houses were informed, that the said Mr. Nicholls being committed to the custody of one Denham, one of the Serjeant's deputies, was escaped from him.

* "Stapleton died at Calais as soon as he landed, and was denied burial, upon imagination that he had died of the plague: others remained a long time beyond the seas; and, though they long after returned, never were received into any trust in those times, nor in truth concurred, or acted in the public affairs, but retired to their own estates, and lived very privately." Clarendon.

"Sir Philip Stapleton and Mr. Long, went together in a ship to France, where that gallant English gentleman sir Philip Stapleton fell sick at sea, and grew more sick on shore at Calais, and within two or three days died there, as some suspected, of the plague. Others of the Eleven Members went to other parts, and some of them retired into their countries, and there lived privately; Mr. Hollis continued divers years after in Britania in France." Whitelocke.

—The said Denham was called in, and the House demanded of him how he came to escape; he answered, that passing his word as he was a gentleman, to be a safe prisoner, he gave him his liberty, and thereupon he escaped. The house upon debate hereof, ordered that the said Denham should be committed: And ordered further, That all the ports in England and Wales should be stopped for apprehending of the said Mr. Nicholls; and this Order to be sent to them with speed: Also it was ordered, that the Pass formerly granted by the Speaker, should be revoked and made void.

Letters from France tell of six of the Eleven Impeached Members landed at Calais, but that sir Philip Stapleton soon after his landing, died at Calais of the plague, the rest are gone to Flushing, very much sad at the sudden death of sir Philip.

September 4. The House of Commons this day, proceeded further in the Report from the Committee for examination of the late Tumult and Force upon the Parliament, and the whole day was spent in this particular business; something was first considered of in the case of Mr. Baynton; and this, as a leading case, brought on the Report, how far some other Members of that House had engaged, or were concerned in the late Tumult or Design of a new War; and upon this debate several of the Impeached Members were concerned; and at last it was voted and ordered, that summons from the house of commons should be made out for Mr. Denzil Hollis, sir William Waller, sir John Clotworthy, major general Massey, colonel Walter Long, and Mr. Anthony Nicholls, members of that house, to attend the house the 16th Oct. next, to answer such things as shall be objected against them.—It was also, upon debate, further ordered, That Mr. Glynn, the Recorder of London, should attend the house on Monday next, to answer as aforesaid.—And that sir John Maynard should also attend the house on Tuesday next; and the Sergeant at Arms attending that house had direction to send notice forthwith of the said Orders, at their respective houses or lodgings.

September 6. Mr. Glynn, Recorder of London, attended the House of Commons, according to the Order on Saturday last, to answer the Charge against him: but the house being then very attentive about the business of sending the Propositions to the King, Mr. Recorder was put off till the next day.

September 7. John Glynn, esq. Recorder of London, and sir John Maynard, appeared in the House of Commons, when the Speaker informed them, That there had been a Report made, in which were some things that highly concerned them, this being read, Mr. Glynn instantly gave a general Answer to many of the matters objected against him, and a particular one to others. After which, the question being put, Whether John Glynn, esq. Recorder of London, be discharged from being a Member of this house? it passed in the affirmative,

58 against 52, and he was discharged accordingly. Sir John Maynard refused to answer to any of the Informations that were read against him, but prayed that he might have counsel assigned him, and withdrew. On which it was resolved, without division, "That sir John Maynard be expelled the house and committed prisoner to the Tower." Resolved also, "That an Impeachment of High Treason be prepared and brought in against him."

September 8. Sir John Maynard was carried prisoner to the Tower, according to the order yesterday; and Mr. Recorder received his Sentence in the commons house; but it was ordered that his commitment to the Tower should be dispensed withal for a week, that he may have time to sort and deliver up his Papers and Writings in relation to his place of Recorder of London, or to his clients at law, and to remain in custody.

September 16. The Commons resumed the debate concerning the Impeached Members, and ordered an Impeachment of high crimes and misdemeanors to be brought in against Mr. Recorder Glynn, prisoner in the Tower.

October 27. An Impeachment against sir John Maynard was read, and assented to.

January 27, 1648. The House considered of the Charge against the Eleven Members, and in particular that against sir John Maynard, which was formerly read in the said house. The house ordered to prosecute the said Charge; and to that purpose ordered the same to be sent to the lords.

The House then voted, That Mr. Hollis should be disabled ever to sit as a member of that house during this present parliament. The like Order was made against sir William Lewis, Mr. Nicholls, sir John Clotworthy, sir William Waller, col. Massey, and col. Long.

January 29. The House of Commons, according to the former order, considered further of the business concerning the Eleven Impeached Members of the house of commons, and the Seven Members of the house of peers, one whereof was anew impeached on Thursday last. This business admitted of much debate; and, upon the result of all, it was resolved upon and voted, That the rest of the Eleven Members of the house should be impeached of High Treason, in the same manner as sir John Maynard was on Thursday last; except sir William Lewis, who, for some reasons extraordinary, was to be impeached only of High Crimes and Misdemeanors.

The House then considered of the place of Mr. Glynn, (who is one of the Eleven) late Recorder of the city of London, and ordered that one Mr. Steele should be chosen in his place.

February 1. The Articles of Impeachment against sir John Maynard were carried up to the house of lords, and are as follows: viz.

ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT of the Commons in parliament assembled, against sir JOHN MAYNARD, Knight of the Bath, whereby he stands charged of High Treason, and other high Crimes and Misdemeanors.

I. That the said sir John Maynard hath, maliciously and traitorously, endeavoured, combined, and conspired to subvert the freedom of parliament.

II. That, upon the 30th of July last, and divers days before and since, he, the said sir John, at the Guildhall, and other places within the cities of London and Westminster, and county of Middlesex, hath, maliciously and traitorously, plotted and endeavoured to raise and levy war; and accordingly, then and there, hath, maliciously and traitorously, raised and levied war against the parliament, king, and kingdom.

III. That whereas, on the 26th of July last past, a great company of Reformado officers, soldiers, apprentices, and other dissolute and desperate persons, (many whereof have been in arms against the parliament) being tumultuously assembled at Westminster-Hall, and parts adjacent, within the city of Westminster and liberties thereof, did, by a most horrid force and violence, possess themselves of the doors and passages of the houses of parliament in Westminster aforesaid, (the members of the said houses then sitting in parliament) and did then and there, contrary to the honour and freedom of parliament, threaten, aid, for divers hours, imprison, the said members so sitting in parliament; and, by the said menacing imprisonment, and violence, did force the said houses to pass an Ordinance of parliament, for the revoking and making void an Ordinance made the 23d of July abovesaid, concerning the Militia of London, and for the constituting of sir John Gayer, knt. Tho. Adams, James Bunce, Aldermen, and others, citizens of the city of London, a committee of the Militia of the said city, and parts adjacent within the lines of communication: and did likewise, then and there, forcibly enter into the said houses of parliament, and forced the members of the said houses to pass such Votes as they, the said tumultuous persons, then and there required; and did then and there violently assault the persons of the Speakers, and divers members of both houses then attending on the parliament; and, by their violent menacings and assaults, did force the said Speakers, and divers members, from their attendance in parliament. And whereas sir Tho. Fairfax, knt. and the army under his command, was formerly, by both houses of parliament, raised and maintained, and is still continued, for the safety and defence of the parliament and the kingdom; and the said sir Tho. Fairfax and the said Army, hearing of the said horrid force and violence offered to the said houses of parliament as aforesaid, did march towards the cities of London and Westminster to suppress the said tumults, and to restore the said houses of parliament, and the members thereof, to their just freedom, safety, and honour; and to secure the said houses of parliament from the like violence and traitorous attempts for the future, he, the said sir J. Maynard, knowing of the said horrid force and violence, and that the said Ordinance, for the Militia of London, so by force obtained as aforesaid, was void and null, and that the said sir Tho. Fairfax, and the Army under his command, were marching towards the cities of London and Westminster, for the intents and purposes aforesaid, he, the said sir John Maynard, for the better advancing of his traitorous purposes, designs, and actions as aforesaid, did, on the 30th of July aforesaid, and divers days since, with Denzil Hollis, and Walter Long, esqrs. Francis lord Willoughby of Parham, col. Edw. Massey, col. Sydenham Pointz, and divers others, meet at the Guildhall aforesaid, and other places within the cities of London and Westminster, and county of Middlesex; and did, then and there, sit with, and traitorously consult, abet, and maintain the said sir John Gayer, alderman James Bunce, and others of the said pretended Militia, in putting in execution the said pretended Ordinance for the said pretended Militia of London, so by force obtained as aforesaid; and, together with the said Denzil Hollis, Walter Long, Francis lord Willoughby of Parham, sir John Gayer, alderman James Bunce, and others, did traitorously and maliciously plot, contrive, and order the raising of another Army to embroil the kingdom in a new and bloody war; and did, traitorously and maliciously, at the time and place, and with the persons aforesaid, plot, contrive, and order the levying, raising, listing, arming and arraying several forces, both of horse and foot, for the maintenance of the said new and bloody war against the king, parliament, and kingdom, and to ruin and destroy the said Army under the command of the said sir Tho. Fairfax, raised for the defence of the parliament and kingdom as aforesaid, add to prevent and hinder them from vindicating the honour and safety of parliament as aforesaid, and the said several forces, both of horse and foot as abovesaid, were listed, raised, and levied accordingly; sundry of them having been aiding and abetting to the abovesaid horrid force and violence amongst the said soldiers, officers, and tumultuous persons as abovesaid, upon the said 26th of July last past, against the said houses of parliament as abovesaid.

IV. And, in further pursuance of the said traitorous purposes and designs, he the said sir John Maynard, knowing of the said horrid force and violence, did, together with the said Denzil Hollis, Walter Long, and Francis lord Willoughby of Parham, on the 30th of July aforesaid, at the Guildhall, and other places aforesaid, traitorously order and appoint the Reformado officers, which, by former Ordinance of parliament, were commanded to depart forth of the lines of communication, to rendezvous in a certain place in Westminster, and liberties thereof, commonly called St. James's Fields, to be listed, and put into a regimental way; to the intent to be arrayed, armed, and employed for the destruction of the Army under the command of sir Tho. Fairfax, and all such as did adhere to them, and did then and there, traitorously order, direct, and cause to be raised and levied 18 regiments of the Trained Bands of the cities of London and Westminster, and the Auxiliary Bands, and all other forces of the said cities, and the sailors, watermen, and seamen within or near the river Thames, to be mustered, arrayed, armed, and put into a warlike posture, to be employed in the said war, traitorously contrived, levied, and raised by him, the said sir John Maynard, and the persons abovenamed, against the king, parliament and kingdom, and the said Army of the Parliament, under the command of sir Tho. Fairfax.

V. That, on the said 30th of July last, he the said sir John Maynard, at the Guildhall aforesaid, together with the said Denzil Hollis, Walter Long, esqrs. Francis lord Willoughby of Parham, and others, in pursuance of his said traitorous plots and contrivances, did traitorously order, command, and appoint the raising, seizing, and listing of all horses, geldings, and mares within the cities of London and Westminster, and lines of communication, and ten miles distant, to be employed in the said new and bloody war, so as aforesaid traitorously raised and levied by him, and the persons in this Article afore-mentioned, against the king, parliament, and kingdom.

VI. The said sir John Maynard, with other the persons afore-named, at the Guildhall aforesaid, upon the 3rd of August last, and divers days before and since, did traitorously order and command the officers of the Ordnance within the Tower of London, to issue 400 barrels of powder, and 4,000 muskets and other arms, ammunition; and provisions for war, formerly provided by the said houses of parliament for the defence of the kingdom, and to furnish the said Army of the parliament under the command of sir Thomas Fairfax, and the Navy at sea appointed for the safety and defence of the kingdom; to be employed and used for the arming and arraying of the said Reformado officers and soldiers, raised and listed as aforesaid for the maintenance of the said new and bloody war, so as aforesaid traitorously plotted, contrived, and fomented by him and the persons aforesaid, and to be employed, for the destruction of the said parliament's Army under the command of sir Thomas Fairfax, and the subjects of the kingdom adhering to, and joining with, the said Army of the king, parliament, and kingdom.

VII. That whereas sir John Maynard, with others afore-named, in pursuance of their said traitorous and malicious designs to embroil the kingdom in a new and bloody war, and to fight against the parliament's Army, then marching up towards London, for the purposes before recited, did, at the time and place, abovesaid, cause a Declaration, (framed by some person within the city of London, containing matter of reproach and scandal of the Army, doing their duty in the service of the parliament; and reflecting on the authority and freedom of parliament in several of their Ordinances, lawfully and duly passed; and abetting the Engagement declared against by the said houses of parliament the 23rd of July then instant, as a traitorous and seditious design of divers ill-affected persons in and about London, and parts adjacent; and to bring in the king, without security and satisfaction first given to both kingdoms, as was insisted on by the parliaments of both kingdoms; and tending to engage the rest of the kingdom with them in the said war against the parliament and Army) to be published in all or most of the churches and chapels within London and lines of communication, in or upon the 1st of August last past.—By all which designs, endeavours, and actions, he, the said sir John Maynard, hath traitorously laboured to ruin and destroy the king, parliament and kingdom; for all which they do impeach him of High Treason against the king, his crown and dignity.

And the said Commons, by protestation, saving to themselves a liberty of exhibiting, at any time hereafter, any further Accusation or Impeachment against the said sir John Maynard, and also of replying to the Answers that the said sir John Maynard shall make to the said Articles, or to any of them, and of offering further proof of the premises, or any of them, or of any other Impeachment or Accusation that shall be exhibited by them, as the cause shall, according to the course of parliament, require, do pray that the said sir John Maynard may be put to answer all and every of the premises; and that such proceedings, examinations, trial, and judgment may be upon every of them had and used, as is agreeable to law and justice.

Feb. 3. The Lords made the following Order: "That the lieutenant of the Tower do bring sir John Maynard to the bar, on Saturday morning next, to receive his charge of High Treason, and other High Crimes and Misdemeanors, brought up from the House of Commons against him."

Feb. 5. The Lieutenant of the Tower having brought sir John Maynard to the bar of the House of Lords, the Speaker told him, "That the lords did send for him to appear this day to receive his Articles of High Treason, and other High Crimes and Misdemeanors, brought up from the Commons against him;" and commanded him to kneel at the bar as a delinquent. Sir John refused; but desired that the doors of the house might be set open for any body to come in that would, and this house not be made private, as the Council Table was; and he said, This way of Articles was not a way of proceeding of this kingdom; therefore he, being a commoner of England, and a free-born subject, ought to be tried as a commoner, by Bill or Indictment in the inferior courts of justice; and desired counsel to speak to it. He also, being again commanded to kneel as a delinquent, refused, saying, "He did not come to make bargains." Upon this the house commanded sir John to withdraw, and the lords ordered that he should be fined 500*l.* for his refusal, in not submitting himself to the usual and ordinary way of proceeding of their house, upon Articles brought from the Commons against him.

Then the Lords commanded sir John to be brought in again, and the Speaker told him, "That their lordships had fined him 500*l.* for his refusal, in not submitting himself to the usual and ordinary way of proceeding of that house, upon Articles brought up from the Commons against him; and let him know that the lords had ordered, That the Articles brought up from the Commons, the 28th of January last, should be read." He refused to hear them read. However the Articles being read, the Speaker told him, "Now his Articles having been read, he might have a copy of them if he would; and that he is to put in his Answer to them within fourteen days." He replied, "He did not hear them read, and protested against the reading of them; and that these Articles brought up against him were not believed by them that drew them up: and he said (comparing this proceeding against him with the proceedings of the Council Table) that he did admire the justice of the Council Table, in regard of the arbitrary proceedings against him here." After this he was commanded to withdraw, and the Lords ordered that the said sir John being impeached by Articles of the Commons assembled in Parliament, whereby he stands charged of High Treason, and other High Crimes, Misdemeanors, and Offences, shall stand committed to the Tower, there to be kept in safe custody until the pleasure of their house be further signified.—A warrant was immediately issued in that behalf; and it was ordered that the Fine of 500*l.* imposed upon him, be presently esteemed into the exchequer.

Feb. 8. This day the House of Peers received from sir John Maynard another Protestation, in which he gives them to understand he ought to be tried by a Jury, for which he quotes Magna Charta, and the lord Coke, and that he may except against thirty-five of the Jury, without shewing cause, that none are to be his Judges that have acted in the same, whereof he is accused; with much more to the same purpose. The Lords ordered he bring in his Answer by Saturday next.

March 2. The House of Commons ordered, That a Writ should be issued for electing a Burgess in the place of Mr. Anthony Nicholls, one of the Eleven Impeached Members, who is disabled ever to sit as a Member of Parliament.

March 3. The House ordered, That Mr. Speaker should grant his Warrant to the clerk of the crown for election of a Burgess to serve in parliament for the town of Maldon in the place of sir John Clotworthy, one of the Eleven Impeached Members.

April 12. Sir John Maynard put in his Answer to the House of Peers, pleading Not Guilty to the charge of High Treason framed against him.

May 23. The Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons of the City of London, in Common Council assembled, presented a Petition to the House of Commons, praying, amongst other things, "That the Aldermen now in the Tower, the Recorder, and the rest of their fellow citizens restrained upon the same occasion, may be discharged and restored; whereby the city may be the better united, their hands strengthened, and they made more serviceable to the parliament and city for their preservation and safety; which they shall endeavour, to the utmost of their power and abilities."

The Lords returned them thanks, and gave them assurance, "To take all opportunities for a speedy Settlement of a safe Peace in both kingdoms, according to the Covenant, and endeavour to prevent a new bloody war, That upon the Impeachment sent from the Commons, they proceeded no otherwise than as usual in course of parliaments: the Recorder, and the rest not impeached, they will endeavour their release."

Mr. Speaker, by the command of the House of Commons, acquainted them, "That as to the business concerning the Aldermen in the Tower, it is a business of very serious and important consideration; they have therefore resolved to resume the debate of it on this day sevensnight."

The Commons, upon further debate of this Petition, ordered, "That Mr. Glynn, Recorder of the city, should be discharged from any proceedings upon the Vote for his Impeachment."

June 3. The House of Commons considered of the business of the Eleven Members, and ordered, "That the Votes, whereby Denzil Hollis, sir John Maynard, knight, sir William Waller, knight, sir William Lewis, knt. colonel Edward Massey, sir John Clotworthy, knight, Anthony Nicolls, esq. and Walter Long, esq. stand accused by this house, be fully discharged."

June 6. The Lords concurred with the Commons, and resolved not to proceed any further against the Eleven Members.

June 7. The House was informed, That many of the Inhabitants of Westminster were at the door; they were called in and presented a Petition to the house, wherein they desired, "That Mr. Glynn, who was formerly chosen to serve in parliament for them, might be re-admitted into the house." The House hereupon ordered, "That the former Vote for disabling Mr. Recorder Glynn to be a member of the house of commons, should be henceforth revoked and made void."

June 19. The Case of Mr. Walter Long (one of the Eleven) was reported; and the house voted to receive him in again. Upon the case of sir John Clotworthy, in whose stead is since chose Mr. Mildmay, the house voted, That it be referred to the Committee for Privileges to examine, and make report to the house.

June 26. The Committee of Privileges made report to the house, of the Case of sir John Clotworthy (one of the Eleven) and Mr. Mildmay, and after some debate it was voted, 'That the election of Mr. Mildmay was void, and that the former order, prohibiting sir John Clotworthy and Mr. Mildmay to sit in the house till farther order, be revoked; and that be said sir John be re-admitted.'

On December the 6th, 1648, the day of Colonel Pride's Purge, col. Whaley presented to the House of Commons a Paper bearing the following title, "To the hon. the Commons of England in parliament assembled, The humble Proposals and Desires of his excellency the ord Fairfax and the general council of officers, Dec. 6, 1648, in order to a speedy prosecution of justice, and the settlement formerly propounded by them." The preamble and two first demands are as follow: "Having with others, for a long while sadly beheld and tasted, in your proceedings, the miserable fruits of councils divided and corrupted by faction and personal interest, even to the neglecting, betraying, and casting away all public good; to the lengthening out of endless troubles, burdens, and damage; to the continuance and widening of that issue of blood, whereby these nations have been so long polluted and consumed; and to the perpetual hazard, bondage, and destruction of them at last: and seeing no other or better way, we propound and demand as followeth: 1. Whereas Denzil Hollis, esq. Lionel Copley, esq. major-gen. Massey, and others of your members whose names you well know, were, in 1647, impeached by us for Treason, or for high Crimes and Misdemeanors, in relation to the treasonable Engagement in the city of London, the violence then done upon the parliament; the levying of a new war, and other evils in maintenance and prosecution thereof; and, upon clear proofs against them, were, by your censure, expelled the house, and disabled from further trust therein; and, upon new writs issued out, new members were chosen and returned in some of their places; and yet, by the prevalence of their faction, when in the last summer's wars, divers faithful members were engaged abroad upon necessary public service, and others, through malignant tumults and disturbances, could not safely attend the house, the same persons were afterwards re-admitted to sit in the house and vote as formerly, without any trial or satisfaction in the things whereof they were accused: we demand that all those members so impeached may be forthwith secured, and brought to justice; and such others as are of their faction may be secluded from the house. 2. Whereas, by the confederacy of major-gen. Brown, now sheriff of London, with the said impeached members and others, the Scots were invited and drawn in to invade this kingdom the last summer; insomuch as when, upon their actual invasion, the house proceeded to declare them enemies, and those that adhered to them traitors; yet the said confederates, and other treacherous members, to the number of 90 and odd, as upon the division of the house appeared, did, by their counsels and votes, endeavour to hinder the house from declaring against their confederate invaders: we desire that the said major-gen. Brown may be also secured and brought to judgment; and that the rest of the 90 and odd persons, dissenting against the said Vote, may be excluded the house."

And on the 12th of the same month, The Commons being met, pursuant to adjournment, they proceeded upon the Proposals and Desires of the Army, which were read a second time; but the result, contained in several clauses, we are told by the editor of the printed Journals, was obliterated by an Order of March the 2nd, 1659: however, these Votes we are enabled to supply, the house having ordered them to be printed and published about a month after the passing of them: Resolved, "That the Votes of the 7th and 8th of June last, 'For revoking the Orders of the 7th and 9th Sept. and the 27th Jan. 1647, disabling commissary Lionel Copley, and also Denzil Hollis, esq. sir Philip Stapylton, &c. from being members of this house,' was of a dangerous consequence, tending to the destruction of the justice and peace of this kingdom; and is hereby repealed."

178. The Case of DAVID JENKINS, esq. a Welsh Judge, for publishing Seditious Books,* and for passing Sentence of Death on Persons for not assisting against the Parliament: 23 CHARLES I. A. D. 1647. [6 and 7 Rushw. Coll. Whitelocke's Memorials. Jenkinsius Redivivus.]

BRIEF Notices of different particulars of this Case, are given detachedly by Rushworth and Whitelocke; and the Judge himself has left us some very bold and spirited accounts of his bold and spirited carriage, and arguments in the course of it.—Rushworth's Account is as follows:

June 22, 1647. The House of Commons this day had debate of the business against Judge Jenkins, Prisoner in the Tower, and appointed Mr. Solicitor St. John to prosecute against them in the King's Bench, according to Law, this Term, and the Publishers of his Books. And Mr. Serjeant Jermin, Mr. Bradshaw, and Mr. Prynne ordered to prepare the Matter of Fact against him, and Mr. Beck to be the Solicitor.

January 14, 1648. The House this day ordered, That Judge Jenkins be this term brought to his Trial, and that the Charge against him be presented effectually. *

February 15. A Report was made of the carriage of Judge Jenkins at the Chancery-Bar on Monday last, whither he was brought as Defendant, upon an action at law for Monies, and being demanded to give in his Answer, he gave in a Paper, "That he could not, nor ought, nor would not submit to the power of that Court;" and in sum said, "That it was no Court, and their Seal was counterfeit," with much more to that purpose: upon which the House ordered a Committee to draw up an Ordinance of Impeachment against him for High Treason, and to dispatch the same forthwith.

February 17. An Ordinance was reported to the House for the attainting of Judge Jenkins of High Treason, which was read, and much debate had thereon, and ordered to commit it to a Committee.

February 19. The Ordinance for attainting of Judge Jenkins of High Treason, was again for the Army, touching the eight Queries." They are all written in a high strain of loyalty, and with bold and bitter enmity to the Parliament. As Mr. Luders has expressed it, "Judge Jenkins, who was imprisoned by the Parliament for his enmity to them, employed his hours of confinement, in collecting together the various acts of Law-Tyranny which they had practised." See the note to St. John's Argument in Lord Strafford's case: ante, vol. 3, p. 1487. The Parliament, on the other hand, were inveterate in their hostility against him, and to the last, insisted that he should be exempted from pardon: Upon this point, Mr. Prynne, in his celebrated Speech on "the King's Answer to the Propositions of both Houses" says of Judge Jenkins that he "is aged, scarce worth your execution." See 3 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 1170.

* "Friday, 14 Jan." says Clement Walker, "After a long debate it was ordered, That Sir Lewis Dives, Sir John Stowell and David Jenkins be tried as Traytors at the King's Bench; the Grand Jury had found the Bill against Jenkins. Mr. Solicitor, &c. appointed to manage this business, but Jenkins is so great a lawyer, that the Solicitor durst not venture upon him, the long sword being more powerful in his mouth than the law; wherefore the Solicitor found an error in the indictment, turned him back again upon the house to be impeached before the Lords, to whose jurisdiction he pleaded; so the Solicitor put the affront from himself upon the houses."

reported to the house, and the Proofs upon the Matters of Fact mentioned therein, were fully debated; and upon the whole, the house being satisfied with the proofs, passed the Ordinance, and the Lords concurrence to be desired.

February 21. This day the House of Commons, according to former order, had before them Judge Jenkins; he being brought in by the Serjeant at Arms, was commanded to kneel at the Commons bar, but very obstinately refused, and with many bold expressions denied the authority of parliament, charging them with wronging the king, wishing the laws might be protected, but that there could be no laws without the king; terrifying the parliament with the king's great issue, using many other high words in derogation of the parliament and their authority; in short, his whole deportment before the house, was the very same with his carriage at the Chancery bar, the last term.

The House then commanded him to withdraw; they had in debate his obstinate behaviour and words, which they voted to be "a high Breach of Privilege of the House," and fined him 1,000*l.* for his Contempt.

Afterwards he was again brought before the House, when his Charge was read unto him, which contains, "That he had condemned, or past sentence upon men to be hanged, drawn and quartered, for not assisting against the Parliament: That he took up arms himself a Judge, and a colonel was ordinary; that he stirred up others to levy war, and assist against the parliament; and accused the parliament of, and charged them with counterfeiting the great seal." Being asked what he had to say, He answered, That they had no power to try him; and would give no other answer.

After this, the Witnesses to prove the matter of fact in the said Charge, were called in; and Mr. Speaker, according to the order of the house, acquainted them with the danger of giving false Evidence to the house, to sway the judgment of that honourable house, and thereby bring the guilt of innocent blood upon themselves.

They were also required to give their Evidence concerning the Carriage of Judge Jenkins at the Chancery bar, and of his throwing in a scandalous Paper into that court; upon all which many witnesses were called into the house, to prove the matter of fact contained in the said Charge, which was fully done; and, the house being satisfied with the said Evidence, they proceeded to the reading of the Ordinance of Impeachment against him the third time, which was assented unto, and ordered to be sent to the lords for their concurrence.

May 11. The Lords were this day desired by Message from the House of Commons, to pass the Ordinance against Judge Jenkins.

November 7. The House fell into debate concerning the rest of the seven exempted persons, and voted, That Judge Jenkins be one of the Seven excepted from Pardon.

The following are the Particulars noted by Whitelocke.

May 11, 1647. A printed Paper called "Judge Jenkins his Vindication," and another called "Dudley Digges of the Illegality of Subjects taking Arms against their Sovereign," was referred to the Committee of Complaints, and the Printers and Publishers thereof to be tried at the King's Bench.

June 22. Order for proceedings against Judge Jenkins; and Mr. Solicitor St. John, serjeant Jermyn, Mr. Bradshaw, and Mr. Prynne to prosecute him.

January 14, 1648. Orders for remanding the earl of Cleveland to the Tower, and for sir Lewis Dives to be kept in safe custody, and for Mr. Solicitor to prosecute him, and sir Jo. Stowel, and Judge Jenkins to Trial next term.

February 15. Upon information, That Judge Jenkins being brought as a Defendant to the Chancery bar, and required to answer a Bill there against him, for a foul Cheat and Breach of Trust (as some alledged); Judge Jenkins told the court, "That he ought not, nor would submit to the power of that court, for that it was no court, and their seal was counterfeit." The House referred it to a Committee to draw up an Impeachment of Treason against him.

February 19. Upon hearing of Proofs, the Ordinance passed, to be sent up to the Lords, for attainting of Judge Jenkins.

February 21. Judge Jenkins brought to the bar of the House, refused to kneel, denied their authority, told them, "That they wronged the king, willing that the Laws might be protected, that there could be no law without a king," and used high expressions against the parliament, and their authority.

The House fined him 1,000*l.* for his Contempt.

At another time when his Charge was read against him at the bar, "For giving judgment of death against men for assisting the parliament, and for being himself in Arms against the parliament, and persuading others to do the like, and for denying the power of the parliament, &c." and asked what he had to say thereunto, he told them, "That they had no power to try him," and he would give no other answer..

After many Witnesses examined in the house, to prove the matters of fact contained in the Charge, the House passed the Ordinance for impeaching of Judge Jenkins, and ordered it to be sent up to the Lords.

April 18. The Commons desired the Lords to proceed upon the impeachments against the Seven Lords, and against the citizens, and against Judge Jenkins.

May 8. The Lords were put in mind to proceed against Judge Jenkins.

November 7. The House voted, That Judge Jenkins shall be one of the Seven Persons excepted from Pardon.

March 14, 1649. Upon a Report from the council of state, the House of Commons voted,

That sir Jo. Stowell and Judge Jenkins be tried for their life.

July 10, 1650. An Act passed for the trial of sir John Stowell, David Jenkins, Walter Slingsby, Brown Bushell, William Davenant, and C. Gerrard, by an High Court of Justice.

October 15, 1651. Several Petitions from Mr. Jenkins, Mr. Case, and others who were in the Conspiracy with Mr. Love, by way of humble Acknowledgment and Submission*.

The Parliament pardoned them all, and ordered the Commissioners of the Great Seal to pass their Pardons.

Judge Jenkins has left us the following Articles written and published by himself, relative to the Proceedings against him :

THE VINDICATION OF JUDGE JENKINS, PRISONER IN THE TOWER, APRIL 29, 1647.

I was convened upon Saturday the 10th of this month of April before a Committee of the House of Commons, wherein master Corbet had the chair; and I was there to be examined upon some questions then to be propounded to me; to which questions I refused to give any other Answer than that which was set down in a Paper I then delivered to the said Mr. Corbet, which followeth in these words :

"Gentlemen; I stand committed by the House of Commons for High Treason, for not acknowledging nor obeying the power of the two Houses, by adhering to the King in this war; I deny this to be Treason, for the supreme and only power by the laws of this land is in the king: If I should submit to any examination derived from your power, which by the Negative Oath stands in opposition to the king's power, I should confess the power to be in you, and so condemn myself, for a Traitor, which I neither ought nor will do.

"I am sworn to obey the King, and the laws of the land; you have not power to examine me by those laws, but by the king's writ, patent or commission: if you can produce either thereof I will answer the Questions you shall propound; otherwise I cannot answer thereto, without the breach of my Oath, and the violation of the laws, which I will not do to save my life.

"You yourselves, all of you this Parliament, have sworn that the king is our only and supreme governor: your Protestation, your Vow, and Covenant, your solemn League and Covenant, your Declarations, all of them published to the kingdom, that your scope is the maintainance of the laws; those laws are and must be derived to us, and enlivened by the only supreme governor, the fountain of justice, and the life of the law, the king. The Parliaments are called by his writs, the Judges sit by his patents, so of all other officers, the cities and towns corporate govern by the king's Charters; and therefore since by the law I cannot be examined by you, without a power derived by his majesty, I neither can, nor will, nor ought you to examine me upon any questions, but if as a private gentleman, you shall be pleased to ask me any questions, I shall really and truly answer every such question, as you shall demand.

This Paper hath been mis-represented to the good people of this city by a printed one styling it my Recantation, which I own not; and besides is in itself repugnant: (just like these times) the body falls out with the head. To vindicate myself from that Recantation, and to publish to the world the reality of the Paper then delivered to Mr. Corbet, and the matter therein contained, I have published this ensuing discourse.

No person who hath committed Treason, Murder, or Felony, hath any assurance at all for so much as an hour of life, lands or goods, without the king's gracious pardon, 27 H. 8. chap. 24.

The King is not virtually in the two houses at Westminster, whereby they may give any assurance at all to any person, in any thing, for any such offence.

1. The House of Commons have declared to the kingdom in their Declaration of the 28th of November last, to the Scots Papers, p. 8. "That the king at this time is not in a condition to govern." No person or thing can derive a virtue to other men, or things, which itself hath not; and therefore it is impossible that they should have a virtue from the king to govern, which they declare he hath not himself to give.

2. The Law of the land is, "That no person in any parliament hath a voice in the House of Commons, but that he stands a person to all intents and purposes as if he had never been elected or returned, if before he sit in the house, he take not his oath upon the holy Evangelists, that the king's majesty is the only and supreme governor over all persons in all causes." [5 Eliz. c. 1.] All the members of the said house have taken it, and at all times as they are returned do take it; otherwise they have no colour to intermeddle with the public affairs. How does this solemn and legal oath agree with their said Declaration. "That the king is in no condition to govern?" By the one it is sworn, he is the only supreme governor, by the other, that he is not in a condition to govern.

3. The oath is not, that the king was or ought to be, or had been, before he was seduced by ill council, our only and supreme governor in all causes over all persons; but in the present tense, "that he is our only and supreme governor," at this present in all causes and over all persons. So they the same persons swear one thing, and declare to the kingdom the contrary of the same thing, at the same time, is that which concerneth the well of all this nation.

4. The Ministers in the pulpits do not say, what they swear in the house of commons. Who ever heard since this unnatural War, any of their presbyters attribute that to his majesty which they swear? The reason is this, their oath is taken at Westminster amongst themselves: that which their ministers pray and preach, goes amongst the people. To tell the people that the king is now their only and supreme governor in all causes, is contrary to that the houses do now practise, and to all they act and maintain. The two houses forsooth, are the only and supreme governors in default of the king, for that he hath left his great council, and will not come to them, and yet the king desires to come, but they will not suffer him, but keep him prisoner at Holmby: so well do their actions and oaths agree.

5. They swear now, king Charles is their only and supreme Governor; but with a resolution at the time of the Oath taking, and before and after, that he shall not be only or supreme governor, or only and supreme, but not any governor at all: for there is no point of government, but for some years past they have taken to themselves, and used his name only, to abuse and deceive the people.

6. That this virtual power is a mere fiction, their Propositions sent to Oxford, to Newcastle, to be signed by the king, do prove it so. What needs this ado, if they have the virtual power with them at Westminster?

7. To affirm that the King's power (which is the virtue they talk of) is separable from his person, is High Treason by the law of this land; which is so declared by that learned man of the law, sir Edward Coke; so much magnified by this present parliament, who in the 7th part of his Reports in Calvin's case, fol. 11, saith thus. "In the reign of Edward the 2nd, the Spencers the father and son, to cover the Treason hatched in their hearts, invented this damnable opinion, that homage and oath of allegiance was more by reason of the king's crown, (that is of his politic capacity) then by reason of the person of the king: upon which opinion they inferred three execrable and detestable consequences. 1. If the king do not demean himself by reason in the right of his crown, his lieges are bound by oath to remove the king. 2. Seeing that the king could not be reformed by suit of law, that ought to be done per asperum, that is by force. 3. That his lieges be bound to govern in aid of him, and in default of him; all which were condemned by two parliaments, one in the reign of Edw. 2, called Exilium Hugonis le Spencer; and the other in anno 1 Edw. 3. chap. 2."*

And that the natural body and politic make one indivisible body, and these two bodies incorporate in one person make one body and not divers, is resolved as the law of England, 1 Eliz. Ployden Co. fol. 113, by Sir Corbet Castlin, Lord Chief Justice of England, Sir James Dyer, Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, the lord Sanders, lord chief baron of the Exchequer, by the rest of the Judges, viz. Justice Itastall, justice Brown, justice Corbet, justice Weston, baron Freyvl, Carus, and Powtrel serjeant to the queen, Garrard attorney general, Carell attorney of the Dutchy, Plowden the most learned man of that age, in the knowledge of the law, and customs of the realm.

8. The law in all ages without any controversy is and hath been: that "no act of parliament binds the subjects of this land without the assent of the king, either for lands, goods, or fame."* No man can shew any syllable, letter, or line to the contrary in the books of the law, or printed acts of parliament, in any age in this land: if the virtual power be in the Houses, there needs no assent of the king's. The stiles of the Acts printed from 9 Hen. 3, to 1 Hen. 7, were either "The King ordains at his parliament," &c. or "the king ordaineth by the advice of his Prelates and Barons, and at the humble Petition of the Commons, &c." In Hen. 7, his time the stile altered, and hath since continued thus: "It is ordained by the king's majesty, and the lords spiritual and temporal, and commons in this present parliament assembled:" so that always the assent of the king giveth the life to all, as the soul to the body; and therefore our law-books call the king, "the Fountain of Justice, and the life of the law."

9. Mercy as well as justice, belongs by the law of the land only to the King. This is confessed by Mr. Prynne, and it is so without any question: the king can only pardon, and never more cause to have sufficient pardons than in such troublesome times as these, and God send us pardons and peace: none can give any Pardon, but the king, by the law of the land: "The whole and sole power of pardoning treasons and felonies belongs to the king" are the words of the law, and it is a delusion to take it from any other, and utterly invalid, 27 Hen. 8, cap. 24.

10. Queen Elizabeth summoned her first parliament, to be held the 23d of Jan. in the first year of her majesty's reign: the lords and commons assembled by force of the same writ; the 21st day the queen fell sick, and could not appear in her person in parliament that day, and therefore prorogued it until the 25 of the same month of January: "resolved by all the judges of England, that the Parliament began not the day of the return of the Writ, viz. the 23d of Jan. when the lords and commons appeared, but the 25th of the said month, when the Queen came in person;" which sheweth evidently that this virtual presence is a meer deluding fiction that hath no ground in law, reason, or sense. They have the king now a prisoner at Holmby, with guards upon him, and yet they govern by the virtual power of their prisoner. These are some few of the causes and reasons which moved me to deliver that Paper to Mr. Corbet, which I am ready to justify with my life, and should hold it a great honour to die for the honourable and holy laws of the land. That which will save this land from destruction, is, an Act of Oblivion and his majesty's gracious general Pardon, the Soldiers their Arrears, and every man his own, and truth and peace established in the land, and a favourable regard had to the satisfaction of tender consciences.

April 29, 1647.

DAVID JENKINS.

The CORDIAL of Judge Jenkins; for the good people of London. In Reply to a thing, called, "An Answer to the Poysonous Seditious Paper of Master David Jenkins; By H. P. Barister of Lincoln's Inn;" Printed in the year 1647; and reprinted in the year 1681.

After the said Mr. H. P. hath made a recital of the Heads of my "Vindication," he deduced his Answer unto these eight Particulars, which follow verbatim.

1. "It cannot be denied, but the Parliament sits by the king's writ, nay, if statute law be greater than the king's writ, it cannot be denied but the parliament sits, or ought to sit by something greater than the king's writ: and if it be confessed that the parliament sits by the king's writ, but does not act by the king's writ, then it must follow, that the parliament is a void vain court, and sits to no purpose; nay, it must also follow, that the parliament is of less authority, and of less use than any other inferior court: forasmuch as it is not in the king's power to controul other courts, or to prevent them from sitting or acting.

2. "This is a gross non sequitur, the king's power is in himself; ergo, it is not derived to, nor does reside virtually in the parliament. For the light of the sun remains imbodyed, and unexhausted in the globe of the Sun, at the same time as it is diffused and displayed through all the body of the air; and who sees not that the king, without emptying himself, gives commissions daily of Oyre and Terminer to others, which yet himself can neither frustrate nor elude? but for my part I conceive it is a great error to inter that the parliament hath only the king's power, because it hath the king's power in it: for it seems to me, that the parliament does both give and act by concurrent power, devolved both from the king and Kingdom; and in this some things are more obvious and apparent than in others. For by what power does the parliament grant Subsidies to the king? If only by the power which the king gives, then the king may take Subsidies without any grant from the parliament: and if it be so by a power, which the people give to the parliament; then it will follow the parliament hath a power given both by king and kingdom.

* 9 Hen. 3, Magna Charta. So in every age till this day, and in every King's time, as appears by the acts in print, 1 part of the Instit. Sect. 234, in fine, where many of the Law books are cited, 7 Hen. 7, 14, 19 of Hen. 7, 20.

3. "The sending Propositions to the king, and desiring his concurrence, is scarce worth an Answer; for subjects may humbly petition for that which is their strict right and property. Nay it may sometimes beseech a superior to prefer suit to an inferior for matters in themselves due. God himself hath not utterly disdained to beseech his own miserable, impious, unworthy creatures: besides, 'tis not our Tenet, that the king hath no power, because he hath not all power, nor that the king cannot at all promote our happiness, because he hath not just claim to procure our ruin.

4. "We affirm not, that the king's power is separated from his person, so as the two Spencers affirmed, neither do we frame conclusions out of that separation, as the two Spencers did, either that the king may be removed for misdemeanors, or performed per asperit; or that the subject is bound to govern in aid of him; we only say, that his power is distinguishable from his person, and when he himself makes a distinction betwixt them, commanding one thing by his legal writs, courts, and offices, and commanding another thing extrajudicially by word of mouth, letters, or ministers, we are to obey his power rather than his person.

5. "We take not from the king all power of pardoning Delinquents; we only say it is not proper to him quarto modo: For if the king pardon him which hath murdered my son, his pardon shall not cut me off from my appeal; and it is more unreasonable, that the king's pardon should make a whole state which hath suffered remediless than any private man. So if the king should deny indemnity to those which in the fury of war have done things unjustifiable by the laws of peace, and thereby keep the wounds of the state from being bound up, it is equitable that an act of indemnity should be made forcible another way. And if his will not hold, yet this is no good consequence, the king is absolute in point of pardons, therefore he is absolute in all things else: and the parliament hath no power to discharge Delinquencies, therefore it hath no power in other matters.

6. "The parliament hath declared the king to be in no condition to govern: But this must not be interpreted rigidly, and without distinction; for if the king with his sword drawn in his hand, and pursuing the parliament and their adherents as Rebels, be not fit for all acts of government, yet it is not hereby insinuated that he is divested of the habit or right of governing: If he be unqualified now, he is not unqualified for the future; if he may not do things destructive to the parliament, he is not barred from returning to the parliament, or doing justice to the parliament. This is a frivolous cavil, and subterfuge.

7. "We swear, that the king is our supreme governor over all persons, and in all causes; but we do not swear he is above all law, nor above the safety of his people, which is the end of the law, and indeed paramount to the law itself. If he be above law, or liable to no restraint of our law, then we are no freer than the French or the Turks; and if he be above the prime end of law, common safety, then we are not free as the French or Turks; for if the total subversion of the French or Turk were attempted, they might by God's Law, imprinted in the book of nature, justify a self-defence; but we must remedilessly perish, when the king pleases to command our throats. Besides, how achieved the king of England such a supremacy above all law, and the community itself, for whose behalf law was made? If God's donation be pleaded, which is not special to him, or different from what other kings may pretend to, then to what purpose serve our laws, nay, to what purpose serve the laws of other countries? For by this general donation, all nations are condemned to all servitude as well as we; If the law of this land be appealed to, what books hath Mr. Jenkins read, where hath he found out that lex regia, whereby the people of England have given away from themselves all right in themselves? Some of our Books tell us, that we are more free than the French; that the king cannot oppress us in our persons or estates, by imprisonment, denying justice, or laying taxes without our consents: Other Books tell us, that the safety of the people is the supreme law, and that the king hath both God and the law for his superior. But all this is nothing to learned Mr. Jenkins.

8. "We admit, that no acts of parliament are complete, or formally binding, without the king's assent: Yet, this is still to be denied, that, therefore, without this assent particularly exprest, the two houses can do nothing, nor have any virtual power at all, no, not to examine Mr. Jenkins, nor to do any other thing of like nature, though in order to public justice and safety. I have done, and wish Mr. Jenkins would call in and lick up again his black, infamous, execrable reproaches, so filthily vomited out against the parliament."

To the First.

I was examined by a Committee appointed by the house of commons: I say, and said, That the house of commons have no power to examine me; for that it is no court: every court hath power to examine upon oath; this power the house of commons never claimed: The court of Pie-powders, Court Baron, Hundred Court, County Court, and every other court of record, or not of record, hath power to examine upon oath, and an examination without oath is a communication only; examination in law is upon oath. [5 H. 4. c. 3.3 H. 6, 46. 19 H. 6, 43. 35 H. 6. 5.]

There is no court without a power of trial:

the house of commons hath no power to try any office, nor ever practised it by bill, indictment, information, plaint, or original writ, to reduce it to trial, nor to try it by verdict, demurrer, or examination of witnesses upon oath, without which there can be no condemnation or judgment; and that which can attain to no reasonable end, the laws reject as a thing inutile and useless; Sapiens incipit à fine. [Sir Anthony Mayne's case. Coke. part. Reports, Lit. 2. lib. sect. 194. 6. H. 4. 1.]

The writ whereby they are called gives them power, 'Ad faciendum et consentiendum;' to what? to such things 'Quæ ibidem de comuni consilio ordiparia contigerunt,' (viz) in the parliament: [4 par. Inst. fol. 4 and 9.] This makes nothing at all for a court for the house of commons; that consilium which that writ intends, is cleared partly by the writ for chusing knights, &c. For the king by that writ is said to resolve to consult and treat with the prelates and peers of the kingdom, for and touching the great concernments of the common wealth (for the king never sits in the house of commons;) and this also is made evident by the Writs to the prelates, peers, judges, and to his council at law; the words in their writ are; 'To appear and attend the parliament,' consilium impensuri, the one doth consulere, the other facere et consentire.

The House of Lords, where the king sits in person, assisted by his lords, judges, serjeants, attorney, solicitor, masters of the chancery, is a Court of Record to many purposes: set down in the Books of Law, and the Statutes of the Land, and that court is only in the House of Lords, where the king sits. 7 H. 1. 28. 1 H. 5. 20. 13 E. 3. ca. 5. 4. pars. Inst. pag. 24.

A Court must either be by the king's patent, statute law, or by the common law, which is common and constant usage; the House of Commons hath no patent to be a court, nor statute law to be a court, nor common usage; they have no Journal Book, but since Ed. 6.'s time: was there ever fine by the House of Commons estreated into the exchequer? for murder or felony they can imprison no man, much less for treason; that house which cannot do the less, cannot do the greater. [Plowd. Com. 319.]

It is ordained, that no man shall be imprisoned or put out of his franchise by the king or his council, but upon Indictment or presentment, of his good and lawful neighbours where the deed is done, or by original writ at the common law, and so is lex terra, the law of the land, mentioned in Magna Charta, cap. 29, expounded, and the said Magna Charta, and Charta de Foresta, are declared by the statute of 25 E. 1, c. 1, to be the common law of the land. All judges and commissioners are to proceed 'Secundum legem et consuetudinem regni Angliæ,' as appears by all proceedings in all courts, and by all commissions: and therefore the house of commons by themselves, proceeding not by indictment, presentment, or original writ, have no power to imprison men or put them out of their franchise. [25 E. 3, c. 4. 3 Car. Petition of Right.]

This no way trenches upon the Parliament; for it is in law no parliament without king and both houses; I have only in my Paper delivered to M. Corbet applied myself to the Committee, that had no power to examine me, but I never thought, said, or wrote, that the Parliament had no power to examine me: the law and custom of this land is, that a parliament hath power over my life, liberty, land, and goods, and over every other subject, but the house of commons of itself hath no such power. [4 pars Instit. p. 1, 3 pars Inst. p. 23. 12 H. 7. 20. Prince's Case, 8 par. Coke. par. Inst. p. 159. 14 H. 8. 3. Dyer. 38 H. 8. 60.]

For the lord Coke's relation, that the house of commons have imposed fines, and imprisoned men in queen Elizabeth's time, and since; [1 pars Inst. 19. b.] Few facts of late time never questioned, make no power, nor court; à facto ad jus is no good argument; for the words of the statute of 6 H. 8, c. 16, that a licence to depart from the house of commons for any member thereof, is to be entered of record in the book of the Clerk of the Parliament, appointed or to be appointed for that house, doth not conclude that the house of commons is a court of record. [4 pars Inst. c. parl. Hobbart's Reports, fol. 152.]

For first, that law of 6 H. 8, c. 26, handles no such question, as that, whether the house of commons be a court; it is a maxim in all laws, 'Lex aliud tractans nil probet,' the word (Record) there mentioned, is only a memorial of what was done and entered in a Book. A plaint removed out of the county court to the court of the common pleas, hath these words in the writ of remove, 'Recordari facias loquelam,' &c. and yet the county court is no court of record; and so for ancient demesne in a writ of false judgment, the words are 'Recordari facias loquelam,' &c. and yet the court of ancient demesne is no court of record; and so of a court baron, the law and custom of England must be preserved, or England will be destroyed, and have neither law nor custom. [Hobbart's Reports, fol. 152. Fitz. Na. Br. 70. Fitz. Nat. Br. 13. 12 H. 433. 34 H. 6. 49.]

Let any man shew me, that the court of lords, or the house of commons in any age hath made any man a delinquent (Rege dissentiente) the king contradicting it under his great seal. Michel, and others of late, were condemned by the prosecution of the house of commons in king James's time; did king James ever contradict it? and so of ancient times, where the house of peers condemned the lord Latimer in 50 E. 3, the king's pardon freed him: which shews clearly, that the king's express, or implied assent must of necessity be had to make a delinquent; the execution of the sentence is in the king's name. [4 part Instit. tit. Parliam. p. 23.]

The gentleman saith, "That the parliament sits, or ought to sit by something greater than the king's writ," &c. No parliament did ever sit without the king's writ, nor could ever parliaments begin without the king's presence in person, or by a guardian of England by patent under the king's great seal, the king being in remotis, or by commission under the great seal to certain lords representing the king's person, [4 pars. Inst. p. 4. and 6.] and it hath been thus in all ages unto this session of parliament, wherein his majesty hath been pressed, and hath passed two acts of parliament, one for a Triennial Parliament, and another for a perpetual, if the houses please to satisfy their desires; how these two acts agree one with another, and with the statute in Ed. 3.'s time, where parliaments are ordained to be holden every year, and what mischiefs to the people of this land such length of parliaments will produce, by protections and privileges to free them and their menial servants from all debts during their lives, if they please to continue so long, and how destructive to men's actions against them, by reason of the statute of limitations, which confines their actions to certain years, and many other inconveniencies of greater importance, is easy to understand. [4 E. 3, c. 14. 36 E. 3, c. 10, 21 Jac. the Act of limitation of Actions, c. 22.]

How can any man affirm that the two houses of parliament do act now by the king's writ, which relates to Council and Treaty with the king, concerning the king, the defence of his kingdom and of the church of England, these are three points which it tends to, as appears by the writ. They keep their king prisoner at Holmby, and will not suffer him to consult and treat with them. [4 pars. Inst. p. 14. Vow and Covenant, p. 11.] They have made a Vow and a Covenant to assist the forces raised and continued by both houses against the forces raised by the king without their consent, and to the same effect have devised the oath which they call the Negative Oath: Is this to defend the king's kingdom, or their kingdom?

When by their solemn League and Covenant they extirpate bishops, deans, and chapters root and branch, is this to defend the church of England? (that church must necessarily be meant, that was the church of England when the said writ bore test) they were not summoned to defend a church that was not in being, to destroy and defend the church are very contrary things; the church is not defended, when they take away and sell the lands of the church. [1 pars. Coke, dean and chapter of Norwich.]

The gentleman saith, "The king cannot controul other courts of justice, or prevent them from sitting, or enacting, and therefore not the two houses, &c." It is true, the king cannot controul or prevent his other courts, for that they are his ordinary courts of common justice, to administer common right unto all men according to the fixed laws. The houses make no court without the king, they are no body corporate without the king, nor parliament without the king, they all make one corporate body, one court called the parliament, whereof the king is the head, and the court is in the lords house, where the king is present: and as man is no man without a head, so the houses severed from the king, as now they are, have no power at all, and they themselves by levying war against the king, and imprisoning of him, have made the statute for not dissolving, adjourning, or proroguing this parliament of no effect, by the said acts of their own: they sit to no purpose without his assent to their bills, they will not suffer him to consult with them, and treat and reason with them, whereby he may discern what bills are fit to pass, and what not, which in all ages the kings of this land have enjoyed as their undoubted rights, and therefore they sit to no purpose by their own disobedience and fault. [14 H. 8, 3. 36 Hen. 8. Dyer. 60. 4 pars Inst. p. 1].

For the ordinary courts at Westminster, the judges in all those courts are judges by the king's patent or writ, otherwise they are no judges: the houses can make no judges, they are no judges at all who are made by them; the whole and sole power of making judges belongs to the king: the king cannot controul or prevent his own judges from sitting and acting, but the houses he may, for they are not the king's judges but the judges of the two houses. In his other courts, the king commits his power to his judges by his patent, and they are sworn to do common right to all men, and the king is sworn not to let them from so doing; the king cannot judge in those courts, nor controul; but the king is both judge and controulor in the court of parliament, quod acts, for his assent or dissent doth give life or death to all bills. Many lawyers have much to answer to God, this kingdom, and to posterity, for pulling the people of this land with fancies, as the gentleman who wrote the Answer to my Paper, and others, have published in these troubles, which have been none of the least causes of the raising and continuing of them: And so I have done with the first part of this Answer [17 H. 8, c. 24. 28 H. 8. 11 Dyer. 2 R. 3, 11].

To the Second.

For the non sequitur, in the second section of the gentleman's Answer, the antecedent and the consequent are his own.

—libellus:

Quem recitas meus est (ô Fidentius!)
Sed male dum recitas incipit esse tuus.

My words are, that the king is not virtually in the two houses at Westminster, to enable them to grant pardons, for that whole and sole power by the law belongs to the king: My Paper hath no such thing, as that the king's power cannot be derived to others, or the virtue of his power: For his power, and the virtue of his power, is in all patents to his judges, in charters to corporations, in commissions of all sorts, and in the parliament assembled by force of his writ of summons, so long it is they obey him: but when they renounce that power, and claim it not from the king, and declare to the kingdom, that he is not in condition to govern, and imprison him, and usurp to themselves all royal authority, as the two houses now do, no reasonable man can affirm, that they act by the power of their prisoner, who hath no power to give them, that by force of arms take all power to themselves. [27 H. 8, c. 24].

The gentleman saith, "The king grants commissions daily of Oyer and Terminer, which he cannot frustrate nor elude." The king may revoke and discharge the commission by his writ, as he may remove all judges, and place other men in their room; and any king's death determines all the judges patents at Westminster-Hall, commission of Oyer and Terminer, &c. And so he might dissolve both houses in all times by his writ under the great seal, until that in this parliament, by his own concession, the king of his goodness hath secluded himself, which goodness hath been full ill required. [4 E. 4, 34. 5 E. 4, 4. 1 Eliz. Dyer. 165. 1 Mar. Brook's case 447].

The gentleman affirms, "That the power the parliament hath is concurrent from the king and kingdom," which he conceives is proved by the grant of subsidies to the king by the parliament. The mistaking of this word 'parliament,' hath been mischievous in these times to this land, and it is affectedly mistaken, which makes the sin the greater, for the two houses are not the parliament, as before is declared, and at this time so to inculcate it, when all men know that of the 120 peers of the kingdom, who were temporal peers before the troubles, there are now not above 30 in the lords house, and in the house of commons, about 200 of the principal gentlemen of the kingdom left the house and adhered to his majesty, whose imprisonment by them shews no such candour as is to be desired.

It is true, that no Tallage can be laid upon the people of this land but by their consent in parliament, as appeareth by the laws mentioned in the margin; but you shall find in Mr. Selden's learned book, called "Mare Clausum," a number of precedents in Henry 3rd's time for Ship-money, justly condemned this parliament, to the which his majesty assented; and in truth that Ship-money was condemned before by the said two statutes of 25 E. 1, and 34 E. 1, "de Tallagio non concedendo," Danegelt, Englishety, and many grievous burthens were laid upon the people, and born until that memorable prince's time. But I am of opinion, that the common law of the land did always restrain kings from all subsidies and tallages, but by consent in parliament; which doth appear by Magna Charta, the last chapter, where the prelates, lords, and commonalty, gave the king the sixteenth part of their moveables. In truth it is no manner of consequence, because the king cannot take what he pleaseth of the subject's goods, that therefore they have a concurrent power in parliament; there have been many parliaments and no subsidies granted: parliaments may be without subsidies, but subsidies cannot be without parliaments: of ancient times parliaments rarely granted any, unless in the time of foreign wars; and in my time, queen Elizabeth refused a subsidy granted in parliament, and in the parliament 1 Jac.

none were granted. The gentleman should make a conscience of blinding the people with such untrue colours, to the ruin of the king and people.

To the Third.

The gentleman affirms, "That the sending Propositions to the king, and desiring his concurrence, is scarce worth an answer, for subjects may humbly petition for that which is their strict right and property." The Propositions sent to Newcastle, are in print; wherein the two houses are so far from humbly petitioning, that they stile not themselves his majesty's subjects, as appears by the Propositions.—That they have a strict right or property to any one of these Propositions is a strange assertion, every one of them being against the laws now in force. Have the two houses a strict right and property, to lay upon the people what taxes they shall judge meet? to pardon all treasons, &c. that is one of their Propositions. Have they a strict right and property to pardon themselves; And so for all the rest of their Propositions.—These Propositions have been voted by both houses, the king's assent, they being drawn into bills, makes them acts of parliament: Hath the king no right to assent or dissent? Was the sending but a compliment? All our law-books and statutes speak otherwise. This gentleman, and others, must give an account one time or other for such delusions put upon the people. [12 H. 7, 20, 1 Jac. c. 1, 1 Car. c. 7.]

To the Fourth.

The gentleman saith, "They affirm not, that the king's power is separated from his person, so as the two Spencers affirmed, &c." His majesty's person is now at Holmby under their guards; have they not severed his power from him, when by no power they have left him; he cannot have two of his chaplains, who have not taken their covenant, to attend him for the exercise of his conscience?

For the three conclusions of the Spencers, do not the two houses act every of them? They say, his majesty hath broken his trust, touching the government of his people; they have raised armies to take him, they have taken him, and imprisoned him; they govern themselves; they make laws, impose taxes, make judges, sheriffs, and take upon them 'omnia insignia summæ potestatis.' Is not this to remove the king for misdemeanors, to reform per asperitæ, to govern in aid of him; the three conclusions of the Spencers? Do they think the good people of England are become stupid, and will not at length see these things? [15 Ed. 2, Exilium Hugonis, Calvin's Case 1 E. c. 2, 7 pars Reports. 11.]

The gentleman saith "They do not separate his power from his person, but distinguish it," &c. His power is in his legal writs, courts, and officers: When they counterfeit the great seal, and seal writs with the same, make judges themselves, courts and officers by their own ordinances against his consent, declared under his true great seal of England (not by word of mouth, letters, or ministers only) their seal is obeyed, their own writs, their own judges, their own courts, their own officers, and not the king's: The time will come when such strange actions and discourses will be lamented. [Plowd. 4, Eli. 2, c. 3.]

To the Fifth.

The gentleman goes on, "We take, not from the king all power of pardoning Delinquents, we only say it is not proper to him quarto modo, &c." What do you mean by quarto modo? I am sure, "Omnis rex Angliæ, solus rex et semper rex," can do it, and none else. Read the books of the law to this purpose, collected by that reverend and learned judge Stamford, from all antiquity to his time, who died in the last year of king Philip and queen Mary's reign, you shall find this a truth undeniable; and this power was never questioned in any age in any book by any until this time, that every thing is put to the question: You gentlemen, who profess the law, and maintain the party against the king, return at length, and bring not so much scandal upon the law, (which preserves all) by publishing such incredible things. [Stamford Pleas 95, 27. H. 8, c. 24, Dier. 163.]

We hold only what the law holds: The king's prerogative and the subject's liberty are determined, and bounded, and admeasured by the written law what they are; we do not hold the king to have any more power, neither doth his majesty claim any other but what the law gives him; the two houses by the law of this land, have no colour of power, either to make delinquents, or pardon delinquents, the king contradicting: (and the army under sir Thomas Fairfax, howbeit not soldiers, do now understand that to be law, and do now evidently see, and assuredly know, that it is not an ordinance of the two houses, but an act of parliament, made by the king, lords, and commons, that will secure them, and let this army remember their executed fellow-soldiers,) and the law was always so taken by all men until these troubles; that have begot monsters of opinions. [Bract. lib. 3, cap. 14, fol. 132, 1 pars Instit. p. 344. Plow. 3, Eliz. 236, 237.]

To the Sixth.

This gentleman says, "The Parliament hath declared the king to be in no condition to govern, &c." There is no end of your distinctions, I and you profess the law; shew me law for your distinctions, or letter, syllable, or line, in any age in the books of the law, that the king may in one time be in no condition to govern, and yet have the habit of governing, and another time he may (viz.) when the two houses will suffer him: The law saith thus, "Ubi lex non distinguit, non est distinguendum."

He says, "the king is not barred from returning to his parliament," (as he calls the two houses) he knows the contrary, the whole city knows the contrary, "Nos juris consulti sumus sacerdotes," (as Justinian the emperor hath it, in the first Book of his Institutions) and therefore knowledge and truth should come from our lips: Worthy and ingenious men will remember, and reflect upon that passage of that good and wise man Seneca, "Non qua iur, sed qua eundum;" follow not the ways of the lawyers of the house of commons; God forgive them, I am sure the king will, if they be wise and seek it in time.

To the Seventh.

The gentleman says, "We swear that the king is our supreme governor over all persons and in all causes, &c." Why hath he left out the word: ("only?") for the oath the members now take, is that king Charles is now the only and supreme governor in all causes, over all persons, and yet they keep their only supreme governor now in prison, and act now in parliament by virtue of their prisoner's writ, and by a concurrent power in this parliament, and by their own strict right and property, (as the gentleman affirms in his answer). These things agree well with their oath, that the king is the only supreme governor in all causes over all persons: This oath is taken now in the parliament time by all members of the house of commons, and is required by the law to be taken in all parliaments, otherwise they have no power, nor colour to meddle with the public affairs. [1 Eliz. ch. 1. Cawdries Case 5 pars. fol. 1.]

This Oath being taken in parliament, that "the king is the only and supreme governor in all causes," then it follows in parliament causes; "over all persons," then over the two houses; let them keep this oath, and we shall be sure of peace in the land: And good lawyers ought to desire peace both for the public good, and their private, and not dishonour that noble profession, as many do in this miserable time.

The gentleman says, "we do not swear that the king is above all law, nor above the safety of his people;" neither do we so swear, but his majesty and we will swear to the contrary, and have sworn, and have made good, and will by God's grace make good our oath to the world, that the king is not above the law, nor above the safety of his people. The law, and the safety of his people, are his safety, his honour, and his strength.

To the Eighth.

The gentleman concludes, "That acts of parliament are not formally binding, nor complete without the king's assent, yet the houses have a virtual power without the king's particular assent, to do things in order to public justice and safety. (viz.) In setting up the excise, in raising and maintaining of Armies, in taxing the people at pleasure with fifth and twentieth parts, fifty subsidies, sequestrations, loans, compositions, imprisoning the king, abolishing the common-prayer-book, selling the church-lands, &c. All these are in order to the public justice and safety."

Mr. H. P. you are of my profession; I be-seach you, for the good of your country, for the honour of our science, persuade yourself, and others as much as in you lies, to believe and follow the monition and counsel of that memorable, reverend, and profoundly learned in the laws and customs of the land, the lord Coke [3 part Inst. p. 36.] who writes as becomes a great and learned judge of the law (a person much magnified by the two houses) in these words: "Peruse over all books, records, and histories, and you shall find a principle in law, a rule in reason, and a trial in experience, that treason doth ever produce fatal and final destruction to the offender, and never attains to the desired end, two incidents inseparable thereunto, and therefore let all men abandon it, as the poisonous bait of the devil, and follow the precept in holy scripture," serve God, honour the king, and have no company with the seditious.

Conclusion.

I say again, that without an Act of Oblivion, a gracious General Pardon from his majesty, the Arrears of the Soldiers paid, a favourable regard had to tender consciences, there will be neither truth nor peace in this land, nor any man secure of any thing he hath. By me,

DAVID JENKINS, Prisoner in the Tower.

Judge Jenkins's PLEA, delivered in to the earl of Manchester, and the Speaker of the house of commons, sitting in the chancery at Westminster, which was read by their command in open court, the 14th of Feb. 1648; and there avowed by David Jenkins, prisoner in Newgate: London; Printed in the year 1648; and Reprinted in the year 1681.

I have been required to appear in the Chancery the twelfth of this instant February, before Commissioners appointed by the two Houses for the keeping of their great seal, and managing the affairs of the Chancery. I cannot, nor ought, nor will submit to this power; I am a Judge sworn to the laws. The law is first, that this court is coram rege in Cancellaria: Secondly, the Chancellor or keeper of the great seal is made by delivery of the great seal to him by the king, and by taking of an Oath. [4 pars Inst. fol. 79. 8 H. 4. fol. 5. 9 E. 4. f. 15.]

The Oath followeth in these words.

1. Well and truly to serve our sovereign lord the king, and his people, in that office. 2. To do right to all manner of people, poor and rich, after the laws and usages of this realm. 3. Truly to counsel the king, and his counsel to conceal and keep. 4. Not to suffer the hurt, or disheriting of the king, or that the rights of the crown be decreased by any means as far as he may let it. 5. If he may not let it, he shall make it clearly and expressly to be known to the king, with his advice and counsel. 6. And that he shall do and purchase the king's profit in all that he reasonably may, as God him help, and the contents of God's book.' [41. pars In. fol. 88. 10. R. 2. rot. Parl. num. 8.]

The said Commissioners among others have imprisoned their king, have declared to the kingdom that they will make no Addresses or Applications to him, nor receive any from him. [Declar. 17 Jan. 1648.] Have counterfeited a new great seal, and after destroyed the true old great seal which belonged by the law to the king's custody. [Articul. sup. Chartas. c. 5.]

These Commissioners have had no seal delivered to them by his majesty, have taken no such Oath, or full ill keep it, and for these evident reasons grounded upon the fundamental laws of this land, these Commissioners have neither court, seal or commission, and therefore I ought not against the laws, against my knowledge, and against my conscience, to submit to their power.

To affirm that they maintain the king's Power and authority in relation to his laws (as they often do) and restrain only his person, is strange. They must be remembered that the House of Commons this Parliament gave in charge to Mr. Solicitor upon the prosecution of the Bill of Attainder against the earl of Strafford, to declare the law to be "that machination of war against the laws or kingdom, is against the king, they cannot be severed."

Mr. Pym had in charge likewise upon the same prosecution to declare "that the king and his People are obliged one to another in the nearest relation, he is a father, and the child in law is called pars patris, he is the husband of the common-wealth, they have the same interests, they are inseparable in their condition, be it good or evil; he is the Head, they are the body; there is such an incorporation as cannot be dissolved without the destruction of both." This agrees with our laws, and the law of this land: In that argument of Mr. Solicitor, and discourse of Mr. Pym, directed by the House of Commons, are contained the true Rights, Liberties, and Laws of the people, deduced from our ancestors in all ages, and wherein there is no line or word but is agreeable to the laws, and is a necessary and useful Book to be perused, and followed by all; which Book was published by order of the house of commons. If the doctrine of that book had been followed, we had not been so miserable as we are; neither had these great evils ensued, for the which the land mourns. [20 H. 7. fol. 7. 8 H. 7. fol. 12. 1 E. 5. fol. 3. 4. E. 4. fol. 25. 5 E. 4. fol. 29.]

In this month of February, six years now past, the only difference between his majesty and the prevailing party in both houses, was touching the Power of the Militia, which in plain English is, Power over Sea and Land. This was the sole quarrel. The king and his progenitors have had it in all times, the laws have fixed it upon them; they have used it for the weal of the people: none of the subjects ever had it or claimed it; the laws deny it them; for the time they have had it, our pres-

surès have been miserable. [Collect. of Ordinances, 1 pars.. fol. 66, 67. 81.]

His majesty hath a numerous issue, and so hath his father: many great persons of England and Scotland are of the blood royal, and all the kings of Christendom are of the same blood, so long as the laws last, or any of the said persons, or their descendants be living, this people shall have neither peace nor profit; but all the confusions that are imaginable will attend them.—And therefore, at length, be good to yourselves, restore our king, receive from him an act of oblivion, a general pardon, assurance for the arrears of the soldiery, and meet satisfaction to tender consciences.

By DAVID JENKINS, prisoner in Newgate.
Feb. 12, 1648.

The ANSWER of Judge Jenkins, to the imputation put upon his Plea in Chancery, which was read in open Court the 14th of Feb. 1648, and avowed, by David Jenkins, prisoner in Newgate. Printed in the year 1648, and re-printed in the year 1681.

I have no disposition, nor ever had, to be known by any public Writing: These miserable times, which fill many men's mouths, and most men's ears, with notorious untruths, thereby to blast and destroy the King's sacred majesty, his laws and government, and to bring in a confusion; enforceth me at this time (who formerly have written nothing but for the public) to let the world know how unjustly the Pamphleteer of this week, licensed by our Reformers, hath traduced me, touching a suit commenced in their Court of Chancery against me, by one Mr. Ernely a Wiltshire gentleman, touching the estate of one Mr. Thomas of Glamorganshire. The truth whereof is as followeth:

Mr. Thomas, whose father and my grandfather were two brothers, about 17 years past made his will, and declared by the same his son (being then of very tender years) a ward to his majesty, and made him executor, and myself during his minority, (referring to his wardship) to administer his estate personal and testamentary, and to be accountable to his son when he came to age: and 17 years since the father died.—This estate consists in a stock of sheep, so disposed by me as the number are yet continued, and for the number and condition, they were at their delivery back, to be made as good by those persons, who had the charge of them, as they were when they were received.—The rest of the estate (for any considerable part) was in mortgages of land, forfeited in the life of my young cousin Thomas, for many of them, and many absolutely purchased by me in his name in his life-time, for the which I am not yet paid.—The land descended, and ought, upon sir Edward Thomas, my cousin's heir at common law; so that Mr. Ernely, the Plaintiff in Chancery, hath no colour for the land: for my young cousin died without issue about 17 years old, and could not dispose of the inheritance of any land by any pretended will: The stock of sheep remains, if the Plaintiff and the Reformers have not plundered them: For the money it came all to the Court, it was to satisfy the king for the marriage.

The colour the Plaintiff hath, is this: After the death of my old kinsman Mr. Thomas, by undue means the young gentleman was married to Mr. Ernely's daughter, in a way of ravishment, being both children, without one penny paid, or consent of friends or kindred: For the which a suit of ravishment depended against Mr. Ernely and others in the Court of Wards.—The young gentleman died about 17 years of age, since these confusions, without issue; and some hours before my young cousin's death (who died of a pestilent fever) Mr. Ernely pretends a will made by him, and that he made his wife (Mr. Ernely's daughter) his executrix: his said wife dies soon after, and is pretended to make nuncupative will, and to make her father (Mr. Ernely) her executor, and so pretends an executor of an executor of an executor: which pretended wills he saith he hath proved in the courts of his friends the Reformers.

Whether such wills were made or no, must receive an equal examination, and of what validity they are, being pretended to be made by children in extremis, if made at all? And whether an executor of an executor of an executor, can maintain an account by the law of the land? and whether (I being executor during the minority, viz. the wardship) my young cousin could make such a will as is pretended, he being no executor till his full age.

The age touching wills, the law of this land determines to be 21 years, (37 H. 6. 5. 21 E. 4. 24.) and before that age at common law an act could not be devised. For wills touching goods and chattels, our law for many ages hath been the same to the decision of the civil and canon laws, in the bishops' courts. That law, (as Justinian hath it in the second book of his Institutions, the 12th chap.) is, "Impuberi non licet testari." This Pubertas begins at 14. It is plena pubertas at 18 years of age: the question is, whether this ius testandi is in pubertate plena, or pubertate incepta: Pigot's case, 5th part of Coke's Reports, the doctors affirmed, that 17 years of age was a full age as to an infant executor to dispose of goods, this opinion hath been by others since denied. Sir Edward Coke 11 part, Instit. sect. 123, saith, He must be 18, which is the time of plena pubertas, 2 Hen. 4. 12, an infant of 18 years of age may be a disseisor. Sir John Dodderidge in his Book called, "The Office and Duty of Executors," which they say is his, and it is a learned and laborious Treatise, fol. 347, delivers, that this opinion of 17 years, for that ability in an infant, hath been reported otherwise: this latter opinion comes nearer the common law, and the statute law of the land: which common law, and statute law, gives infants no power by deed or will to make any disposition of any thing they have, before they be 21 years of age.

It seems also more reasonable, because infants at 18 years have, by the intentment of law, as they grow in years, more use of reason to discern what is fit for them to do and act. And for a mere stranger to sue in a Court of Conscience, who pretends by such wills of infants (the infant husband being ravished) against the will of the kindred of the deceased, who died six years sithence without issue (being 17 years of age) and that any part of his estate should go that way by a course of equity, unless the law be for Mr. Ernely, who paid not a penny with his daughter, and who would have the husband of his daughter bring him a portion, by his pretended title of an executor of an executor of an executor, viz. of an infant the executor of another infant, the executor of a third person, seems very strange.

The said licensed Historiographer of theirs, hath published, the 16th of this present month of February 1647, "That I, out of a desire to keep the estate, have in a suit in the Court of Wards, in my cousin's life time, pleaded to the Jurisdiction of that Court." It is true, I did so: for I conceived that the estate would be unsafe in Mr. Ernely's hands, and I was willing to preserve it till my young cousin came to be of age, to dispose of it himself, according as I was trusted.

The law being, that the Court of Wards hath no jurisdiction over the personal estate, for then the marriage was paid for to the king, and all due to the king ascertained. (32 H. 8, c. 46, 4 pars Instit. fol. 201, 202). It is true, that that was insisted upon, as was just, for to preserve the estate from Mr. Ernely, who would have made what account he pleased to my cousin at his full age: and this is the truth of that business.—That I declined not the jurisdiction of the Chancery, to keep an estate in my hand, appears, by my declining long since the power of the House of Commons to examine me; and the Reformers have all my estate: what would Mr. Ernely have, when they (the Reformers) have all already, or can have from me, if he had any colour?

I desire the good people of this City to observe what notorious untruths their licensed Historiographers publish to delude the people. In this particular case they publish,

1. "That the Suit against me, is in the behalf of an Orphan:" Mr. Earnly (who is Plaintiff in their court) is a Wiltshire gentleman, at the least of 50 years of age, there is their orphan.

2. "That I made a Speech to the people at the Hall door, that the questioning of me for what I had done for the king, was illegal; and that the Judges had no power to try me, the king being absent:" another notorious untruth! For I protest to God all that I said was only this, 'God preserve the king and the laws.'

3. It is said that coming to the bar, I stirred not my hat: All the lawyers then at the bar were uncovered; whereof I held it a civility, to be also uncovered: and so I was, as they all know.

4. "That the earl of Manchester should say, "I received a great estate in money, of the Orphan's Estate:" as there is no truth in it, so it is most untrue that the said lord so said (as all men present can testify,) the truth is, they care not what they do, what they say, what they swear, nor what they write: witness the Declaration of a prevailing party of the House of Commons, of the 11th of this instant February; who contrary to the Oath of Allegiance, the Oath of Supremacy, the Protestation, their Solemn League and Covenant, their Declarations to make his majesty a glorious king, fearful to his enemies, and beloved of his subjects; and yet now, after 22 years, they would insinuate to the people, that this King, whom they have so much magnified, hath poisoned his own father.

5 It is a public notorious untruth, "That the Parliament hath published a Declaration against the king, of the 1st of this instant Feb." whereas it is well known to be the Declaration of the prevailing party of the House of Commons only, without the Lords: and so they would make that prevailing party only to be the Parliament.*

Let the People of England believe their five senses how it was with them seven years ago, and before, during his majesty's reign: how this kingdom abounded then with peace, plenty, and glory, to the admiration and envy of other nations: and now let them consider and judge by their senses, since those men (whom nothing would satisfy, but all power both by sea and land, which in truth is the regality and kingship, which they call the Militia, have usurped the said power regal, whether they have not, by impostures and delusions, diffused among the people by themselves and their agents, brought a flourishing kingdom to the most deplorable condition it now is in.

To the end that this kingdom may not utterly be ruined, God incline their hearts to restore his majesty, and for their own and their posterities sake to receive from his majesty an Act of Oblivion, a General Pardon, assurance for the Arrears of the soldiery, and meet satisfaction for tender consciences.

DAVID JENKINS.

Judge JenKins's REMONSTRANCE to the Lords and Commons, the 21st of Feb. 1648, at Westminster.

I desire that the Lords and Commons of the two houses, would be pleased to remember, and that all the good people of England do take notice, of an Order of the House of Commons this session, for publishing the lord Coke his Books: which Order they may find printed in the last leaf of the second part of his Institutes, in these words, viz.

'Die Mercurij 12 Majj. 1644,

'Upon debate this day in the Commons
'House of Parliament, the said house did then

* "Their Licensed Historiographer hath published this in the Pamphlet called the "Kingdom's Weekly Post," from Wednesday Feb. 7, to Wednesday the 16th of Feb. 1647."

‘mentary upon Magna Charta, the Pleas of ‘the Crown, and the Jurisdiction of Courts,’ ‘according to the intention of the said sir Ed‘ward Coke, and that none but the heir of the ‘said sir Edw. Coke, or he that shall be autho‘rized by him, do presume to publish in print ‘any of the foresaid books, or any copy thereof.

‘H. ELSIGNE, Cler. Dom. Com.’

And I do further desire them that they would read and peruse Mr. Solicitor St. John, and Mr. Pym, their Books published likewise this session, whose Titles are as followeth, viz. “An Argument of Law, concerning the Bill of Attainder of High Treason of Thomas earl of Strafford, at a Conference in a Committee of both houses of parliament, by Mr. St. John, his Majesty’s solicitor general. Published by order of the Commons house.” And the “Speech or Declaration of John Pym, esq. after the Recapitulation or summing up of the Charge of High Treason against Thomas earl of Strafford, 12th April, 1641. Published by the Order of the House of Commons.”

1. Nothing is delivered in law in my Books, but what the House of Commons have avowed to be law in Books of Law, published by their command this session, and agreeable to the books of law, and statutes of this realm, in all former times and ages.

2. The supposed Offence charged on me is against the two Houses, and none ought to be judges and parties, by the law of the land, in their own case.

3. I desire the benefit of Magna Charta, the Petition of Right, and other good laws of this land, which ordain that “Men’s Trials should be by the established laws, and not otherwise.” They are the very words of the Petition of Right.

An Ordinance of both Houses is no law of the land, by their own confession; and by the books of the lord Coke, published by their Order, as aforesaid, this session, in six several places.*

For Sedition, in my Books there is none, but such as they have “authorised to be published and printed.” To publish the Law is no sedition. These positions following I do set down for the law of the land in my Books, and they themselves have justified, and avowed them as aforesaid; We agree the law to be, and to have been in all times in all the Particulars following, as here enaueith:

1. To imprison the King is High Treason.
2. To remove counsellors from the king by force is High Treason.
3. To alter the established Laws in any part by force is High Treason.
4. To usurp the Royal Power is High Treason.

* 1 Part, Col. of Ordinances, fol. 728, 2 pars Instit. fol. 47, 48, 157, 153, 4 pars Instit. 23, 232, 238, 4 Il. 7, 18.

5. To alter the Religion established is High Treason.

6. To raise Rumours, and give out words to alienate the people’s affections from the king, is High Treason.

7. To seas Soldiers upon the people of the kingdom, without their consent, is High Treason. [Mr. Solicitor, p. 9.]

8. The execution of Paper Orders by Soldiers in a military way, is High Treason. [Mr. Solicitor, p. 9.]

9. To counterfeit the great seal, is High Treason. [Mr. Solicitor, p. 24. 4 part Instit. p. 125. Justice Hutton’s Argument; fol. 39, 40. 4 part Inst.]

10. The Commission of Array is in force, and none other.

11. None can make judges, justices, sheriffs, &c. but the king: the king makes every court.

12. The Great Seal belongs to the king’s custody, or to whom he shall appoint, and none other. [2 part Instit. Articul. super Chartas, c. 5.]

13. Ordinances of one or both houses are no laws to bind the people. [1 par. Coll. of Ordin. et Coke ut supra.]

14. No Privilege of Parliament, holds for Treason, Felony, or Breach of the Peace, not for twenty parliament men, forty, nor three hundred. [4 p. Inst. 25.]

15. To subvert the Fundamental Laws is High Treason. [Mr. Solicitor, p. 8. 70.]

16. To levy War against the person of the King is High Treason. [Mr. Solicitor, p. 12, 27.]

17. To persuade Foreigners to Levy War within this kingdom, is High Treason. [Mr. Solicitor, p. 26.]

18. To impose unlawful Taxes, to impose new Oaths, is High Treason. [Mr. Solicitor, p. 35.]

19. The king can do no wrong. [Mr. Pym, p. 8.]

20. It is a pernicious doctrine to teach Subjects, they may be discharged from the Oath of Allegiance. Then what means the doctrine of both Houses of the Votes 11th of Feb. 1647. [Mr. Pym, p. 17.]

21. “A necessity of a man’s own making, doth not excuse him.” The requiring and forcing of the militia, brought the necessity of arming upon the houses. [Mr. Pym, p. 24.]

22. “None can levy War within this realm without Authority from the king, for to him only it belongeth to levy war, by the common law of the land, to do otherwise is High Treason by the said common law.” [3 par. Inst. p. 9.] The only quarrel was and is the Militia: for the which so much blood hath been spent, and treasure. [Mr. Solicitor, 70. 71.]

23. No parliament without the king, he is principium, caput et finis. [4 part, Inst. p. 1, 3, 4. 4 pars Inst. 41, 356.]

24. Presentment or Trial by Jury, is the birth-right of the subject.

There is no doubt but that many in both Houses are free from this Great Sin, and that most of the prevailing party, had at first no intentions to proceed so far; but the madness of the people (who are very unstable, and so they will find them) and the success of their armies (having this great rich city to supply them with all accommodations) have so elevated them, that the evil is come to this height.

For myself, to put me to death in this cause is the greatest honour I can possibly receive in this world. 'Dulce et decorum est mori pro patriâ.' And for a Lawyer and a Judge of the Law, to die 'Dum sanctis patriæ legibus obsequitur;' for obedience to the laws; will be deemed by the good men of this time, a sweet smelling sacrifice; and by this, and future times, that I died full of years, and had an honest and honourable end. And posterity will take knowledge of those men, who put some to death for subverting of the laws, and others for supporting of them, &c.

Yet mercy is above all the works of God, "The king is God's vicar on earth." In Bracton*, who was a judge in Henry 3rd's time, you shall find the king's oath, "To shew mercy," is part of it: You are all his children; say and do what you will, you are all his subjects, and "He is our king and parent:" "Pro magno peccato paupulum supplicii satis est patri." And therefore let not the prevailing party be obdurate, out of a desperation of safety: That which is past is not revocable: Take to your thoughts your parents, your wives, your children, your friends, your fortunes, your country; wherein foreigners write there is 'Mira æris suavitatis, et rerum omnium abundantia.'

Invite them not hither, the only way to be free of their company will be, To restore his majesty, and receive from him an Act of Oblivion, a General Pardon, assurance for the Arrears of the Soldiery, and meet satisfaction to tender consciences. God preserve the King and the Laws.

DAVID JENKINS.
Prisoner in Newgate.

"David Jenkins was made one of the Judges for South Wales, and continued in that office till the rebellion broke out, at which time he either imprisoned divers persons in his circuit, or condemned them to die, as being guilty of high treason for bearing arms against the king. At length, being taken prisoner at Hereford, when that city was surprised by the parliament forces, Dec. 18, 1645, he was hurried up to London, and committed prisoner to the Tower. Afterwards, being brought to the bar in Chancery, he denied the authority of that court, because their seal was counterfeited, and so consequently the commissioners thereof were constituted against law: Whereupon, being committed to Newgate prison, he was impeached of treason, and brought to the bar of the commons house; but denying their authority, and refusing to kneel, was for his contempt fined 1,000*l.* and remitted to his prison, and thence translated to Wallingford Castle.

"Afterwards passed an act for his Trial in the high court of justice, A. D. 1650, so that Jenkins thinking of nothing but hanging, was resolved, if it should come to pass, to suffer with the Bible under one arm, and Magna Charta (of which he was a zealous defender) under the other. But Harry Marten (as it is said) urging to his fellows that, Sanguis Martyrum est Semen Ecclesiæ, and that that way of proceeding would do them mischief, they thought good not to take away his life." Wood's Ath. 11, 328.

"When Judge Jenkins was brought before the Rump in 1646, he treated those rebels with a just and becoming contempt. 'In your speech,' says he, 'Mr. Speaker, you said the house was offended with my behaviour, in not making any obeisance to you upon my coming here; and this was the more wondered at, because I pretended to be knowing in the laws of the land (having made it my study for these five and forty years). And because I am so, that was the reason of such my behaviour. For, as long as you had the king's arms engraved on your mace, and acted under his authority, had I come here, I would have bowed my body in obedience to his authority, by which you were first called. But, Mr. Speaker, since you and this house have renounced all your duty and allegiance to your sovereign and natural liege lord the king, and are become a den of thieves, should I bow myself in this house of Rimmon, the Lord would not pardon me in this thing.' Which provoked the house so much, that without any trial they voted him and sir Francis Butler guilty of high treason, and fixed the day of execution; but were again diverted from it by a droll speech of that remarkable buffoon Harry Marten.

"After this, they sent a committee from the Commons' house to Newgate to judge Jenkins, and made this offer to him, 'That if he would own their power to be lawful, they would not only take off the sequestrations from his estates, which were about 500*l.* per annum, but would also settle a pension on him of 1,000*l.* a year.' To which he answered, 'Far be it from me to own rebellion (although it was successful) to be lawful;' so he desired to see their backs.

"Then the chief of them made another proposal to the Judge, and said, 'He should have the sum was mentioned above, if he would but permit and suffer them to put in print, 'That he did own and acknowledge their power to be lawful and just, and would not gainsay it.' To this he answered, 'That he would not connive at their so doing, for all the money they had robbed the kingdom of, and should they be so impudent as to print any such matter, he would sell his doublet and coat to buy pens, ink and paper, (the use of which it seems, was not debarred him) and would set forth the Commons' house in their proper colours.' When they found him so firm, one of the committee used this motive,

* Bract. l. 3. c. 9, p. 107. 4 pars Inst. 742, 343. Stanford 99.

"You have a wife and nine-children, who all will starve if you refuse this offer; so consider, for their sakes, they make up ten pressing arguments for your compliance." "What," said the Judge, "did they desire you to press me in this matter?" "I will not say they did," replied the committee man, "but I think they press you to it without speaking at all." With that the old man's anger was heightened to the utmost, and he in passion said, "Had my wife and children petitioned you in this matter, I would have looked on her as a whore, and them as bastards." Upon this the committee departed, and he continued in Newgate till the Restoration." Grey's Ex. of Neale's 4th vol. Heath, in his "Loyal English Martyrs," (which book appears to have been written very shortly after the Restoration, for it mentions Sheldon as "now bishop of London," which see he occupied only from 1660 to 1663,) speaking of Jenkins, says, "He was continued a close prisoner till they were weary of him, and then was sent to Windsor in the same quality, where he continued of the same mind, till without thanks, he was permitted the liberty of the town. This brave stout person is yet living, but when dead his memory shall endure for evermore."

Die Martis, 21 September, 1647.

WHEREAS John Brown, esq. Clerk of the Parliaments, did the 25th day of June, 1647, exhibit a Charge before the Lords in Parliament, against John Morris, alias Poyntz, Mary his wife, Isabel Smith, Leonard Darby, and John Harris, for forging, framing, and publishing a Copy of a pretended Act of Parliament, alledged to have been made in the 43d of Elizabeth, and entitled, 'An Act to enable and make good a Conveyance and Assurance made of the manors of Chipping-Onger, Northokenden, Southokenden, and other lands in the county of Essex, and Beaves-Marks, alias Buries-Marks, in London, by James Morris, esq. and Gabriel Poyntz, esq. to John Morris, alias Poyntz, and his Heirs; and to establish the said manors upon the said John Morris, alias Poyntz, and his Heirs, according to the said Conveyance.' Whereas in truth there neither is, nor ever was any such act of parliament. And for forging and counterfeiting his hand-writing, and subscribing to the said copy, John Brown, 'Cleric. Parliamentorum.' And the better to colour their lewd practices, have charged the said John Brown with the loss of the said Record, and denying of his own hand. And whereas sir Adam Littleton, bart. who had good title to part of the said Manors and Lands, as in right of Dame Audery, his wife, whose inheritance thereunto was sought to be impeached by the said Copy of the said pretended Act of Parliament, complained likewise against the said persons before their lordships, for the said Forgery and Publication; in that the said John Morris, Leonard Darby, John Harris, and Isabel Smith, did produce the said Copy at Chelmsford, at Lent-Assizes, in 1646, for the county of Essex; at a trial in an Ejectione Firme, brought by Thomas Smith, husband of the said Isabel, and Lessee of the said John Morris, against Josias Clarke, Tenant to the said sir Adam Littleton, of part of the said lands contained in the said pretended Act, and did plead and affirm the same to be a true Copy of an Act of Parliament: And the said Darby and Harris did falsely and perjuriously swear in open court at the said Trial, that they had examined the said Copy, by them produced, with the Record of the said pretended Act, in the office of the clerk of the parliament; and did there also falsely and perjuriously swear, that they did shew that Writing to the Clerk of the Parliament, and that he did acknowledge the said Writing to be his own hand; whereas in truth the said subscription to the said pretended Act of Parliament is counterfeit, and none of the said Clerk of the said Parliament's hand. And the said sir Adam further complained of an Exemptionification under the Great Seal of England, for countenancing the said forged Copy of the said pretended Act, by some undue means by the said parties thereunto affirmed, of the parties shewing, whereof proof was made before their lordships.

All which being crimes of a very high and transcendent nature, and do concern the public justice of the kingdom, and of this honourable house, the supremest judicatory of this kingdom: that Acts of Parliament, the highest records in this kingdom, should be framed, invented, forged, and given in evidence, and published as true acts of Parliament; and the hand of the clerk of the parliament, a sworn officer, forged, counterfeited, and subscribed to the same; as that if such a bold and audacious act should not be severely punished, no man can be safe in his life, person or estate: The said John Brown, and sir Adam Littleton, desired that the persons aforesaid might forthwith answer the said Charges; and that their lordships would inflict such exemplarily punishment upon the offenders, as may deter the like attempts and lewd practices in others, and give such fitting reparations as their lordships in their wisdom should think meet.

Whereupon the persons aforesaid put in their Answers to the premises, and pleaded Not Guilty; and after the case had been divers days fully heard by Counsel on both sides, and Witnesses produced at this Bar, and the whole matter after thoroughly weighed, debated, and fully considered of by the house; the Lords in Parliament assembled, being fully satisfied of the guilt of the said persons, for the aforesaid high crimes charged against them, do award and adjudge,

1. "That the said John Morris, alias Poyntz, shall pay as a fine to our sovereign lord the king the sum of 1,000*l*. Isabel Smith 200*l*. Leonard Darby 400*l*. and John Harris 400*l*. 2. That the said parties shall pay to John Brown, esq. Clerk of the parliament, for his damages, 500*l*. 3. That all the said parties shall, before their enlargement out of prison, be bound to their good behaviour during their lives, before some one of his majesty's justices of his bench at Westminster, with good sureties. 4. That the said Copy of the pretended Act of Parliament, falsely affirmed upon oath, to have been subscribed with the name of the said Clerk of the Parliament, entitled, 'An Act to enable and make good a conveyance and assurance, made of the manors of Chipping-Onger, Northokenden, Southokenden, and other lands in the county of Essex; and Beaves Marks, alias Buris Marks, in London, by James Morris, esq. Gabriel Poyntz, esq. to John Morris, alias Poyntz, and his heirs, and to establish the said Manors upon the said John Morris, alias Poyntz, and his heirs, according to the said conveyance;' is hereby declared to be forged and counterfeit; and is by their lordships adjudged and decreed to be for ever damped and cancelled, and never to be pleaded in any court or cause whatsoever: nor to be admitted to be given in evidence; there being no record of such pretended Act of Parliament to warrant the same. 5. That all the said several Persons hereby adjudged guilty of the said Crimes, shall ever hereafter be made incapable to be witnesses in any cause whatsoever. 6. That John Brown, esq. Clerk of the Parliament, is, in the judgment of this house, free and clear of and from all and every the aspersions, falsities, and charges of the said John Morris, alias Poyntz, Isabel Smith, Leonard Darby, and John Harris, charged, uttered, divulged, and given out by them against him, concerning the matters herein mentioned. And that this judgment shall be openly read and published in the face of the county of Essex, at the next assizes to be held for that county. 7. That the said parties shall bring, or cause to be brought into this house by the first day of October next, one Exemplification under the Great Seal of England, concerning the manor of Little Munden, in the county of Hertford; and the aforesaid exemplification of the said counterfeit Act of Parliament, to which the Great Seal of England is charged to have been unduly and fraudently affixed, that so the aforesaid forged Exemplification may be cancelled and vacated. 8. That they shall be imprisoned during the pleasure of this house.

JOH. BROWN, Cler. Parliamentorum."

Die Martis, 2d Die Novem. 1647.

Whereas the Lords in Parliament assembled, upon the 21st of September last, gave Judgment concerning a Copy of a pretended Act of Parliament, entitled, 'An Act to enable and make good a Conveyance and assurance, made of the manors of Chipping-Onger, Northokenden, Southokenden, and other lands in the county of Essex; and Beaves-Marks, alias Buris-Marks, in London, by James Morris, esq. Gabriel Poyntz, esq. to John Morris, alias Poyntz, and his heirs, and to establish the said manors upon the said John Morris, alias Poyntz, and his heirs, according to the said conveyance;' and declared the same to be forged and counterfeit, and there to be damned and cancelled, as by the said judgment more at large appeareth.

And whereas Dame Audery Littleton, late wife of sir Adam Littleton, deceased, sir Folke Grevil, knt. and Maurice Barrow, esq. by their petition exhibited before the Lords in Parliament, complained, that notwithstanding the said Judgment, one Isabel Smith, a person sentenced by their lordships, and committed to Newgate for the said Forgery, having procured the said forged Act of Parliament, and other forged writings, viz. three Fines of the lands contained in the said forged act, and a forged Pleading, setting forth the uses of the said forged fines, to be written in parchment; and having by some slight made them to seem as if they had been written long since, did foist and shuffle in the same amongst other Evidences, and Writings remaining in the treasury of the late Court of Wards: and pretending the same to be found there, obtained copies thereof under the hand of Mr. Audely, clerk of the said court, hoping thereby to gain some credit and authority to the said forgeries, and further to impeach the titles of the petitioners.

To which Petition the said Isabel Smith put in her Answer, and a day was appointed for hearing the same. At which day the said Isabel Smith, being present at the bar, and not making good any of the particulars in her said Answer, nor giving any satisfaction to such questions as were by their lordships demanded of her concerning the same: And the said several Writings, after full examination by hearing of counsel, and witnesses produced; and also upon view of the said Writings, (being by their lordships' order brought into the house) manifestly appearing to their lordships to be gross forgeries: The lords in parliament assembled to declare, and adjudge;

"That the said parchment Writings, one whereof purporteth a Fine pretended to be levied at St. Albans, "a die sancti Martini in quindecim dies," anno 37 Eliz. between James Morris, esq. and John Morris, alias Poyntz, his son, Plaintiffs, and Gabriel Poyntz, esq. and William Cutts, Defendants; of the manors of Chipping-Onger, and other lands and teuelements, with the appurtenances, in Chipping-Onger, in the county of Essex: One other whereof purporteth a fine pretended to be levied at St. Albans, "a die sancti Martini in quindecim dies," anno 37 Eliz. between James Morris, esq. and John Morris, alias Poyntz, his son, Plaintiffs; and Gabriel Poyntz, esq. and William Cutts, Defendants; of the manors of Northokenden, Poyntz, and Groves, with the appurtenances, and of divers messuages, cottages, mills, lands, meadows, pastures, and other hereditaments in Northwokenden, alias Northokenden, Southwokenden, alias Southokenden, Avely, Upminster, alias Upmister, Southweal, Brentwood, alias Burntwood, Warley, alias Warley Magna, Childerditch, Bulfan, Bownton, alias Bunton, East Thoredon, West Thoredon, West Thurrock, Grays Thurrock, Chawdwell, Styfford, alias Stiford, Horne-church, Basseldon, and Granham, and of the rectory of Northwokenden, alias Northokenden, with the appurtenances, in the said county of Essex.

"One other whereof purporteth a Fine pretended to be levied at St. Albans "a die sancti Martini in quindecim dies," anno 37 Eliz. between James Morris, esq. John Morris alias Poyntz, his son, Plaintiffs; and Gabriel Poyntz, esq. and William Cutts, esq. Defendants; of four Messuages, six gardens, and two acres of land with the appurtenances, in the parish of St. Catherine Cree-church, London.

"One other of the said Parchment writings purporteth a pleading, setting forth the uses of the said fines, and beginning in these words, (viz.) Essex. ss. "And one other whereof purporteth a copy of a pretended act of parliament, intituled, "An act to enable and make good a conveyance and assurance, made of the manors of Chipping-Onger, Northokenden, Southokenden, and other lands in the county of Essex: and Beaves-Marks alias Buries-Marks in London; by James Morris, esq. and Gabriel Poyntz, esq. to John Morris alias Poyntz, and his heirs, and to establish the said manors upon the said John Morris alias Poyntz, and his heirs, according to the said conveyance: Are hereby declared to be forged and counterfeit, and are by their lordships adjudged and decreed to be for ever damned and cancelled, and never to be pleaded, or admitted to be given in evidence in any court, or cause whatsoever; there being no record of any such fines, pleading, or act of parliament to warrant the same; nor any term then held at St. Albans, when the said fines were pretended to be levied there.

"And it is further ordered by the lords in parliament assembled, that the said Isabel Smith shall by the 27th of November next bring, or cause to be brought into this house, the copies of the said parchment writings, (pretended to be found in the treasury of the Court of Wards) subscribed by the said Mr. Awdeley, that so the same may be cancelled and vacated.

I have searched the Records of the Common Pleas, de Termino Sancti Trinitat. anno tricesimo octavo reg. Eliz. rollo vicesimo primo, and do find that there is no inrollment of any such Record there, as is above-mentioned. Per JOHANNEM COCKS, Cleric. Thesaur. de Com. Banco.

I have searched in the Treasurer's Remembrancer's Office in the Exchequer, amongst the Records of Trinity Term, anno xxxviii. Regiae Elizabeth. Roll xxi. but do not find that there is any such Record or Inrollment, as is above-mentioned. T. OSBORNE.

6th May, 1647.

Memorandum, that I Francis Blake, Keeper of the Books for the searchers of fines, and of the Records thereof in the Chirographer's Office, have made diligent search in the said Books, and amongst the said Records of Michaelmas-Term, 35 and 36 Eliz. and all the Terms after, till Hillary 38 Eliz. and I can find no fine at all from Gabriel Poyntz and William Cutts, or either of them, to any person whatsoever, of any lands in the counties of Essex or London. And moreover, I find by the said Records, that Michaelmas Term, 36 and 37 Eliz. was held at the city of Westminster, and not at the town of St. Albans. All which I do hereby, at the request of sir Adam Poyntz, alias Littleton, bart. certify to all whom it may concern. F. BLAKE.

Soon after a short Breviate of Mr. John Morris's Case was drawn up, and delivered to his excellency sir Thomas Fairfax, by divers of the Parliament's agents.

"May it please your Excellency; Being deeply oppressed in our spirits, and overburthened in ourselves, at the manifold and doleful outcries and complaints of the people, in all parts of our quarters where we come, uttered against the daily pressures and inroads that are made by prerogative and arbitrary violence upon their common rights; and in particular, the cry and miserable moan of certain oppressed Commoners, to wit, of John Poyntz, alias Morris, esq. Isabel Smith, John Harris, and Leonard Darby, coming unto our ears, that we could not, but, as in duty we are bound, deeply represent their miserable condition, as fellow-feelers of their oppressions, and persons liable (when we come into their single capacity of Commons) to the said mischief; and therefore conceiving it our duty to contribute our utmost endeavours for the remedy of the same, we could not but unburden in some measure our spirits unto your Excellency in their behalfs, who in such a horrid and barbarous manner have been abused and supplanted of their common rights, by acts of violence and force, committed by John Brown, Clerk unto the House of Lords, and his accomplices, under the colour of several Orders surreptitiously by misinformations gained from the said House, to the high usurpation and abuse of the name and authority of parliament, in permitting the image thereof upon his own prerogative, outrage and violence, to the total ruin and supplantation of the just freedoms, and birth-right inheritance of the said persons, as the several papers thereunto subjoined, for the full information of your Excellency, do demonstrate. And for more certain confirmation of our premises, represented by the same, be pleased to consider, that whereas the abovesaid persons are accused, condemned, and sentenced by the lords (surprized by Brown's misrepresentations and delusions) to pay 2,500*l.* fine, and suffer imprisonment, contrary to the regular course of the laws, during the pleasure of the said House, for forging and framing a copy of an act of parliament, touching the estate of the said John Poyntz alias Morris, pretended to be taken out of the office of the said John Brown, with his hand thereunto; no such original record as Brown pretendeth is to be found in his office: that since the said accusation, another original record of the said act of parliament, with other writings and evidences for the said estate, is found in the court of wards, and they have gained copies thereof, examined and subscribed by the master of the said court and his clerks, the which, with their hands thereunto, are herewith presented; and concerning the truth thereof, three of us can also give it upon oath, that the wife of one Godfrey Cade, now prisoner in the Fleet, did declare unto us, that the said John Brown went to the Fleet unto her husband, and gave him twenty-five shillings in hand, and promised him five pounds more, and his enlargement, to swear at the Lords bar, that he forged the copy of the said act of parliament, and counterfeited the clerk's hand unto it; and the said Cade did also confess the same.

"Wherefore we humbly implore that your Excellency would be pleased to grant the said distressed persons your letter of request unto the parliament, according to their petition, herewith directed to your Excellency, that the said persons, and their adversaries, may be left to the free course and trial at common law; and that in the mean time, till the controversy concerning the estate be decided at law, the said persons may enjoy their enlargement upon bail, without any further trouble or durance, and the execution of their severe sentence be suspended, and the said Poyntz, alias Morris, enjoy peaceable possession of the said estate, like as all his ancestors, from the days of queen Elizabeth, have done before him. Which request is so reasonable and just, and their condition so miserable, desperate, and dangerous, and of such concernment to the whole commonwealth, that no man, if such exorbitances be not stopped and curbed, can have any security in his estate or liberty, that we cannot but promise to ourselves your Excellency's commiseration of their condition, and readily assent unto their just suit. Thus we humbly take our leave, beseeching your favourable construction upon our boldness, and remain your Excellency's most humble servants and soldiers,

180. Proceedings upon a Charge of High Treason against Sir JOHN GAYRE, knt. Mayor of the City of London, THOMAS CULLAX, Alderman and one of the Sheriffs of London, and JAMES BUNCE, JOHN LANGHAM, and THOMAS ADAMS, Aldermen of London, for countenancing and abetting Force and Tumults against the House of Commons: 23 CHARLES I. A. D. 1647. [6 and 7 Rushw. 3 Cobb. Parl. Hist.]

BY way of introduction to this Charge a brief account of some preceding transactions may be acceptable.

On the 27th of July, 1647, a Petition was presented to the House of Commons from the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council of the city of London, in these words:

The humble Petition of the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons of the City of London in Common Council assembled: To the right honourable the Lords and Commons assembled in High Court of Parliament. Whereunto is annexed two Petitions; the one entitled, 'The humble Petition of divers well-affected Citizens of the City of London,' the other entitled, 'The humble Petition of divers Young Men, Citizens, and Apprentices of this honourable City.' They are as followeth, viz:

To the honourable the House of Commons assembled in High Court of Parliament: The humble Petition of the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons of the City of London in Common Council assembled,

"Humbly sheweth; That the Petitioners have, by Ordinance of parliament dated the 23rd present, taken notice of the pleasure of both houses for constituting a new Committee for the Militia of the city of London and the liberties thereof, and of all other places within the Lines of Communication and the Weekly Bills of Mortality, and for determining of a former Ordinance for the Militia of this city, &c. dated the 4th of May last; which being taken into serious consideration, the Petitioners could not but call to mind how far both Houses of Parliament had formerly honoured the City, when they first established the Committee for the Militia, and since enlarged or altered the same; to take the sense of this Court before they finally resolved thereupon; which confidence the Petitioners are not conscious to themselves to have forfeited. And next, being sensible by two Petitions presented to this court (the copies whereof are annexed) the one entitled, 'The humble Petition of divers well-affected Citizens of this City of London,' and the other entitled, 'The humble Petition of divers Young Men, Citizens, and others Apprentices of this City.' What a general distemper this sudden change hath already made, and may further raise in this city; besides that hereby the city is for the present put out of all regular posture of defence.—The Petitioners could not but return unto this honourable house, and humbly and earnestly pray, That the Militia which was established by Ordinance of the 4th of May last as aforesaid, and then ordered to continue for one whole year, may be re-established; that so the present fears and distempers in the city may be dispersed and appeased: Whereunto, as the Petitioners humbly conceive this to be the only present safe means, next under the mighty hand of God, so they will not doubt, but that the said Militia, as hitherto they have done, will in all things perform their duties according to their trust. And the Petitioners shall pray, &c."

To the right honourable the Lord Mayor, the right worshipful the Aldermen, and Commons of the City of London in Common Council assembled: The humble Petition of divers well-affected Citizens of the City of London,

"Sheweth; That whereas we have lifted up our hands to the High God, for the reformation and defence of Religion, his majesty's just power and authority, the Liberties of the Subjects, and the Privileges of Parliaments; and seriously considering the late Transactions to violate all these, and to weaken the zeal and forwardness of this city, and this honourable court in the maintenance of the same, by endeavouring to remove the Present Militia, confirmed by authority of a Free Parliament for a year, and made choice of by this honourable court.—In this streight and exigency we are bold in all humility, yet with all earnestness, to pray, That this Honourable Court would sadly weigh the present dangers; and, as in former times it hath been your honour to be instrumental for the preservation of this miserable and dying kingdom, by the interposition of your courage, and power, and wisdom, in a time of need, so you would not suffer it to be buried in perpetual oblivion and reproach, by yielding up that Militia, which, by the good providence of God, and the authority of a Free Parliament, hath been invested in your hands, the only visible means, under God, we have now left for the security of our Religion, Lives, and Liberties."

To the right honourable the Lord Mayor, the right worshipful the Aldermen, and the worshipful the Commons in Common Council assembled: The humble Petition of divers Young Men, Citizens, and others Apprentices of this honourable City,

"Humbly sheweth; That your Petitioners being sadly affected with the distractions of these times, wherein divers discontented persons, for the advancement of their own interests, labour to sow new seeds of division and discord among us, whereby Incendiaries are encouraged, the well-affected discountenanced, the privileges of parliament violated, the public worship of God slighted, the liberties and properties of the faithful subjects of this Kingdom, and especially of this city, much endangered, and the long-desired-for end of these Troubles (by his majesty's gracious compliance with, and his safe and honourable return to his parliament, which we hoped was almost obtained, now retarded, and for the present altogether frustrated) have presented their humble Petition to both Houses of Parliament, a Copy whereof is hereunto annexed, the which they have thought it their duty likewise to tender unto this honourable Court; being confident, that as their desires in these their humble Addresses arise from no other ends whatsoever but the glory of God, and the discharge of their consciences, in pursuance of that Solemn League and Covenant which lies upon them, 'To endeavour to their utmost, in their places and callings, to use all lawful ways and means for the conservation and maintenance of the just rights and privileges of Parliament,' lately so much violated, 'the preservation and defence of his majesty's royal person and authority, together with the true Religion and Liberties of this kingdom, and for the discovery and bringing to condign punishment all evil instruments whatsoever, which labour, by fomenting groundless Fears and Jealousies, to divide and make parties amongst the people, thereby to retard the Settlement of Church and State: so we doubt not but this honourable Court (who have been instrumental to invite us, both by example and persuasion (according to several Ordinances and Declarations of Parliament) to engage ourselves to the prosecution of the said ends, wherein you have already done very much, to your everlasting praise and commendation) will still with all reality, constancy, and undaunted magnanimity, pursue the same, and likewise encourage those that shall, according to their duty, labour to promote the same ends. Wherefore we humbly pray, That this honourable Court would be pleased to use their utmost endeavours, by their Addresses to the Parliament, and otherwise, as they in their wisdom shall think fit, for the furthering of your Petitioners desire contained in the above-mentioned Petition.—We cannot likewise but with all thankfulness take notice of what this honourable city has done for the putting in execution of several Ordinances of Parliament, That none be put into any place of trust, either in church or commonwealth, but such as have taken, and now stand well affected to the covenant, to which we are confident that you will still adhere.—And whereas there have been, and still are, several factious persons who stile themselves 'The Well-affected of this City,' (though unworthy of that name) who labour to traduce the actions thereof, thereby to bring an odium upon it, and to lay it open to their malice; a fresh instance whereof we have in a Petition presented to the parliament, pretended to be the Petition of the Young Men and Apprentices of the City, as likewise by a Petition pretended to be presented to sir Thomas Fairfax, the which we are ready to produce, and refer the consideration of them to this honourable Court: And further pray, That as both the Militia of the City hath been legally chosen by this honourable Court, according to Ordinance of Parliament, and the Common Council legally chosen by the several Wards (according to the ancient custom of this City) you would be pleased to retain the same power, both civil and military, in your own hands. And that you would be pleased, for the prevention of many imminent dangers to which this City may be liable, by reason of these distractions, to take such effectual and speedy course, for the safeguard and defence thereof, that the fear either of any mutiny within, or any unwarrantable power from abroad, may in some measure be taken away, whereby trade (the main support of this City, now mightily impaired) may be again revived, and the franchises and liberties of this honourable City (to which we are the apparent heirs) maintained and defended. And as your Petitioners are in duty bound, both by that relation which they stand in to the honourable City, as by that solemn Engagement whereinto they have entered, so they will be always ready to hazard their lives for the defence thereof, and not suffer themselves directly or indirectly, by any terror or persuasion, to be drawn from their duty herein."

The humble Desires of the Citizens, Young Men, and Apprentices of the City of London; presented to both the Honourable Houses of Parliament, July 26, 1647. Together with the Ordinances of Parliament.

"1. It is our humble Desire, in regard Religion, our Lives, Liberties, and Estates are so much endangered, and the peace and safety of this city and kingdom, that the pretended Ordinance for the Change of the Militia of the City of London may be presently repealed before the rising of the houses; and that former Ordinance, that was conferred for a year by a Free Parliament, upon the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council, and by them legally chosen, may be established: In which regard we do conceive, that no justice, though it run in never so free a channel, can lawfully dispossess them of it, unless it shall appear to be abused contrary to the trust reposed in them. 2. It is likewise desired that the City of London may immediately be vindicated against a late pretended Declaration of both Houses, which declares all those Traitors, and so to forfeit life and estate, who shall, after publication thereof, act thereupon to get Subscriptions, and that the said Declaration be now presently reversed and cancelled. 3. That both Houses of Parliament do presently make an Order up on some special penalty, for the calling in of all their members of either houses to discharge the trust the kingdom has reposed in them, especially Eleven late accused Members, against whom there has been nothing proved of their accusation to this day. That yet again we may come to be so happy, as to enjoy the healing influence of a full and free parliament, in these distracted times.—These particulars we cannot but insist upon, since the distractions amongst us begin to grow so high, and the honour and privileges of parliament, the peace and safety of the city and kingdom are so greatly violated."

Much time was spent in this Business, and at last the Lords and Commons concurred in two Ordinances, as follow :

"Be it ordained, by the Lords and Commons in parliament assembled, That the Declaration of the 24th of this instant July, which declares all those Traitors who shall after publication thereof act thereupon to get Subscriptions, be null and void, any thing in the said Declaration to the contrary notwithstanding."

On July 24th 1647, the Houses of Lords and Commons had voted the following Declaration: "The Lords and Commons having seen a printed Paper, entitled, 'A Petition to the right honourable the Lord Mayor, the right worshipful the Aldermen, and Commons of the City of London, in the Common or Guildhall of the City of London assembled, under the name of divers Citizens, Commanders, Officers, and Soldiers of the Trained-Bands, Auxiliaries and others, Young Men and Apprentices, Sea Commanders, Seamen and Watermen.' Together with a dangerous Engagement of the same persons, by oath and vow, concerning the king's present coming to the parliament, upon terms far different from those which both houses, after mature deliberation, have declared to be necessary for the good and safety of this kingdom, casting reflections upon the proceedings both of the Parliament and Army, and tending to the embroiling the kingdom in a new war: And the said Lords and Commons, taking notice of great endeavours used by divers ill-affected persons, to procure Subscriptions thereunto, whereby well-meaning people may be misled: Do therefore declare, that whosoever after publication or notice thereof, shall proceed in, or promote or set his name to, or give consent that his name be set unto, or any way join in the said engagement, shall be deemed and adjudged Guilty of High Treason, and shall forfeit life and estate, as in cases of High Treason accustomed." They also ordered that it should be published forthwith, by beat of drum and sound of trumpet.

July 28. The Common Council sate in Guildhall again, and read a Letter from his ex-cency sir Thomas Fairfax, setting forth his good affection and tender care of the good of the City; and shewing his great dislike of the Petition, and the means used to promote the same. At the same time many Young Men, and others, attended the Common Council to express their readiness to stand up for the just privileges of the City, and defend it against all Opposers.

A Letter was then drawn up, and a messenger dispatched to his Excellency, and six commissioners appointed to go after the next morning. In the Letter the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council, declare their inclinableness to Peace, intreating his Excellency, That the Army might not advance this way, nor intermeddle with the rights and privileges of the City, conceiving that their strengthening of the City for the safety and preservation thereof, was no just cause to provoke the soldier: And as for the Petition, the Parliament had already declared their sense thereof, and therefore it was needless for them to do it, and the rather, for that it had never been formally presented to them.

July 29. This day came a Letter from his Excellency sir Thomas Fairfax, to the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council of the City of London; viz.

"My lords and gentlemen; You may please to remember the forward compliance of this Army with your desires, to remove to this distance, and that upon the assurance you gave them of your concurrence with their declared desires, for the settling of the liberty and peace of this kingdom, (against which you never yet offered us one exception, or any ground of dissent) as also of your great tenderness and resolution to secure the parliament and their privileges from any violence or attempt; the chief reason given us of your late listing of new forces, and wherein we did most acquiesce.—That upon this confidence, we had disposed of the Army into several parts of the kingdom, for the ease of the whole, some of them to above 100 miles distant; we had given up ourselves to the effecting such proposals as might tend to the comfortable settlement of this poor kingdom, and we were in a hopeful way for speedy relief for Ireland.—We cannot then but be deeply sensible of the unparalleled violation acted upon the Parliament upon Monday last, by a multitude from your City, because therein the Guards sent from the City, did not only neglect their duty for the security of the parliament from such violence, and the whole City to yield any relief to the houses in that extremity, but I am assured from eye and ear witnesses, that divers of the Common Council gave great encouragement to it, which doth not only gainsay your former professions, but does violence to those many obligations, that of your charter, protestation, and sundry other ways laid upon you to protect the parliament: For my part, I cannot but look on you (who are in authority) as accountable to the kingdom for your present interruptions of that hopeful way of Peace and Settlement things were in for this nation, and for relieving Ireland, occasioned by a late destructive Engagement, especially by the latter prodigious and horrid force done upon the parliament, tending to dissolve all government; upon which score, we and the whole kingdom shall have cause, to put every thing of the like nature that may happen to the parliament, to any who are friends to them and this army, except by your wisdom, care, and industry, the chief actors in the premises may be detected, secured, and given up to the procuring of justice for the same, and the best endeavours used to prevent the like for the future. And so I rest, your most assured friend to serve you,

A DECLARATION of the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons of the City of London in Common Council assembled.

"How, and by what authority, and under what pretences, his majesty was surprized at Holmby, where he was placed by consent of both kingdoms; and how thence removed, and at last brought into the army, under whose power his royal person hath ever since been kept, and carried to and fro, notwithstanding that his surprizal was disowned by the general for himself and all the officers about him, and for the body of the army, and that since both houses of parliament had required his royal person to be brought to Richmond, and there left in the hands of the Commissioners of Parliament who attended him at Holmby: Contrary to all which, the army yet desire, that no place might be proposed for his majesty's residence nearer London than where they would allow the quarters of the army to be. All these things we doubt not but by this time are so evidently known and apparent to the whole kingdom, that we should not need to insist upon any particular discovery thereof: and we believe that the right understanding and well-affected people of this kingdom, who remember and still adhere unto the Covenant which they have made with God, have all along observed in what manner the army, in the posture whereinto they have put themselves, have ever since proceeded with the parliament and city, and sought to improve their interests throughout the whole kingdom. We for our parts shall not presume to deliver any thing of our sense upon that which hath been altered, acted, or consented unto by both houses, at the instance, interposition, or importunity of the army; but only desire hereby to give a true account unto the kingdom upon what grounds and reasons we have been led to concur with the army in many of their late desires to the parliament (which happily may have been looked upon with some admiration), and what our just ends and aims were in sending down and continuing a committee of aldermen and citizens in the army all this time.

sentation of the 19th of December, 1646, and our Petition of the 17th of March, 1647; in the two last of which the disbanding of the army was particularly and especially insisted upon, have, we are confident, satisfied all moderate and unbiassed men, that we were desirous upon the first opportunity which God gave us, to express our great zeal for the settlement of peace in this kingdom, by establishing of the true religion, restoring his majesty to his just rights and authority, maintaining the privilege of parliament, easing the great charge of the kingdom, securing the people in their lawful liberties and properties, and relieving our distressed fellow subjects and protestants in Ireland; and in order hereunto, we have given two such signal testimonies, in that we were the principal leaders and encouragers to the first advancing of 200,000*l.* towards the satisfaction of our brethren of Scotland, when they had agreed to return to their country, and to this latter sudden raising of the like sum of 200,000*l.* for the payment of this army, and the affairs of Ireland, when the parliament had resolved upon the disbanding and disposing of so many of the army as the kingdom had no further use of, as we will hope that all men have been clearly convinced of our sincere intentions, as much as lay in us, and as far as it was fit for us to appear therein, to improve our utmost endeavours to make the way open to a happy composure of all things. And when the army refused to disband, and had possessed themselves of the person of the king, thereby justifying that bold seizure of him, which the general at first disclaimed as aforesaid; and that the army was upon their march, or, as they called it, drawing near to London; and that this city was in a manner summoned by a letter of the 10th of June last, under the hands of the general, and other prime officers of the army, although the parliament were at that time sensible enough of the strange carriage of the army towards them; and notwithstanding the army's lying so near to the city did very much hinder and impair the trade thereof, to the great prejudice of the city in particular, and of the kingdom in general: yet we, to shew how much we were desirous to avoid the occasion of a new war, did make bold often to address ourselves to the parliament and joined with the army in many of their demands to the honourable houses, sent down a committee of aldermen and citizens to reside in the army to maintain all good correspondence on both sides; and although the army a long time hovered near the parliament and city, we still omitted no endeavours or good offices on our parts, as far as we could well appear for them, to manifest how careful we were to uphold a good understanding between the army and the city. What violation the privileges of the house of commons suffered when the eleven accused members were enforced by the army to withdraw themselves, after it was declared upon the question, 'That by the laws of the land, no Judgment can be given to suspend those Members, or any of them, from sitting in the 'house, upon the papers presented from the army, before particulars produced, and proofs made.' And in what manner the parliament have (to satisfy the army) as it were renounced all foreign aid, under what pretence soever, even such as are under the same covenant with them. These things, we say, being transacted by the representative body of the whole kingdom, and public every where, it is evident what great influence (to say no more) the army hath throughout had upon the counsels of parliament: and for this city, it hath suffered itself to be so bounded by the army in relation to any preparation for its own guard and defence, whilst yet the army is recruited, and the soldiery of the whole kingdom invited to join with them, that the city hath been very much exposed to hazard and danger thereby. Yet, although this army be invested with the whole power of the land forces of this kingdom under pay of the parliament, when there is nothing left that can probably make any considerable resistance, and that it was expected they should fall roundly upon those things which concerned the public only, as they professed from the beginning; the army, contrary to that which they declared in their said letter of the 10th of June last unto the city, and their Declaration or Representation of the 14th of June, 'That they would not go beyond their desires at that time expressed, and for other particulars would acquiesce in the wisdom and justice of the parliament:' now demand the Militia of the city of London, which had been established by ordinance of parliament of the 4th of May last, to continue for one whole year in the hands of such as by their authority were nominated by the lord mayor, aldermen, and commons in common council assembled, and desire the same to be put into other hands; and so far prevail with the parliament, that they immediately consented thereto, although formerly they never made choice of, enlarged, or changed the Militia at London, but they still were pleased first to communicate the same unto the court of common council of this city: but we humbly and thankfully acknowledge, that upon our humble Petition the parliament presently recalled the same, and re-established the Militia appointed by ordinance of the 4th of May last as aforesaid. And therefore being thus awakened by this unexpected and undeserved interposition of the army in the Militia of the city, which we must protest to be subject to no other cognizance but of the king and parliament; and having experience how strongly the army have ever insisted upon any thing they once demanded, we cannot but foresee how far our proceedings in this business may be misrepresented to the kingdom, and misunderstood by those, who from the great professions of the army, have, or do expect from them a speedy settlement of the peace of the kingdom, and so may be possessed with something, as if we, by contesting for our Militia, did seek to retard the same. And this hath cast us upon this Declaration, wherein although we have unwillingly been enforced to touch upon some proceedings of the army with the parliament and this city, which preceded their intermeddling with our Militia, yet we could not omit the same, that we might make it clear to the kingdom what little reason the army had, when they had obtained so much from the parliament, and that the city had so far complied with them, at last to demand the change of that Militia which never moved in any thing without our cognizance, and so could never give the army any just cause of exception. And we well hope, that all the kingdom will be fully satisfied hereby how extremely desirous we have been all along to avoid giving any just cause of offence or provocation, and be convinced that we could not in honour do less than we have done to preserve our interest in so great a part of our government. For our parts, we call God to witness, we have a brotherly sense of the many great pressures under which the country must needs be, by quartering the army; and when the army shall be ready, of which they have given the kingdom so great hopes, to offer any thing to the parliament, for the settlement of the public, none shall more readily and zealously join with them therein than we, who from the bottom of our hearts abhor the thoughts of a new war. But if this vindication of our right in the Militia of the city shall be thought by the army to be a just cause for them, either to divert them from falling speedily upon that which concerns the public peace, or to cast them upon extraordinary courses, let God, the kingdom, and the whole world, be judge between them and us.

"As for that Petition and Engagement which hath been lately set on foot in the name of 'divers citizens, commanders, officers and soldiers of the trained bands and auxiliaries, the young men and apprentices of the cities of London and Westminster, sea commanders, seamen, and watermen, together with divers other commanders, officers, and soldiers within the line of communication and parishes mentioned in the weekly bills of mortality,' directed unto the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons, in the Common or Guild-Hall assembled. Upon which the army also have by their letter of the 23d of July last, given us their sense. To this we have no more to say, but that, for as much as we can collect, we find this Petition and Engagement to be occasioned from the intelligence which came from the army, that they would demand the alteration of the militia of this city; at which if our city, and other the inhabitants, took the alarm, the distemper which it begot cannot be charged on the government of the city: Neither can we see why the army should take notice thereof, it being only intended to the common-hall, but never presented, even as the petition of their soldiery was to their general, which being taken notice of by the parliament, as it was in agitation, was then so deeply resented by the soldiery, that from thence hath followed the putting of the army into that posture wherein now it is. Having thus cleared ourselves from any design to embroil ourselves or the kingdom in a new war, we find ourselves obliged, by which also we hope the whole world will be the more fully satisfied of our desires for a speedy, firm, and just peace, to declare unto the whole kingdom the bottom of our hearts and affections, as in relation to his majesty, whom we have always, and shall ever acknowledge to be our true and only sovereign, although his royal person have, during these distractions, been divided from us. Our Remonstrance, Representation, and Petition before-mentioned, and a later Petition to both houses on the 17th of March last, presently after his majesty came to Holmby, have, we doubt not, already justified us, that in all our addresses to the parliament, upon all occasions which did concern the public, we have ever remembered to express our earnest desires for his majesty's honourable and speedy return to his houses of parliament; and since his surprisal we have with much longing attended what the army would propound concerning his majesty in particular, according to the greater expectation which they have raised in the people, from that which they have hinted in their declaration or representation, and other papers of their intentions towards his majesty. But upon what great affairs, conducing to the ends the army at first professed, the time hath been hitherto spent, and nothing done, but to get the whole power of the kingdom and city into their hand, is sufficiently apparent.

"We therefore do in the presence of Almighty God profess, That there is nothing in the world that we more desire, than that his majesty may be put and left free, in such an honourable condition and capacity, as his person may appear to be at liberty, to receive and treat upon such propositions as shall be presented unto him from the parliaments of both his kingdoms; for our consciences tell us, that whilst his royal person is environed by an army, and remains under the power thereof, we cannot expect that either his majesty's princely heart can give that free assent unto those things which shall be propounded unto him as is requisite; or if he do, cannot hope with good reason that we and our posterity shall without alteration enjoy the same; and therefore we are resolved earnestly, yet with humility, to apply ourselves to the parliament to this purpose, and hope that all good subjects, who are touched with any due sense of that duty and allegiance which by the law of God and man they owe unto their king, will unanimously join with us therein.

"We cannot omit also to declare unto the kingdom, how we have sadly observed, since the Eleven accused Members withdrew themselves, and that the Army hath daily grown upon the parliament, that a very great and considerable number of other members of the house of commons have also retired themselves, to the endangering of the kingdom, which never more needed a full council. And therefore we shall make our speedy Address to the honourable House of Commons to call in the members of their house, residing in the Army, or retiring to their dwellings by leave of the house, or otherwise: And we shall particularly insist upon the re-admission of the Eleven Members, lately driven out of the House of Commons by the violent pursuit of the Army, contrary to the sense of the same house, the law of the land, and the privileges of parliament; wherein also we are confident, all good Englishmen, and lovers of their country, will adhere to them and us.

"We should express ourselves further to vindicate this City before the kingdom, from the aspersions which may have, throughout these distractions, been cast upon this city to have been the first promoters and contrivers of this unnatural war, which God for the sins of this nation hath brought upon the kingdom: But that God is our witness, how desirous we have been at all times, and still are, of a safe and well-grounded peace; and with what fellow-feeling we have looked upon the miseries, which this long war hath brought upon our fellow-subjects throughout the country.

"And thus, as we have herein truly and clearly stated the matter of difference, if it can be called any, between us and the Army, to wit this alone, that we could not submit the Militia of this City to be altered at the pleasure of an Army, after it had been so orderly settled in the hands of such as were entrusted therewith for one whole year, when there was a full and free Parliament; so we find it more than time, that the whole kingdom were possessed with the true state thereof; And therefore, and to this end, we have been necessitated to this Declaration, whereby we are confident, the whole kingdom will clearly discover, upon whom the guilt of a New War, which we do still and will ever abhor, must justly lie: So, and no otherwise, shall we expect a blessing from Almighty God, in our just Defence (if we must be put upon the same) than as from the bottom of our hearts we sincerely desire an happy and speedy Peace, by the Settlement of true Religion in this kingdom, by re-establishing his majesty's just Rights and Authority, by upholding all lawful privileges of a free Parliament, by maintaining the Fundamental Laws of the land, by restoring and securing the subject unto, and in his just right and property, and by freeing this long oppressed kingdom of all Taxes and the enforced Free-Quarters towards the maintenance of an Army, which of a long time hath had no visible enemy to encounter: And from this resolution by the blessing of God, we shall never recede for any earthly consideration or advantage whatsoever. MITCHEL.

"My lords and gentlemen; Having resolved upon this enclosed Dispatch to the City of London, I thought it my part to give you an account of it, and to give you all assurance, that my heart is deeply affected with the late carriages towards the parliament: And however others have neglected their duty towards them for their security and defence; yet as God shall enable me, it shall be my great business to improve all that is in my hand for the preserving of them, and in them the interest of the nation, and what constructions soever some formerly may have put upon the proceedings of this Army: I trust the Lord will by his good hand lead us into such good actions, as shall witness our end answerable to all our profession; to wit, for the good of the kingdom, and therein to be an effectual saving to the great authority of the kingdom in the parliament. Your most assured friend. THOMAS FAIRFAX.

Bedford, July 29, 1647.

A Letter from both Houses of Parliament to his Excellency Sir Thomas Fairfax, concerning the City of London, and other things relating to the peace of the kingdom.

"May it please your Excellency; The Houses having this day received from their Commissioners a copy of your Letter to them dated at Bedford, July 29, with a copy of another Letter of the same date, writ to the city of London, in both which though there be no accounts at all of the motion of your Army, yet the houses understand by the letters from their commissioners in which the copies were enclosed, and otherwise, that you have given Orders for the marching of the Army towards London upon pretence of defending the houses from the danger of Tumults; upon consideration whereof the houses have commanded us to let you understand, that as they cannot but have a deep sense of the undue liberty, which some Apprentices of the city of London, and others, from whom they might have expected more obedience, have taken to themselves to violate the just authority, privileges, and freedom of parliament, in which the safety of the whole kingdom is concerned, and so they doubt not but the sense of so great an offence will at last strike all their breasts that have been accessory thereunto, with a detestation of any practices of the like nature for the future: And as the houses cannot imagine, that the disorder committed by some Apprentices, or those that mingled with them, had the allowance of the City of London, so they have since received full satisfaction by the strict Orders given out by the Lord Mayor and Common Council of the city, to all masters to have care of their servants, and by their Declaration proclaimed in the several parts of the city, for the preventing and suppressing of tumults, that they shall sit with much freedom and security from any disturbance for the future. And therefore the Houses seeing no cause to command that Army, or any part thereof, to march up for their defence, but rather judging (by the distractions raised at the news thereof) that the motion of the Army near the City, is like to precipitate the City and Army in a desperate and bloody engagement, not only to the disturbance of the parliament's sitting, but also to the destruction thereof, and of all authority, by casting the whole kingdom into confusion. For prevention thereof, they have sent you this enclosed Order, requiring you, as you tender the freedom of parliament, the safety of the city and whole kingdom, to give exact obedience thereunto, This being all we have in command, we rest." Westminster, July 30, 1647.

A Declaration of the Lords and Commons of the Committee for the Safety and the Militia of London, to the whole kingdom, of the Resolutions of the Parliament and City. Dated August 2, 1647.

"For the better satisfaction of the kingdom, the City of London (who have been the principal maintainers of the Army now advancing against them), is for peace, and hath omitted nothing to shew their desires to maintain a good understanding with the Army; what the city doth in standing upon their guard, is for their own defence, and not to engage in a new war, but to put a speedy period to the kingdom's troubles, and hasten Ireland's relief: They profess they have, and shall always endeavour to procure the soldiers indemnity, and that they may have their arrears paid them; and have no other end but that God may have his glory, the king's majesty settled in his just rights, the parliament enjoy their privileges and freedoms, and the subject their fundamental laws, liberty and peace: and this being the Resolution of this City, they are confident no person of honour, good conscience, and lover of their country, will draw sword, or use violence against them, but rather stand for their defence and safety."

Ordered by the Committee of Lords and Commons, for the safety of the king, parliament, city and kingdom; and also by the Committee of the Militia of the city of London and parts adjacent, that this Declaration be printed and published. THO. PARTINGTON, Clerk.

Upon August 3, the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council of the City of London, having agreed upon a Letter to send to the General, six Aldermen and twelve of the Common Council went with the same early this morning, and presented it to the General at Colebrook: The Letter was as followeth:

A Letter agreed upon by the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common-Councilmen of the City of London, to be sent to the General at Colebrook, August 2, 1647.

"Right Honourable; Unto all our present unhappiness we have this added; That we have not yet received any Answer from your Excellency to our two last Letters, although the Army be approached so near unto us, and that some of our Committee have daily attended to that purpose: but we are resolved to omit nothing unattempted, though all discouragements do manifest, as we have always protest, how much we desire peace and abhor a new War; and to this end we have added six Aldermen and twelve Commons to the Committee we formerly appointed to attend your Excellency; from whom your Excellency will please to receive our sense of the great offence that the Army hath taken against this city, and give ear and credit unto those things which they delivered unto your Excellency and your honourable council of war on our behalf: We have no more to say, but to pursue them with our prayers, that God will give a blessing to their and our endeavours; and avert his heavy judgments from this city, and incline your noble heart to weigh seriously the miseries of a new War; wherein whatsoever share is allotted to this city, the desolation will have an influence upon the whole kingdom.—By the command of the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons of the City of London.' MICHELL."

Upon the presenting of this Letter, the Commissioners for this City had presented them a Declaration by the General and Council of War on behalf of themselves and the whole Army, dated at Colebrook, August 3, 1647, shewing the Grounds of their present advance towards London: They likewise presented them a Copy of the Grand Proposals of the Army for a settled Peace, and a short Declaration thereunto added; and these they received as the Grand Desires and Proposals of the Army, and Declaration of their Proceedings and Intentions. This is given at large at 3 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 746. It assigns the pretensions and proceedings of the Citizens of London, and the apprentices, as the principal cause of the Army's advance.

Wednesday, August the 4th, another Letter was presented to the General at Thistleworth, from the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, &c. of London, in these words:

"Right Honourable; We have by some of that Committee, which we sent down unto your Excellency this morning, received the Declaration of your Excellency, and your Council of War, on the behalf of yourselves, and the whole army, as we were sitting in council, about five of the clock in the afternoon, and have heard the same read, and considered seriously thereupon; and by our Committee we have had a full Relation of all Passages between your Excellency and them; and forasmuch as we observe from the said Declaration, of the chief cause that hath drawn your Excellency and your army thus near the city, is to bring home those noble and honourable members of both houses; who, because of the Tumults at Westminster the 26th past, have retired themselves, to the end they may be placed in safety, and in Free Parliament at Westminster, We cheerfully and heartily join with your excellency therein; and according as we shall find directions from your Excellency, they shall find all ports and passages open to receive you and them, as also such guards of two or three regiments as your Excellency shall think fitting, for their conduct to the two houses of parliament; and the parliament being sate with peace and safety, we shall humbly submit to their direction, what forces of yours and ours to continue for their future guard; in which service, we humbly offer the whole strength of this city; all other matters which in this strait of time we cannot go through, we wholly refer and submit to be determined by both houses, when they shall be set in safety at Westminster, as aforesaid, and in confidence that God will give a blessing to these our endeavours, for the taking away all offences and misunderstanding, we have recalled our late Declaration, published in the name of the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons of the city of London, in common council assembled: And now we well hope, That your Excellency will receive such satisfaction hereby, as that you will withhold the soldier from doing any offence or prejudice to the City, or lines of communication.—By command of the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and commons at London, in common-council assembled. MICHELL."

This morning also about two of the clock, col. Rainsborough, col. Hewson, col. Pride, and col. Rossiter's regiment, commanded then by lieut. colonel Twisleton, with their several regiments of horse and foot, which is the brigade commanded out on Hounslow-Heath, marched into the borough of Southwark, without any opposition, the soldiers carrying themselves very civilly, without doing hurt to any; and finding the city gate on the bridge shut, and the Port-cullis let down, as also a guard within; they planted two pieces of ordnance against the gate, and set a guard without, and in a short time after the great fort was yielded to them.—About two of the clock this afternoon the six Aldermen, and Twelve Commons before-mentioned, returned from his Excellency to the Common-Council at Guild-Hall, with the General's demands, to have the forts on the west side of the City of London to be delivered up to him; and that security being given, he would bring the Members of both houses, who were forced from the Parliament, to Westminster, to sit in the Free Parliament; and of this an Answer was to be returned to the General by six of the clock at night: And after a full debate thereupon a Letter was drawn up and sent to his Excellency in these words:

"Right Honourable; By those of our Committee which came from you this day, we understand your Excellency's and your honourable Council of War, their expectation to be possessed of all forts from Giles's fort, and that to be one, down to the river-side, by six of the clock this evening: And we took notice for what reasons your Excellency is led to insist thereupon: For our parts, that we may manifest how ready we are to comply with all things which may beget a good understanding, We have readily consented thereunto, as far as the cognizance thereof belongs to this court, and have given directions accordingly, to the Committee of the Militia, for drawing off all forces and ordnance, unto which work they do now instantly apply themselves, and we are confident your Excellency will find performance accordingly. The Committee of the Militia will also give order for quitting such forts on Southwark-side, as are not as yet in possession of your forces. And now, next under Almighty God, we do rely upon your Excellency's honourable word for our safety, and to be protected from all violence of the soldiery. MICHEL."

August 4, 1647.

Aug. 5th. The whole Army advanced nearer London, the general removing his head quarters from Thistleworth, came to Hammersmith, and at the end of the town was met by the commissioners of the city, who assured him, that the city were well satisfied upon the agreement of his excellency's advance, that the forts from Giles's to the water-side were acquitted by them, and delivered to the forces sent by his excellency, who now had the guard of them; and they desired of his excellency an Answer to their last Letter, whereupon his excellency returned back to sir Nicholas Crisp's house, where a letter was agreed on as followeth:

"My lords and gentlemen; I am very glad to find so ready a compliance, in answer to my last Desire sent to the Common Council, and have accordingly given order for three regiments of foot, and two of horse, to possess those forts you mention in your last, and to lie thereabouts. I am with the rest of the Army marched up to Hammersmith, in order to the security of the lords and commons, who, I suppose, will to morrow sit in parliament: the preserving of their privileges, and securing them from violence, that with freedom they may sit and discharge their trusts, hath been the cause of my near approach to your city; and whereas you are pleased to express your hopes of preservation from violence, you may be confident nothing shall pass from this army, but what shall be for the safety of this city: and I doubt not, though some disaffected persons to the peace of the kingdom, have endeavoured to beget a misunderstanding between this army and the city, hoping thereby to embroil the kingdom in new troubles, yet that this army will always so behave themselves, as to witness to the world the integrity of their hearts, in having no other design, but the quiet and happy settlement of a firm and lasting peace, wherein both the whole kingdom, and your city particularly, will have cause to rejoice in the goodness of God, the accomplishment whereof will truly glad the hearts of this army, and in particular of, Your most humble servant,

THO. FAIRFAX."

Aug. 6th. His excellency sir Thomas Fairfax came to take possession of the Tower of London, according to the Votes of both houses on Friday last; he was attended on by his life-guard and a party of colonel Pride's regiment of foot: coming to the Tower, the city-guard that were there, marched out, and about 300 of the general's foot marched in, when also his excellency went into the Tower, attended by many commanders and other gentlemen, and took possession of his command there as constable.

The Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common-council of London had appointed a Committee to congratulate his Excellency at the Tower, which Committee coming to the Tower, after dinner alderman Gibbs made a speech to his excellency, thereby intimating that the Lord Mayor, Aldermen and Common-council of the City had commanded him to give his Excellency and his army thanks for their love to and care of the city of London; and that they could wish they were able to record his praises to future ages suitable to their worth:—That they are very sorry that their coming into the City was so sudden, that they could not attend his excellency in such an equipage as they desired: and lastly, that he was desired to recommend to his excellency the faithfulness and care of colonel West lieutenant of the Tower; and that they do desire his excellency, That on Thursday next, if it may suit with the great affairs of the kingdom, the city do desire that his excellency with his general officers, and captains, would please to dine with them; and that all names and distinctions of parties in the city and kingdom may be laid aside, and every one seek peace and unity, that the army may strengthen the hands of the city, and the city the army, by a firm bond of unity.

To which his Excellency returned a loving and modest Answer, giving them thanks for the expressions of their love to him, and care of the peace of the kingdom; that for a lieutenant of the Tower, (though he that was now in, was a worthy person) he had appointed a gentleman of known worth and fidelity, a citizen of good estate, dwelling amongst them, viz. Colonel Tichburne, who is by his excellency made lieutenant of the Tower; that for him and his officers coming to dine with the city, he would acquaint them with their desires at a council of war, giving them thanks, and desiring that all may labour and study for unity and peace: after this his excellency went to view what store of ordnance, arms, powder, shot, musket, pistols, and other ammunition was in the Tower, attended by both the lieutenants, officers of the ordnance, and many other gentlemen of quality; and after view taken of the stores, he went up into the White Tower, and stayed above half an hour, taking a view thereof, and then came down and gave order to his lieutenant to give away 20*l*. to be divided as he shall think fit, among the warders, clerks, &c. belonging to the officers of the ordnance for their pains; so his excellency departed, and went that night from London to the lord Pawlet's house by Turnham-Green, whose son sir John Pawlet married the general's lady's sister, and stayed there this night and Tuesday.

September 24. According to former order, the Committee appointed to examine the Forces upon the House of Commons, made their further report, and it was concerning the proofs and informations against some of chief eminency in the City that had been actors or abettors of the Force and Tumults against the houses. Upon which the house entering into serious debate, it was put to the question, and voted, "That there appears sufficient matter to accuse sir John Gayre knight, mayor of the city of London, of High-Treason;" and further voted, "That he should be committed prisoner to the Tower of London upon accusation of High-Treason, for countenancing and abetting the Force and Tumults brought down and used against the house the 26th of July last; and this to be in order to his trial."

The House upon debate also further voted the like Charge of High Treason against Thomas Cullam alderman and one of the sheriffs of London, James Bunce alderman, John Langham alderman, Thomas Adams alderman, citizens of London, for countenancing and abetting the said Force against the Houses; and that they be committed to the Tower of London*.

And the Committee appointed to examine the said Force and Tumult, were appointed to prepare and bring Impeachments against the said Lord Mayor and Aldermen as aforesaid, against Monday morning next.

September 25. The Lord Mayor and impeached Aldermen before-mentioned being taken into custody the last night, were this day

* Whitelocke speaking of the disturbances made by the Citizens, thus moralizes: "We may take notice of the uncertainty of worldly affairs, when the parliament and their army had subdued their common enemy, then they quarrelled among themselves, the army against the parliament; when they were pretty well pieced together again, then the apprentices and others make an insurrection against the parliament and army. Thus they were in continual perplexities and danger."—In a like strain he observes on another occasion: "In these passages we may take notice of the strange workings of God, and of the perplexed condition in which the parliament was at this time." The Invasion of England by Hamilton and the Scots calls forth these reflections: "Here you may take notice of a strange turn in the affairs of this Parliament to which all human affairs are subject, but in these times much more than ordinary. You have read the great endeavours formerly, to bring them in as friends to assist the Parliament, and remember the story of their actions, and return home again; now the other faction in Scotland prevailing, the Scots are turned enemies to England, and invade them with a considerable army; before, they joined with the parliament against the king, now they join with the king's forces against the parliament. How like the Sea the People of the world are, still ebbing or flowing, always in an uncertain motion, and constant in nothing but inconstancy!"

carried to the Tower, according to the Votes of the Houses.

This day a further Report was made to the House from the Committee appointed to examine the Force upon the house and Tumult in relation to citizens; and it was voted, "That col. Lawrence Bromfield, col. Edward Hooker, captain Jones, be impeached of High Crimes and Misdemeanors, and committed to the Serjeant's custody attending the house of commons; and that a Charge of Impeachment be drawn up against them accordingly." Also, "That captain Musgrave, Tho. Carill, Barthol. West, Rich. Rumney, Ralph Hooker, John Melton minister, James Studley, Richard Fortis, Mr. William Drake, — Brooke, Apprentice to Mr. Baker of Hellens, John Harley, Daniel Hill, and Edm. Peisley citizens of London, be indicted of High-Treason at the King's Bench bar, and committed to the Serjeant's custody until their trial this next term at the court of King's Bench aforesaid."

The House had then also debate in relation to the settlement of the government of the City of London; and ordered, That the Aldermen and Common Council of London do meet and consider how the civil government of the city may be executed according to the city charter, now that the Lord Mayor is committed.*

September 24. The Commons sent by Message to the house of peers an Impeachment against the Lord Mayor of London according to the Votes the last week, desiring their lordships would appoint a time for his trial; and the Commons will be ready to bring up their Charge and Proof against him.

Both the Houses passed an Order for a Common Hall to be called to-morrow at Guildhall, London, for the chusing of a new Lord Mayor, according to the custom of the city of London.

September 25. This day was a Common Hall in London for the chusing of a Lord Mayor. There was in nomination alderman Warner, alderman Andrews, sir Jacob Garratt, sir Thomas Soames, and alderman Reynoldson; and after it was put to the voice, it was in competition between the three first. The aldermen would have two presented to the Commons, whereof they to chuse one, according to late custom: But the City Charter being read in that particular, it appeared, that the Commons came to chuse (and not to present) a mayor for the year ensuing; and they chose alderman Warner both for the next year

* On the 28th of March, 1771, Brass Crosby, Lord Mayor of London, a Member of Parliament, was committed to the Tower under a warrant of the Speaker of the House of Commons, for a breach of privilege of the house; (see the Case, infra). He remained in confinement till the end of the session, during which period, it appears that alderman Trecothick officiated as his locum tenens; under what devolution of authority is not set forth.

ensuing, and in the room of sir John Gayre, for the remaining part of this time.

September 29. Alderman Warner, the new Lord Mayor, was presented to the House of Peers to take his oath to serve out the time of sir John Gayre; and is afterwards to be again sworn for the year following. At his presenting before the Lords, one of the City Council made a Speech, acquainting their lordships, That according to the Charter of the city of London, they had chosen alderman Warner to be Lord Mayor for the year following, he being a gentleman of approved worth and fidelity to the city and kingdom; using many expressions in his commendations; and in truth he well deserves them, desiring their lordships approbation of their choice, and that he may execute the place for the time of sir John Gayre, and year following, and that he may be sworn; which their lordships accordingly gave order for, expressing their very good liking and approbation in the choice of the said Lord Mayor; of whose fidelity and abilities, as well parliament as city, have received so many testimonies.

December 2. After the City Petition was read, and Answer given thereunto, they Ordered, That the Committee appointed to draw up the Impeachment against the Lords, do draw up the Impeachment against the late Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Recorder of London, now in the Tower, by Monday morning next.

March 13, 1648. This day, according to former Order, the house took into consideration the several Impeachments of High Treason against sir John Gayre, knight, alderman, and late Lord Mayor of the city of London, alderman Bunce, alderman Adams, and alderman Langham. In the first place the Impeachment against sir John Gayre was read, and the Proofs to every Article against him; upon which the house being fully satisfied to the matter against him; they voted and past every of the said Articles one by one. The Articles of High Treason against alderman Adams were also read particularly one by one, and the particular Proofs to each Article, and were assented unto. The like Articles against alderman Bunce and alderman Langham were past. The house then ordered, That the several Articles of Impeachment should be sent to the Lords, and their lordships to be acquainted that the House is ready to make good the Charge against the said several aldermen.

March 21. A Message was brought from the Commons by Mr. Chaloner and others, with Articles of Impeachment for High Treason, and other High Crimes and Misdemeanors, against sir John Gayre knight, alderman of London, James Bunce, Thomas Adams, and John Langham, aldermen of the same: who, in the name of the commons, and of all the commons of England, did desire their lordships to put the said Aldermen to their Answer; and that such proceedings might be had thereupon as were agreeable to justice: that the house of commons were ready with their Evidence, and that the four impeached Aldermen were by virtue of an order from their house, committed prisoners to the Tower.

April 14. The Commons sent up to the Lords their Articles of Impeachment against sir John Gayre, knight, which were read, as follows:

ARTICLES of the Commons assembled in Parliament, in Maintenance of their Impeachment against Sir JOHN GAYRE, Knight, Alderman of the City of London, whereby he stands charged of High Treason, and other High Crimes and Misdemeanors.

“That upon the 26th of July last past, and divers days before and since, he the said sir John Gayre, being then lord mayor of London, at the Guildhall, and other places within the said cities of London and Westminster and counties of Middlesex and Surry, contrary to his oath and duty as lord mayor of London, and against his allegiance, hath, together with Thomas Adams, John Langham, and James Bunce, aldermen of London; Wm. Drake, Jeremiah Bains, John Milton, Thos. Papillon, Richard Rumney, and Richard Crook, citizens of London; and with col. Sydenham Pointz, col. John Dalbier, col. James Midlop, capt. Robert Massey, and other Reformed officers and soldiers, and other persons, maliciously and traitorously plotted and endeavoured, with open force and violence, and with armed power, to compel and enforce the lords and commons, then assembled in parliament at Westminster, to alter the laws and ordinances by parliament established for the safety and weal of the realm; and likewise, maliciously and traitorously, to raise and levy war within the places aforesaid, against the king, parliament, and kingdom; and accordingly at the times and places aforesaid, hath, with the persons aforesaid, and others, maliciously and traitorously raised and levied war against the king, parliament, and kingdom; and together with the persons aforesaid, with open force and violence, and with armed power, did, at the times and places aforesaid, maliciously compel and enforce the said lords and commons, in parliament assembled, to alter, annul, and make void several laws and ordinances by parliament established, and to make new laws and ordinances according to their own will and pleasure.

“That the said sir John Gayre, together with the said John Langham, &c. and other reformed officers and soldiers, and other persons; which reformed officers, by ordinance of parliament, the lords and commons assembled in parliament, for their tumultuous carriage towards the parliament, were commanded to depart out of the cities of London and Westminster, and twenty miles about the late lines of communication; and the execution of the said ordinance was committed to the said sir John Gayre, &c. the then militia of the city of London, who were, by divers orders of the house of commons, put in mind of their duty, and required to put the said ordinance duly in execution, which they did not do; but did, at the times and places aforesaid, traitorously and seditionously procure, abet, maintain, and encourage the said reformed officers and soldiers, and many apprentices of the city of London, and divers other persons ill affected to the proceedings of parliament, by open force and violence, and with armed power, to compel and enforce the houses of parliament to revoke, annul, and make void an ordinance of parliament, made and passed by the lords and commons, now assembled in parliament, the 23d day of July last. And likewise, by such open force and violence, and armed power, to compel and enforce the said lords and commons, assembled in parliament, to revoke, annul, and make void a declaration, made by the said lords and commons, the 24th of July last. And further, by the said open force and violence, and with armed power, to compel and enforce the said lords and commons in parliament assembled, to make and ordain an ordinance of parliament of the 26th of July, whereby they made the ordinance of parliament of the 4th of May, for and concerning the militia of the city of London, formerly repealed, to be in full force and virtue, any thing in the ordinance of the 23d of July to the contrary notwithstanding.

"And the said col. James Midhop, capt. Robert Massey, and the said other reformed officers and soldiers, apprentices, and others the said ill-affected people, by the procurement, abetting, maintenance, encouragement, and assistance of the said sir John Gayre, &c., did accordingly, traitorously and maliciously, with open force and violence, and with armed power, upon or about the 26th of July, compel and enforce the said lords and commons, in parliament assembled within the city of Westminster, to repeal and make void the aforesaid ordinance of the 23d of July; and also revoke, annul, and make void the aforesaid declaration of the 24th of July; and to make again and pass the said ordinance for the militia, of the 4th of May, formerly repealed.

"And by the said open force and violence, and armed power, and by the procurement, abetting, maintenance, encouraging, and assistance as aforesaid, did, on or about the 26th of July, traitorously and maliciously compel and enforce the house of commons to vote, That the king should forthwith come up to the city of London; which procuring, abetting, maintaining, encouraging, and actual force as aforesaid, was procured and done to the intent and purpose to annul and make void several laws and ordinances made by the lords and commons assembled in parliament for the safety and welfare of the people of this realm, and to destroy and take away the just power and authority of the parliament; and to the further intent, that he the said sir John Gayre, with others his said confederates, might be the better enabled to carry on their traitorous design of levying the said war against the king, parliament, and kingdom.—That, in further prosecution of his said traitorous levying the said war, and other his traitorous plottings, contrivances, and abetting as aforesaid, he the said sir John Gayre, &c. and other persons, caused many of the reformed officers and soldiers, and many regiments of other armed men, to the number of 10,000 armed men, and upwards, upon or about the 30th of July last past, to be listed and raised; and being so listed, armed, and raised, to be employed with weapons of war, offensive and defensive, in a warlike manner, to fight against the army under the command of sir Thos. Fairfax, who was, by ordinance of lords and commons, assembled in parliament, appointed to defend the parliament and kingdom, and was then marching up to the city of London, to that purpose; and the said sir John Gayre, and the said reformed officers and soldiers, and persons aforesaid, with the said regiment of armed men and other forces, at the time aforesaid, did levy actual war within the cities of London and Westminster, counties of Middlesex and Surry, against the king, parliament, and kingdom.—By all which means and ways, he the said sir John Gayre hath, traitorously and maliciously, conspired, continued and actually levied war against the king, parliament, and kingdom, and hath traitorously and maliciously plotted, contrived, procured, and abetted the forcing of the said houses of parliament as aforesaid; which actually by him, and his abetment and procurement, hath been done accordingly: for all which they do impeach him of High Treason against the king, his crown and dignity.—And the said commons, by protestation, saving to themselves a liberty of exhibiting, at any times hereafter, any other accusation or impeachment against the said sir John Gayre; and also of replying to the answers that the said sir John shall make to his said articles, or any of them, and of offering further proof also of the premises, or any of them, or any other impeachment or accusation that shall be by them, as the cause shall, according to the course of parliament, require, do pray that the said sir John be put to answer all and every the premises; and that such proceedings, examinations, trial, and judgment may be upon every of them had and used, as is agreeable to law and justice."

Hereupon the lords ordered, That sir John Gayre, now prisoner in the Tower, be brought to their bar on Wednesday next to receive this Charge brought up from the house of commons against him.

April 19. The Lieutenant of the Tower having brought up sir John Gayre to the house of lords, the Speaker commanded him to kneel at the bar as a delinquent; which he refused to do, and desired to be heard: but being commanded again to kneel, and he still refusing to do so, the lords directed him to withdraw; and then taking into consideration the high Contempt hereby offered to their house, fined him 500*l.* to the king, to be presently estreated into the exchequer.—Sir John being called in again, and told by the Speaker, That the lords had fined him 500*l.* for his high Contempt; and the Impeachment being then read in his presence, he said, He disavowed and abhorred the offences which he had heard read to him: he also desired a copy of his charge, time to answer it, and that such council as he should desire might be assigned him; which the lords agreed to.

April 12. The Articles of Impeachment brought up from the commons against Thomas Adams, alderman of the city of London, were read: but, being the same as those against sir John Gayre, it is unnecessary to repeat them.

April 26. Alderman Adams was brought to the bar of the Lords, to receive his Charge of High Treason, and other High Crimes and misdemeanors brought up from the Commons against him; where, being commanded to kneel as a delinquent, he desired to be excused from kneeling; which answer the lords took for a contempt; and, after commanding him to withdraw, fined him 500*l.* to be estreated into the exchequer, and levied forthwith.—Then he was called in again, and the Speaker told him, That their lordships had fined him 500*l.* for his high contempt to that house, in refusing to kneel at their bar; and then commanded his Charge to be publicly read to him, which was accordingly done. Next the Speaker told him he should have a copy of his Charge, if he desired it, and counsel assigned him; which was accordingly ordered.

Next, John Langham and James Bunce, aldermen, were called in separately, and both set to the bar and commanded to kneel; which they also refusing, were each fined 500*l.* for their contempt, and were remanded back to the Tower. The fines were ordered to be estreated forthwith, and copies of the writs for that purpose are entered in the Journals.

May 23. The Lord Mayor, Aldermen and Commons, of the City of London in Common Council assembled, presented a Petition to the House of Commons, praying, amongst other things, "That the Aldermen now in the Tower, the Recorder, and the rest of their fellow-citizens restrained upon the same occasion, may be discharged and restored; whereby the City may be the better united, their hands strengthened, and they made more serviceable to the Parliament and City for their preservation and safety, which they shall endeavour to the utmost of their power and abilities."

The Lords returned the Petitioners Thanks; That upon the Impeachments sent from the Commons, they had proceeded no otherwise than in the usual course of parliament: That as to the Recorder and the rest not impeached, they would endeavour their release; and assured the City of their inclinations to comply with these desires from them, as a means firmly to unite them, to fasten their hearts, and strengthen their hands to serve the parliament, in order to the establishment of religion and the peace of the kingdom according to the Covenant.

The Speaker of the house of commons acquainted the citizens, That the house had considered their Petition; that in it were many Desires which are expressed to tend very much to the union of the city in itself: which how much that house desired, would appear by the following Vote: 1. "That Mr. Glyan, Recorder of the City, be discharged from any proceedings upon the Vote for his Impeachment. 2. The like order made for lieut. col. Baines; the colonels Chapman, Vaughan, Copely, Bromfield, and Hooker; the captains Jones and Cox. And, 3. That upon the desire of the Militia of London, the horse and foot in the Tower should be removed from thence, and joined with the forces at Whitehall and the Mews; there to continue till the city declare they are in a posture to defend the parliament and themselves."—He also further informed them, That as to the Case of the Aldermen in the Tower, it was a business of a very serious and important consideration; and therefore the house had resolved to resume the debate of it on that day se'nnight.

June 3. The House of Commons resolved, "That the Votes whereby Alderman Gayre, Langham and Bunce stand accused, be hereby discharged."

June 6. The Lords concurred with the Commons, and resolved not to proceed any further against the Aldermen in the Tower, and ordered them all to be discharged.

181. Proceedings against the Seven Lords; namely, JAMES Earl of SUFFOLK, FRANCIS Lord WILLOUGHBY of Parham, JOHN Lord HUNSDEN, WILLIAM Lord MAYNARD, THEOBALD Earl of LINCOLN, GEORGE Lord BERKLEY, and JAMES Earl of MIDDLESEX, upon an Impeachment of High Treason, for levying War against the King, Parliament, and Kingdom: 23 CAR. I. A. D. 1647. [7 Rushworth. 3 Cobb. Parl. Hist.]

THE Commons this 8th day of September 1647 further proceeded in the Report from the Committee, how far any member of parliament had been active in the late design of a new War, and Tumults in London; and they had before them the cases of several lords, members of the house of peers, and upon debate of the Informations, and Proofs against them, the commons voted an Impeachment of High Treason against them, viz. against James earl of Suffolk, Francis lord Willoughby of Parham, John lord Hunsden, William lord Maynard, Theobald earl of Lincoln, George lord Berkley, and James earl of Middlesex, for levying of war against the king, parliament, and kingdom.

And the commons sent a message to the house of peers, to impeach the said Lords of high-treason at the bar of that house; and to desire their lordships that they may be sequestered from the service of the house, and committed to custody: and that the commons would be ready when their lordships should please to bring a particular charge against them, which was done accordingly.

Their lordships taking into debate the said Charge, appointed to meet in full house about the same to-morrow; and that the said impeached lords should have notice to attend, which was also done accordingly.

Sept. 9. The house of peers this day, as was ordered, debated the business and Impeachment of their members in a full house; and it was voted and ordered, That the gentleman-usher of their house seize and bring before their lordships the said earl of Lincoln, earl of Suffolk, and earl of Middlesex, the lord Hunsdon, lord Willoughby of Parham, lord Berkley, and lord Maynard, to answer the impeachment of high-treason brought up against them by the house of commons.

Sept. 16. They likewise ordered to send a message to the lords, that they would appoint a day for the commons to bring up a Charge, in order to the former Impeachment against the seven impeached members of that house, of which seven the earl of Lincoln, earl of Suffolk, and lord Maynard only are in custody of the black-rod, lord Hunsdon sick, and no return, as we yet hear of from the earl of Middlesex, lord Barkley, and lord Willoughby of Parham.

The Impeachment of the house of commons against the Seven Lords had laid dormant in that house, and no farther notice is taken of it in their Journals, than what is before given; till October 14, on which day we find that a message from the commons was sent up, declaring, "That having long since brought up an Impeachment of high-treason, against James earl of Suffolk, Theophilus earl of Lincoln, James earl of Middlesex, George lord Berkely, Francis lord Willoughby, John lord Hunsdon, and William lord Maynard, they desire their lordships would please to appoint a time when the house of commons should bring up their proofs against them." The answer was, that the lords appoint that day fortnight for the purpose.

December 2. The house of commons ordered, That the Impeachment against the earl of Lincoln should be read, which accordingly was read the first time.—A Message was ordered to be sent to the lords, to desire their lordships that the house may have further time given them to bring up their Impeachment against the Seven Lords impeached by that house.—They also ordered, That a member of the house should prepare and make ready the Proofs and Evidences against the said lords by Saturday next.

A Message came from the lords to acquaint the house, That their lordships, according to the desire of the house, had ordered by this day seven-night, for the House of Commons to bring up their Charge against the Members of that house impeached.

December 9. The house, according to former order, took into debate the several articles of Impeachment against the Seven Lords formerly impeached by that house, and some of the proofs of the said Impeachment were read, which took up the rest of this day's debate: the further consideration of that business is to be resumed to-morrow.

December 10. The house ordered, that a message should be sent to the lords, for desiring their lordships to appoint a further day for the house of commons to bring up the impeachment against the seven members of their house formerly impeached by them.

December 13. The Impeachment against the Seven Lords was this day read in the house of commons, and part of the proofs thereof.

Dec. 14. This being the day appointed for the Commons to bring up their Articles of Impeachment against the Seven Lords; and they not appearing to support their Charge, a committee of lords was appointed to consider of precedents in this case, and to offer somewhat to the house to prevent the like for the future.

Jan 19, 1648. A Letter directed to the Speaker, from the earl of Lincoln and the other lords under restraint, except the lord Hunsdon, was read:

"My lords; After so long a restraint, by your lordships order, and no prosecution against us, we may expect, from your justice, our liberties; the which we shall enjoy with the more satisfaction, as it will appear a right to your lordships quality, as well as a freedom to the present condition of, Your, &c. Berkeley, Willoughby, Maynard, Lincoln, Suffolk, Middlesex. Jan. 19."

It was then ordered, That these Six Lords, that have subscribed this Letter, shall have their liberty from the restraint they lie under, in the custody of the gentleman-usher of the black rod attending that house; and it was referred to a committee to consider of some Declaration, to be entered in the Journal Book, concerning the commitment of peers of this realm upon Impeachments. The lord Hunsdon was also released the next day, on his application, by letter, to the house.

Jan. 28. The Commons sent up a Message to impeach Francis lord Willoughby of Parham, of High Treason and other high crimes and misdemeanors, and exhibited Articles of Impeachment at the same time against him.

Jan. 31. The Commons sent up to the Lords Articles of Impeachment against the earls of Lincoln and Suffolk, with the rest of the Seven Lords formerly impeached by them of High Treason, for levying war against the king, parliament, and kingdom; and desired that such farther proceedings might be had thereupon as to justice and the course of parliament did appertain, and then the Commons would be ready with their Evidence to support the said Charge.

Feb. 2. The Lords took into consideration the Articles of Impeachment against the Seven Lords, of High Treason, and high crimes and misdemeanors, brought from the commons; and it was moved that it might be considered, Whether the releasing of the said Lords, and giving them their liberty on the 19th Jan. last, be not a discharging and acquitting them of the general accusation of High Treason; and whether the releasing of their persons be a discharging of that accusation? Then the General Accusation of the 8th Sept. last was read, and the Order for their commitment, with the several Messages sent to the House of Commons concerning them. And the question being put, Whether, upon what hath been now read, the general Impeachment against the Seven Lords is dismissed? It was resolved in the negative.—Next, it was taken into consideration, Whether, in the particular Articles against the Seven Lords, there be not a contrariety in the averment of the House of Commons; because the Articles make mention, That they are in maintenance of a former Charge brought up from the Commons against them, of High Treason, and high crimes and misdemeanors; and it was moved to have a conference with the Commons about it; and the question being put, Whether to send to the Seven Lords copies of their several and respective Articles, and appoint them a day to put in their Answers, to the same, before such time as a conference be had with the Commons concerning this business, it was resolved in the affirmative; and ordered, That the earls of Lincoln, Suffolk, and Middlesex, the lords Berkeley, Hunsdon, Willoughby, and Maynard, shall attend at the bar on Friday morning, and receive their several and respective Articles of Impeachment of High Treason and other high crimes and misdemeanors, brought from the Commons against them; and that they put in their several and respective Answers thereunto by to-morrow fortnight. And it was further ordered, That the aforesaid lords be sequestered from the house, upon this Charge: and that they shall put in bail of 4,000*l.* a-piece and 2,000*l.* by surety for each lord, on Friday next.

Feb. 3. The Lords ordered, That the Seven Impeached Lords be allowed till Tuesday next for coming to receive their Charges and bringing in their Bail.

Feb. 8. This day Six of the Impeached Lords appeared at the house of peers' bar, where they heard their Charges read one by one; they then entered bond, and put in their security, according to their former order. The lord Willoughby came not, but sent a Letter, being himself withdrawn, which being read was to this effect; That he had been about four months committed, without particular Charge against him, that their lordships were pleased to order his enlargement; that he had received counsel from a friend, that he is not fit for public employment, and therefore resolved to privacy, that he hath always been faithful to the parliament, and desired their lordships to make an honourable construction of his retirement.* The lords ordered that 14 days be given to all the Seven Impeached Lords to put in their Answers; and they shall have council assigned to them, if they desire it, for matter of law,

March 8. A Petition was presented to the house of peers from the Impeached Lords, all but the lord Willoughby of Parham, desiring a further day to bring in their Answer, because the counsellors assigned them are some of them out of town, upon which the Lords granted them time until the 12th of April.

April 12. This day the earl of Lincoln, earl of Suffolk, earl of Middlesex, the lord Hunsdon, lord Berkley, did each of them put in their Answer to the house of peers in parchment, pleading not guilty to the Charge of High Treason framed against them.

April 18. A Message was sent up from the Commons to the Lords, to mind them of the Impeachment against the Seven Lords; which the Lords ordered to be taken into consideration on the 20th instant.

June 6. The Commons sent up a Message to acquaint the Lords, That they would proceed no farther upon the Impeachments against the Seven Peers. Upon which the Lords ordered, That the said Lords by name should be forthwith discharged from the restraint they laid under on account of the said Impeachments; and that the same, upon the aforesaid Declaration of the Commons, should be vacated in the Journal-Book. Ordered, also, That the Lords impeached should have notice to attend the service of the house the next morning.

* "He was in the beginning of the troubles very hearty and strong for the Parliament, and manifested great personal courage, honour, and military, as well as civil, abilities; as appears by his actions, and letters, whilst he was in the service of the parliament. In whose favour and esteem he was so high, that they voted him to be General for the Horse, under the earl of Essex, and afterwards to be an earl. But having taken a disgust at the Parliament's declining a personal Treaty with the king, and being jealous that monarchy, and consequently degrees and titles of honour, were in danger to be wholly abolished, he was too forward in countenancing and assisting the late tumults in the City, when the Members of Parliament were driven away from Westminster to the Army. Upon the return of the Members he was with other Lords impeached of High Treason for that action; and rather than appear, and stand to a Trial for it, he left his country, and was now with the prince in his navy, for which the commons voted his estate to be secured." Whitelocke.

182. THE TRIAL OF CHARLES STUART, KING OF ENGLAND; Before the High Court of Justice, for High Treason : 24 CHARLES I. A. D. 1649.*

INTRODUCTION.

THE following brief Account of some Proceedings in Parliament will serve as an introduction to this important Trial :

January 3, 1648. The Commons resolved, That no further Addresses be made to the King by themselves, nor by any other, without leave of both houses, and those that do, to incur the penalty of High Treason. And declare, They will receive no more Messages from him. And enjoin, That no person whatsoever receive or bring any more Messages from him, to both or either houses, or to any other person.

Jan. 15. The Lords concurred to these Votes.

August 17. The Commons concur with the Lords, that these Votes for non-addresses be revoked.

November 20. The Army present their Remonstrance to the Parliament, for bringing Delinquents to Justice.

Nov. 24. The Treaty at the Isle of Wight voted to continue till the 27th of November.

December 1. Master Hollis presents an Account of the Treaty with the King. And the same day information was brought them of the King's being removed from Carisbrook to Hurst Castle.

Dec. 5. The king's Answer to the Propositions voted a Ground for the House to proceed upon, for Settlement of the Peace of the Kingdom.†

* In the original all the Proceedings in this Case are stated to occur in 1648, agreeably to the old computation of the commencement of the year from March 25th. But here the year is computed to begin on January the 1st, and the dates are altered accordingly. Similar alterations are made generally throughout this work.

† Upon this question Prynne made his celebrated Speech, maintaining the sufficiency of His Majesty's Answer, as a Ground, &c. See 3 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 1152. To find that the most strenuous and the most powerful efforts in his favour upon this most critical occasion had been made by Prynne, whom he had suffered his ministers in the Star Chamber to punish so barbarously [See the Cases A. D. 1633, 1637, vol. 3, pp. 562, 711.] must have been a shock to the feelings of Charles, nearly as severe as that afterwards given to the feelings of his son James by the reply of the aged father of Lord Russell. See Notes to Lord Russell's Case, A. D. 1683, post.

Dec. 6. The Members were secured by col. Pride.

Dec. 7. The House of Commons appointed a day of humiliation; Peters, Caryl, and Marshal, to perform the duty.

The several Votes, 1. For revoking the Votes for Non-addresses to the king; 2. For a Treaty to be had with him; 3. That his Answers to the Propositions were a ground for Peace, voted dishonourable and destructive.

Dec. 23. A committee was appointed to consider how to proceed in a way of justice against the King and other capital offenders.

Dec. 28. An Ordinance for Trial of the King was read.

January 1, 1649. Declared and adjudged by the Commons, That by the fundamental laws it is Treason in the King of England, for the time being, to levy war against the parliament and kingdom.

Jan. 2. The Lords disagreed to this Vote, and cast it out, and the Ordinance for Trial of the King, nemine contradicente.

Jan. 3. The same Vote was again put to the question in the House of Commons, and carried in the affirmative.

Jan. 4. Master Garland presents a new Ordinance † for erecting an High Court of Justice for Trial of the King; which was read the first, second, and third time, assented to, and passed the same day. And ordered, no Copy to be delivered.

Same day, Resolved, That the people are (un-† Whitelocke carefully abstained from any share in these transactions. The following particulars are extracted from his Memorials : " Dec. 26, 1648. This morning sir Thomas Widdrington and Mr. Whitelocke being together, Mr. Smith who was Clerk to the Committee for preparing the Charge against the King, came to them with a Message from the Committee, that they required them to come to them this day, they having some matters of importance wherein they desired their advice, and assistance; and that they must not fail them. They knew what the business was, and Whitelocke told sir T. Widdrington, that he was resolved not to meddle in that business about the Trial of the King; it being contrary to his judgment, as he had himself declared in the house. Sir T. Widdrington said, he was of the same judgment, and would have no hand in that business, but he knew not whither to go, to be out of the way; and that the Committee might not know whither to send to him. Whitelocke re-der God) the original of all just powers. That themselves, being chosen by and representing the people, have the Supreme Power in the nation.* That whatsoever is enacted, or de-plied, That his coach was ready, and he was this morning going out of town purposely to avoid this business, and if he pleased to go with him, they might be quiet at his house in the country till this business should be over, and he should be glad of his company. He willingly consented to go with Whitelock, and was not long in preparing himself for the journey."—"January 9, 1649. Widdrington and Whitelock by agreement went into the house this morning, the Trial of the King being begun, some looked very shy upon them, others bid them welcome, and seemed glad to see them there."—Whitelock consented to accept the office of Commissioner of the new Great Seal, (which Widdrington from scrupling the authority of the House of Commons refused to do) and in a speech in which he offered some reasons for wishing to decline that office, he distinctly, though warily and with mention of the ground of necessity, asserted the sufficiency of the House. He also acted as a Member of the Council of State, but when as such he was demanded to subscribe the test appointed by parliament for approving all that was done concerning the King and Kingship, and for taking away the House of Lords," &c. he tells us, that "he scrupled that part of approving the proceedings of the High Court of Justice, because he was not privy to them, nor did know what they were in particular, nor ever heard any report of them made to the house; and not knowing what they were, he could not sign that paper, to approve of them." Nevertheless, he afterwards prepared and brought in the Declaration to satisfy the people touching the 'proceedings of parliament,' as he gently expresses it, which however he says the Committee "made much sharper than he had drawn it, and added divers clauses which he thought matters fit to be omitted." See this Declaration in 3 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 1319. Oldmixon says it was published in English, Latin, French, and Dutch.—Whitelock also prepared the act for taking away the House of Lords; or, in his own words, "It was put upon Whitelock to draw an Act to take away the House of Lords, wherein he desired to have been excused in regard he was not in the house when the Vote passed, and had declared his opinion against it, but he could not get excused."

* Of the Debates which led to the Trial of the King, lord Clarendon writes thus;

"It hath been acknowledged by some officers, and others who were present at the consultations, that from the time of the king's being at Hampton Court, and after the army had mastered both the parliament and the city, and were weary of having the king with them, and knew not well how to be rid of him, there were many secret consults what to do with him. And it was generally concluded, 'they should never be able to settle their new form of government, whilst he lived;' and after he was become a prisoner in the Isle of Wight, they were more solicitous for a resolution and determination in that particular: and after the vote of no more addresses, the most violent party thought 'they could do nothing in order to their own ends, till he should be first dead; and therefore, one way or other, that was to be compassed in the first place' Some were for 'an actual deposing him; which could not but be easily brought to pass, since the parliament would vote any thing they should be directed.' Others were for 'the taking away his life by poison, which would make least noise;' or, 'if that could not be so easily contrived, by assassination; for which there were hands enough ready to be employed.' There was a third sort, as violent as either of the other, who pressed 'to have him brought to a public trial as a malefactor; which,' they said, 'would be most for the honour of the parliament, and would teach all kings to know, that they were accountable and punishable for the wickedness of their lives.'—Many of the officers were of the first opinion, 'as a thing they had precedents for; and that he being once deposed, they could better settle the government than if he were dead; for his son could pretend no right whilst he was alive; whereas, if the father were dead, he would presently call himself King, and others would call him so too; and, it may be, other kings and princes would own him for such. If he were kept alive in a close prison, he might afterwards be made use of, or removed upon any appearance of a revolution.'—There were as many officers of the second judgment 'that he should be presently dispatched.' They said, 'it appeared by the experience they had, that whilst he was alive (for a more strict imprisonment than he had undergone he could never be confined to) there would be always plots and designs to set him at liberty; and he would have parties throughout the kingdom, and, in a short time, a faction in their most secret councils, and it may be in the army itself; and, where his liberty would yield so great a price, it would be too great a trust to repose in any man, that he would long resist the temptation. Whereas, if he were confessedly dead, all those fears would be over, especially if they proceeded with that circumspection and severity towards all his party, as in prudence they ought to do.' This party might probably have carried it, if Hammond could have been wrought upon to have concurred; but he had yet too much conscience to expose himself to that infamy, and without his privity or connivance it could not be done.—The third party, which were all the levellers and agitators of the army, in the head of which Ireton and Harrison were, would not endure either of the other ways, and said, 'they could as easily bring him to justice in the clared for law by the Commons in parliament, hath the force of a law, and the people concluded thereby: though consent of King and Peers be not had thereunto.

'sight of the sun, as depose him, since the authority of the parliament could do one as well as the other: that their precedent of deposing had no reputation with the people, but was looked upon as the effect of some potent faction, which always oppressed the people more after, than they had been before. Besides, those depositions had always been attended with assassinations and murders, which were the more odious and detested, because nobody owned and avowed the bloody actions they had done. But if he were brought to a public trial, for the notorious ill things he had done, and for his misgovernment, upon the complaint and prosecution of the people, the superiority of the people would be hereby vindicated and made manifest; and they should receive the benefit, and be for ever free from those oppressions which he had imposed upon them, and for which he ought to pay so dear; and such an exemplary proceeding and execution as this, where every circumstance should be clear and notorious, would be the best foundation and security of the government they intended to establish, and no

'man would be ambitious to succeed him, and be a king in his place, when he saw in what manner he must be accountable to the people.' This argumentation, or the strength and obstinacy of that party, carried it; and, hereupon, all that formality of proceeding, which afterwards was exercised, was resolved upon and consented to.—Whether the incredibility or monstrousness of such a kind of proceeding, wrought upon the minds of men, or whether the principal actors took pains, by their insinuations, to have it so believed; it fell out, however, that they among them who wished the king best, and stood nearest to the stage where these parts were acted, did not believe that there were those horrid intentions that shortly after appeared. The preachers, who had sounded the trumpets loudest to, and throughout the war, preached now as furiously against all wicked attempts and violence against the person of the king, and foolishly urged the obligation of the Covenant (by which they had involved him in all the danger he was in) for the security of his person."

A perfect NARRATIVE of the whole PROCEEDINGS of the HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE, in the Trial of the KING, in Westminster-Hall. With the several Speeches of the King, Lord President, and Solicitor General. Published by Authority, to prevent false and impertinent Relations. January 20—27. A.D. 1649. Licensed by Gilbert Mabbot.

ON Saturday, being the 20th day of January, 1649, the Lord President of the High Court of Justice, with near fourscore of the members of the said Court, having sixteen gentlemen with partizans, and a sword, and a mace, with their and other officers of the said court, marching before them, came to the place ordered to be prepared for their sitting at the west-end of the great Hall at Westminster; where the Lord President, in a crimson-velvet chair, fixed in the midst of the Court, placed himself, having a desk with a crimson-velvet cushion before him; the rest of the members placing themselves on each side of him upon several seats, or benches, prepared and hung with scarlet for that purpose; and the partizans dividing themselves on each side of the court before them.

The Court being thus sat, and Silence made, the great gate of the said Hall was set open, to the end that all persons, without exception, desirous to see or hear, might come into it. Upon which the Hall was presently filled, and silence again ordered.

This done, colonel Thomlinson, who had the charge of the Prisoner, was commanded to bring him to the Court; who within a quarter of an hour's space brought him, attended with about twenty officers with partizans, marching before him, there being other gentlemen, to whose care and custody he was likewise committed, marching in his rear.

Being thus brought up within the face of the Court, the Serjeant at Arms, with his mace, receives and conducts him strait to the bar, having a crimson-velvet chair set before him. After a stern looking upon the Court, and the people in the galleries on each side of him, he places himself, not at all moving his hat, or otherwise shewing the least respect to the court; but presently rises up again, and turns about, looking downwards upon the guards placed on the left side, and on the multitude of spectators on the right side of the said great Hall. After silence made among the people, the Act of Parliament for the trying of Charles Stuart, king of England, was read over by the Clerk of the Court, who sat on one side of a table covered with a rich Turkey-carpet, and placed at the feet of the said Lord President; upon which table was also laid the sword and mace.

After reading the said Act, the several names of the Commissioners were called over, every one who was present, being eighty, as aforesaid, rising up, and answering to his call.

Having again placed himself in his Chair, with his face towards the Court, silence being again ordered, the Lord President stood up, and said,

Lord President. Charles Stuart, king of England, the Commons of England assembled in parliament being deeply sensible of the calamities that have been brought upon this nation, which is fixed upon you as the principal author of it, have resolved to make inquisition for blood; and according to that debt and duty they owe to justice, to God, the kingdom, and themselves, and according to the fundamental power that rests in themselves, they have resolved to bring you to Trial and Judgment; and for that purpose have constituted this High Court of Justice, before which you are brought.

This said, Mr. Cook, Solicitor for the Common-wealth, standing within a bar on the right hand of the Prisoner, offered to speak: but the king having a staff in his hand, held it up, and laid it upon the said Mr. Cook's shoulder two or three times, bidding him hold. Nevertheless, the Lord President ordering him to go on, he said:

Mr. Cook. My lord, I am commanded to charge Charles Stuart, King of England, in the name of the Commons of England, with Treason and High Misdemeanors; I desire the said Charge may be read.

The said Charge being delivered to the Clerk of the Court, the Lord President ordered it should be read; but the king bid him hold. Nevertheless, being commanded by the Lord President to read it, the Clerk began, and the Prisoner sat down again in his chair, looking sometimes on the High Court, sometimes up to the Galleries; and having risen again, and turned about to behold the guards and spectators, sat down, looking very sternly, and with a countenance not at all moved, till these words, viz. 'Charles Stuart to be a Tyrant and Traitor,' &c. were read; at which he laughed, as he sat, in the face of the Court.

The Charge being read, the Lord President replied:

Lord President. Sir, You have now heard your Charge, containing such matter as appears in it; you find, that in the close of it, it is prayed to the Court, in the behalf of the commons of England, that you answer to your Charge. The Court expects your Answer.

King. I would know by what power I am called hither; I was not long ago in the Isle of Wight; how I came there, is a longer story than I think it fit at this present time for me to speak of; but there I entered into a Treaty with both houses of parliament, with as much public faith as it is possible to be had of any people in the world. I treated there with a number of honourable lords and gentlemen, and treated honestly and uprightly; I cannot say but they did very nobly with me, we were upon the conclusion of the Treaty. Now I would know by what authority, I mean lawful; there are many unlawful authorities in the world, thieves and robbers by the highways; but I would know by what authority I was brought from thence, and carried from place to place, and I know not what: and when I know what lawful authority, I shall answer. Remember I am your king, your lawful king, and what sins you bring upon your heads, and the judgment of God upon this land; think well upon it, I say, think well upon it, before you go further from one sin to a greater: therefore let me know by what lawful authority I am seated here, and I shall not be unwilling to answer. In the mean time, I shall not betray my trust; I have a trust committed to me by God, by old and lawful descent; I will not betray it, to answer to a new unlawful authority: therefore resolve me that, and you shall hear more of me.

Lord President. If you had been pleased to have observed what was hinted to you by the Court, at your first coming hither, you would have known by what authority; which authority requires you, in the name of the people of England, of which you are elected king, to answer them.

King. No, Sir, I deny that.

Lord President. If you acknowledge not the authority of the Court, they must proceed.

King. I do tell them so; England was never an elective kingdom, but an hereditary kingdom for near these thousand years; therefore let me know by what authority I am called hither: I do stand more for the Liberty of my people, than any here that come to be my pretended Judges; and therefore let me know by what lawful authority I am seated here, and I will answer it; otherwise I will not answer it.

Id. President. Sir, how really you have managed your trust, is known: your way of answer is to interrogate the Court, which be- seems not you in this condition. You have been told of it twice or thrice.

King. Here is a gentleman, lieutenant colonel Cobbet; ask him, if he did not bring me from the Isle of Wight, by force. I do not come here as submitting to the Court: I will stand as much for the privilege of the house of commons, rightly understood, as any man here whatsoever. I see no house of lords here that may constitute a parliament; and the king too should have been. Is this the bringing of the king to his parliament? Is this the bringing an end to the Treaty in the public faith of the world? Let me see a legal authority warranted by the Word of God, the Scriptures, or warranted by the Constitutions of the kingdom, and I will answer.

Id. President. Sir; You have propounded a question, and have been answered. Seeing you will not answer, the Court will consider how to proceed: in the mean time, those that brought you hither, are to take charge of you back again. The Court desires to know, whether this be all the Answer you will give, or no.

King. Sir, I desire that you would give me, and all the world, satisfaction in this: let me tell you, it is not a slight thing you are about.

I am sworn to keep the peace, by that duty I owe to God and my country, and I will do it to the last breath of my body; and therefore ye shall do well to satisfy first God, and then the country, by what authority you do it: if you do it by an usurped authority, you cannot answer. There is a God in Heaven, that will call you, and all that give you power, to account. Satisfy me in that, and I will answer; otherwise I betray my Trust, and the Liberties of the people: and therefore think of that, and then I shall be willing. For I do avow, that it is as great a sin to withstand lawful authority, as it is to submit to a tyrannical, or any other ways unlawful authority; and therefore satisfy me that, and you shall receive my answer.

Ld. President. The Court expects you should give them a final Answer; their purpose is to adjourn to Monday next; if you do not satisfy yourself, though we do tell you our authority, we are satisfied with our authority, and it is upon God's authority and the kingdom's; and that peace you speak of will be kept in the doing of justice, and that is our present work.

King. For answer, let me tell you, you have shewn no lawful authority to satisfy any reasonable man.

Ld. President. That is, in your apprehension; we are satisfied that are your Judges.

King. It is not my apprehension, nor yours neither, that ought to decide it.

Ld. President. The Court hath heard you, and you are to be disposed of as they have commanded.

The Court adjourns to the Painted Chamber, on Monday at ten of the clock in the forenoon, and thence hither.

It is to be observed that as the Charge was reading against the king, the head of his Staff fell off, which he wondered at; and seeing none to take it up, he stoops for it himself.

As the King went away, facing the Court, he said, 'I do not fear that' (meaning the Sword). The People in the Hall, as he went down the stairs, cried out, some, 'God save the King,' and most for 'Justice.'

At the High Court of Justice sitting in Westminster Hall, Monday, Jan. 22, 1649.

O Yes! made; Silence commanded; the Court called, and answered to their names. Silence commanded upon pain of imprisonment, and the Captain of the Guard to apprehend all such as make disturbance. Upon the king's coming in, a shout was made. Command given by the Court to the Captain of the Guard, to fetch and take into his custody those who make any disturbance.

Mr. Solicitor. May it please your lordship, my Lord President; I did at the last court in the behalf of the Commons of England, exhibit and give in to this court a Charge of High Treason, and other High Crimes, against the prisoner at the bar; whereof I do accuse him in the name of the People of England: and the Charge was read unto him, and his Answer required. My lord, He was not then pleased to give an Answer, but instead of answering, did there dispute the Authority of this high Court. My humble motion to this high Court in behalf of the kingdom of England is, That the prisoner may be directed to make a positive Answer, either by way of confession, or negation; which if he shall refuse to do, that the matter of the Charge may be taken pro confesso, and the Court may proceed according to justice.

Ld. President. Sir, You may remember at the last Court you were told the occasion of your being brought hither, and you heard a Charge read against you, containing a Charge of High-Treason and other high crimes against this realm of England: you heard likewise, that it was prayed in the behalf of the People, that you should give an Answer to that Charge, that thereupon such proceedings might be had, as should be agreeable to justice. You were then pleased to make some scruples concerning the authority of this Court, and knew not by what authority you were brought hither: you did divers times propound your questions, and were as often answered, That it was by authority of the Commons of England assembled in parliament, that did think fit to call you to account for those high and capital Misdemeanours wherewith you were then charged. Since that the Court hath taken into consideration what you then said; they are fully satisfied with their own authority, and they hold it fit you should stand satisfied with it too; and they do require it, that you do give a positive and particular Answer to this Charge that is exhibited against you: they do expect you should either confess or deny it; if you deny, it is offered in the behalf of the kingdom to be made good against you: their authority they do avow to the whole world, that the whole kingdom are to rest satisfied in, and you are to rest satisfied with it. And therefore you are to lose no more time, but to give a positive Answer thereunto.

King. When I was here last, it is very true, I made that question; truly if it were only my own particular Case, I would have satisfied myself with the protestation I made the last time I was here against the Legality of this Court, and that a king cannot be tried by any superior jurisdiction on earth; but it is not my case alone, it is the Freedom and the Liberty of the people of England; and do you pretend what you will, I stand more for their Liberties. For if power without law may make laws, may alter the fundamental laws of the kingdom, I do not know what subject he is in England, that can be sure of his life, or anything that he calls his own: therefore when that I came here, I did expect particular reasons to know by what law, what authority you did proceed against me here. And therefore I am a little to seek what to say to you in this particular, because the affirmative is to be proved, the negative often is very hard to do: but since I cannot persuade you to do it, I shall tell you my reasons as short as I can.—My Reasons why in conscience and the duty I owe to God first, and my people next, for the preservation of their lives, liberties, and estates, I conceive I cannot answer this, till I be satisfied of the legality of it.—All proceedings against any man whatsoever—

Ld. President. Sir, I must interrupt you, which I would not do, but that what you do is not agreeable to the proceedings of any court of justice: You are about to enter into argument, and dispute concerning the Authority of this Court, before whom you appear as a Prisoner, and are charged as an high Delinquent; if you take upon you to dispute the Authority of the Court, we may not do it, nor will any court give way unto it: you are to submit unto it, you are to give a punctual and direct Answer, whether you will answer your Charge or no, and what your Answer is.

King. Sir, By your favour, I do not know the forms of law; I do know law and reason, though I am no lawyer professed; but I know as much law as any gentleman in England; and therefore (under favour), I do plead for the Liberties of the People of England more than you do: and therefore if I should impose a belief upon any man, without reasons given for it, it were unreasonable; but I must tell you, that that reason that I have, as thus informed, I cannot yield unto it.

Ld. President. Sir, I must interrupt you, you may not be permitted: you speak of law and reason; it is fit there should be law and reason, and there is both against you. Sir, the Vote of the Commons of England assembled in parliament, it is the reason of the kingdom, and they are these that have given to that law, according to which you should have ruled and reigned. Sir, you are not to dispute our Authority, you are told it again by the Court. Sir, it will be taken notice of, that you stand in contempt of the Court, and your contempt will be recorded accordingly.

King. I do not know how a king can be a Delinquent; but by any law that ever I heard of, men (Delinquents, or what you will), let me tell you, they may put in Demurrers against any proceeding as legal: and I do demand that, and demand to be heard with my Reasons; if you deny that, you deny reason.

Ld. President. Sir, you have offered something to the Court; I shall speak something unto you, the Sense of the Court. Sir, neither you nor any man are permitted to dispute that point; you are concluded, you may not demur to the jurisdiction of the Court: if you do, I must let you know, that they over-rule your Demurrer; they sit here by the authority of the Commons of England, and all your predecessors and you are responsible to them.

King. I deny that; shew me one precedent.

Ld. President. Sir, you ought not to interrupt while the Court is speaking to you. This point is not to be debated by you, neither will the Court permit you to do it: if you offer it by way of Demurrer to the Jurisdiction of the Court, they have considered of their Jurisdiction, they do affirm their own Jurisdiction.

King. I say, Sir, by your favour, that the Commons of England was never a Court of Judicature; I would know how they came to be so.

Ld. President. Sir, you are not to be permitted to go on in that Speech and these discourses.

Then the clerk of the court read as followeth:

‘Charles Stuart, king of England, You have been accused on behalf of the People of England of High-Treasons, and other high Crimes; the Court have determined that you ought to answer the same.’

King. I will answer the same so soon as I know by what Authority you do this.

Ld. President. If this be all that you will say, then, Gentlemen, you that brought the Prisoner hither, take charge of him back again.

King. I do require that I may give in my Reasons why I do not answer, and give me time for that.

Ld. President. Sir, it is not for Prisoners to require.

King. Prisoners! Sir, I am not an ordinary prisoner.

Ld. President. The Court hath considered of their jurisdiction, and they have already affirmed their jurisdiction; if you will not answer, we shall give order to record your default.

King. You never heard my Reasons yet.

Ld. President. Sir, your Reasons are not to be heard against the highest jurisdiction.

King. Shew me that Jurisdiction where reason is not to be heard.

Ld. President. Sir, we shew it you here, The Commons of England; and the next time you are brought, you will know more of the pleasure of the Court; and, it may be, their final determination.

King. Shew me where ever the House of Commons was a Court of Judicature of that kind.

Ld. President. Serjeant, take away the Prisoner.

King. Well, Sir, remember that the king is not suffered to give in his Reasons for the Liberty and Freedom of all his Subjects.

Ld. President. Sir, you are not to have Liberty to use this language: How great a friend you have been to the Laws and Liberties of the people, let all England and the world judge.

King. Sir, under favour, it was the Liberty, Freedom, and Laws of the subject, that ever I took—defended myself with arms; I never took up arms against the people, but for the laws.

Ld. President. The Command of the Court must be obeyed; no Answer will be given to the Charge.

King. Well, Sir!

And so he was guarded forth to sir Robert Cotton's house,

Then the Court adjourned to the Painted chamber, on Tuesday at 12 o'clock, and from thence they intend to adjourn to Westminster-hall; at which time all persons concerned are to give their attendance.

At the High Court of Justice sitting in Westminster-Hall, Tuesday Jun. 23, 1649.

O Yes made, Silence commanded, the Court called, 73 persons present.—The King comes in with his guard, looks with an austere countenance upon the Court, and sits down.—The second O Yes made, and Silence commanded.

Mr. Cook, Solicitor-General. May it please your lordship, my lord President; this is now the third time, that by the great grace and favour of this High Court, the Prisoner hath been brought to the bar before any issue joined in the cause. My lord, I did at the first court exhibit a Charge against him, containing the highest Treasons that ever was wrought upon the theatre of England; That a king of England, trusted to keep the law, that had taken an oath so to do, that had tribute paid him for that end, should be guilty of a wicked Design to subvert and destroy our Laws, and introduce an Arbitrary and Tyrannical Government, in defiance of the Parliament and their Authority, set up his standard for War against his Parliament and People: And I did humbly pray, in the behalf of the people of England, that he might speedily be required to make an Answer to the Charge.—But, my lord, instead of making any Answer, he did then dispute the Authority of this High Court. Your lordship was pleased to give him a further day to consider, and to put in his Answer; which day being Yesterday, I did humbly move, that he might be required to give a direct and positive Answer, either by denying or confession of it; But, my lord, he was then pleased for to demur to the Jurisdiction of the Court; which the court did then over-rule, and commanded him to give a direct and positive Answer. My lord, besides this great delay of justice, I shall now humbly move your lordship for speedy Judgment against him. My lord, I might press your lordship upon the whole, that according to the known rules of the law of the land, That if a Prisoner shall stand as contumacious in contempt, and shall not put in an issuable plea, Guilty or not Guilty of the Charge given against him, whereby he may come to a fair trial; that, as by an implicit confession, it may be taken pro confesso, as it hath been done to those who have deserved more favour than the Prisoner at the bar has done. But besides, my lord, I shall humbly press your lordship upon the whole fact. The house of commons, the supreme Authority and Jurisdiction of the kingdom, they have declared, That it is notorious, that the matter of the Charge is true, as it is in truth, my lord, as clear as crystal, and as the sun that shines at noon-day: which if your lordship and the Court be not satisfied in, I have notwithstanding, on the people of England's behalf, several Witnesses to produce. And therefore I do humbly pray, and yet I must confess it is not so much I, as the innocent blood that hath been shed, the cry whereof is very great for justice and judgment; and therefore I do humbly pray, that speedy Judgment be pronounced against the Prisoner at the bar.

Lord President. Sir, you have heard what is moved by the Counsel on the behalf of the kingdom against you. Sir, you may well remember, and if you do not, the Court cannot forget, what dilatory dealings the Court hath found at your hands. You were pleased to propound some Questions, you have had our Resolutions upon them. You were told, over and over again, That the Court did affirm their own jurisdiction; that it was not for you, nor any other man, to dispute the jurisdiction of the supreme and highest Authority of England, from which there is no appeal, and touching which there must be no dispute: yet you did persist in such carriage, as you gave no manner of obedience, nor did you acknowledge any authority in them, nor the High Court that constituted this Court of Justice.—Sir, I must let you know from the Court, that they are very sensible of these delays of yours, and that they ought not, being thus authorized by the supreme Court of England, to be thus trifled withal; and that they might in justice, if they pleased, and according to the rules of justice, take advantage of these delays, and proceed to pronounce judgment against you: yet nevertheless they are pleased to give direction, and on their behalfs I do require you, that you make a positive Answer unto this Charge that is against you, Sir, in plain terms, for Justice knows no respect of persons; you are to give your positive and final Answer in plain English, whether you be Guilty or Not Guilty of these Treasons laid to your charge.

The King, after a little pause, said,

King. When I was here yesterday, I did desire to speak for the Liberties of the people of England; I was interrupted; I desire, to know yet whether I may speak freely or not.

Lord President. Sir, you have had the Resolution of the Court upon the like question the last day, and you were told, that having such a Charge of so high a nature against you, and your work was, that you ought to acknowledge the jurisdiction of the Court, and to answer to your Charge. Sir, if you answer to your Charge, which the Court gives you leave now to do, though they might have taken the advantage of your contempt; yet if you be able to answer to your Charge, when you have once answered, you shall be heard at large, make the best defence you can. But, Sir, I must let you know from the Court, as their commands, that you are not to be permitted to issue out into any other discourses, till such time as you have given a positive Answer concerning the matter that is charged upon you.

King. For the Charge, I value it not a rush; it is the Liberty of the People of England that I stand for. For me to acknowledge a new Court that I never heard of before, I that am your King, that should be an example to all the people of England, for to uphold justice, to maintain the old laws; indeed I do not know how to do it. You spoke very well the first day that I came here (on Saturday) of the obligations that I had laid upon me by God, to the maintenance of the Liberties of my people; the same obligation you spake of, I do acknowledge to God that I owe to him, and to my people, to defend as much as in me lies the antient laws of the kingdom: therefore, until that I may know that this is not against the fundamental Laws of the kingdom, by your favour I can put in no particular Charge. (*) If you will give me time, I will shew you my Reasons why I cannot do it, and this—

Here, being interrupted, he said,

By your favour, you ought not to interrupt me: How I came here, I know not; there's no law for it to make your king your prisoner. I was in a Treaty upon the public faith of the kingdom, that was the known—(†) two Houses of Parliament that was the representative of the kingdom; and when that I had almost made an end of the Treaty, then I was hurried away, and brought hither: and therefore—

Here the Lord President said, Sir, you must know the pleasure of the Court.

King. By your favour, sir.

Lord President. Nay, sir, by your favour, you may not be permitted to fall into those discourses; you appear as a Delinquent, you have not acknowledged the authority of the Court, the Court craves it not of you; but once more they command you to give your positive Answer—Clerk, do your duty.

King. Duty, sir!

The Clerk reads.

“ Charles Stuart, king of England, you are “ accused in behalf of the commons of England “ of divers Crimes and Treasons, which Charge “ hath been read unto you; the Court now re- “ quires you to give your positive and final An- “ swer, by way of confession or denial of the “ Charge.”

King. Sir, I say again to you, so that I might give satisfaction to the people of England of the clearness of my proceeding, not by way of Answer, not in this way, but to satisfy them that I have done nothing against that trust that has been committed to me, I would do it; but to acknowledge a new Court, against their Privileges, to alter the fundamental laws of the kingdom—sir, you must excuse me.

(†) Clement Walker says, “ Whether these breaches and interruptions were made by Bradshaw, or are omissions and expunctions of some material parts of the king's speech, which this licensed penman durst not set down, I know not. I hear much of the king's argument is omitted, and much depraved, none but licensed men being suffered to take notes.”

Lord President. Sir, this is the third time that you have publicly disowned this Court, and put an affront upon it. How far you have preserved the privileges of the People, your actions have spoke it; but truly, Sir, men's intentions ought to be known by their actions; you have written your meaning in bloody characters throughout the whole kingdom. But, Sir, you understand the pleasure of the Court.—Clerk, Record the Default.—And, Gentlemen, you that took charge of the Prisoner, take him back again.

King. I will only say this one word more to you: If it were only my own particular, I would not say any more, nor interrupt you.

Lord President. Sir, you have heard the pleasure of the Court, and you are (notwithstanding you will not understand it) to find that you are before a court of justice.

Then the King went forth with his guard, and proclamation was made, That all persons which had then appeared, and had further to do at the Court, might depart into the Painted Chamber; to which place the Court did forthwith adjourn, and intended to meet in Westminster Hall by ten of the clock next morning.

Cryer. God bless the kingdom of England!

Wednesday, January 24th, 1649.

This day it was expected the High Court of Justice would have met in Westminster Hall, about ten of the clock; but at the time appointed, one of the Ushers, by direction of the Court (then sitting in the Painted Chamber) gave notice to the people there assembled, That in regard the Court was then upon the Examination of Witnesses, in relation to present affairs, in the Painted Chamber, they could not sit there; but all persons appointed to be there, were to appear upon further summons.

The Proceedings of the High Court of Justice sitting in Westminster-Hall, on Saturday the 27th of January 1649.

O Yes made; Silence commanded; the court called; Serjeant Bradshaw Lord President (in a scarlet robe), with sixty-eight other members of the court.

As the King comes in, a Cry made in the Hall for Execution! Justice! Execution!

King. I shall desire a word to be heard a little, and I hope I shall give no occasion of interruption.

Ld. President. You may answer in your time, hear the Court first.

King. If it please you, Sir, I desire to be heard, and I shall not give any occasion of interruption, and it is only in a word: a sudden Judgment.

Ld. President. Sir, you shall be heard in due time, but you are to hear the Court first.

King. Sir, I desire—it will be in order to what I believe the Court will say; and therefore, Sir an hasty Judgment is not so soon recalled.

Ld. President. Sir, you shall be heard to—fore the Judgment be given, and in the mean time you may forbear.

King. Well, Sir, shall I be heard before the Judgment be given?

Ld. President. Gentlemen, it is well known to all, or most of you here present, that the Prisoner at the Bar hath been several times convened and brought before the Court to make answer to a Charge of Treason, and other high Crimes exhibited against him in the name of the people of England; [Here a malignant lady (Lady Fairfax) interrupted the Court, saying, 'Not half the People;' but she was soon silenced. See the Trial of Daniel Axtell, Oct. 15, 1660.] to which Charge being required to answer he hath been so far from obeying the commands of the Court by submitting to their justice, as he began to take upon him to offer reasoning and debate unto the Authority of the Court, and of the highest court that constituted them to try and judge him: but being over-ruled in that, and required to make his Answer, he was still pleased to continue contumacious, and to refuse to submit or answer. Hereupon the Court, that they may not be wanting to themselves, to the trust reposed in them, nor that any man's wilfulness prevent justice, they have thought fit to take the matter into their consideration; they have considered of the Charge, they have considered of the Contumacy, and of that Confession, which in law doth arise upon that contumacy: they have likewise considered of the notoriety of the fact charged upon this Prisoner, and upon the whole matter they are resolved, and have agreed upon a Sentence to be now pronounced against this Prisoner: but in respect he doth desire to be heard, before the Sentence be read and pronounced, the Court hath resolved that they will hear him. Yet, Sir, thus much I must tell you beforehand, which you have been minded of at other courts, that if that you have to say to be offered any debate concerning jurisdiction, you are not to be heard in it; you have offered it formerly, and you have indeed struck at the root, that is, the power and supreme authority of the Commons of England, which this Court will not admit a debate of; and which indeed is an irrational thing in them to do, being a court that acts upon authority derived from them, that they should presume to judge upon their superior, from whom there is no appeal. But, Sir, if you have any thing to say in defence of yourself concerning the matter charged, the Court hath given me in command to let you know they will hear you.

King. Since that I see that you will not hear any thing of debate concerning that which I confess I thought most material for the Peace of the Kingdom, and for the Liberty of the Subject, I shall wave it; I shall speak nothing to it, but only I must tell you, that this many a-day all things have been taken away from me, but that, that I call more dear to me than my life, which is my conscience and my honour: and if I had respect to my life more than the Peace of the Kingdom, the Liberty of the Subject, certainly I should have made a particular Defence for myself; for by that at leastwise I might have delayed an ugly Sentence, which I believe will pass upon me. Therefore certainly, Sir, as a man that hath some understanding, some knowledge of the world, if that my true zeal to my country had not over-born the care that I have of my own preservation, I should have gone another way to work than that I have done. Now, Sir, I conceive that an hasty Sentence once passed, may sooner be repented than recalled; and truly, the self-same desire that I have for the Peace of the Kingdom, and the Liberty of the subject, more than my own particular, does make me now at last desire, that having something for to say that concerns both, I desire before Sentence be given, that I may be heard in the Painted-Chamber before the Lords and Commons. This delay cannot be prejudicial to you, whatsoever I say; if that I say no reason, those that hear me must be judges: I cannot be judge of that, which I have: if it be reason, and really for the welfare of the kingdom, and the liberty of the subject, I am sure on't, very well it is worth the hearing; therefore I do conjure you, as you love that which you pretend, I hope it is real, the Liberty of the Subject, the Peace of the Kingdom, that you will grant me the hearing, before any Sentence be past. I only desire this, that you will take this into your consideration, it may be you have not heard of it before-hand; if you will, I'll retire, and you may think of it; but if I cannot get this liberty, I do here protest, that so fair shews of Liberty and Peace are pure shews, and not otherwise, since you will not hear your king.

Ld. President. Sir, you have now spoken.

King. Yes, Sir.

Ld. President. And this that you have said is a further declining of the Jurisdiction of this Court, which was the thing wherein you were limited before.

King. Pray excuse me, Sir, for my interruption, because you mistake me; it is not a declining of it, you do judge me before you hear me speak: I say it will not, I do not decline it, though I cannot acknowledge the Jurisdiction of the Court; yet, Sir, in this give me leave to say, I would do it, though I do not by this acknowledge it, I do protest it is not the declining of it, since I say, if that I do say any thing, but that which is for the Peace of the Kingdom, and the Liberty of the Subject, then the shame is mine. Now I desire that you will take this into your consideration; if you will, I'll withdraw.

Ld. President. Sir, this is not altogether new that you have moved unto us, not altogether new to us, though it is the first time in person you have offered it to the Court. Sir, you say you do not decline the Jurisdiction of the Court.

King. Not in this that I have said.

Ld. President. I understand you well, Sir, but nevertheless, that which you have offered seems to be contrary to that saying of yours:

for the Court are ready to give a Sentence: It is not as you say, That they will not hear your king; for they have been ready to hear you they have patiently waited your pleasure for three Courts together, to hear what you would say to the People's Charge against you, to which you have not vouchsafed to give any Answer at all. Sir, this tends to a further delay; truly, Sir, such delays as these, neither may the kingdom nor justice well bear; you have had three several days to have offered in this kind what you would have pleased. This Court is founded upon that Authority of the Commons of England, in whom rests the supreme jurisdiction; that which you now tender, is to have another jurisdiction, and a co-ordinate jurisdiction. I know very well you express yourself, Sir, that notwithstanding that you would offer to the Lords and Commons in the Painted Chamber, yet nevertheless you would proceed on here, I did hear you say so. But, Sir, that you would offer there, whatever it is, it must needs be in delay of the Justice here; so as if this Court be resolved, and prepared for the Sentence, this that you offer they are not bound in justice to grant: But, Sir, according to what you seem to desire, and because you shall know the further pleasure of the Court upon that which you have moved, the Court will withdraw for a time.

King. Shall I withdraw?

Ld. President. Sir, you shall know the pleasure of the Court presently.

The Court withdraws for half an hour into the Court of Wards.

Serjeant at Arms. The Court gives command, that the Prisoner be withdrawn; and they give order for his return again.

The Court withdraws for half an hour, and returns.

Ld. President. Serjeant at Arms, send for your Prisoner.

Sir, you were pleased to make a motion here to the Court to offer a desire of yours, touching the propounding of somewhat to the Lords in the Painted Chamber, for the peace of the kingdom: Sir, you did, in effect, receive an Answer before the Court adjourned; truly, Sir, their withdrawing and adjournment was pro formâ tantum: for it did not seem to them that there was any difficulty in the thing: they have considered of what you have moved, and have considered of their own Authority, which is founded, as hath been often said, upon the supreme Authority of the Commons of England assembled in parliament: the Court acts according to their Commission. Sir, the return I have to you from the Court, is this: That they have been too much delayed by you already, and this that you now offer hath occasioned some little further delay; and they are Judges appointed by the highest Judges; and Judges are no more to delay, than they are to deny Justice: they are good words in the great old Charter of England; Nulli negabimus, nulli denedemus, nulli differemus Justitiam. There must be no delay; but the truth is, Sir, and so every man here observes it, that you have much delayed them in your Contempt and Default, for which they might long since have proceeded to Judgment against you; and notwithstanding what you have offered, they are resolved to proceed to Punishment, and to Judgment, and that is their unanimous Resolution.

King. Sir, I know it is in vain for me to dispute, I am no sceptic for to deny the Power that you have; I know that you have Power enough: Sir, I confess, I think it would have been for the kingdom's peace, if you would have taken the pains for to have shewn the lawfulness of your Power; for this Delay that I have desired, I confess it is a delay, but it is a delay very important for the Peace of the Kingdom; for it is not my person that I look on alone, it is the kingdom's welfare, and the kingdom's peace; it is an old Sentence, That we should think long, before we resolve of great matters. Therefore, Sir, I do say again, that I do put at your doors all the inconvenience of an hasty Sentence. I confess I have been here now, I think, this week; this day eight days was the day I came here first, but a little Delay of a day or two further may give Peace; whereas an hasty Judgment may bring on that trouble and perpetual inconvenience to the kingdom, that the child that is unborn may repeat it: and therefore again, out of the duty I owe to God, and to my country, I do desire that I may be heard by the Lords and Commons in the Painted Chamber, or any other chamber that you will appoint me.

Ld. President. Sir, you have been already answered to what you even now moved, being the same you moved before, since the Resolution and the Judgment of the Court in it: and the Court now requires to know whether you have any more to say for yourself than you have said, before they proceed to Sentence.

King. I say this, Sir, That if you will bear me, if you will give but this Delay, I doubt not but I shall give some satisfaction to you all here, and to my People after that; and therefore I do require you, as you will answer it at the dreadful Day of Judgment, that you will consider it once again.

Ld. President. Sir, I have received direction from the Court.

King. Well, Sir.

Ld. President. If this must be re-enforced, or any thing of this nature, your Answer must be the same; and they will proceed to Sentence, if you have nothing more to say.

King. Sir, I have nothing more to say, but I shall desire, that this may be entered what I have said.

Ld. President. The Court then, Sir, hath something else to say to you; which, although I know it will be very unacceptable, yet notwithstanding they are willing, and are resolved to discharge their duty.—Sir, You speak very well of a precious thing, which you call Peace: and it had been much to be wished that God had put it into your heart, that you had as effectually and really endeavoured and studied the Peace of the kingdom, as now in words you seem to pretend: but, as you were told the other day, actions must expound intentions; yet actions have been clean contrary. And truly, Sir, it doth appear plainly enough to them, that you have gone upon very erroneous principles: The kingdom hath felt it to their smart; and it will be no ease to you to think of it: for, Sir, you have held yourself, and let fall such language, as if you had been no way subject to the Law, or that the law had not been your superior. Sir, the Court is very sensible of it, and I hope so are all the understanding people of England, that the law is your superior; that you ought to have ruled according to the law; you ought to have done so. Sir, I know very well your pretence hath been that you have done so; but, Sir, the difference hath been who shall be the expositors of this law: Sir, whether you and your party, out of courts of justice, shall take upon them to expound law, or the courts of justice, who are the expounders? Nay, the Sovereign and the High Court of Justice, the Parliament of England, that are not only the highest expounders, but the sole makers of the law? Sir, for you to set yourself with your single judgment, and those that adhere unto you, to set yourself against the highest Court of Justice, that is not Law. Sir, as the Law is your Superior, so truly, Sir, there is something that is superior to the Law, and that is indeed the Parent or Author of the Law, and that is the people of England: for, Sir, as they are those that at the first (as other countries have done) did chuse to themselves this form of government even for Justice sake, that justice might be administered, that peace might be preserved; so, Sir, they gave laws to their governors, according to which they should govern: and if those laws should have proved inconvenient or prejudicial to the public, they had a power in them, and reserved to themselves, to alter as they shall see cause. Sir, it is very true what some of your side have said, 'Rex non habet parem in regno,' say they: This Court will say the same, while King, that you have not your peer in some sense, for you are major singulis; but they will aver again that you are minor universis. And the same Author tells you, that 'non debet esse major eo in regno suo in exhibitione juris, minoris autem esse debet in judicio suscipiendo.' [Bract. de leg. lib. 1. c. 8.]

This we know to be law, Rex habet superiorem, Deum et legem, etiam et curiam; so says the same author. And truly, Sir, he makes bold to go a little further, Debet ei ponere frænum: they ought to bridle him. And, Sir, we know very well the stories of old: those wars that were called the Barons' War, when the nobility of the land did stand out for the Liberty and Property of the Subject, and would not suffer the kings, that did invade, to play the tyrants freer, but called them to account for it; we know that truth, that they did fræ-

num ponere. But, Sir, if they do forbear to do their duty now, and are not so mindful of their own honour and the kingdom's good as the Barons of England of old were, certainly the Commons of England will not be unmindful of what is for their preservation, and for their safety; Justitia fructu causa reges constituti sunt. This we learn: The end of having kings, or any other governors, it is for the enjoying of justice; that is the end. Now, Sir, if so be the king will go contrary to that end, or any other governor will go contrary to the end of his government; Sir, he must understand that he is but an officer in trust, and he ought to discharge that trust; and they are to take order for the animadversion and punishment of such an offending governor.

This is not law of yesterday, Sir, (since the time of the division betwixt you and your people) but it is law of old. And we know very well the Authors and the Authorities that do tell us what the law was in that point upon the Election of Kings, upon the Oath that they took unto their people: And if they did not observe it, there were those things called Parliaments; the Parliaments were they that were to adjudge (the very Words of the Author) the complaints and wrongs done of the king and the queen, or their children; such wrongs especially, when the people could have no where else any Remedy. Sir, that hath been the people of England's case: they could not have their Remedy elsewhere but in parliament.

Sir, Parliaments were ordained for that purpose, to redress the Grievances of the people; that was their main end. And truly, Sir, if so be that the kings of England had been rightly mindful of themselves, they were never more in majesty and state than in the Parliament: But how forgetful some have been, Stories have told us: we have, a miserable, a lamentable, a sad experience of it. Sir, by the old laws of England, I speak these things the rather to you, because you were pleased to let fall the other day, You thought you had as much knowledge in the Law as most gentlemen in England: it is very well, Sir. And truly, Sir, it is very fit for the gentlemen of England to understand that Law under which they must live, and by which they must be governed. And then, Sir, the Scripture says, "They that know their master's will and do it not:" what follows? The Law is your master, the acts of parliament.

The Parliaments were to be kept antiently, we find in our old Author, twice in the year, that the Subject upon any occasion might have a ready Remedy and Redress for his Grievance. Afterwards, by several acts of parliament in the days of your predecessor Edward the third, they should have been once a year. Sir, what the Intermission of parliaments hath been in your time, it is very well known, and the sad consequences of it; and what in the interim instead of these Parliaments hath been by you by an high and arbitrary hand introduced upon the People, that likewise hath been too well known and felt. But when God by his Providence had so far brought it about, that you could no longer decline the calling of a Parliament, Sir, yet it will appear what your ends were against the antient and your native kingdom of Scotland: the Parliament of England not serving your ends against them, you were pleased to dissolve it. Another great necessity occasioned the calling of this parliament; and what your Designs, and Plots, and Endeavours all along have been, for the crushing and confounding of this Parliament, hath been very notorious to the whole kingdom. And truly, Sir, in that you did strike at all; that had been a sure way to have brought about That that this Charge lays upon you, your intention to subvert the Fundamental Laws of the Land: for the great bulwark of the Liberties of the People is the Parliament of England; and to subvert and root up that, which your aim hath been to do, certainly at one blow you had confounded the Liberties and the Property of England.

Truly, Sir, it makes me to call to mind; I cannot forbear to express it; for, Sir, we must deal plainly with you, according to the merits of your cause; so is our Commission: it makes me call to mind (these proceedings of yours) That that we read of a great Roman Emperor, by the way let us call him a great Roman tyrant, Caligula, that wished that the people of Rome had had but one neck, that at one blow he might cut it off. And your proceedings have been somewhat like to this: for the body of the people of England hath been (and where else) represented but in the Parliament; and could you but have confounded that, you had at one blow cut off the neck of England. But God hath reserved better things for us, and hath pleased for to confound your designs, and to break your forces, and to bring your person into custody, that you might be responsible to justice.

Sir, we know very well that it is a question much on your side press'd, By what Precedent we shall proceed? Truly, Sir, for Precedents, I shall not upon these occasions institute any long discourse; but it is no new thing to cite precedents almost of all nations, where the people (when power hath been in their hands) have made bold to call their Kings to account; and where the change of government hath been upon occasion of the Tyranny and Misgovernment of those that have been placed over them, I will not spend time to mention either France, or Spain, or the Empire, or other countries; volumes may be written of it. But truly, Sir, that of the kingdom of Arragon, I shall think some of us have thought upon it, where they have the justice of Arragon, that is, a man, tanquam in medio positus, betwixt the king of Spain and the people of the country; that if wrong be done by the king, he that is king of Arragon, the justice, hath power to reform the wrong; and he is acknowledged to be the king's superior, and is the grand preserver of their privileges, and hath prosecuted kings upon their miscarriages.

Sir, what the Tribunes of Rome were heretofore, and what the Ephori were to the Lacedemonian State, we know that is the Parliament of England to the English state: and though Rome seemed to lose its liberty when once the Emperors were; yet you shall find some famous acts of justice even done by the Senate of Rome; that great Tyrant of his time, Nero, condemned and judged by the Senate. But truly, Sir, to you I should not need to mention these foreign examples and stories: If you look but over Tweed, we find enough in your native kingdom of Scotland: If we look to your first King Fergus, that your Stories make mention of, he was an elective king; he died, and left two sons, both in their minority; the kingdom made choice of their uncle, his brother, to govern in the minority. Afterwards the elder brother, giving small hopes to the people that he would rule or govern well, seeking to supplant that good uncle of his that governed them justly, they set the elder aside, and took to the younger. Sir, if I should come to what your Stories make mention of, you know very well you are the hundred and ninth king of Scotland; for not to mention so many kings as that kingdom, according to their power and privilege, have made bold to deal withal, some to banish, and some to imprison, and some to put to death, it would be too long; and as one of your own authors says, it would be too long to recite the manifold examples that your own Stories make mention of. Reges, &c. (say they) we do create; we created kings at first: Leges, &c. we imposed laws upon them. And as they are chosen by the suffrages of the People at the first, so upon just occasion, by the same suffrages they may be taken down again. And we will be bold to say, that no kingdom hath yielded more plentiful experience than that your native kingdom of Scotland hath done concerning the Deposition and the Punishment of their offending and transgressing kings, &c.

It is not far to go for an example: near you Your grandmother set aside, and your father, an infant, crowned. And the State did it here in England: here hath not been a want of some examples. They have made bold (the Parliament and the People of England) to call their Kings to account: there are frequent examples of it in the Saxons' time, the time before the Conquest. Since the Conquest there want not some Precedents neither; King Edward the Second, King Richard the Second, were dealt with so by the Parliament, as they were deposed and deprived. And truly, Sir, whoever shall look into their Stories, they shall not find the Articles that are charged upon them to come near to that height and capitalness of Crimes that are laid to your Charge; nothing near.

Sir, you were pleased to say, the other day, wherein they dissent; and I did not contradict it. But take all together, Sir: If you were as the Charge speaks, and no otherwise, admitted king of England: but for that you were pleased then to alledge, how that for almost a thousand years these things have been, Stories will tell you, if you go no higher than the time of the Conquest; if you do come down since the Conquest, you are the twenty-fourth king from William called the Conqueror, you shall find one half of them to come merely from the state, and not merely upon the point of descent. It were easy to be instanced to you; but time must not be lost that way. And truly, Sir, what a grave and learned Judge said in his time, and well known to you, and is since printed for posterity, That although there was such a thing as a descent many times, yet the kings of England ever held the greatest assurance of their Titles, when it was declared by Parliament. And, Sir, your Oath, the manner of your Coronation, doth shew plainly, that the kings of England, although it is true, by the law the next person in blood is designed; yet if there were just cause to refuse him, the People of England might do it. For there is a Contract and a Bargain made between the King and his People, and your Oath is taken: and certainly, Sir, the bond is reciprocal; for as you are the Liege Lord, so they Liege Subjects. And we know very well, that hath been so much spoken of, Ligeantia est duplex. This we know now, the one tie, the one bond, is the Bond of Protection that is due from the sovereign; the other is the Bond of Subjection that is due from the subject. Sir, if this bond be once broken, farewell sovereignty! Subjunctio trahit, &c.

These things may not be denied, Sir: I speak it rather, and I pray God it may work upon your heart, that you may be sensible of your Miscarriages. For whether you have been, as by your office you ought to be, a Protector of England, or the Destroyer of England, let all England judge, or all the world, that hath look'd upon it. Sir, though you have it by inheritance in the way that is spoken of, yet it must not be denied that your office was an office of trust, and indeed an office of the highest trust lodged in any single person; For as you were the Grand Administrator of Justice, and others were, as your delegates, to see it done throughout your realms; if your greatest office were to do Justice, and preserve your People from wrong, and instead of doing that, you will be the great Wrong-doer yourself; if instead of being a Conservator of the Peace, you will be the grand Disturber of the Peace; surely this is contrary to your office, contrary to your trust. Now, Sir, if it be an office of inheritance, as you speak of, your Title by Descent, let all men know that great offices are seizable and forfeitable, as if you had it but for a year, and for your life. Therefore, Sir, it will concern you to take into your serious consideration your great Miscarriages in this kind. Truly, Sir, I shall not particularize the many Miscarriages of your reign whatsoever, they are famously known: It had been happy for the kingdom, and happy for you too, if it had not been so much known, and so much felt, as the Story of your Miscarriages must needs be, and hath been already.

Sir, That which we are now upon, by the command of the highest Court, hath been and is to try and judge you for these great offences of your's. Sir, the Charge hath called you Tyrant, a Traitor, a Murderer, and a Public Enemy to the Commonwealth of England. Sir, it had been well if that any of all these terms might rightly and justly have been spared, if any one of them at all.

King. Ha!

Ld. President. Truly, Sir, We have been told, "Rex est dum bene regit, Tyrannus qui populum opprimit:" And if so be that be the definition of a Tyrant, then see how you come short of it in your actions, whether the highest Tyrant, by that way of arbitrary government, and that you have sought for to introduce, and that you have sought to put, you were putting upon the people? Whether that was not as high an Act of Tyranny as any of your predecessors were guilty of, nay, many degrees beyond it?

Sir, the term Traitor cannot be spared. We shall easily agree it must denote and suppose a Breach of Trust; and it must suppose it to be done to a superior. And therefore, Sir, as the people of England might have incurred that respecting you, if they had been truly guilty of it, as to the definition of law; so on the other side, when you did break your trust to the kingdom, you did break your trust to your superior: For the kingdom is that for which you were trusted.—And therefore, sir, for this breach of Trust when you are called to account, you are called to account by your superiors. "Minimus ad majorem in judicium vocat." And, Sir, the People of England cannot be so far wanting to themselves, God having dealt so miraculously and gloriously for them: but that having power in their hands, and their great enemy, they must proceed to do justice to themselves and to you: For, Sir, the Court could heartily desire, that you would lay your hand upon your heart, and consider what you have done amiss, that you would endeavour to make your peace with God. Truly, Sir, these are your High-Crimes, Tyranny and Treason.

There is a third thing too, if those had not been, and that is Murder, which is laid to your charge. All the bloody Murders, which have been committed since this time that the division was betwixt you and your people, must be laid to your charge, which have been acted or committed in these late wars. Sir, it is an heinous and crying sin: And truly, Sir, if any man will ask us what Punishment is due to a Murderer, let God's Law, let man's law speak. Sir, I will presume that you are so well read in Scripture, as to know what God himself hath said concerning the shedding of man's blood: Gen. ix. Numb. xxxv. will tell you what the punishment is: And which this Court, in behalf of the whole kingdom, are sensible of, of that innocent blood that has been shed, whereby indeed the land stands still defiled with that blood; and, as the text hath it, it can no way be cleansed but with the shedding of the Blood of him that shed this blood. Sir, we know no dispensation from this blood in that Commandment, 'Thou shalt do no Murder.' We do not know but that it extends to kings as well as to the meanest peasants, the meanest of the people; the command is universal. Sir, God's law forbids it; Man's law forbids it: Nor do we know that there is any manner of exception, not even in man's laws, for the punishment of murder in you. It is true, that in the case of kings every private hand was not to put forth itself to this work, for their reformation and punishment: But, Sir, the people represented having power in their hands, had there been but one wilful act of murder by you committed, had power to have convened you, and to have punished you for it.

But then, Sir, the weight that lies upon you in all those respects that have been spoken, by reason of your Tyranny, Treason, Breach of Trust, and the Murders that have been committed; surely, Sir, it must drive you into a sad consideration concerning your eternal condition. As I said at first, I know it cannot be pleasing to you to hear any such things as these are mentioned unto you from this Court, for so we do call ourselves, and justify ourselves to be a Court, and a high Court of Justice, authorized by the highest and solemnest court of the kingdom, as we have often said; And although you do yet endeavour what you may to discount us, yet we do take knowledge of ourselves to be such a Court as can administer Justice to you; and we are bound, Sir, in duty to do it. Sir, all I shall say before the reading of your Sentence, it is but this: The Court does heartily desire that you will seriously think of those evils that you stand guilty of. Sir, you said well to us the other day, you wished us to have God before our eyes. Truly, Sir, I hope all of us have so: That God, who we know is a King of Kings, and Lord of Lords; that God with whom there is no respect of Persons; that God, who is the Avenger of innocent Blood; We have that God before us; that God, who does bestow a curse upon them that withhold their hands from shedding of blood, which is in the case of guilty malefactors, and that do deserve death: That God we have before our eyes. And were it not that the conscience of our duty hath called us unto this place, and this employment, Sir, you should have had no appearance of a Court here. But, Sir, we must prefer the discharge of our duty unto God, and unto the kingdom, before any other respect whatsoever. And although at this time many of us, if not all of us, are severely threatened by some of your party, what they intend to do, Sir, we do here declare, That we shall not decline or forbear the doing of our duty in the administration of Justice, even to you, according to the merit of your Offence, although God should permit those men to effect all that bloody design in hand against us. Sir, we will say, and we will declare it, as those Children in the fiery Furnace, that would not worship the golden Image that Nebuchadnezzar had set up, 'That their God was able to deliver them 'from that danger that they were near unto.' But yet if he would not do it, yet notwithstanding that they would not fall down and worship the Image. We shall thus apply it; That though we should not be delivered from those bloody hands and hearts that conspire the overthrow of the kingdom in general, of us in particular, for acting in this great Work of Justice, though we should perish in the Work, yet by God's grace, and by God's strength, we will go on with it. And this is all our resolutions. Sir, I say for yourself, we do heartily wish and desire that God would be pleased to give you a sense of your sins, that you would see wherein you have done amiss, that you may cry unto him, that God would deliver you from Blood-guiltiness. A good king was once guilty of that particular thing, and was clear otherwise, saving in the matter of Uriah. Truly, Sir, the Story tells us that he was a repentant king; and it signifies enough, that he had died for it, but that God was pleased to accept of him, and to give him his pardon, "Thou shalt not die, but the child shall die: Thou hast given cause to the enemies of God to blaspheme."

King. I would desire only one word before you give Sentence; and that is, that you would hear me concerning those great Imputations that you have laid to my charge.

Ld. President. Sir, You must give me now leave to go on; for I am not far from your Sentence; and your time is now past.

King. But I shall desire you will bear me a few words to you: For truly, whatever Sentence you will put upon me in respect of those heavy imputations, that I see by your Speech you have put upon me; Sir, It is very true, that—

Ld. President. Sir, I must put you in mind: Truly, Sir, I would not willingly, at this time especially, interrupt you in any thing you have to say, that is proper for us to admit of; but, Sir, you have not owned us as a Court, and you look upon us as a sort of people met together; and we know what language we receive from your party.

King. I know nothing of that.

Ld. President. You disavow us as a Court; and therefore for you to address yourself to us, not acknowledging us as a Court to judge of what you say, it is not to be permitted. And the truth is, all along, from the first time you were pleased to disavow and disown us, the Court needed not to have heard you one word: For unless they be acknowledged a Court, and engaged, it is not proper for you to speak. Sir, we have given you too much liberty already, and admitted of too much delay, and we may not admit of any farther. Were it proper for us to do it, we should hear you freely; and we should not have declined to hear you at large, what you could have said or proved on your behalf, whether for totally excusing, or for in part excusing those great and heinous Charges, that in whole or in part are laid upon you. But, Sir, I shall trouble you no longer; your sins are of so large a dimension, that if you do but seriously think of them, they will drive you to a sad consideration of it, and they may improve in you a sad and serious repentance: And that the Court doth heartily wish that you may be so penitent for what you have done amiss, that God may have mercy, at leastwise, upon your better part: Truly, Sir, for the other, it is our parts and duties to do that, which the law prescribes. We are not here judicare but judicare. We cannot be unmindful of what the Scripture tells us; "For to acquit the Guilty is of equal Abomination, as to condemn the Innocent:" We may not acquit the Guilty. What sentence the law affirms to a Traitor, Tyrant, a Murderer, and a public Enemy to the Country, that Sentence you are now to hear read unto you; and that is the Sentence of the Court.

The Lord President commands the Sentence to be read: make an O yes, and command Silence while the Sentence is read.

O yes made: Silence commanded.

The Clerk read the Sentence, which was drawn up in Parchment:

"Whereas the Commons of England in Parliament had appointed them an High Court of Justice, for the Trying of Charles Stuart, King of England, before whom he had been three times convened; and at the first time a Charge of High-Treason, and other Crimes and Misdemeanors, was read in the behalf of the Kingdom of England," &c. [Here the Clerk read the Charge.] "Which Charge being read unto him, as aforesaid, he the said Charles Stuart was required to give his Answer: But he refused so to do; and so expressed the several Passages of his Trial in refusing to answer.—For all which Treasons and Crimes this Court doth adjudge, That the said Charles Stuart, as a Tyrant, Traitor, Murderer, and a Public Enemy, shall be put to Death, by the severing his Head from his Body."

After the Sentence read, the Lord President said, This Sentence now read and published, is the Act, Sentence, Judgment, and Resolution of the whole Court.

Here the Court stood up, as assenting to what the President said.

King. Will you hear me a word, Sir?

Ld. President. Sir, you are not to be heard after the Sentence.

King. No, Sir!

Ld. President. No, Sir; by your favour, Sir. Guard, withdraw you Prisoner.

King. I may speak after the Sentence—
By your Favour, Sir, I may Speak after the Sentence ever.

By your Favour, (Hold!) the Sentence, Sir—

I say, Sir, I do—

I am not suffered for to speak: Expect what Justice other People will have.

O yes: All manner of Persons that have any thing else to do, are to depart at this time, and to give their attendance in the Painted Chamber; to which place this Court doth forthwith adjourn itself.

Then the Court rose, and the King went with his guard to sir Robert Cotton's, and from thence to Whitehall.

The Speech Cook designed to have delivered if the King had pleaded.

May it please your Lordship; my Lord President, and this high court, erected for the most comprehensive, impartial, and glorious piece of justice, that ever was acted and executed upon the theatre of England, for the trying and judging of Charles Stuart, whom God in his Wrath gave to be a King to this Nation, and will, I trust, in great love, for his notorious prevarications and blood-guiltiness, take him away from us: He that hath been the original of all injustice, and the principal author of more mischiefs to the free-born people of this nation, than the best arithmetician can well enumerate, stands now to give an account of his stewardship, and to receive the good of justice, for all the evil of his injustice and cruelty. Had he ten thousand lives, they could not all satisfy for the numerous, horrid, and barbarous massacres of myriads and legions of innocent persons, which by his commands, commissions and procurements, (or at least all the world must needs say, which he might have prevented; and he that suffers any man to be killed, when he may save his life without danger of his own, is a murderer), have been cruelly slain, and inhumanly murdered, in this renowned Albion: Anglia hath been made an Akeldama, and her younger sister Ireland a land of ire and misery. And yet this hard-hearted man, as he went out of the Court down the stairs, January 29, said (as some of his guard told me and others), 'That he was not troubled for any of the blood that hath been shed, but for the blood of one man' (peradventure he meant Strafford). He was no more affected with a List that was brought into Oxford of five or six thousand slain at Edgehill, than to read one of Ben. Jonson's Tragedies. You Gentlemen Royalists that fought for him, if ye had lost your lives for his sake, you see he would have no more pitied you, by his own confession, than you do a poor worm: and yet what heart but would cleave, if it were a rock; melt, if it were ice; break, if it were a flint; or dissolve, if it were a diamond: to consider that so much precious Protestant blood should be shed in these three Kingdoms, so many gallant, valiant men of all sorts and conditions to be sacrificed and lost their lives, and many of them to die so desperately in regard of their eternal conditions; and all this merely and only for the satisfying and fulfilling of one man's sinful lust and wicked will? A good shepherd is he that lays down his life, or ventures it to save the sheep; but for one to be so proudly wedded to his own conceits, as so maliciously to oppose his private opinion against the public judgment and reason of state, and to make head against the Parliament, who acknowledged him to be head thereof, so far as to give him the honour of the royal assent, in settling the Militia and safety of the people: I say, for a protestant prince, so beloved at home, and feared abroad, that in love and by gentle means might have had any thing from the Parliament; for him to occasion the shedding of so much blood for a pretended Prerogative, as hereafter will appear, nothing in effect but to fix and perpetuate an absolute tyranny; I can say no less, 'But O Lucifer, from whence art thou fallen?' and what heretics are they in politics, that would have had such a man to live! Much more, that think his actions to have inherited love and praise from heaven and earth. But now to dissect the Charge.

I. That the kings of England are trusted with a limited Power to govern by law, the whole stream and current of legal Authorities run so limped and clear, that I should but weary those that know it already, and trouble those that need not know the particular Cases; for it is one of the fundamentals of law, That the king is not above the law, but the law above the king. I could easily deraign it from 1 Edw. 3. to the Jurisdiction of Courts, That the king has no more power or authority, than what by law is concredited and committed to him: but the most famous Authority is Fortescue, Chancellor to Henry 6, (and therefore undoubtedly would not clip his master's Prerogative) who most judiciously takes a difference between a Government wholly regal and seignoral, as in Turkey, Russia, France, Spain, &c. and a government politick and mixed, where the law keeps the beam even between sovereignty and subjection, as in England, Denmark, Sweden, and Poland. The first, where the edict of a prince makes the law resemble an impetuous inundation of the waters, whereby the corn and hay, and other fruits of the earth are spoiled, as when it is midwinter at Midsummer; the latter is like a sweet smooth stream, running by the pleasant fields and meadows. That by the law of England the king ought not to impose any thing upon the people, or take any thing away from them to the value of a farthing, but by common consent in Parliaments or National Meetings; and that the people of common right, and by several statutes, ought to have parliaments yearly, or oftener if need be, for the redress of public Grievances, and for the enacting of good and wholesome laws, and repealing of old statutes of Uneri which are prejudicial to the nation: And that the king hath not by law so much power as a Justice of Peace, to commit any man to prison for any offence whatsoever, because all such matters were committed to proper courts and officers of justice: And if the king by his verbal command send for any person to come before him, if the party refused to attend, and the messenger endeavouring to force him, they fell to blows; if the messenger killed the party sent for, this by the law is murder in him; but if he killed the messenger, this was justifiable in him, being in his own defence, so as to sue forth a pardon of course: These, and many other Cases of like nature, are so clear and well known, that I will not presume to multiply particulars.

That the King took an Oath at his Coronation to preserve the peace of the nation, to do justice to all, and to keep and observe the laws which the people have, himself confesses: [1st Book of Ord. fol.] And it was charged upon the late Archbishop, that he emasculated the oath, and left out very material words; 'Which the people shall chuse:' which certainly he durst not have done, without the king's special command. And it seems to me no light presumption, that from that very day he had a design to alter and subvert the fundamental laws, and to introduce an arbitrary and tyrannical government. But though there had been no Oath, yet by special office and duty of his place every king of England is obliged to act for the people's good: for all power, as it is originally in the People (he must needs be extreme ignorant, malicious, or a self-destroyer, that shall deny it), so it is given forth for their preservation, nothing for their destruction. For a king to rule by lust, and not by law, is a creature that was never of God's making, not of God's approbation, but his permission: and though such men are said to be Gods on earth, it is in no other sense than the Devil is called the God of this World. It seems that one Passage which the king would have offered to the Court, (which was not permitted him to dispute the Supreme Authority in the nation; and standing mute, the Charge being for High Treason, it is a conviction in law) was, That 1 Sam. viii. is a copy of the King's Commission, by virtue whereof, he as king might rule and govern as he list; that he might take the people's sons, and appoint them for himself, for his chariots, and to be his horsemen, and take their daughters to be his confectionaries, and take their fields, and vineyards, and olive-yards, even the best of them, and their goodliest young men, and their asses, and give them to his officers, and to his servants; which indeed is a copy and pattern of an absolute Tyrant and absolute Slaves, where the people have no more than the Tyrant will afford them. The Holy Spirit in that Chapter does not insinuate what a good king ought to do, but what a wicked king would presume to do. Besides, Saul and David had extraordinary calling, but all just power is now derived from and conferred by the people: yet in the case of Saul it is observable, That the people, out of pride to be like other nations, desired a king, and such a king as the Heathens had, which were all tyrants: for they that know any thing in History, know that the first four monarchs were all Tyrants at first, till they gained the people's consent. Nimrod the great Hunter was Ninus that built Nineveh, the first Tyrant and Conqueror that had no Title; and so were all kingdoms, which are not elective, till the people's subsequent consent; and tho' it be by Descent, yet it is a continuation of a Conquest; till the people consent and voluntarily submit to a government, they are but slaves, and in reason they may free themselves if they can. In France the king begins his reign from the day of his Coronation: The Archbishop asks the people, if he shall be king; the twelve peers, or some that personate them, say, Yes: They girt the sword about him, then he swears to defend the laws. And is any thing more natural than to keep an oath? And though virtuous kings have prevailed with the people to make their crowns hereditary, yet the Coronation shews the shell that the kernel hath been in. Samuel was a good Judge, and there was nothing could be objected against him, therefore God was displeased at their inordinate desire of a king; and it seems to me, that the Lord declares his dislike of all such kings as the Heathens were, that is, kings with an unlimited power, that are not tied to laws; for he gave them a king in his wrath, therein dealing with them as the wise physician with the distempered and impatient patient, who desiring to drink wine, tells him the danger of inflammation; yet wine he will have, and the physician considering a little wine will do but little hurt, rather than his patient by fretting should take greater hurt, prescribes a little white-wine: wherein the physician doth not approve his drinking of wine, but of two evils chuseth the least. The Jews would have a King for majesty and splendor, like the Heathens: God permits this, he approves it not: it seems to me, that the Lord renounces the very genus of such kings as are there mentioned, and the old word 'Conning,' by contraction 'King,' does not signify power or force to do what he will, but a knowing, wise, discreet man, that opens the people's eyes, and does not lead them by the noses, but governs them with wisdom and discretion for their own good. Therefore, Gentlemen-Royalists, be not so mad as to misconstrue either the Oaths of Allegiance or Supremacy, or any League or Covenant, that any man should swear to give any one leave to cut his throat: The true meaning is, that the king of England was supreme in this land, in opposition to the Pope, or any other prince or potentate, as the words of the oath do import, 'That no foreign State, Prince, or 'Potentate,' &c. In case of any foreign Invasion, the king was by law to be Generalissimo, to command the people for their own safety; and so it was expounded by the Parliament in 13 Eliz. which for some reason of state was not permitted to be printed with the Statutes. Besides, God told those kings whom he had formerly anointed, what their duty was; not to exalt themselves overmuch above their brethren, to delight themselves in the law of God: Out of which I infer, that the Turks, Tartars, Muscovites, French, Spaniards, and all people that live at the beck and nod of tyrannical men, may and ought to free themselves from that tyranny, if, and when, they can; for such Tyrants that so domineer with a rod of iron, do not govern by God's permissive hand of approbation or benediction, but by the permissive hand of his Providence, suffering them to scourge the people, for ends best known to himself, until he open a way for the people to work out their own enfranchisements.

But before I speak of the War, it will be necessary for the satisfaction of rational men, to open and prove the King's wicked Design, wherewith he stands charged. Now, that he had from the beginning of his reign such a Design and Endeavour so to tear up the Foundations of Government, that Law should be no protection to any man's person or estate, will clearly appear by what follows.

1. By his not taking the Oath so fully as his predecessors did, that so when the Parliament should tender good laws to him for the royal assent, he might readily answer that he was not by Oath obliged to confirm or corroborate the same.

2. By his dishonourable and perfidious dealing with the People at his Coronation, when he set forth a Proclamation, That in regard of the Infection then spread through the kingdom, he promised to dispense with those knights, that by an old statute were to attend at the Coronation, who were thereby required not to attend; but did notwithstanding within a few months after take advantage of their absence, and raised a vast sum of money out of their estates at the Council-Table; where they pleading the said Proclamation for their justification, they were answered that the Law of the Land was above any Proclamation; like that Tyrant, that when he could not by law execute a virgin, commanded her to be deflowered, and then put to death.

3. By his altering the Patents and Commissions to the Judges, which having heretofore had their places granted to them so long as they should behave themselves well therein, he made them but during pleasure; that if so the Judges should not declare the Law to be as he would have it, he might with a wet finger remove them, and put in such as should not only say, but swear, if need were, That the Law was as the king would have it. For when a man shall give 5 or 10,000*l.* for a Judge's Place, during the king's pleasure, and he shall the next day send to him to know his opinion of a difference in law between the King and Subject; and it shall be intimated unto him, That if he do not deliver his Opinion for the king, he is likely to be removed out of his place the next day; which if so, he knows not how to live, but must rot in a prison for the money which he borrowed to buy his Place; as was well known to be some of their cases, who under-hand and closely bought great places, to elude the danger of the statute; whether this was not too heavy a temptation for the shoulders of most men to bear, is no hard matter to determine. So as upon the matter, that very act of his made the king at the least a potential tyrant; for when that shall be law which a king shall declare himself, or which shall be declared by those whom he chuses, this brings the people to the very next step to slavery.

But that which doth irrefragably prove the Design, was his restless desire to destroy Parliaments, or to make them useless: And for that, who knows not but that there were three or four National Meetings in Parliament in the first four years of his reign, which were called for Supply, to bring Money into his coffers, in point of Subsidies, rather than for any benefit to the people, as may appear by the few good laws that were then made? But that which is most memorable, is the untimely dissolving of the Parliament in 4 Car. when sir John Elliot and others, who managed a Conference with the house of peers concerning the duke of Buckingham, who, amongst other things, was charged concerning the Death of king James, were committed close prisoners to the Tower, where he lost his life by cruel indurance; which I may not pass over without a special animadversion: for sure there is no Turk or Heathen but will say, that if he were any way guilty of his father's death, let him die for it.

I would not willingly be so injurious to the honest Reader, as to make him buy that again which he hath formerly met with in the Parliament's Declaration or elsewhere; in such a case a marginal reference may be sufficient. Nor would I herein be so presumptuous as to prevent any thing that happily may be intended in any Declaration for more general satisfaction; but humbly to offer a student's mite, which satisfies myself, with submission to better judgments.

How the King first came to the crown, God and his own conscience best knew. It was well known and observed at court, that a little before he was a professed enemy to the duke of Buckingham; but instantly upon the death of king James, took him into such special protection, grace and favour, that upon the matter he divided the kingdom with him. And when the earl of Bristol had exhibited a Charge against the said duke, the 13th Article whereof concerned the Death of king James, he instantly dissolved that parliament, that so he might protect the Duke from the justice thereof, and would never suffer any legal enquiry to be made for his father's death. The Rabbins observe, that That which stuck most with Abraham about God's command to sacrifice Isaac, was this: 'Can I not be obedient, unless I be unnatural? What will the Heathen say, when they hear I have killed my only son?' What will an Indian say to this case? A king hath all power in his hand to do justice: There is one accused upon strong presumptions, at the least, for poisoning the king's father; the king protects him from justice; whether do you believe that himself had any hand in his father's death? Had the duke been accused for the death of a beggar, he ought not to have protected him from a judicial trial. We know that by law it is no less than Misprision of Treason to conceal a treason; and to conceal a murder, strongly implies a guilt thereof, and makes him a kind of accessory to the fact. He that hath no nature to do justice to his own Father, could it ever be expected that he should do justice to others? Was he fit to continue a Father to the people, who was without natural affection to his own Father? Will he love a kingdom, that shewed no love to himself, unless it was, that he durst not suffer inquisition to be made for it? But I leave it as a riddle, which at the Day of Judgment will be expounded and unriddled; for some sins will not be made manifest till that day, with this only, That had he made the Law of God his delight, and studied therein 'night and day,' as God commanded his kings to do; or had he but studied Scripture half so much as Ben. Johnson or Shakespear, he might have learnt, That when Amazia was settled in the kingdom, he suddenly did justice upon those servants which had killed his father Joash: [2 Kings xii. 20. and xiv. 1, 5.] he did not by any pretended prerogative excuse or protect them, but delivered them up into the hands of that Justice which the horridness of the fact did undoubtedly demerit*.

That parliament (4 Car.) proving so abortive, the king sets forth a Proclamation, That none should presume to move him to call Parliaments, for he knew how to raise Monies enough without the help of Parliaments; therefore in twelve years refuseth to call any. In which interval and intermission, how he had oppressed the people by Incroachments and usurpations upon their Liberties and Properties; and what vast sums of Money he had forcibly exacted and exhausted by illegal Patents and Monopolies of all sorts, I refer the Reader to that most judicious and full Declaration of the State of the kingdom, published in the beginning of this parliament. That Judgment of Ship-money did, upon the matter, formalize the people absolute slaves, and him an absolute Tyrant: For if the king may take from the people, in case of necessity, and himself shall be Judge of that necessity, then cannot any man say that he is worth sixpence, for if the king say that he hath need of that sixpence, then by law he must have it. I mean that great Nimrod, that would have made all England a forest; and the people, which the bishop calls his sheep, to be his venison to be hunted at his pleasure.

Nor does the common Objection, "That the Judges and evil Counsellors, and not the king, ought to be responsible for such Mal-Administrations, injustice and oppression," bear the weight of a feather in the balance of right reason. For, 1st, Who made such wicked and corrupt Judges? Were they not his own creatures? And ought not every man to be accountable for the works of his own hands? He that does not hinder the doing of Evil, if it lies in his power to prevent it, is guilty of it as a commander thereof. He that suffered those black Stars to inflict such barbarous cruelties, and unheard-of punishments, as Brandings, Slitting of Noses, &c. upon honest men, to the dishonour of the Protestant religion, and disgrace of the Image of God shining in the face of man, he well deserved to have been so served. But, 2dly, he had the benefit of those illegal Fines and Judgments. I agree, that if a Judge shall oppress I. S. for the benefit of I. D. the king ought not to answer for this, but the Judge, unless he protect the Judge against the complaint of I. S. and in that case he makes himself guilty of it. But when an unjust Judgment is given against I. S. for the king's benefit, and the Fine to come immediately into his coffers; he that receives the money must needs be presumed to consent to the judgment. But, 3dly, mark a Machiavel-policy; "call no parliaments to question the injustice and corruption of Judges for the people's relief; and make your own Judges, and let that be the law that they declare; whether it be reasonable or unreasonable, it is no matter."

But, then, how came it to pass that we had any more Parliaments? Had we not a gracious king to call a parliament when there was so much need of it, and to pass so many gracious acts to put down the Star-Chamber, &c.? Nothing less; it was not any voluntary free act of Grace, nor the least ingredient or tincture of love or good affection to the people, that called the short parliament in 1640, but to serve his own turn against the Scots, whom he then had designed to enslave: and those seven Acts of Grace which the king passed, were no more than his duty to do, nor half so much, but giving the people a taste of their own grists; and he dissents with them about the Militia, which commanded all the rest; he never intended thereby any more good and security to the people, than he that stealing the goose leaves the feathers behind him. But to answer the question, thus it was:

The King being wholly given up to be led by the counsels of a Jesuited Party, who endeavoured to throw a bone of dissention among us, that they might cast in their net into our troubled waters, and catch more fish: For St. Peter's See persuaded the king to set up a new Form of Prayer in Scotland, and laid the bait so cunningly, that whether they saw it or not, they were uadone: If they saw the Mystery of Iniquity couched in it, they would resist, and so merit punishment for re-

bellings; if they swallowed it, it would make way for worse. Well, they saw the poison, and refused to taste it. The King makes war, and many that loved honour and wealth more than God, assisted him; down he went with an army, but his treasure wasted in a short time; fight they would not, for fear of an after-reckoning. Some commanders propound, that they should make their demands; and the king grants all, comes back to London, and burns the Pacification, saying, it was counterfeit; They reassume their forces, he raises a second War against them, and was necessitated to call a parliament, offering to lay down Ship-Money for twelve Subsidies. They refuse; the king in high displeasure breaks off the Parliament, and in a Declaration commands them not to think of any more Parliaments, for he would never call another.

There was a king of Egypt that cruelly oppressed the people; they, poor slaves! complaining to one another, he feared a rising, and commanded that none should complain upon pain of cruel death. Spies being abroad, they often met, but durst not speak, but parted with tears in their eyes; which declared that they had more to utter, but durst not: This struck him to greater fears, he commanded that none should look upon one another's eyes at parting; therefore their griefs being too great to be smothered, they fetched a deep sigh when they parted, which moved them so much to compassionate one another's wrongs, that they ran in and killed the Tyrant. The long hatching Irish Treason was now ripe, and therefore it was necessary that England and Scotland should be in combustion, lest we might help the Irish protestants. Well, the Scots get Newcastle; he knew they would trust him no more, he had so often broke with them, therefore no hopes to get them out by a Treaty. Many lords and the City petition for a Parliament; the king was at such a necessity, that yield he must to that which he most abhorred; God had brought him to such a strait. He that a few months before assumed the power of God, commanding men not to think of Parliaments, to restrain the free thoughts of the heart of man, was constrained to call one, which they knew he would break off when the Scots were sent home; therefore got a confirmation of it, that he should not dissolve it without the consent of both Houses, of which he had no hopes, or by force, which he suddenly attempted; and the English Army in the North, was to have come up to confound the Parliament and this rebellious and disloyal City, as the king called it; and for their pains was promised thirty thousand pounds and the plunder, as by the Examinations of colouel Goring, Legg, &c. doth most fully appear,

And here by the way, I cannot but commend the City Malignants; he calls them Rebels, they call him a gracious King: He, by his Proclamation at Oxford, prohibits all Commerce and intercourse of Trade between this populous City (the life and interest whereof consists in Trade, without which many thousands cannot subsist) and other parts of the kingdom: still they do good against evil, and petitioning him so often to cut their throats, are troubled at nothing so much as that they are not reduced to that former and a worse bondage than when there was a Lord Warden [Darling-rub] made in the City, and the King sent for as much of their estates as he pleased. But surely the Oxfordshire men are more to be commended; for when the King had commanded by his Proclamation, [15 April, 20 Car.] that what corn, hay, and other provision in the county of Oxford, could not be fetched into the said city for his garrison, should be consumed and destroyed by fire, for fear it should fall into the hands of the Parliament's Friends; (a cruelty not to be paralleled by any Infidel, Heathen, or Pagan King; nor to be preceded amongst the most avowed and professed enemies, much less from a king to his subjects) they resolved never to trust him any more.

But the great Question will be, What hath been the true Ground and Occasion of the War? which unless I clear, and put it out of question, as the Charge imports, I shall fall short of what I chiefly aim at, viz. "That the King set up his Standard of War, for the advancement and upholding of his personal Interest, Power, and pretended Prerogative, against the public interest of common right, peace and safety:" and thus I prove it.

1. He fought for the Militia by sea and land, to have it at his absolute disposal, and to justify and maintain his illegal Commissions of Array; and this he pretended was his birthright by the law of England: which if it were so, then might he by the same reason command all the Money in the kingdom; for he that carries the sword, will command the purse.

2. The next thing that he pretended to fight for, was his power to call Parliaments when he pleased, and dissolve them when he list; if they will serve his turn, then they may sit by a law to enslave the people; so that the people had better chuse all the Courtiers and King's Favourites at first, than to trouble themselves with ludicrous Elections, to assemble the Freeholders together, to their great labour and expence both of time and coin; and those which are chosen knights and burgesses, to make great preparations, to take long journeys to London themselves and their attendants, to see the kings and lords in their Parliament robes ride in state to the house, and with Domitian, to catch flies. And no sooner shall there be any breathings, or a spirit of justice stirring and discovered in the House of Commons, but the king sends the black rod, and dissolves the Parliament, and sends them back again as wise as they were before, but not with so much Money in their purses, to tell stories to the Freeholders of the bravery of the king and lords.

3. Well, but if this be too gross, and that the people begin to murmur and clamour for another Parliament, then there goes out another Summons, and they meet, and sit for some time, but to as much purpose as before; for when the Commons have presented any Bill for Redress of a public Grievance, then the king hath several games to play to make all fruitless: As, first, his own negative voice, that if Lords and Commons are both agreed, then he will advise; which (I know not by what strange doctrine) hath been of late construed to be a plain denial: though under favour, at the first it was no more but to allow him two or three days time to consider of the equity of the law; in which time if he could not convince them of the injustice of it, then ought he by his oath and by law to consent to it.

4. But if by this means the King had contracted hard thoughts from the people, and that not only the Commons, but many of the Lords, that have the same noble blood running in their veins, as those English Barons, whose swords were the chief instruments that purchased Magna Charta; then, that the king might be sure to put some others between him and the people's hatred, the next prerogative that he pretended to have, was to be the sole Judge of Chivalry, to have the sole power of conferring Honours, to make as many lords as he pleased, that so he might be sure to have two against one, if the House of Commons (by reason of the multitude of burgesses, which he likewise pretended a power to make as many borough towns and corporations as he pleased) were not packed also. And this is that glorious privilege of the English Parliaments, so much admired for just nothing: For if this pretended prerogative might stand for law, as was challenged by his Adherents, never was there a purer cheat put upon any people, nor a more ready way to enslave them, than by privilege of Parliament; being just such a mockery of the people, as that Mock Parliament at Oxford was, where the king's cousin must be the figure, and the representative stand for a cypher.

5. But then out of Parliament the people are made to believe, that the king hath committed all justice to the Judges, and distributed the execution thereof into several courts; and that the king cannot so much as imprison a man, or impose any thing upon, nor take any thing away from the people, as by law he ought not to do: But now see what Prerogative he challenges.

1. If the king have a mind to have any public-spirited man removed out of the way; this man is killed, the murderer known; a letter comes to the Judge, and it may be, it shall be found but manslaughter; if it be found murder, the man is condemned, but the king grants him a pardon, which the Judges will allow, if the word 'Murder' be in it: But because it is too gross to pardon murder, therefore the king shall grant him a lease of his life for seven years, and then renew it (like a Bishop's lease), as he did to major Prichard, who was lately justified: who being a servant to the earl of Lindsey, murdered a gentleman in Lincolnshire, and was condemned, and had a lease of his life from the king, as his own friends have credibly told me.

2. For matter of Liberty: the king or any courtier sends a man to prison; if the Judge set him at liberty, then put him out of his place; a temptation too heavy for those that love money and honour more than God, to bear: therefore any judgment that is given between the king and a subject, it is not worth a rush: for what will not money do?

Next, he challenges a Prerogative to enhance and debase Monies, which by law was allowed him, so far as to balance Trade, and no further; that if gold went high beyond sea, it might not be cheap here, to have it all bought up and transported: but under colour of that, he challenges a Prerogative, That the king may by proclamation make leather current, or make a sixpence go for 20s. or 20s. for a sixpence. Which not to mention any thing of the project of Farthings or Brass money, he that challenges such a prerogative, is a potential tyrant: for if he may make my twelpence in my pocket worth but two-pence, what property hath any man in any thing that he enjoys?

Another Prerogative pretended was, That the king may avoid any Grant; and so may cozen and cheat any man by a law. The ground whereof is, That the King's Grants shall be taken according to his intention; which, in a sober sense, I wish that all men's grants might be so construed according to their intentions, expressed by word or writing: but by this means, it being hard to know what the king intended, his Grants have been like the Devil's Oracles, taken in any contrary sense for his own advantage.

1 Rep. In the famous Case of Altonwood there is vouched the lord Lovell's case: That the king granted lands to the lord Lovell, and his heirs males, not for service done, but for a valuable consideration of money paid. The Patentee well hoped to have enjoyed the land not only during his life, but that his heirs males, at least of his body, should have likewise enjoyed it: but the Judges finding, it seems, that the king was willing to keep the money, and have his land again, (for what other reason, no mortal man can fathom) resolved that it was a void Grant, and that nothing passed to the patentee. I might instance in many cases of like nature, throughout all the Reports. As one once made his boast, That he never made or past any patent or charter from the crown, but he reserved one starting hole or other, and knew how to avoid it; and so merely to cozen and defraud the poor patentee. So that now put all these Prerogatives together, 1. The Militia by sea and land: 2. A liberty to call Parliaments when he pleased; and to adjourn, prorogue, or dissolve them at pleasure: 3. A negative Voice, that the People cannot save themselves without him, and must cut their own throats, if commanded so to do: 4. The Nomination and Making of all the Judges, that upon peril of the loss of their places must declare the law to be as he pleases: 5. A power to confer Honours upon whom, and how he pleases; a covetous base wretch for five or ten thousand pounds to be courted, who deserves to be carted: 6. To pardon Murderers, whom the Lord says shall not be pardoned: 7. To set a value and price of Monies as he pleases; that if he be to pay ten thousand pounds, he may make Leather by his Proclamation to be current that day, or 5s. to pass for 20s.; and if to receive so much, 20s. to pass for 5s.: And lastly, a legal Theft to avoid his own Grants: I may boldly throw the gauntlet, and challenge all the Machiavels in the world to invent such an exquisite platform of tyrannical domination, and such a perfect tyranny, without main or blemish, as this is, and that by a law, which is worst of all. But the truth is, these are no legal prerogatives, but usurpations, incroachments, and invasions upon the people's rights and liberties: and this easily effected, without any great depth of policy; for it is but being sure to call no Parliaments, or make them useless, and make the Judges places profitable, and place avarice upon the bench, and no doubt but the law shall sound as the king would have it. But let me thus far satisfy the ingenuous Reader, That all the Judges in England cannot make one case to be law that is not reason, no more than they can prove a hair to be white that is black; which if they should so declare or adjudge, it is a mere nullity: For law must be reason adjudged, where reason is the Genus; and the judgment in some court makes the Differentia. And I never found that the fair hand of the Common Law of England ever reached out any prerogative to the king above the meanest man, but in three cases; 1. In matters of Honour and Preeminence to his person; and in matters of Interest: That he should have Mines Royal of Gold and Silver, in whose land soever they were discovered; and fishes royal, as sturgeons and whales, in whose streams or water soever they were taken, which very rarely happened: or to have tythes out of a parish that nobody else could challenge: For says the Law, 'The most noble persons are to have the most noble things.' 2. To have his Patents freed from deceit, that he be not over-reached or cozened in his Contracts, being employed about the great and arduous affairs of the kingdom. 3. His Rights to be freed from incursion of time, not to be bound up by any Statute of Non-claim: for indeed possession is a vain plea, when the matter of right is in question; for right can never die: and some such honourable privileges of mending his plea, or suing in what court he will; and some such prerogatives, of a middle indifferent nature, that could not be prejudicial to the people. But that the law of England should give the king any such vast, immense, precipitating power, or any such God-like state, That he ought not to be accountable for wicked actions, or misadministrations and misgovernment, as he hath challenged and avowed in his Answer to the Petition of Right, or any such principles of Tyranny; which are as inconsistent with the people's liberties and safety as the Ark and Dragon, light and darkness, in an extensive degree; is a most vain and irrational thing to imagine. And yet that was the ground of the War, as himself often declared; and that would not have half contented him, if he had come in by the sword. But some rational men object, How can it be Murder, say they, for the king to raise Forces against the Parliament, since there is no other way of determining differences between the king and his subjects, but by the sword? For the Law is no competent judge between two supreme powers; and then if it be only a contending for each other's right, where is the malice that makes the killing of a man murder? Take the Answer thus: first, How is it possible to imagine two supreme powers in one nation, no more than two suns in one firmament? If the king be supreme, the parliament must be subordinate: if they supreme, then he subordinate. But then it is alledged, That the king challenged a power only co-ordinate, that the parliament could do nothing without him, nor he without them. Under favour, two powers co-ordinate is as absurd as the other: for though in quiet times the Commons have waited upon the king, and allowed him a negative voice in matters of less concernment, where delay could not prove dangerous to the people; yet when the Commons shall vote that the kingdom is in danger, unless the Militia be so and so settled; now if he will not agree to it, they are bound in duty to do it themselves. And it is impossible to imagine that ever any man should have the consent of the people to be their king upon other conditions (without which no man ever had right to wear the diadem): for conquest makes a title amongst wolves and bears, but not amongst men.

When the first Agreement was concerning the Power of Parliaments, if the king should have said, Gentlemen, are you content to allow me any negative voice, that if you vote the kingdom to be in danger, unless such an Act pass, if I refuse to assent, shall nothing be done in that case? Surely no rational man but would have answered, May it please your majesty, we shall use all dutiful means to procure your royal assent: but if you still refuse, we must not sit still, and see ourselves ruined: we must and will save ourselves, whether you will or no. And will any man say that the king's power is diminished, because he cannot hurt the people? Or that a man is less in health that hath many physicians to attend him? God is omnipotent, that cannot sin; and all power is for the People's good: but a prince may not say, That is for the people's good, which they see and feel to be for their hurt. And as for the malice, the law implies that; as when a thief sets upon a man to rob him, he hath no spite to the man, but love to the money: but it is an implied malice, that he will add the people unless they will be slaves.

Q. But by what Law is the King condemned?
Resp. By the Fundamental Law of this kingdom, by the general law of all nations, and the unanimous consent of all rational men in the world, written in every man's heart with the pen of a diamond in capital letters, and a character so legible, that he that runs may read, viz. That when any man is intrusted with the sword for the protection and preservation of the people, if this man shall employ it to their destruction, which was put into his hand for their safety, by the law of that land he becomes an enemy to that people, and deserves the most exemplary and severe punishment that can be invented. And this is the first necessary fundamental law of every kingdom, which by intrinsical rules of government must preserve itself. And this law needed not be expressed, That if a king become a tyrant, he shall die for it; it is so naturally implied. We do not use to make laws which are for the preservation of nature; that a man should eat and drink, and buy himself clothes, and enjoy other natural comforts: No kingdom ever made any laws for it. And as we are to defend ourselves naturally without any written law, from hunger and cold, so from outward violence. Therefore, if a King would destroy a people, it is absurd and ridiculous to ask by what law he is to die. And this Law of Nature is the law of God, written in the fleshly tables of men's hearts; that, like the elder sister, hath a prerogative right of power before any positive law whatsoever: and this law of nature is an undubitable legislative authority of itself, that hath a suspensive power over all human laws. If any man shall by express covenant, under hand and seal, give power to another man to kill him, this is a void contract, being destructive to humanity.* And by the law of England any act or agreement against the laws of God or nature is a mere nullity: for as man hath no hand in the making of the laws of God or nature, no more hath he power to mar or alter them. If the pilot of a ship be drunk, and running upon a rock; if the passengers cannot otherwise prevent it, they may throw him into the sea to cool him. And this Question hath received Resolution this parliament. When the Militia of an Army is committed to a general, it is not with any express condition, that he shall not turn the mouths of his cannons against his own soldiers; for that is so naturally and necessarily implied, that it is needless to be expressed; inasmuch, as if he did attempt or command such a thing against the nature of his trust and place, it did ipso facto estate the Army in a right of disobedience; unless any man be so grossly ignorant, to think that obedience binds men to cut their own throats, or their companions. Nor is this any secret of the law which hath lain hid from the beginning, and now brought out to bring him to justice; but that which is connatural with every man, and innate in his judgment and reason, and is as antient as the first king, and an epideimical binding law in all nations in the world: for when many families agree, for the preservation of human society, to invest any king or governor with power and authority; upon the acceptance thereof, there is a mutual trust and confidence between them, that the king shall improve his power for their good, and make it his work to procure their safeties, and they to provide for his honour; which is done to the commonwealth in him, as the Sword and Ensigns of honour carried before the Lord Mayor, are for the honour of the City." Now, as when any one of this people shall compass the death of the governor, ruling well, this is a treason punishable with death, for the wrong done to the community, and Anathema be to such a man; so when he or they that are trusted to fight the People's Battles, and to procure their welfare, shall prevaricate, and act to the enslaving or destroying of the people, who are his Liege Lords, and all governors are but the people's creatures, and the work of their hands, to be accountable as their stewards, (and is it not senseless for the Vessel to ask the Potter by what law he calls it to account?) this is High Treason with a witness, and far more transcendent than in the former case; because the king was paid for his service, and the dignity of the person does increase the offence. For a great man of noble education and knowledge to betray so great a trust, and abuse so much love as the Parliament shewed to the King, by petitioning him as good subjects, praying him as good Christians, advising him as good counsellors, and treating with him as the Great Council of the kingdom, with such infinite care and tenderness of his honour (a course which God's People did not take with Rehoboam; they never petitioned him, but advised him; he refused their counsel, and hearkened to young counsellors, and they cry, "To thy tents, O Israel;" and make quick and short work of it); after all this, and much more longanimity and patience, which God exercises towards man to bring him to repentance, from the lord to the servant, for him not only to set up a standard of war, in defiance of his dread sovereign the People (for so they truly were in nature, though names have befooled us), but to persist so many years in such cruel persecutions; who with the word of his mouth might have made a peace: If ever there were so superlative a Treason, let the Indians judge. And whosoever shall break and violate such a trust and confidence, Anathema Maranatha be unto them.

Q. But why was there not a written Law to make it Treason for the King to destroy the King, as well as for a man to compass the King's Death?

Resp. Because our ancestors did never imagine, that any king of England would have been so desperately mad, as to levy a War against the Parliament and People; as in the common instances of parricide, the Romans made no law against him that should kill his father, thinking no child would be so unnatural to be the death of him who was the author of his life: but when a child came to be accused for murder, there was a more cruel punishment inflicted than for other homicides; for he was thrown into the sea in a great leathier barrel, with a dog, a jackanapes, a cock, and a viper, significant companions for him, to be deprived of all the elements, as in my "Poor Man's Case," fol. 10. Nor was there any law made against parents who should kill their children; yet if any man was so unnatural, he had an exemplary punishment.

Obj. But is it not a Maxim in law, That the King can do no Wrong?

Resp. For any man to say so, is blasphemy against the great God of Truth and Love: for only God cannot err; because what he wills is right, because he wills it. And it is a sad thing to consider how learned men, for unworthy ends, should use such art to subdue the people, by transportation of their senses, as to make them believe that the law is, That the King can do no Wrong.

First, for Law; I do aver it with confidence, but in all humility, that there is no such case to be found in law, That if the King rob, or murder, or commit such horrid extravagancies, that it is no Wrong. Indeed the case is put in Hen. 7, by a Chief Judge, "That if the King kill a man, it is no felony, to make him suffer death;" that is, to be meant in ordinary courts of justice. But there is no doubt but the parliament might try the king, or appoint others to judge him for it. We find cases in law, that the king hath been sued even in civil actions.—In 43 Edw. 3, 22, it is resolved, That all manner of actions did lie against the King, as against any lord; and 24 Edw. 3, 23, Wilby a learned Judge said, That there was a Writ Præcipe Henrico Regi Angliæ.—Indeed Ed. 1. did make an Act of State, That men should sue to him by Petition; but this was not agreed unto in Parliament: Thelwal. tit. Roye. Digest of Writs, 71. But after, when Judges Places grew great, the Judges and Bitesheeps began to sing lullaby, and speak Placentia to the king, that "my lord the King is an Angel of light:" now angels are not responsible to men, but God, therefore not kings; and the Judges, they begin to make the king a god, and say, That by law his stile is "Sacred Majesty," though he swears every hour; and "Gracious Majesty," though gracious men be the chief objects of his hatred; and that the king hath an omnipotence and an omnipresence.

But I am sure there is no case in law, That if the King levy a War against the Parliament and People, that it is not Treason. Possibly that case in Hen. 7. may prove, That if the king should in his passion kill a man, this shall not be felony to take away the king's life; for the inconveniency may be greater to the people, by putting a king to death for one offence and miserringe, than the execution of justice upon him can advantage them. But what's this to a levying of War against a Parliament? Never any Judge was so devoid of understanding, that he denied that to be Treason. But suppose a judge that held his place at the king's pleasure did so, I am sure never any parliament said so. But what if there had in dark times of Popery been an act made, That the king might murder, ravish, burn, and perpetuate all mischiefs, and play reaks with impunity; will any man that hath but wit enough to measure an ell of cloth, or to tell twenty, say, That this is an obligation for men to stand still, and suffer a monster to cut their throats, and grant commission to rob at Shuter's-hill; as such and no better are all legal thefts and oppressions? The Doctor says, That a Statute against giving an alms to a poor man is void: He is no Student, I mean, was never bound prentice to reason, that says, A King cannot commit Treason against the People.

Obj. But are there not Negative Words in the Statute of 25 Edw. 3, That nothing else shall be construed to be Treason but what is there expressed?

Resp. That Statute was intended for the People's safety, that the King's Judges should not make traitors by the dozens, to gratify the king or courtiers; but it was never meant, to give liberty to the king to destroy the people: and though it be said, that the king and parliament only may declare Treason, yet no doubt if the king will neglect his duty, it may be so declared without him; for when many are obliged to do any service, if some of them fail, the rest must do it.

Obj. But is there any Precedent, that ever any man was put to death that did not offend against some written law? For where there is no law, there is no transgression.

Resp. It is very true, where there is neither law of God, nor nature, nor positive law, there can be no transgression; and therefore that Scripture is much abused, to apply it only to laws positive. For,

1. Ad ea quæ frequentius, &c. It is out of the sphere of all earthly law-givers to comprehend and express all particular cases that may possibly happen, but such as are of most frequent concurrence; particulars being different, like the several faces of men different from one another, else Laws would be too tedious: and as particulars occur, rational men will reduce them to general Reasons of State, so as every thing may be adjudged for the good of the community.

2. The law of England is Lex non Scripta, and we have a direction in the Epistle to the 3 Rep. That when our Law-Books are silent, we must repair to the Law of Nature and Reason. Hollingshead and other historians tells us, That in 30 H. 8, the lord Hungerford was executed for buggery, for which there was then no positive law to make it felony: and before any statute against Witchcraft, many Witches have been hanged in England, because it is death by God's law. If any Italian mountebank should come over hither, and give any man poison that should lie in his body above a year and a day, and then kill him, as it is reported they can give a man poison that shall consume the body in three years: will any make scruple or question to hang up such a rascal? At Naples, the great Treasurer of corn being intrusted with many thousand quarters at three shillings the bushel, for the common good, finding an opportunity to sell it for five shillings, the bushel to foreign merchants, enriched himself exceedingly thereby; and corn growing suddenly dear, the Council called him to account for it, who proffered to allow three shillings for it, as it was delivered into his custody, and hoped thereby to escape: but for so great a breach of trust, nothing would content the people but to have him hanged; and though there was no positive law for it, to make it Treason, yet it was resolved by the best politicians, that it was Treason to break so great a trust by the fundamental constitution of the kingdom, and that for so great an offence he ought to die, that durst presume to enrich himself by that which might endanger the lives of so many citizens; for as Society is so natural, so governors must of necessity and in all reason provide for the preservation and sustenance of the weakest member, he that is but as the little Toe of the Body Politic.

But concerning Ireland, where there were no less than 150,000 men, women, and children, most barbarously and satanically murdered in the first 4 months of the Rebellion, as appeared by substantial proofs, at the King's Bench, at the Trial of Macguire*: if the king had a hand, or but a little-finger in that Massacre, every man will say, Let him die the death: But how shall we be assured of that? How can we know the tree better than by it's fruits? For my own particular, I have spent many serious thoughts about it, and I desire in doubtful cases to give Charity the upper hand; but I cannot in my conscience acquit him of it. Many strong presumptions, and several oaths of honest men, that have seen the king's Commission for it, cannot but amount to a clear proof. If I meet a man running down stairs with a bloody sword in his hand, and find a man stabbed in the chamber; though I did not see this man run into the body by that man which I met, yet if I were of the Jury, I durst not but find him guilty of the murder; and I cannot but admire that any man should deny that for him, which he durst never deny for himself. How often was that monstrous Rebellion laid in his dish! and yet he durst never absolutely deny it. Never was bear so unwillingly brought to the stake, as he was to declare against the Rebels; and when he did once call them Rebels, he would suffer but forty Copies to be printed, and those to be sent to him sealed: And he hath since above forty times called them his Subjects, and his good Subjects; and sent to Ormond to give special thanks to some of these Rebels, as Muskerry and Plunket (which I am confident, by what I see of his height of spirit and undaunted resolution at his Trial and since, acting the last part answerable to the former part of his life; he would rather have lost his life, than to have sent Thanks to two such incarnate devils, if he had not been as guilty as themselves). Questionless if the king had not been guilty of that blood, he would have made a thousand Declarations against these Blood-hounds and Hell-hounds, that are not to be named but with fire and brimstone, and have sent to all princes in the world for assistance against such accursed devils in the shape of men: But he durst not offend those Fiends and Firebrands; for if he had, I verily believe they would soon have produced his Commission under his hand and seal of Scotland at Edinburgh, 1641, a copy whereof is in the Parliament's hands, attested by Oath, dispersed by copies in Ireland, which caused the general rebellion.

Obj. He did not give Commission to kill the English, but to take their Forts, Castles, Towns, and Arms, and come over and help him.

Resp. And is it like all this could be effected without the slaughter of the poor English? Did the king ever call them Rebels, but in forty Proclamations wrung out of him by force, by the Parliament's importunity? Murdering the Protestants was so acceptable to him! And with this limitation, That none should be published without his further directions, as appears under Nichol's hand, now in the Parliament's Custody. But the Scots were proclaimed rebels before they had killed a man, or had an army, and a Prayer against them enjoined in all Churches; but no such matter against the Irish.

Well, when the Rebels were worsted in Ireland, the king makes war here to protect them, which but for his fair words had been prevented; often calling God to witness, he would as soon raise war on his own children: And men from Popish principles assist him. Well! we fought in jest, and were kept between winning and losing; The king must not be too strong, lest he revenge himself; nor the Parliament too strong, for the Commons would rule all; till Naseby fight, that then the king could keep no more days of Thanksgiving so well as we, then he makes a Cessation in Ireland, and many Irish came over to help him: English came over with Papists, who had scarce wiped their swords since they had killed their wives and children, and had their estates.

But thus I argue; The Rebels knew that the king had proclaimed them Traitors, and forty Copies were printed; and the first Clause of an Oath enjoined by the General Council of Rebels, was, "To bear true faith and allegiance to king Charles, and by all means to maintain his royal prerogative, against the Puritans in the Parliament of England." Now, is any man so weak in his intellectuals, as to imagine, that if the Rebels had without the king's command or consent murdered so many Protestants, and he thereupon had really proclaimed them rebels, that they would after this have taken a new oath to have maintained his prerogative? No; those bloody devils had more wit than to fight in jest. If the king had once in good earnest proclaimed them rebels, they would have burnt their scabbards, and would not have stiled themselves the king's and queen's army, as they did. And truly, that which the king said for himself, That he would have adventured himself to have gone in person into Ireland to suppress that Rebellion, is but a poor argument to enforce any man's belief, that he was not guilty of the Massacre; For it makes me rather think, that he had some hopes to have returned at the head of 20 or 30,000 Rebels to have destroyed this nation. For when the earl of Leicester was sent by the Parliament to subdue the Rebels, did not the king hinder him from going? And were not the clothes and provisions which were sent by the Parliament for the relief of the poor Protestants there, seized upon by his command, and his men of war; and sold or exchanged for arms and ammunition to destroy this Parliament? And does not every man know, that the Rebels in Ireland gave Letters of Mart for taking the Parliament's ships, but freed the king's, as their very good friends? And I have often heard it credibly reported, that the king should say, That nothing more troubled him, but that there was not as much Protestant blood running in England and Scotland, as in Ireland. And when that horrid Rebellion began to break forth, how did the Papists here triumph and boast, that they hoped ere long to see London Streets run down in blood? And yet I do not think, that the king was a Papist, or that he designed to introduce the Pope's Supremacy in spiritual things into this kingdom; But thus it was; A Jesuitical party at court was too prevalent in his counsels, and some mungrel Protestants, that less hated the Papists than the Puritans, by the queen's mediation joined all together to destroy the Puritans; hoping that the Papists and the Laodicean Protestants would agree well enough together. And lastly, if it be said, that if the King and the Rebels were never fallen out, what need had Ormond to make a Pacification or Peace with them by the king's commission under the great seal of Ireland? Truly there hath been so much Daubing, and so little Plain-dealing, that I wonder how there comes to be so many beggars.

Concerning the betraying of Rochel, to the enslaving of the protestant party in France, I confess I heard so much of it, and was so shamefully reproached for it in Geneva, and by the Protestant Ministers in France, that I could believe no less than that the king was guilty of it. I have heard fearful exclamations from the French Protestants against the King and the late Duke of Buckingham, for the betraying of Rochel. And some of the ministers told me ten years since, That God would be revenged of the wicked King of England for betraying Rochel. And I have often heard Deodati say, concerning Henry IV. of France, That the Papists had his body, but the Protestants had his heart and soul; but for the king of England, the Protestants had his body, but the Papists had his heart: Not that I think he did believe Transubstantiation, but I verily believe, that he loved a Papist better than a Puritan.

The Duke of Roan, who was an honest gallant man, and the King's godfather, would often say, That all the blood which was shed in Dauphine would be cast upon the king of England's score. For thus it was: The King sent a letter to the Rochellers by sir William Beecher, to assure them, That he would assist them to the uttermost against the French King, for the liberty of their religion; conditionally, That they would not make any peace without him: And Montague was sent into Savoy, and to the d. of Roan, to assure them from the King, That 30,000 men should be sent out of England, to assist them against the French King, in three fleets; one to land in the isle of Rhee, a second in the river of Bourdeaux, and a third in Normandy. Whereupon the duke of Roan being general for the Protestants, not suspecting that the French durst assault him in Dauphine (because the King of England was ready to invade him as he had promised), drew out his army upon disadvantage: Whereupon the French King employed all his army into Dauphine against the Protestants, who were forced to retreat, and the duke of Roan to fly to Geneva, and the Protestants to accept of peace upon very hard conditions, to stand barely at the King's devotion for their liberties, without any cautionary towns of assurance, as formerly they had; being such a peace as the sheep make with the wolves, when the dogs are dismissed. And the Protestants have ever since cried out to this very day, It is not the French King that did us wrong, for then we could have borne it; but it was the King of England, a professed Protestant, that betrayed us. And when I have many times intreated Deodati and others to have a good opinion of the King, he would answer me, That we are commanded to forgive our enemies, but not to forgive our friends.

There is a French book printed about two years since, called "Memoires du Monsieur de Roan;" where the King's horrid perfidiousness, and deep dissimulation, is very clearly unfolded and discovered. To instance but in some particulars: The King having solemnly engaged to the Rochellers, that he would hazard all the forces he had in his three Kingdoms, rather than they should perish; did, in order thereunto, to gain credulity with them, send out eight ships to sea, commanded by sir John Pennington, to assist the Rochellers, as was pretended, but nothing less intended; for Pennington assisted the French King against the Rochellers, which made sir Ferdinando Gorge to go away with the Great Neptune, in detestation of so damnable a plot: And the English masters and owners of ships refusing to lend their ships to destroy the Rochellers, whom with their souls they desired to relieve, Pennington in a mad spite shot at them.

Soubise being Agent here in England for the French Protestants, acquainted the King how basely Pennington had dealt, and that the English ships had mowed down the Rochel ships like grass, not only to the great danger and loss of the Rochellers, but to the eternal dishonour of this nation, scandal of our religion, and disadvantage of the general affairs of all the Protestants in Christendom. The King seems to be displeased, and says, What a Knave is this Pennington! But whether it was not feigned, let all the world judge. But the thing being plain, said Soubise to the king, Sir, why did the English ships assist the French King, and those that would not were shot at by your Admiral? The French Protestants are no fools; how can I make them believe that you intend their Welfare? The King was much put to it for a ready answer, but at last thus it was patched up; that the French King had a design to be revenged of Genoa for some former affront, and that the King lent him eight English ships to be employed for Genoa; and that sailing towards Genoa, they met with some of the Rochellers accidentally, and that the English did but look on and could not help it, not having any commission to fight at that present: Wherein the Rochellers might and would have declined a sea-fight, if they had not expected our assistance. But still the poor Protestants were willing rather to blame Pennington than the King; who in great seeming zeal, being surety for the last peace between the French King and his Protestant subjects, sends Devick to the duke of Roan, to assure him, That if Rochel were not speedily set at liberty (which the French King had beseged, contrary to his agreement), he would employ his whole strength, and in his own person see it performed. Which being not done, then the King sends the Duke of Buckingham to the Isle of Rhee, and gives new hopes of better success to Soubise; commanding the admiral and officers in the fleet, in Soubise's hearing, to do nothing without his advice. But when the duke came to land at the Isle of Rhee, many gallant Englishmen lost their lives, and the duke brought back 300 tons of corn from the Rochellers, which he had borrowed of them, pretending a necessity for the Englishmen, which was but feigned, knowing it was a city impregnable, so long as they had provision within. I confess the Rochellers were not wile, to lend the duke their corn, considering how they had been dealt with. But what a base thing was it so to betray them, and to swear unto them, That they should have corn enough sent from England, before they wanted it! And for a long time, God did miraculously send them in a new kind of fish, which they never had before. But when the Duke came to Court, he made the honest English believe, that Rochel would suddenly be relieved, and that there was not the least danger of the loss of it: but secretary Cook, an honest understanding gentleman, and the only friend at Court to the Rochellers, labouring to improve his power to send some succour to Rochel, was suddenly sent away from court upon some sleeveless errand, as some say to Portsmouth, under colour of providing corn for Rochel: But the Duke soon after went thither, and said, His life upon it, Rochel is safe enough. And the next day, Soubise being at Portsmouth, he pressed the Duke of Buckingham most importunately to send relief to Rochel then or never. The Duke told him, that he had just then heard good news of the 'virtualling of Rochel, which he was going to tell the king: which Soubise making doubt of, the Duke affirmed it by an oath; and having the words in his mouth, he was stabbed by Felton, and instantly died.* The poor Rochellers seeing themselves so betrayed, exclaimed of the English, and were constrained through famine to surrender the city; yet new assurances came from the king to the duke of Roan, that he should never be abandoned, and that he should not be dismayed nor astonished for the loss of Rochel.

But Soubise spoke his mind freely at court, that the English had betrayed Rochel, and that the loss of that city was the apparent perdition and loss of 32 places of strength from the French protestants in Languedoc, Piedmont, and Dauphine: therefore it was thought fit that he should have a fig given him to stop his mouth. Well, not long after, two capuchins were sent into England to kill honest Soubise, and the one of them discovered the other. Soubise rewarded the discoverer, and demanded justice here against the other, who was a prisoner; but by what means you may easily imagine, that assassinate rascal, instead of being whipt, or receiving some more severe punishment, was released, and sent back into France with money in his purse: and one of the messengers that was sent from Rochel to complain of those abominable treacheries, was taken here; and, as the duke of Roan writes, was hanged for some pretended felony or treason: And much more to this purpose may be found in the duke of Roan's memorials. But yet I know many wise, sober, men do acquit the king from the guilt of the loss of Rochel, and lay it upon the duke, as if it were but a loss of his reputation. They say the duke of Buckingham agitated his affairs neither for religion, nor the honour of his master; but only to satisfy his passion in certain foolish vows which he made in France, entered upon a war: and that the business miscarried through ignorance, and for want of understanding to manage so difficult a negotiation, he being unfit to be an admiral or a general.

I confess that for many years I was of that opinion, and thought that the king was seduced by evil counsel; and some thought that Buckingham and others ruled him as a child, and durst do what they list: but certainly he was too politic and subtle a man to be swayed by any thing but his own judgment. Since Naseby Letters, I ever thought him principal in all transactions of state, and the wisest about him but accessaries: he never acted by any implicit faith in state matters: the proudest of them all durst never cross him in any design, when he had once resolved upon it. Is any man so soft-brained to think that the duke of Pennington durst betray Rochel without his command? Would not he have hanged them up at their return, if they had wilfully transgressed his commands? A thousand such excuses made for him, are but like Irish quagmires that have no solid ground or foundation in reason: he was well known to be a great student in his younger days, that his father would say, He must make him a bishop. He had more learning and dexterity in state affairs undoubtedly, than all the kings in Christendom: If he had had grace answerable to his strong parts, he had been another Solomon: but his wit and knowledge proved like a sword in a madman's hand; he was a stranger to the work of grace and the spirit of God: and all those meanders in state, his serpentine turnings and windings, have but brought him to shame and confusion. But I am fully satisfied none of his counsel durst ever advise him to any thing, but what they knew before he resolved to have done; and that they durst as well take a bear by the tooth, as do, or consent to the doing of any thing, but what they knew would please him; they did but hew and square the timber, he was the master builder that gave the form to every architecture: and being so able and judicious to discern of every man's merits, never think that the duke of Pennington, or any judge or officer, did ever any thing for his advantage without his command, against law or honour.

Upon all which premises, may it please your lordship, I do humbly demand and pray the justice of this High Court; and yet not I, but the innocent blood that hath been shed in these three kingdoms, demands justice against him: This blood is vocal, and cries aloud, and yet speaks no better, but much louder than the blood of Abel; for what proportion hath the blood of that righteous man to the blood of so many thousand? If king Ahab and queen Jezebel, for the blood of one righteous Naboth, (who would not sell his inheritance for the full value) were justly put to death; what punishment doth he deserve, that is guilty of the blood of thousands, and sought for a pretended prerogative, that he might have any man's estate that he liked, without paying for it? This blood hath long cried, How long, Parliament, how long, Army, will ye forbear to avenge our blood? Will ye not do justice upon the capital author of all injustice? When will ye take the proud lion by the beard, that defies you with impetuous exultations? What is the House of Commons? What is the Army? As Pharaoh said, "Who is the Lord? And who is Moses? I am not accountable to any power on earth;" those that were murdered at Brentford, knocked on, the head in the water, and those honest souls that were killed in cold blood at Bolton and Liverpool in Lancashire, at Bartonby in Cheshire, and many other places, their blood cries night and day for justice against him; their wives and their children cry, Justice upon the Murderer, or else give us our fathers and husbands again: Nay, should the people be silent, the very stones and timber of the houses would cry for justice against him. But, my lord, before I pray Judgment, I humbly crave leave to speak to two particulars:

1. Concerning the Prisoner. When I consider what he was, and how many prayers have been made for him, though I know that all the world cannot restore him nor save his life, because God will not forgive his temporal punishment; yet if God in him will be pleased to add one example more to the church of his unchangeable love to his elect in Christ, not knowing but that he may belong to the election of grace; I am troubled in my spirit, in regard of his eternal condition, for fear that he should depart this life without love and reconciliation to all those saints whom he hath scorned under the notion of presbyterians, anabaptists, independents and sectaries. It cannot be denied, but that he hath spent all his days in unmeasurable pride; that during his whole reign he hath deputed himself as a God, been depended upon, and adored as God; that he hath challenged and assumed an omnipotent power, an earthly omnipotence, that with the breath of his mouth hath dissolved parliaments; his non placet hath made all the counsels of that supreme court to become abortives. Non curo hath been his motto, who instead of being honoured as good kings ought to be, and no more, hath been idolized and adored, as our good God only ought to be. A man that hath shot all his arrows against the upright in the land, hated Christ in his members, swallowed down unrighteousness, as the ox drinks water; esteemed the needy as his foot-stool, crushed honest public-spirited men, and grieved when he could not afflict the honest more than he did; counted it the best art and policy to suppress the righteous, and to give way to his courtiers so to gripe, grind, oppress and overreach the free people of the land, that he might do what he list (the remembrance whereof would pierce his soul, if he knew the preciousness of it); but all sins to an infinite mercy are equally pardonable: therefore my prayer for this poor wretch shall be, That God would so give him repentance to life, that he may believe in that Christ, whom he hath imprisoned, persecuted, and murdered in the saints; that he which hath lived a tyrant, and hated nothing so much as holiness, may die a convert, and in love to the saints in England; that so the tears of the oppressed and the afflicted may not be as so many fiery stinging serpents, causing an eternal despairing, continual horror to this miserable man, when all tyrants shall be astonished, and innocent blood will affright more than twelve legions of devils. All the hurt that I wish to him, is, that he may look the saints in the face with comfort; for the saints must judge the world: and however it may be, he or his adherents may think it a brave Roman spirit, not to repent of any thing, nor express any sorrow for any sin, though never so horrid, taking more care and fear not to change their countenance upon the scaffold, than what shall become of them after death; yet I beseech your lordship, that I may tell him and all the malignants now living, but this: Charles Stuart, unless you depart this life in love and reconciliation to all those saints and godly men, whom you have either ignorantly or maliciously opposed, mocked, and persecuted, and still scorn and jeer at, as heretics and sectaries, there is no more hopes for you ever to see God in comfort, than for me to touch the Heavens with my finger, or with a word to annihilate this great building, or for the Devil to be saved; which he might be, if he could love a saint as such. No, Sir; it will be too late for you to say to those saints, whom you have defied, Give me some of your holiness, that I may behold God's angry countenance: you can expect no answer, but "Go buy, Sir," of those soul-lucksters, your bishops, which fed you with chaff and poison; and now you must feed upon fire and brimstone to all eternity.

2. Concerning myself, I bear no more malice to the man's person, than I do to my dear father; but I hate that cursed principle of Tyranny, that has so long lodged and harboured within him, which has turned our waters of law into blood. And therefore, upon that malignant principle, I hope this High-Court (which is an habitation of justice, and a royal palace of principles of freedom) will do speedy justice; that this lion which has devoured so many sheep, may not only be removed out of the way, but that this iron scepter, which has been lifted to break this poor nation in pieces like a potter's vessel, may be wrested out of the hands of tyrants: that my honourable clients (for whom I am an unworthy advocate) the people of England, may not only taste, but drink abundantly of those sweet waters of that well of liberty, which this renowned Army hath digged with their swords, which was stopped by the Philistines, the fierce Jew, and uncircumcised Canaanite; the hopes whereof made me readily hearken to the call to this service, as if it had been immediately from heaven, being fully satisfied that the prisoner was long since condemned to die by God's law (which being more noble and antient than any law of man, if there had been a statute that he should not die, yet he ought to be put to death notwithstanding); and that this High Court was but to pronounce the sentence and judgment written against him. And though I might have been sufficiently discouraged, in respect that my reason is far less than others of my profession; yet considering that there are but two things desirable, to make a dumb man eloquent; namely a good cause, and good judges; the first whereof procures the justice of heaven, and the second justice upon earth: and thinking that happily God might make use of one mean man at the bar, amongst other learned counsel, that more of his mind might appear in it (for many times the less there is of man, the more God's glory does appear; and hitherto very much of the mind of God hath appeared in this action), I went as cheerfully about it as to a wedding. And that the glory of this administration may be wholly given to God, I desire to observe, to the praise of his great name, the work of God upon my own spirit in his gracious assistance and presence with me, as a return of prayer, and fruit of faith; believing that God never calls to the acting of any thing so pleasing to him, as this most excellent court of justice is, but he is present with the honourable judges, and those that wait upon them. I have been sometimes of counsel against felons and prisoners, but I never moved the court to proceed to judgment against any felon, or to keep any man in prison, but I trembled at it in my thoughts, as thinking it would be easier to give an account of mercy and indulgence, than of any thing that might look like rigour: but now my spirits are quite of another temper, and I hope it is meat and drink to good men, to have justice done; and recreation to think what benefit this nation will receive by it.

And now, my Lord, I must, as the truth is, conclude him guilty of more transcendent Treasons, and enormous crimes, than all the kings in this part of the world have ever been. And as he that would picture Venus, must take the eyes of one, the cheeks of another beautiful woman, and so other parts, to make a complete beauty; so to delineate an absolute tyrant, the cruelty of Richard the third, and all the subtlety, treachery, deep dissimulation, abominable projects and dishonourable shifts that ever were separately in any that swayed the English sceptre, con-spird together to make their habitation in this whited wall. Therefore I humbly pray, That as he has made himself a precedent in committing such horrid acts, which former kings and ages knew not, and have been afraid to think of, that your lordships and this High-Court, out of your sublime wisdoms, and for justice-sake, would make him an example for other kingdoms for the time to come, that the kings of the earth may hear and fear, and do no more so wickedly; that he, which would not be a pattern of virtue, and example of justice in his life, may be a precedent of justice to others by his death.*

The JOURNAL of the High-Court of Justice, for the TRIAL of King CHARLES THE FIRST, as it was read in the House of Commons, and attested under the Hand of PHELPS, Clerk to that Court; with additions by J. NALSON, LL. D.

An Act of the Commons of England, assembled in Parliament, for erecting of a High Court of Justice, for the trying and judging of Charles Stuart, King of England.

Justice is an excellent virtue:

Reason is the life of the law.

Womanish pity to mourn for a tyrant,

Is a deceitful cruelty to a city.

"The Righteous Judge, whose judgment is not only inevitable, but infallible, must shortly with those many encroachments which his predecessors had made upon the people in their rights and freedoms, hath had a wicked design totally to subvert the antient and fundamental laws and liberties of this nation, and in their place to introduce an arbitrary and tyrannical government; and that besides all other evil ways and means to bring this design to pass, he hath prosecuted it with fire and sword, levied judge me, and all that concurred to bring the capital delinquent to condign punishment; but, in the interim, I desire to be judged by all understanding men in the world, that suffer their judgments to be swayed by reason, and not biassed by private interest, whether ever any man did so much deserve to die. Cain, for the murder of one righteous Abel, and David, for one Uriah, had been men of death, had not God pardoned them. Those thirty-one kings, which Joshua hanged up, and Saul's seven sons, which were but at the worst (as it seems to me) evil counsellors, were they not innocent, nay saints, in comparison of this man? Those that crucified Christ did it ignorantly; for, had they known him, they had not crucified the Lord of glory. The saints, under the ten persecutions, suffered by the hands of the heathens; the Sicilian vespers, the Parisian massacre of the Protestants, and the Gun-Powder and maintained a cruel war in the land, against the parliament and kingdom, whereby the country hath been miserably wasted, the public treasure exhausted, trade decayed, thou-

Plot, were acted and intended by Papists, out of a conceit of merit. But for a Protestant prince, styled 'The Defender of the Faith,' in a time of light, that had sworn to keep the peace, received tribute to that end, and might have had the very hearts of the people; if they could have given him them without death, (the strongest engagement;) I say, for such a one so long to persecute the faithful, destroy and enslave the people by oppressing cruelties; and when Machiavel could not do it, to levy a war to that wicked end, which never any of his ancestors durst attempt; that might at any time with a word of his mouth have stopt all the bleeding veins in the three kingdoms, but would not; and, for the satisfying of a baselust, caused more protestant blood to be shed than ever was spilt, either by Rome heathen or antichristian: blessed God, what ugly sins lodge in their bosoms, that would have had this man to live! But words are but women, proofs are men: it is reason that must be the chariot to carry men to give their concurrence to this judgment: therefore I shall deliver my thoughts to the courteous reader, as I was prepared for it, if issue had been joined in the cause, but with some addition, for illustration's sake, desiring excuse for the preamble, because there is some repetition in matter."

He also made the following Addition at the end:

"Courteous Reader, for thy full satisfaction in matter of law, how the late King was by the law of the land accountable for his tyrannous and traitorous exorbitancies, I refer thee to my Lord President's most learned and judicious speech before the sentence read; and I have one word to add, That High Court was a resemblance and representation of the great Day of Judgment, when the saints shall judge all worldly powers, and where this judgment will be confirmed and admired; for it was not only bonum, but bene; not only good for the matter, but the manner of proceeding. This High Court did not only consult with Heaven for wisdom and direction, (a precedent for other courts to begin every solemn action with prayer), but examined witnesses several days upon oath, to inform their consciences; and received abundant satisfaction in a judicial way (which by the law of the land was not requisite in treason, the prisoner standing mute) as judges, which before was most notorious, and known to them as private persons; and having most perspicuously discerned and weighed the merits of the cause in the balances of the sanctuary, law, and right reason, pronounced as righteous a sentence as ever was given by mortal men. And yet what action was ever so good, but was traduced, not only by unholy men, but by the holy men of the world? That professors sands of people murdered, and infinite other mischiefs committed: For all which high and treasonable offences, the said Charles Stuart might long since justly have been brought to should pray for justice, and then repine at the execution of it: blessed Lord! how does the god of this world storm, now his kingdom is shaking! An enlightened eye must needs see that it is the design of Heaven to break all human glory with an iron sceptre, that will not kiss his golden sceptre, and to exalt justice and mercy in the earth. I confess, if the greater part of the world should approve such high and noble acts of justice, it might be suspected, because the most people will judge erroneously: but that Christians that have fasted and prayed many years for justice, should now be angry to see it done; what is it, but like foolish passengers, that having been long at sea in dangerous storms, as they are entering into the quiet haven, to be mad with the pilot because he will not return into the angry seas? But I shall observe one passage in the Lord President's speech, as a scholar may presume to say a word after his master, concerning the many menaces and minatory dangerous speeches which are given forth concerning this High Court; if men must be killed for the faithful discharge of their duties to God and their country, I am sure the murderer will have the worst of it in conclusion, if he should not be known here, (though murder is a sin that seldom goes unpunished in this world; and never did any jesuit hold it meritorious to kill men for bringing tyrants and murderers to justice, or to do such horrid acts in the sight of the sun). It was a noble saying of the Lord President, That he was afraid of nothing so much as the not doing of justice; and when he was called to that high place which was put upon him, he sought it not, but desired to be excused more than once; not to decline a duty to God and the people, for fear of any loss or danger, (being above such thoughts by many stories, as actions testify), but alledging that of himself, out of an humble spirit, which, if others had said of him, I am sure they had done him a great deal of wrong. And though he might have been sufficiently discouraged, because it was a new unprecedented tribunal of condemning a king, (because never did any king so tyrannize and butcher the people: find me but that in any history, and on the other side the leaf you shall find him more than beheaded, even to be quartered, and given to be meat to the fowls of the air); yet the glory of God and the love of justice constrained him to accept it: and with what great wisdom and undauntedness of resolution, joined with a sweet meekness of spirit, he hath performed it, is most evident to all, the malignants themselves being judges. Concerning this High Court, to speak any thing of this glorious administration of justice, is but to shew the sun with a candle, (the sun of justice now shines most gloriously, and it will be fair weather).

exemplary and condign punishment. Whereas also, the parliament well hoping that the

it had pleased God to deliver him into their their in the nation; but, alas! the poor mole is blind still, and cannot see it; but none so blind as they that will not see it). However, it is not proper or convenient for me at present to speak all the truth that I know (the generations that are to come will call them blessed) concerning the integrity and justice of their proceedings, lest I that am a servant should be counted a sycophant, which I abhor in my soul, as my body does poison: and this I will be bold to say, (which I hope God guides my head to write), this High Court hath cut off the head of a tyrant; and they have done well:

undoubtedly it is the best action that they ever did in all their lives; a matter of pure envy, not hatred; for never shall or can any men in this nation promerit so much honour as these have done, by any execution of justice comparable to this. And, in so doing, they have pronounced sentence, not only against one tyrant, but tyranny itself: therefore, if any of them shall turn tyrants, or consent to set up any kind of tyranny by a law, or suffer any unmerciful of domineering over the consciences, persons, and estates, of the free people of this land, they have pronounced sentence against themselves; but good trees cannot bring forth bad fruits; therefore let all desperate malig-nants repent, ere it be too late, of any such ungodly purposes, and fight no longer against God. Every man is sown here as a seed or grain, and grows up to be a tree; it behoves us all to see in what ground we stand. Holy and righteous men will be found to be timber for the great building of God in his love, when tyrants, and enemies to holiness and justice, will be for a threshold or footstool to be trodden upon, or fit for the fire.

"Lastly, For myself, I bless God, I have not so much fear as comes to the thousandth part of a grain; it is for Cain to be afraid that 'every man that meets him will slay him.' I am not much solicitous whether I die of a consumption, or by the hands of Ravilliacs; I leave that to my heavenly Father. If it be his will that I shall fall by the hand of violence, 'It is the Lord, let him do what he pleaseth.' If my indentures be given in before the term of my apprenticeship be expired, and that I be at my Father's house before it be night, I am sure there is no hurt in all this. If I have but so much time left, I shall pray my Father to forgive the murderer. The blood of Christ can wash away sins of the deepest stain; but when he sees his children's blood sprinkled upon the bloody wretch, he loves every member as he loves himself. But know this, ye that have conceived any desperate intentions against those honourable justices, who made you freemen, unless you will return to Egypt; if God, in wrath to you, and love to any of his people, should suffer you to imbrow your hands in any hands, would have quieted the distempers of the kingdom, did forhear to proceed judicially against him; but found by sad experience, that such their remissness served only to encourage him and his complices in the continuance of their evil practices, and in raising of new commotions, rebellions and invasions:

For prevention therefore of the like or greater inconveniencies, and to the end no chief officer or magistrate whatsoever may hereafter presume traitorously and maliciously to imagine or contrive the enslaving or destroying of the English nation, and to expect impunity for so doing: Be it ordained, and enacted by the Commons in parliament, and it is hereby ordained and enacted by authority thereof, That of their innocent blood, either you will repent, or not; if you repent, it will cost you ten times more anguish and grief of heart, than the pleasure of the sin can cause delight: and what a base thing it is to do that which must be repent of at the best! But if you repent not, it had been better for you to have never been born. But let every man be faithful in doing his duty, and trust God with the success, and rejoice in Christ in the testimony of a good conscience; for he that hath not a soul to lose, hath nothing to lose. But, blessed be God, I have a soul to lose; therefore I desire only to fear him, whom to fear, 'is the beginning of wisdom' and for all malignants to come in, and join with honest men in settling this nation upon noble principles of justice, freedom, and mercy to the poor, will be their best and greatest understanding."

The other was sir John Danvers, the younger brother and heir of the earl of Danby, who was a gentleman of the privy chamber to the king, and being neglected by his brother, and having, by a vain expence in his way of living, contracted a vast debt which he knew not how to pay, and being a proud formal weak man, between being seduced and a seducer, became so far involved in their counsels that he suffered himself to be applied to their worst offices, taking it to be a high honour to sit upon the same bench with Cromwell, who employed and contemned him at once: nor did that party of miscreants look upon any two men in the kingdom with that scorn and detestation, as they did upon Danvers and Mildmay." tenor of their Commission, they accordingly appoint the said Court to be holden in the same place on Wednesday the 10th of the said month of January: and ordered Proclamation thereof to be made in the Great Hall at Westminster by Edward Dendy, serjeant at arms; authorizing him thereunto by precept, under their hands and seals, in these words following, viz.

"By virtue of an Act of the Commons of England, assembled in parliament, for erecting of an High Court of Justice for the trying and judging of Charles Stuart, king of England, we, whose Names are here under written, (being Commissioners, amongst others nominated in the said act) do hereby appoint, That the High Court of Justice, mentioned in the said act, shall be holden in the Painted Chamber in the palace of Westminster, on Wednesday the 10th day of this instant January, by 1 of the clock in the afternoon. And this we do appoint to be notified by public proclaiming hereof in the Great Hall at Westminster to-morrow, being the 9th day of this instant January, betwixt the hours of 9 and 11 in the forenoon. In testimony whereof, we have hereunto set our hands and seals this 8th day of January, Anno Domini 1649."

"We the Commissioners, whose names are hereunto subscribed, do hereby authorize and appoint Edward Dendy, serjeant at arms, to cause this to be proclaimed, according to the tenor thereof, and to make due return of the same, with this Precept, to the said Court, at the time and place above-mentioned.

"E. DENDY, Serjeant at Arms."

And in order to the more regular and due Proceedings of the said Court, they nominate officers; and accordingly chose Mr. Aske, Dr.

Dorislaus*, Mr. Steel, and Mr. Cook †, counsel, to attend the said Court; Mr. Greaves and Mr. John Phelps, clerks; to whom notice thereof was ordered to be given.

Mr. Edward Walford, Mr. John Powell, Mr. John King, Mr. Phineas Payne, and Mr. Hull, are chosen messengers to attend this court.

January 9, 1649, according to the Precept of the 8th instant, serjeant Dendy made Proclamation for the sitting of the said Court in the manner following, viz. About 10 of the clock of the same day the said Serjeant, being attended with six trumpets, and a guard of two troops of horse, himself with them on horseback, bearing his mace, rideth into the middle of Westminster-Hall (the Court of Chancery then sitting at a General Seal), where, after the said trumpets sounding (the drums then likewise beating in the Palace-Yard), he caused the said Precept to be openly read: which being done, the House of Commons, at the same time sitting, order as followeth;

Die Martis, 9 Jan. 1649.

“Ordered by the Commons assembled in Parliament, That the same Proclamation that was made this morning in Westminster-Hall, touching the Trial of the King, be made at the Old Exchange and at Cheapside forthwith, and in the same manner; and that serjeant Dendy, the serjeant at arms, do proclaim the same accordingly; and that the guard that lieth in Paul's do see the same done.”

In pursuance whereof, Serjeant Dendy, about twelve of the clock of the same day, accompanied with ten trumpets, and two troops of horse, drawn out for that purpose in Paul's Church-yard, himself mounted, bearing his Mace, marched from thence unto the Old Exchange, London; where, after the trumpets had sounded, he made Proclamation as he had done before in Westminster-Hall: and from thence immediately marched to Cheapside, making the like Proclamation there also in manner as aforesaid. During all which time all the streets were thronged with spectators, without the least violence, injury, or affront, publicly done or offered.

The Court being sat in the said place aforesaid, began to take into consideration the Manner and Order that they intended to observe at the King's Trial, and appointed two ushers of the Court, viz. Mr. Edward Walford and Mr. Vowel; and Mr. Litchman was chosen a messenger to the Court.

John Bradshaw, * Serjeant at Law, a Commissioner of this Court, was then chosen President of the said Court; who being absent, Mr. Say, one of the Commissioners then present, was appointed President pro tempore, and until the said serjeant Bradshaw should attend the said service. The said Mr. Say accordingly took his place, and gave the thanks of this Court to Mr. Garland, one of the Commissioners of this Court, for his great pains by him formerly taken about the business of this Court.

The Court were informed of the great and important employment that at present lay upon Mr. Greaves, in the behalf of the Commonwealth, from which he cannot be spared, without prejudice to the public; and it was therefore moved in his behalf, That he might be excused from attending the service of one of the Clerks of the said Court; which the Court admitted as a sufficient excuse: And thereupon Mr. Andrew Broughton was named and appointed one of the Clerks of this Court, and John Phelps. The said John Phelps being then sent for by a messenger of the Court, and accordingly making his appearance, was commanded to attend the said service; who attended the same accordingly. And a messenger of the Court was sent to summon the said Mr. Broughton.

Mr. Aske, Mr. Steel, Dr. Dorislaus, and Mr. Cook, are appointed Counsel in the behalf of the Commonwealth, to prepare and pro-

ecute the Charge against the King, according to the Act of the Commons assembled in Parliament in that behalf; and, in particular, the Court did appoint Mr. Steel Attorney, and Mr. Cook Solicitor, to take care thereof. And the Act for constituting the said Court was ordered to be transcribed, and delivered to the said Counsel; which was done accordingly.

Mr. Love, Mr. Lisle, Mr. Millington, Mr. Garland, Mr. Marten, Mr. Tho. Challouer, Sir John Danvers, and Sir Henry Mildmay, or any Two of them, are appointed a Committee, to consider of all circumstances in matter of Order or Method for the carrying on and managing the King's Trial; and for that purpose to advise with the counsel assigned to prove the Charge against the King, and to make report therein the next sitting: And the care of the business is particularly recommended to Mr. Love.

Edward Dendy, Serjeant at Arms, made return of the Precept of the 8th instant, for proclaiming the sitting of the Court; which was received: The said Serjeant Dendy having proclaimed the same by the sound of trumpet in Westminster-Hall, as also at the Old Exchange, and in Cheapside.

Edward Dendy, Serjeant at Arms, is appointed Serjeant at Arms, to attend the said Court: Mr. John King is appointed Cryer of the said Court.

The Court having thus made preparations for the said Trial (during all which time they sat private), the doors are now opened for all parties, that had any thing to do there, to give their attendance. Three Proclamations being made by the Cryer, the Act for constituting the said Court was openly read, and the Court called: The Commissioners present were as before named. The Commissioners that were absent were ordered to be summoned to attend the said service; and summons were issued forth accordingly. The Court adjourned itself till Friday, Jan. 12, at two of the clock in the afternoon, to the same place.

VOL. IV.

Serjeant Bradshaw upon special summons attended this Court, being one of the commissioners thereof. And being, according to former Order, called to take his place of President of the said Court, made an earnest apology for himself to be excused; but therein not prevailing, in obedience to the commands and desires of this Court, he submitted to their order, and took place accordingly. And, thereupon, the said Court ordered concerning him as followeth, viz. "That John Bradshaw, Serjeant at Law, who is appointed President of the Court, should be called by the name, and have the Title of Lord President, and that as well without as within the said Court, during the commission and sitting of the said Court." Against which Title, he pressed much to be heard to offer his exceptions; but was therein over-ruled by the Court.

Mr. Andrew Broughton attended according to former order: and it was thereupon again ordered, That Andrew Broughton and John Phelps, gent. be, and they are hereby constituted Clerks of the said Court, and enjoined to give their attendance from time to time accordingly.

Ordered, That the Counsel assigned, or such as they or any of them shall appoint, shall have power to search for all Records and Writings concerning the king's Trial, and to take into their custody, or order the producing of all such records and papers, or copies thereof, by any clerk, or other person whatsoever, at or before the said Trial, as they shall judge requisite; the said counsel giving a note under their hands of their receipt of all such original books and papers, which they shall so take into their custody. And that the said counsel shall have power to send for such person or persons, at or before the said Trial, and to appoint, by writing under their hands, their attendance for the service of the state in this business, as they shall think requisite, requiring all persons concerned to yield obedience thereunto at their perils.

Sir Hardress Waller, knight, and col. Harrison, are ordered to desire the Lord General from time to time to appoint sufficient Guards, to attend and guard the said Court during their sitting.

Ordered, That col. Tichbourne, col. Roe, Mr. Blackstone, and Mr. Fry, members of this Court, shall and do make preparations for the Trial of the King, That it may be performed in a solemn manner: and that they take care for other necessary provisions and accommodations in and about that Trial; and are to appoint and command such workmen in and to their assistance, as they shall think fit.

Mr. Love reporteth from the committee appointed Jan. 10, instant, to consider of the circumstances in matters of order for Trial of the King: and it is thereupon ordered, That in managing the proceedings in open court, at the time of the King's Trial, none of the court do speak but the President and Counsel: and in case of any difficulty arising to any one, that he speak not to the matter openly, but desire the President that the court may please to advise. By which Order it is not intended that any of the commissioners be debarred, at the examination of any witness, to move the Lord President to propound such question to the witness, as shall be thought meet for the better disquisition and finding out of the truth.

Ordered, That there shall be a marshal to attend this court, if there be cause. That the Lord President and Counsel do manage the Trial against the King, according to instructions to be given them by the Court; and that the Committee for considering of all circumstances for the managing of the King's Trial, do consider of Rules and Instructions in that behalf; and are to consult with the counsel, and address themselves to the Lord President for advice in the premises. That the Counsel do bring in the Charge against the King on Monday next.

The Committee for considering of the circumstances of Order for the King's Trial, together with sir Hardress Waller, col. Whaley, Mr. Scot, col. Tichbourne, col. Harrison, lieutenant. Cromwell, and col. Deane, are appointed to consider of the place for trying the King, and make report to-morrow in the afternoon; and are to meet to-morrow morning in the Inner-Court of Wards, at nine of the clock: and who else of the Court please may be there.

The Court adjourned itself till the morrow in the afternoon, at two of the clock.

Sabbati, 13 Jan. 1649.

Proclamation being made, and all parties concerned required to give attendance, the Court is called openly.

Fifty-six Commissioners present.

Ordered, That the Commissioners of this Court, who have not hitherto appeared, be summoned by warrants, under the hands of the clerks of the Court, to give their personal attendance at this Court, to perform the service to which they are, by act of the Commons of England assembled in parliament, appointed and required.

Ordered, That the Serjeant at Arms attending this Court, or his deputy, do forthwith summon all the aforesaid commissioners, making default, who reside or dwell within twenty miles of London.

Particular warrants to every one of them were accordingly issued forth for their attendance.

Upon report made by col. Hutchinson, from the Committee to consider of the manner of bringing the King to Trial, &c. the Court order as followeth, viz. "Ordered, That sir Robert Cotton's house be the place where the King shall lodge during his Trial. That the chamber in sir Robert Cotton's house, next the study there, shall be the King's bed-chamber. That the great chamber, before the said lodging-chamber, be for the King's dining-room; and that a guard, consisting of thirty officers, and other choice men, do always attend the King, who are to attend him at his lodging above stairs; and that two of the said thirty do always attend in his bed-chamber. That a place for a court of guard, for 200 foot soldiers, be built in sir Robert Cotton's garden, near the water-side. That ten companies of foot be constantly upon the guards, for securing sir Robert Cotton's house; and those companies to be quartered in the Court of Requests, the Painted Chamber, and other necessary places thereabouts. That the passage that cometh out of the Old Palace into Westminster Hall be made up at the entrance of the said passage, next the said guard. That the top of the stairs at the Court of Wards' door have a cross-bar made to it. That the King be brought out of sir Robert Cotton's house to his Trial the lower way into Westminster Hall, and so brought to the bar in the face of the Court, attended by the abovesaid guard above stairs. That two rails, of above forty feet distance from the place where this Court shall sit in Westminster Hall, be made cross the said Hall; for the effectual and substantial doing whereof, this Court do refer it to the care of the committee appointed to consider of the manner of bringing the King to Trial; who are likewise to take care for raising the floor in such part of the Hall as they shall think fit for placing of the guards; and that a rail or rails, from the Court down to the Hall gate, be made, in such manner as they shall think fit, on the Common Pleas' side, to keep the people from the soldiers. That there be guards set upon the leads, and other places that have windows to look into the Hall. That the General be desired, from time to time, to send and appoint convenient guards of horse, for the convenient sitting of the Court. That twenty officers, or other gentlemen, do attend upon the Lord President, from time to time, to and from this Court, through Westminster Hall. That the officers of the Ordnance do send unto this Court 200 halberts, or partizans, lying within the Tower of London, for the arming of the guards that are to attend this Court. That at the time of the Trial of the King, the Commissioners do, before their sitting in the Court, meet in the Exchequer Chamber, and do from thence come up to the Hall into the Court. That all back doors from the house called Hell be stopped up during the King's Trial. That lodgings be prepared for the Lord President at sir Abraham Williams's house, in the New Palace-yard, during the sitting of this Court; and that all provisions and necessaries be provided for his lordship. That sir Henry Mildmay, Mr. Holland, and Mr. Edwards, do take care for providing all provisions and necessaries for the King, during his Trial. That sir Henry Mildmay, Mr. Holland, and Mr. Edwards, do likewise take care for all necessaries for the Lord President."

Ordered, "That the Committee for considering of the manner of bringing the King to Trial, do consider what habits the officers of this Court shall have; who are to advise with some Heralds at Arms therein, and concerning the ordering of the said officers. That a sword be carried before the Lord President at the Trial of the King. That John Humphreys, esq. do bear the sword before the Lord President. That a mace, or maces, together with a sword, be likewise carried before the Lord President."

This Court doth adjourn itself to three of the clock in the afternoon.

Jan. 17, 1649. Post Meridiem.

Three Proclamations. The Court is cleared of strangers; and they sit private.

The Charge against the King is presented by the Counsel, and ordered to be recommitted to the Committee appointed for advice with the counsel concerning the Charge against the King, who are to contract the same, and fit it for the Court's proceeding thereupon, according to the act of parliament in that behalf. And the same committee are likewise to take care for the King's coming to Westminster to Trial, at such time as to them shall seem meet; and lieutenant general Cromwell is added to the said Committee. And the counsel are to attend this Court with the said Charge to-morrow at two o'clock in the afternoon. And thereupon,

Ordered, "That the Committee for considering of the manner of bringing the King to Trial do meet to-morrow morning, at eight o'clock, in the Exchequer Chamber."

The Court adjourned itself till the morrow at two o'clock in the afternoon, to the same place.

Col. Hutchinson reporteth from the Committee appointed to consider of the Habits of the Officers; and it is thereupon ordered, "That three gowns be provided for three Ushers, and three clokes for three Messengers of this Court."

Mr. Millington reported from the committee for advice with the Counsel concerning the Charge against the King, that the Counsel have perfected the Charge, and are ready to present it. He likewise reporteth the Draught of an Order, whereby the Charge may, by the command of this Court, be exhibited, together with a Form of Words, the effect whereof the Committee think fit to be pronounced by him that this Court shall appoint so to exhibit the said Charge: which said Order and Form of Words the Court have with some Alterations agreed unto as followeth:

It is ordered, That Mr. Attorney, and in his absence Mr. Solicitor, do, in the behalf of the People of England, exhibit and bring into this Court a Charge of High Treason, and other High Crimes, against Charles Stuart king of England, and charge him thereupon in the behalf aforesaid.

The Form of Words are as followeth:

"My Lord;

"According to an Order of this High Court to me directed for that purpose, I do in the name and on the behalf of the people of England, exhibit and bring into this Court a Charge of High Treason, and other High Crimes, whereof I do accuse Charles Stuart, King of England, here present. And I do, in the name and on the behalf aforesaid, desire the said Charge may be received accordingly, and due Proceedings had thereupon."

The Counsel likewise, according to Mr. Millington's Report, presented a Draught of the Charge against the King; which was read the first, and second, and third time, and referred back to the said Counsel, to make some small Amendments as to the Form thereof.

Ordered, "That commissary general Ireton, col. Whalley, col. Harrison, sir Hardress Waller, or any two of them, do appoint the 30 persons that are by Order of the 17th instant to attend the King, and the 20 that are to attend the Lord President; and, That the Serjeant at Arms do secure Mr. Squibb's Gallery by such ways and means as he shall conceive meet."

The Court adjourned itself till nine of the clock to-morrow morning.

Sabbati, 20 Jan. 1649.

Three Proclamations, and attendance commanded.

Ordered, That sir Henry Mildmay be desired to deliver unto John Humphreys, esq. the Sword of State in his custody; which said sword the said Mr. Humphreys is to bear before the Lord President of this Court.

The Court being sat as aforesaid, before they engaged in further business, the Serjeant at Arms of the House of Commons came thither, and acquainted the Court, that the House wanted their Members that were of that Court; the Court thereupon adjourned till twelve of the clock the same day.

The Court accordingly met at twelve of the clock: Three Proclamations made.

Ordered, "That the Form and Method of the Court's proceeding unto, and in the reading of the Commission by which they sit, sending for, and bringing in the Prisoner to the bar, acquainting him in brief with the cause of his bringing thither, receiving and reading the Charge, and demanding what the Prisoner says thereto, be referred to the discretion of the Lord President; as also, That in case the Prisoner shall in language or carriage towards the Court be insolent, outrageous, or contemptuous, that it be left to the Lord President to reprehend him thereof, and admonish him of his duty, or to command the taking away of the Prisoner; and if he see cause, to withdraw or adjourn the Court. But as to the Prisoner's putting off his hat, the Court will not insist upon it for this day; and that if the King desire time to answer, the Lord President is to give him time."

Ordered, upon the Lord President's desire and motion, "That Mr. Lisle and Mr. Say, Commissioners of this Court, be assistants to the Lord President; and for that purpose, it is ordered, That they sit near the Lord President in Court."

Mr. Solicitor presented the Charge against the King ingrossed in parchment; which was read, and being by Mr. Solicitor signed, was returned to him to be exhibited against the King, in his presence in open Court. And thereupon the Court adjourned itself forthwith to the Great Hall in Westminster.

THE MANNER OF THE TRIAL OF CHARLES STUART, KING OF ENGLAND.*

On Saturday, being the 20th day of January, 1649, the Lord President of the High

* Kennet says, "Jan. 20. This execrable High Court of Justice met in Westminster-hall; and after reading the Ordinance, the Names of the Commissioners, as Judges, were called over: every man answering to his name as he was called, and the President being first called and making answer, the next who was called being the General, lord Fairfax, and no answer being made, the officer called him the second time, when there was a voice heard that said, 'He had more wit than to be there,' which put the Court into some disorder; and somebody asking who it was? there was no other answer but a little murmuring. But presently when the Impeachment was read, and that expression used, 'Of all the good people of England,' the same voice, in a louder tone, answered, 'No, nor the hundredth part of them;' upon which one of the officers bid the soldiers give fire into that box from whence those presumptuous words were uttered. But it was quickly discerned that it was the General's wife, the lady Fairfax, who had uttered both those sharp sayings; who was presently persuaded or forced to leave the place to prevent any new disorder. Sixty seven commissioners answered to their names; and then the Court commanded the Serjeant at Arms to send for the Prisoner, who was brought up in the face of the Court by colonel Tomlinson, under a strong guard, and delivered to the Serjeant at Arms, who conducted him to the bar, where a crimson velvet chair was set before him."

Whitelocke says, "Some who sate on the scaffolds about the Court at the Trial (particularly the Lady Fairfax the Lord General's wife) did not forbear to exclaim aloud against the proceedings of the High Court, and the irreverent usage of the king by his subjects, inasmuch that the Court was interrupted, and the soldiers and officers of the Court had much to do to quiet the ladies and others," p. 366.

Lord Clarendon after relating this incident,

Court of Justice, his two assistants, and the rest of the Commissioners of the said Court, according to the adjournment of the said Court from the Painted Chamber, came to the bench, or place prepared for their sitting, at the West end of the Great Hall at Westminster; divers officers of the said Court, one-and-twenty gentlemen with partizans, and a sword and mace, marching before them up into the Court, where the Lord President in a crimson velvet chair fixed in the midst of the Court, placed himself, having a desk with a crimson velvet cushion before him; the rest of the members placing themselves on each side of him, upon several seats or benches prepared, and hung with scarlet for that purpose. The Lord President's two assistants sitting next of each side of him, and the two Clerks of the Court placed at a table somewhat lower, and covered with a Turkey carpet; upon which table was also laid the sword and mace, the said guard of partizans dividing themselves on each side of the Court before them.

Three Proclamations are made, for all persons that were adjourned over thither, to draw near. The Court being thus sat, and silence enjoined, the great gate of the Hall was set open to the intent that all persons, without exception, desirous to see or hear, might come unto it; upon which the Hall was presently filled, and silence again ordered and proclaimed. After silence proclaimed as aforesaid, the Act of the Commons of England assembled in Parliament, for erecting a High Court of Justice for trying and judging of Charles Stuart king of England, was openly read by one of the Clerks of the Court. The Act being read, the Court was called, every Commissioner present thereupon rising to his name.

says, that "Lady Fairfax was of a very noble extraction, one of the daughters and heirs of Horace lord Vere of Tilbury; who, having been bred in Holland, had not that reverence for the church of England, as she ought to have had, and so had unhappily concurred in her husband's entering into rebellion, never imagining what misery it would bring upon the kingdom; and now abhorred the work in hand as much as any body could do, and did all she could to hinder her husband from acting any part in it. Nor did he ever sit in that bloody Court, though he was throughout overwitted by Cromwell, and made a property to bring that to pass which could very hardly have been otherwise effected."

This done, the Court command the Serjeant at Arms to send for the Prisoner; and thereupon col. Thomlinson, who had the charge of the Prisoner, within a quarter of an hour's space brought him, attended by col. Hacker, and two-and-thirty officers with partizans, guarding him to the Court, his own servants immediately attending him.

Being thus brought up in the face of the Court, the Serjeant at Arms with his mace receives him, and conducts him strait to the bar, having a crimson velvet chair set before him. After a stern looking upon the Court, and the people in the galleries on each side of him, he places himself in the chair, not at all moving his hat, or otherwise shewing the least respect to the Court; but presently riseth up again, and turns about, looking downwards upon the guards placed on the left side, and on the multitude of spectators on the right side of the said great Hall: the guard that attended him, in the mean time dividing themselves on each side of the Court, and his own servants following him to the bar, stand on the left hand of the Prisoner.

The Prisoner having again placed himself in his chair, with his face towards the Court, and silence being again ordered and proclaimed, the Lord President in the name of the Court addressed himself to the Prisoner, acquainting him, That the Commons of England assembled in parliament, being deeply sensible of the evils and calamities that had been brought upon this nation, and of the innocent blood that had been spilt in it, which was fixed upon him as the principal author of it, had resolved to make inquisition for this blood; and according to the debt they did owe to God, to justice, the kingdom, and themselves, and according to that fundamental power that rested, and trust reposed in them by the people, other means failing through his default, had resolved to bring him to Trial and Judgment; and had therefore constituted that Court of Justice, before which he was then brought, where he was to hear his Charge, upon which the Court would proceed according to justice.

Hereupon Mr. Cook, Solicitor for the Commonwealth, standing within a bar, with the rest of the Counsel for the Commonwealth, on the right hand of the Prisoner, offered to speak; but the Prisoner having a staff in his hand, held it up, and softly laid it upon the said Mr. Cook's shoulder two or three times, bidding him hold. Nevertheless, the Lord President ordering him to go on, Mr. Cook did, according to the order of the Court to him directed, in the name and on the behalf of the people of England, exhibit a Charge of High Treason, and other High Crimes, and did therewith accuse the said Charles Stuart king of England; praying in the name and on the behalf aforesaid, that the Charge might be accordingly received and read, and due Proceedings had thereupon. And accordingly preferred a Charge in writing, which being received by the Court, and delivered to the Clerk of the Court, the Lord President, in the name of the Court, ordered it should be read.

But the King interrupting the reading of it, the Court notwithstanding commanded the Clerk to read it; acquainting the Prisoner, that if he had any thing to say after, the Court would hear him: whereupon the Clerk read the Charge, the tenor whereof is as followeth, viz.

A CHARGE of HIGH-TREASON, and other High Crimes exhibited to the High Court of Justice by John Cook, esq. Solicitor-General, appointed by the said Court, for and on the behalf of the People of England, against CHARLES STUART King of England.

‘ That he the said Charles Stuart being admitted King of England, and therein trusted with a limited power to govern by and according to the laws of the land, and not otherwise; and by his trust, oath and office, being obliged to use the power committed to him, for the good and benefit of the people, and for the preservation of their rights and liberties: yet nevertheless, out of wicked design to erect and uphold in himself an unlimited and tyrannical power to rule according to his will, and to overthrow the rights and liberties of the people; yea, to take away and make void the foundations thereof and of all redress and remedy of misgovernment, which by the fundamental constitutions of this kingdom were reserved on the people's behalf, in the right and power of frequent and successive parliaments or national meetings in council; be the said Charles Stuart, for accomplishment of 'such his designs, and for the protecting of 'himself and his adherents in his and their

'wicked practices, to the same ends, bath trai-
'torously and maliciously levied War against
'the present parliament, and the people therein
'represented. Particularly, upon or about the 'thirtieth day of June, in the year of our Lord
'1642, at Beverly in the county of York; and 'upon or about the 30th day of July in the 'year aforesaid, in the county of the city of 'York; and upon or about the 24th day of 'August in the same year, at the county of 'the town of Nottingham, where and when he 'set up his standard of war; and also on or 'about the 23d day of October, in the same 'year, at Edge-hill and Keynton-field, in the 'county of Warwick; and upon or about the '30th day of November in the same year, at 'Brentford in the county of Middlesex; and 'upon or about the 30th day of August, in the 'year of our Lord 1643, at Caversham-Bridge 'near Reading, in the county of Berks; and 'upon or about the 30th day of October in the 'year last mentioned, at or near the city of 'Gloicester; and upon or about the 30th day 'of November in the year last mentioned at 'Newbury in the county of Berks; and upon 'or about the 31st day of July, in the year of 'the 30th day of November in the year last

'mentioned, at Newbury aforesaid; and upon 'or about the 8th day of June, in the year of 'our Lord 1645, at the town of Leicester; and 'also upon the 14th day of the same month in 'the same year, at Naseby-Field in the county
'of Northampton: at which several times and 'places, or most of them, and at many other 'places in this land, at several other times 'within the years afore-mentioned, and in the 'year 1646, be the said Charles Stuart hath 'caused and procured many thousands of the 'free people of this nation to be slain; and by 'divisions, parties, and insurrections within
'this land, by invasions from foreign parts, en'deavoured and procured by him, and by many
'other evil ways and means, he the said Charles
'Stuart hath not only maintained and carried 'on the said war both by land and sea, during 'the years before mentioned, but also hath re'newed or caused to be renewed the said war 'against the parliament and good people of 'this nation, in this present year 1648, in the 'counties of Kent, Essex, Surrey, Sussex, Mid-
'dleser, and many other places of England and 'Wales; and also by sea. And particularly,
'he the said Charles Stuart hath for that pur'pose given commission to his son the Prince,
'and others; whereby, besides multitudes of 'other persons, many such as were by the par'liament intrusted and employed for the safety 'of the nation, (being by him or his agents cor'rupted to the betraying of their trust, and re'volting from the parliament) have had enter'tainment and commission for the continuing 'and renewing of war and hostility against the 'said parliament and people as aforesaid. By 'which cruel and unnatural wars by him the 'said Charles Stuart levied, continued and re'newed as aforesaid, much innocent blood of 'the free people of this nation hath been spilt,

'many families have been undone, the public
'treasury wasted and exhausted, trade ob'structed and miserably decayed, vast expence
'and damage to the nation incurred, and many 'parts of this land spoiled, some of them even
'to desolation. And for further prosecution 'of his said evil designs, he the said Charles
'Stuart doth still continue his commissions to 'the said Prince and other rebels and revolters
'both English and foreigners, and to the earl 'of Ormond, and to the Irish rebels and re-
'volters associated with him; from whom fur'ther invasions upon this land are threatened,
'upon the procurement and on the behalf of 'the said Charles Stuart.

'All which wicked designs, wars and evil
'practices of him the said Charles Stuart, have 'been and are carried on for the advancement 'and upholding of a personal interest of will
'and power, and pretended prerogative to him'self and his family, against the public interest,
'common right, liberty, justice and peace of 'the people of this nation, by and for whom 'he was intrusted as aforesaid.

'By all which it appeareth, that he the said
'Charles Stuart hath been, and is the occa-
'sioner, author, and continuer of the said un'natural, cruel and bloody wars, and therein
'guilty of all the treasons, murders, rapines,
'burnings, spoils, desolations, damages and 'mischiefs to this nation acted and committed
'in the said wars, or occasioned thereby.

'And the said John Cook by protestation 'saving, on the behalf of the said people of 'England, the liberty of exhibiting at any time
'hereafter any other charge against the said
'Charles Stuart, and also of replying to the 'answers which the said Charles Stuart shall 'make to the premises, or any of them, or any 'other charge that shall be so exhibited; doth
'for the said Treasons and Crimes, on the be'half of the said people of England, impeach
'the said Charles Stuart, as a Tyrant, Traitor,
'Murderer, and a public and implacable Enemy
'to the Commonwealth of England; and pray
'that the said Charles Stuart, King of England,
'may be put to answer all and every the pre-
'misses; and that such proceedings, examina'tions, trials, sentences and judgments may be
'thereupon had, as shall be agreeable to jus'tice. (Subscribed) JOHN COOK.'

The Prisoner, while the Charge was reading, sat down in his chair, looking sometimes on the High-Court, and sometimes on the Galleries; and rose again, and turned about to behold the guard and spectators, and after sat down, looking very sternly, and with a countenance not at all moved, till these words, viz.
Charles Stuart to be a Tyrant, Traitor, &c.

were read; at which he laughed, as he sat, in the face of the Court.

The Charge being read, the Lord President, in the name of the Court, demanded the Prisoner's Answer thereto.

But the Prisoner declining that, fell into a discourse of the late Treaty in the Isle of Wight, and demanded, by what lawful authority he was brought from the Isle thither? Upbraiding the Court with the many unlawful Authorities in the world, instancing in robbers and takers of purses; pleading his Kingship, and thereby a trust committed to him by God by descent, which he should betray, together with the Liberties of the People, in case he should answer to an unlawful power, which he charged the Court to be, and that they were raised by an Usurped Power: and affirmed, that he stood more for the liberties of the People, than any of the Judges there sitting: and again demanded, by what authority he was brought thither?

To which it was replied by the Court, That had he been pleased to have observed what was declared to him by the Court at his first coming, and the Charge which he had heard read unto him, he might have informed himself by what authority he was brought before them; namely, by the Authority of the Commons of England assembled in parliament, on the behalf of the people of England: and did therefore again several times advise him to consider of a better Answer: which he refused to do, but persisted in his contumacy. Whereupon the Court at length told him, That they did expect from him a positive Answer to the Charge; affirming their authority, and giving him to understand, that they were upon God's and the Kingdom's Errand, and that the peace stood for would be better had and kept when justice was done, and that was their present work: and advised him seriously to consider what he had to do at his next appearance; which was declared should be upon Monday following, and so remanded him to his former custody.

The Prisoner all the time having kept on his hat, departed, without shewing any the least respect to the Court: but going out of the bar, said 'He did not fear that Bill;' pointing to the table where the Sword and Charge lay.

The Prisoner being withdrawn, three Proclamations were made, and the Court adjourned itself to the Painted Chamber on Monday morning then next at nine of the clock; declaring, that from thence they intended to adjourn to the same place again.

[But that the Reader may have the intire Relation of this deplorable Tragedy, I have from the most Authentic Prints inserted at large the interlocutory Passages between the King and Bradshaw, of which Mr. Phelps in his Journal gives only a succinct Account; which take as follows]

His Majesty with his wonted patience heard all these slanders and reproaches, sitting in the Chair, and looking sometimes on the pretended Court, sometimes up to the Galleries;

and rising again, turned about to behold the Guards and Spectators: then he sat down, with a majestic and unmoved countenance, and sometimes smiling, especially at those words, 'Tyrant, Traitor,' and the like.

Also the silver head of his staff happened to fall off, at which he wondered: and seeing none to take it up, he stooped for it himself.

The Charge being read,

Bradshaw began: Sir, You have now heard your Charge read, containing such matters as appear in it; you find, that in the close of it, it is prayed to the Court, in the behalf of the Commons of England, that you answer to your Charge. The Court expects your Answer.

King. I would know by what power I am called hither; I was not long ago in the Isle of Wight; how I came there, is a longer story than I think is fit at this time for me to speak of; but there I entered into a Treaty with both houses of Parliament, with as much public faith as it is possible to be had of any people in the world. I treated there with a number of honourable Lords and Gentlemen, and treated honestly and uprightly; I cannot say but they did very nobly with me, we were upon a conclusion of the Treaty. Now I would know by what authority, I mean lawful; there are many unlawful Authorities in the world, Thieves and Robbers by the highways; but I would know by what authority I was brought from thence, and carried from place to place, and I know not what: and when I know by what lawful authority, I shall answer. Remember I am your King, your lawful King, and what sins you bring upon your heads, and the judgment of God upon this Land; think well upon it, I say, think well upon it, before you go further from one sin to a greater: therefore let me know by what lawful Authority I am seated here, and I shall not be unwilling to answer. In the mean time I shall not betray my trust; I have a trust committed to me by God, by old and lawful descent, I will not betray it, to answer to a new unlawful Authority: therefore resolve me that, and you shall hear more of me.

Bradshaw. If you had been pleased to have observed what was hinted to you by the Court, at your first coming hither, you would have known by what Authority; which Authority requires you, in the name of the people of England, of which you are elected King, to answer.

King. No, Sir, I deny that.

Bradshaw. If you acknowledge not the Authority of the Court, they must proceed.

King. I do tell them so, England was never an elective kingdom, but an Hereditary Kingdom for near these thousand years: therefore let me know by what authority I am called hither: I do stand more for the Liberty of my People than any here that come to be my pretended Judges: and therefore let me know by what lawful Authority I am seated here, and I will answer it, otherwise I will not answer it.

Bradshaw. Sir, How well you have managed your trust, is known: your way of Answer is to interrogate the Court, which becomes not you in this condition. You have been told of it twice or thrice.

King. Here is a gentleman, Lieutenant-col. Cobbet; ask him, if he did not bring me from the Isle of Wight by force. I do not come here as submitting to the Court: I will stand as much for the Privilege of the House of Commons, rightly understood, as any man here whatsoever. I see no House of Lords here, that may constitute a Parliament; and the King too should have been. Is this the bringing of the King to his Parliament? Is this the bringing an end to the Treaty in the public faith of the world? Let me see a legal Authority warranted by the Word of God the Scriptures, or warranted by the Constitutions of the Kingdom, and I will answer.

Bradshaw. Sir, you have propounded a question, and have been answered. Seeing you will not answer, the Court will consider how to proceed: in the mean time, those that brought you hither, are to take charge of you back again. The Court desires to know, whether this be all the Answer you will give, or no.

King. Sir, I desire that you would give me, and all the world, satisfaction in this; let me tell you, it is not a slight thing you are about. I am sworn to keep the peace, by that duty I owe to God and my country, and I will do it to the last breath of my body; and therefore you shall do well to satisfy first God, and then the country, by what authority you do it: if you do it by an usurped authority, you cannot answer it. There is a God in heaven, that will call you, and all that give you power, to account. Satisfy me in that, and I will answer; otherwise I betray my trust, and the Liberties of the People: and therefore think of that, and then I shall be willing. For I do avow, that it is as great a sin to withstand lawful authority, as it is to submit to a tyrannical or any other ways unlawful authority: and therefore satisfy God and me, and all the world in that, and you shall receive my Answer. I am not afraid of that Bill.

Bradshaw. The Court expects you should give them a final Answer, their purpose is to adjourn to Monday next: if you do not satisfy yourself, though we do tell you our authority; we are satisfied with our authority, and it is upon God's authority and the kingdom's, and that peace you speak of will be kept in the doing of justice, and that is our present work.

King. For answer, let me tell you, you have shewn no lawful authority to satisfy any reasonable man.

Bradshaw. That is in your apprehension; we are satisfied that are your Judges.

King. It is not my apprehension, nor yours neither, that ought to decide it.

Bradshaw. The Court hath heard you, and you are to be disposed of as they have commanded.

So commanding the Guard to take him away, his majesty only replied. 'Well, Sir!' And at his going down, pointing with his Staff towards the Sword*, he said, 'I do not fear that.' As he went down the stairs, the people in the hall cried out, 'God save the King!' notwithstanding some were set there by the faction to lead the clamour for justice. [Nelson].

Painted Chamber, 22 Jan. 1649 †.

Commissioners present:

* It is Bill in Phelps's Journal: which Bill was the Charge, and lay near the Sword of State.

† "On this day the Commissioners from the Estates of the Parliament of Scotland, residing in London, having received no Answer to their Letter sent the 6th, to the Speaker of the house of commons, on occasion of the Act for erecting a High Court of Justice for the Trial of the King; they this day sent a second Letter in which was enclosed the following Protestation:

"By our Letter of the 6th instant, we represented unto you what endeavours have been used for taking away his majesty's life; for change of the fundamental government of this kingdom; and introducing a sinful and ungodly toleration in matters of Religion: and therein we did express our sad thoughts and great fears of the dangerous consequences that might follow thereupon; and, further, we did earnestly press, that there might be no proceeding against his majesty's person; which would certainly continue the great distractions of these kingdoms, and involve us in many evils, troubles, and confusions; but that, by the free councils of both houses of the parliament of England, with the advice and consent of the parliament of Scotland, such course might be taken in relation to him, as might be for the good and happiness of these kingdoms, both having an unquestionable and undeniable interest in his person as king of both; which, duly considered, we had reason to hope should have given a stop to all proceedings against his majesty's person.

—But we understand that, after many of the members of the house of commons have been imprisoned and secluded; and also without and against the consent of the house of peers, power is given, by a single act of yours alone, to certain persons of your own number, of the Army, and others, to proceed against his majesty's person; in order whereunto he was brought, upon Saturday last in the afternoon, before this new extraordinary court: Therefore we do, in the name of the parliament of Scotland, for their vindication from false aspersions and calumnies, declare, That though they are not satisfied with his majesty's Concessions in the late Treaty at Newport, especially in the matters of Religion: and are resolved not to crave his majesty's restitution to his government, before Satisfaction be given by him to his kingdoms; yet they do all unanimously, with one voice (not one member excepted) disclaim the least knowledge of, or accession to, the late proceedings of the ‘ Army here against his majesty ; and sincerely profess, that it will be a great grief unto their hearts, and lie heavy upon their spirits, if they shall see their trusting of his majesty’s person to the honourable houses of the parliament of England, to be made use of to his ruin ; so far contrary to the declared intentions of the kingdom of Scotland, and the solemn professions of the kingdom of England. —And to the end it may be manifest to the world, how much they abominate and detest so horrid a design against his majesty’s person, we do, in the name of the parliament and kingdom of Scotland, hereby declare their Dissent from the said proceedings, and the taking away his majesty’s Life ; and protest, That as they are altogether free from the same, so they may be free from all the evils, miseries, confusions and calamities, that may follow thereupon to these distracted kingdoms. LOTHIAN. Jan. 22. WILL. GLENDINNING.

‘ The foregoing Paper, &c. being read, the house ordered, That they should all be referred to a committee, who were to prepare an Answer thereto, and to consider of fit persons to be sent to the parliament of Scotland. These Papers were also presented to the Lord-General.

‘ Feb. 12. Letters came this day from Edinburgh, advising that Prince Charles was proclaimed King of Scotland by the whole parliament there, with great solemnity.

‘ Feb. 24. It has been already observed, that the parliament of Scotland had proclaimed Prince Charles for their king, and sent a deputation to inform him of it ; and that the house had since published their Answer to the Scots Commissioners Letters, presented in January last. This day those Commissioners sent another Paper, directed to the Speaker, which is not given us in the Journals. Mr. Whitelocke tells us, ‘ That the Speaker acquainted the house this day with a Letter the Scots Commissioners sent him, at their going away, which was without taking leave.’ And adds, ‘ It was full of bitterness against the parliament and their late proceedings against the king, the house of lords, and the secluded Members.’—How highly the commons were affronted at this Remonstrance sufficiently appears from the following Declaration, passed on the 26th of this month ; which they ordered to be forthwith printed and published.

‘ The parliament having received a Paper, dated February 24, subscribed by the earl of Lothian, sir John Chiesley, and Mr. Glendinning, in the name of the kingdom of Scotland, and taking the same into their serious consideration : they do declare, That the said

‘ Paper doth contain much scandalous and reproachful matter against the just proceedings of this parliament ; and an assuming on the behalf of that kingdom, to have a power over the laws and government of this nation, to the high dishonour thereof ; and lastly, a design in the contrivers and subscribers of it, to raise sedition and lay the grounds of a new and bloody war in this land ; that, under the specious pretences in that Paper contained, they may gain advantages to second their late perfidious invasion. And it is further declared, That all persons whatsoever, residing in England or Ireland, or the dominions thereof, that shall join with, or adhere unto, or voluntarily aid or assist, the said contrivers and Subscribers, or any whosever of the kingdom of Scotland, in pursuance of the grounds by them laid in the same Paper, for raising sedition and a new and bloody war in this land, are rebels and traitors to the Commonwealth of England ; and shall be proceeded against as traitors and rebels.

H. SCOBELL, Cler. Par.’

‘ Besides publishing this Declaration, the house ordered, That the Commissioners should have a guard set upon their lodging, to secure them from violence ; and also to restrain them from communication with any by whom the sedition, contained in their Paper, might be promulgated : and that none be suffered to have access to them, or to pass out from them, but for their supply with necessaries during their abode here. It was also ordered, That a message with a duplicate of the foregoing Remonstrance, be sent to the parliament and kingdom of Scotland, To know whether they do or will own and justify what hath been presented to this parliament in their names.

‘ Feb. 28. In consequence of the above Orders, the commons were this day informed that the Scots Commissioners had been apprehended at Gravesend, as they were embarking on their return home, and were now under a guard ; hereupon, it being put to the question, Whether to send them back to Scotland by land, so guarded ? it passed in the affirmative.”

Sixty-two Commissioners present.

Here the Court sit private.

Ordered, That the Committee for nominating the Officers of this Court, together with the Committee for nominating the Guards, do consider of an allowance for Diet of the Officers, and what other satisfaction they shall have for their service.

Col. Harvey informed the Court, That he was desired to signify unto this Court, in the behalf of Mr. John Corbet, member of this Court, that his absence is not from any disaffection to the proceedings of this Court, but in regard of other especial employment that he hath in the service of the state.

Here the Court considered of the King's carriage on the Saturday before, and of all that had then passed on the Court's behalf, and approved thereof, as agreeing to their sense and directions. And perceiving what the king aimed at, viz. to bring in question, if he could, the jurisdiction of the Court, and the authority whereby they sat; and considering that he had not in the interim acknowledged them in any sort to be a Court, or in any judicial capacity to determine of his demand and plea, and that through their sides he intended to wound, if he might be permitted, the supreme authority of the commons of England, in their representative, the commons assembled in parliament; after advice with their Counsel learned in both Laws, and mature deliberation had of the matter,

Resolved, That the Prisoner should not be suffered to bring these things in question which he aimed at, touching that Highest Jurisdiction; whereof they might not make themselves Judges, and from which there was no Appeal. And therefore order and direct, viz.

Ordered, That in case the King shall again offer to fall into that discourse, the Lord President do let him know, That the Court have taken into consideration his demands of the last day, and that he ought to rest satisfied with this Answer, 'That the Commons of England assembled in Parliament have constituted this Court, whose power may not, nor should be permitted to be disputed by him, and that they were resolved he should answer his Charge.'—That in case he shall refuse to answer, or acknowledge the Court, the Lord President do let him know, that the Court will take it as a Contumacy, and that it shall so be recorded.—That in case he shall offer to answer with a Saving, notwithstanding of his pretended prerogative, that the Lord President do in the name of the Court refuse his Protest, and require his positive Answer to the Charge. That in case the king shall demand a copy of the Charge, that he shall then declare his intention to answer; and that declaring such his intention, a copy be granted unto him. That in case the king shall still persist in his contempt, the Lord President do give command to the Clerk to demand of the King in the name of the Court, in these words following, viz.

'Charles Stuart, king of England, you are accused in behalf of the People of England of divers High Crimes and Treasons, which Charge hath been read unto you; the Court requires you to give a positive Answer, whether you confess or deny the Charge; having determined, that you ought to answer the same.'

Ordered, That the Commissioners shall be called in open Court, at the Court's sitting in the Hall, and that the names of such as shall appear shall be recorded.

Hereupon the Court forthwith adjourned itself unto Westminster Hall.

Westminster Hall, 22 Jan. 1649.

Post Meridiem.

The Commissioners coming from the Painted Chamber, take their place in the public Court, in Westminster Hall, as on Saturday before; and being sat, and the Hall door set open, three Proclamations were made for all persons that were adjourned over to this time, to give their attendance, and for all persons to keep silence, upon pain of imprisonment: the Court is thereupon called.

Seventy Commissioners present.

The Court being called, the Serjeant is commanded to fetch his Prisoner.

The King is again brought Prisoner to the bar, as on Saturday before; proclamation is made for silence, whilst pleas of the commonwealth were in hand, and order given to the Captain of the Guard to take into his custody such as should disturb the Court.

Mr. Solicitor moved the Court, that the Prisoner might give a positive Answer to his Charge, or otherwise that the Court would take the matter of it pro confesso, and proceed thereupon according to justice. Which being pressed by the Court upon the Prisoner, and their Judgment again made known unto him, That he was to answer his Charge, otherwise his contumacy would be recorded:

The Prisoner, notwithstanding, still insisted upon his former Plea, and that the Court had no power, nor the Commons of England, who had constituted it, to proceed against him. Upon which the Clerk of the Court, by command, and according to former order, required his Answer in the form prescribed; and the Prisoner still refusing to submit thereto, his default and contempt were again recorded, the Prisoner remanded, and the Court adjourned itself to the next day, being Tuesday, at twelve of the clock, to the Painted Chamber; withal giving notice, That from thence they intended to adjourn to this place again.

[Sunday having been spent in Fasting and seditious Preaching, according to the mode of these impious Hypocrites, who used to preface Rebellion and Murder with the appearance of Religion, the illustrious Sufferer was (as is before in Phelps's Journal related) placed before the infamous Tribunal, where their mercenary Solicitor Cook opened the tragic scene, thus displaying his talents of impudence and treason.] Nelson.

Cook. May it please your lordship, my Lord President; I did at the last Court, in the behalf of the Commons of England, exhibit and give into this Court a Charge of High Treason, and other High Crimes against the Prisoner at the Bar; whereof I do accuse him in the name of the People of England; and the Charge was read unto him, and his Answer required. My Lord, he was not pleased to give an Answer, but instead of answering, did there dispute the Authority of this High Court. My humble motion to this High Court, in the behalf of the kingdom of England, is, That the Prisoner may be directed to make a positive Answer, either by way of Confession or Negation; which if he shall refuse to do, that then the, matter of Charge may be taken pro confesso, and the Court may proceed according to justice.

Bradshaw. Sir, you may remember, at the last Court you were told the occasion of your being brought hither, and you heard a Charge read against you, containing a Charge of High Treason and other High Crimes against this realm of England: you heard likewise, that it was prayed, in the behalf of the people, that you should give an Answer to that Charge, that thereupon such Proceedings might be had as should be agreeable to Justice. You were then pleased to make some scruples concerning the Authority of this Court, and knew not by what Authority you are brought hither: you did divers times propound your Questions, and were as often answered, That it was by Authority of the Commons of England, assembled in Parliament, that did think fit to call you to account for those high and capital Misdemeanours wherewith you were then charged. Since that, the Court hath taken into consideration what you then said; they are fully satisfied with their own Authority, and they hold it fit you should stand satisfied with it too; and they do require it, that you do give a positive and particular Answer to this Charge that is exhibited against you: they do expect you should either confess or deny it; if you deny, it is offered, in the behalf of the kingdom, to be made good against you; their Authority they do avow to the whole world, that the whole Kingdom are to rest satisfied in, and you are to rest satisfied with it. And therefore you are to lose no more time, but to give a positive Answer thereunto.

King. When I was here last, 'tis very true, I made that Question; and if it were only my own particular case, I would have satisfied myself with the Protestation I made the last time I was here against the legality of this Court, and that a King cannot be tried by any superior jurisdiction on earth: but it is not my case alone, it is the Freedom and the Liberty of the People of England; and do you pretend what you will, I stand more for their Liberties. For if Power without Law may make Laws, may alter the Fundamental Laws of the Kingdom, I do not know what subject he is in England that can be sure of his life, or any thing that he calls his own: therefore when that I came here, I did expect particular Reasons to know by what Law, what Authority you did proceed against me here. And therefore I am a little to seek what to say to you in this particular, because the Affirmative is to be proved, the Negative often is very hard to do: But since I cannot persuade you to do it, I shall tell you my Reasons as short as I can.

My Reasons why in conscience and the duty I owe to God first, and my People next, for the preservation of their Lives, Liberties and Estates, I conceive I cannot answer this, till I be satisfied of the legality of it. All Proceedings against any man whatsoever—

Bradshaw. Sir, I must interrupt you, which

I would not do, but that what you do is not agreeable to the Proceedings of any Court of Justice: You are about to enter into argument, and dispute concerning the Authority of this Court, before whom you appear as a Prisoner, and are charged as an high Delinquent; if you take upon you to dispute the Authority of the Court, we may not do it, nor will any Court give way unto it: you are to submit unto it; you are to give a punctual and direct Answer, whether you will answer your Charge or no, and what your Answer is.

King. Sir, by your favour, I do not know the Forms of Law; I do know Law and Reason, though I am no lawyer professed, but I know as much law as any gentleman in England: and therefore (under favour) I do plead for the Liberties of the People of England more than you do: And therefore if I should impose a belief upon any man, without Reasons given for it, it were unreasonable; but I must tell you, that by that Reason that I have, as thus informed, I cannot yield unto it.

Bradshaw. Sir, I must interrupt you, you may not be permitted: you speak of Law and Reason, it is fit there should be Law and Reason, and there is both against you. Sir, the Vote of the Commons of England assembled in Parliament, it is the Reason of the kingdom, and they are these too that have given that law, according to which you should have ruled and reigned. Sir, you are not to dispute our Authority, you are told it again by the Court. Sir, it will be taken notice of, that you stand in contempt of the Court, and your Contempt will be recorded accordingly.

King. I do not know how a King can be a Delinquent; but by any law that ever I heard of, all men (Delinquents, or what you will) let me tell you they may put in Demurrers against any Proceeding as legal: and I do demand that, and demand to be heard with my Reasons; if you deny that, you deny Reason.

Bradshaw. Sir, you have offered something to the Court; I shall speak something unto you, the Sense of the Court. Sir, neither you nor any man are permitted to dispute that point; you are concluded, you may not demur to the Jurisdiction of the Court; if you do, I must let you know, that they over-rule your Demurrer; they sit here by the Authority of the Commons of England, and all your predecessors and you are responsible to them.

King. I deny that; shew me one Precedent.

Bradshaw. Sir, you ought not to interrupt while the Court is speaking to you. The point is not to be debated by you, neither will the Court permit you to do it; if you offer it by way of Demurrer to the Jurisdiction of the Court, they have considered of their Jurisdiction, they do affirm their own Jurisdiction.

King. I say, Sir, by your favour, that the Commons of England was never a Court of Judicature; I would know how they came to be so.

Bradshaw. Sir, you are not to be permitted to go on in that Speech and these Discourses.

Then the Clerk of the Court read,
'Charles Stuart, King of England, You have been accused on the behalf of the People of England of High Treason, and other High Crimes; the Court have determined that you ought to answer the same.'

King. I will answer the same, so soon as I know by what authority you do this.

Bradshaw. If this be all that you will say, then, Gentlemen, you that brought the Prisoner hither, take charge of him back again.

King. I do require that I may give in my Reasons why I do not answer, and give me time for that.

Bradshaw. Sir, 'tis not for Prisoners to require.

King. Prisoners! Sir, I am not an ordinary Prisoner.

Bradshaw. The Court hath considered of their Jurisdiction, and they have already affirmed their Jurisdiction; if you will not answer, we will give order to record your Default.

King. You never heard my Reason yet.

Bradshaw. Sir, your Reasons are not to be heard against the highest Jurisdiction.

King. Shew me that Jurisdiction where Reason is not to be heard.

Bradshaw. Sir, we shew it you here, the Commons of England; and the next time you are brought, you will know more of the pleasure of the Court; and it may be, their final determination.

King. Shew me where ever the House of Commons was a Court of Judicature of that kind.

Bradshaw. Serjeant, take away the Prisoner.

King. Well, Sir, remember that the King is not suffered to give in his Reasons for the Liberty and Freedom of all his Subjects.

Bradshaw. Sir, you are not to have liberty to use this Language: how great a friend you have been to the Laws and Liberties of the People, let all England and the world judge.

King. Sir, under favour, it was the Liberty, Freedom, and Laws of the Subject, that ever I took—defended myself with Arms; I never took up Arms against the People, but for the Laws.

Bradshaw. The command of the Court must be obeyed; no Answer will be given to the Charge.

King. Well, Sir!

Then Bradshaw ordered the Default to be recorded, and the Contempt of the Court; and that no Answer would be given to the Charge.

The king was guarded forth to sir Robert Cotton's house.

The Court adjourned to the Painted Chamber on Tuesday at twelve of the clock, and from thence they intend to adjourn to Westminster-hall; at which times all persons concerned are to give their attendance.

[His Majesty not being suffered to deliver his Reasons* against the Jurisdiction of their pretended Court, by word of mouth, thought fit to leave them in Writing to the more impartial judgment of posterity, as followeth:]

‘ Having already made my Protestations, not only against the illegality of this pretended

‘ Court, but also, That no earthly power can justly call me (who am your king) in question, as a Delinquent; I would not any more open my mouth upon this occasion, more than to refer myself to what I have spoken, were I in this case alone concerned: but the

* These Reasons are abridged in Rapin’s History of England, and accompanied by the following Passages relating to this Trial:

I. “ The high court of justice observed the same rules in trying the king, as in judging a common malefactor, there being no precedent of such a trial.

II. “ The principal article of the accusation was, that the king had levied war against the parliament, which was undeniable. The sieges and battles were evident proofs of it. But this ought not to have been the principal point. It should have been proved, that he was the beginner and author of the war. For it is manifest, if the war had been only defensive on his part, he was not to be blamed. And yet, in the charge, he was supposed to have put the parliament under a necessity of defending themselves, and this point, which was the chief, not only was not proved, but even not attempted to be so. The depositions of the witnesses tended not to shew, that the king had forced the parliament to take up arms, but only that he had been seen sword in hand against the parliament, and giving orders to levy war. The question, which of the two, the king or the parliament, had began the war, ought to have been fully cleared. But though it had been so to the king’s disadvantage, who does not know, that the beginner of a war, is not always the aggressor? This was a point of great discussion, and which impartial judges would have found difficult to decide. For if what has been said in the history of this reign be remembered, it will be observed, that though it is evident the king governed in an arbitrary manner for some years, the ground of the war he undertook, was not in maintenance of this arbitrary power. He had fully consented to the annulling of his usurpations. But the ground of the war, on his part, was the defence of the power the king enjoys by the laws of the land. On the parliament’s side, the ground of the war was, That in a supposition the king could not be trusted any more, they would have divested him of the power his legal prerogatives afforded him to return to his former courses, and govern for the future as he had governed before. The king was unwilling to be curbed, and the parliament would set bounds to his power. This was the true ground of the war. It was not therefore easy to determine who was the first author of it. The king refused to give other security for the future than his word; and the parliament pretended to have very strong reasons to suspect the word of a prince, who had so often broke it. To determine on which side justice and reason lay, the king’s heart must have been dived into, to know whether he was sincere, or intended to deceive the parliament. On the other hand, it was necessary to know, whether the directors of the parliament had not some other end than the public good, and whether private interests were not concealed under that pretence. But all these things could be known only to God. And yet, the parliament, being judge and party, supposed, without alledging any proof, that the king was the aggressor and sole author of the war.

III. “ There are frequent instances in history of kings assassinated by their subjects in consequence either of the public hatred, or of private revenge, or of the interest of some faction. The English history furnishes, even since the conquest, examples of two kings solemnly deposed and imprisoned. But till Charles I., it no where appears, that any king was ever tried for his life, before his own subjects as judges. I shall say nothing here of other sovereigns, who are possessed of a greater authority over their subjects than the kings of England; for there may be a wide difference between sovereigns in that respect. But confining myself wholly to the kingdom of England, and supposing the constitution of the government such as it was from the conquest to Charles I., I shall briefly set forth what has been said for and against so extraordinary a trial. In the first place, it is demanded, On what law, natural or positive, was founded the right assumed by the parliament of England to try the king? The most plausible answer in vindication of the parliament’s proceedings, is as follows.

“ According to the constitution of the English government, the king is no less bound than the subject, to observe the laws, to which himself or predecessors assented, which is the principal clause of the coronation-oath. If this obligation be equal on both sides, there must be therefore equally means to cause them to discharge it, in case they come to neglect it. As for the subject, there is no manner of difficulty. The penalties against offenders are universally known, and the courts of justice are appointed to inflict them. It is true, the laws have ordained no penalty upon the kings who discharge not their duty, as well out of respect to the regal dignity, as because it cannot be supposed, that the king, to whom the execution of the laws is committed, should be the first to break them, and betray the trust lodged in him by the people. He is nevertheless bound to observe them himself, and cause them to be observed by the subject. This is a principle generally acknowledged. But what is this obligation, if the observance of the laws depends solely on his will, and there be no just means to compel him to ob-

'duty I owe to God in the preservation of the 'true Liberty of my People, will not suffer
'me at this time to be silent. For how 'can any free-born subject of England call 'life, or any thing he possesseth, his own, if 'power without right daily make new, and 'abrogate the old fundamental ways of the 'land, which I now take to be the present

'case? Wherefore, when I came hither, I ex'pected that you would have endeavoured to 'have satisfied me concerning these grounds
'which hinder me to answer to your pretended serve them, or punish him when he breaks them? Will it not be an empty sound without any meaning? And will not the English government be as arbitrary as that of any other country in the world? Since, therefore, the laws have not decreed any penalty against a king that should neglect his duty, or the manner to constrain him to discharge it; and as, nevertheless, he is bound by the same laws to procure the observance thereof, and to observe them himself, the nation's representative in parliament is of course to call him to an account, since it is not possible to imagine any other way. Supposing the king has violated the most fundamental laws of the realm, shall foreigners be applied to, for to bring him to justice? Can it be supposed, contrary to experience, that the king is under an impossibility of breaking the fundamental laws of the kingdom, of endeavouring to subvert them, and of establishing an arbitrary government? Will it be maintained, that he may do it with impunity? But if he is assured of impunity, what difference is there between the English government and the most despotic, since its preservation will solely depend on the king's probity and will? If he runs no hazard in trying to alter the constitution, after ten attempts, he will try again, even till he succeeds. As to the objection, that less violent means than war may be used to oblige the king to the observance of the laws, and less unjust and extraordinary, than the taking away his life, to punish him for the breach of them; it is answered, This is true, and the parliament had accordingly tried to secure the government by other methods, as by demanding of the king that the power of the militia might be lodged in both houses: If the king had agreed to it, the realm would have been in peace, and the people's jealousies have ceased. But he had taken up arms to prevent the parliament's using these means, a clear evidence that his design was to maintain himself in a condition to alter the government when he should have opportunity. This unjust war had been the occasion of infinite mischiefs, of the death of thousands of his subjects, and the ruin of the rest; and if he was brought to a trial, it was not so much to punish him for violating the laws, as for preferring the unjust and violent way of arms, before the expedients offered him to prevent his breaking them for the future.

"The advocates for the king say, 1. Though the kings of England have not so much authority in their realm as some other kings, it does not follow, that they may be put upon a level with subjects, and made equally accountable for their actions.

2. "The principle laid down for foundation, that there is an equal obligation upon the king and the subjects to observe the law, is false, and consequently the whole reasoning founded thereon, of no force. For, private persons being entrusted only with their own conduct, nothing can exempt them from the observance of the laws. But the king being entrusted with the government of the state, and the execution of the laws, he has consequently power to qualify them on certain occasions, otherwise this trust would be to no purpose. The law could not foresee every thing, and there are occasions, where it is absolutely necessary for the public good to act contrary to them, or at least, to suspend the observance of them, and therefore the obligation of the king and the subject is not equal.

3. "Supposing the king had violated some of the fundamental laws of the kingdom, and levied war against the parliament after the most unjust manner, it did not follow that he might be punished with death, by reason he has neither superior nor equal in the kingdom, and he could have none but subjects for his judges. Besides, he was the fountain of justice, and it was absurd to make him liable to justice, from whom it flows and derives its whole authority.

4. "According to this supposition, the chance of war having put him in the power of his enemies, he might have been detained in prison, and prevented from doing mischief, till he was prevailed with to grant all the securities required. But there was a wide difference between imprisonment and death; as the first could be considered as a reasonable and necessary precaution, and the other as a punishment subjects were not empowered to inflict on their sovereign, as indeed, the like had never been heard of.

5. "But the supposition that the king had violated the laws, and levied unjust war against his parliament, was very far from being well-grounded. In the first place, as to the laws, if the king, misled by evil counsels, had, on some occasions, carried his power too far, when the parliament made him sensible of the ill consequences of this conduct, he had cheerfully and willingly renounced the exorbitant power which he believed himself before to be justly intitled to. He had, without delay, consented to all the acts presented to him on that subject, and agreed that his most intimate counsellors should be brought to justice. The parliament had accepted this reparation, without expressing the least desire of causing him to suffer for his past faults. After that, it was absurd to alledge these same faults, so amply repaired, as a motive of the justice pretended to be executed upon him.

'Impeachment: But since I see that nothing I can say will move you to it (though Negatives are not so naturally proved as Affirmatives), yet I will shew you the reason why I am confident you cannot judge me, nor indeed the meanest man in England: For I will not (like you), without shewing a reason, seek to impose a belief upon my subjects.' [Hereabout I was stopped, and not suffered to speak any more concerning Reasons.] 'There is no proceeding just against any man, but what is warranted either by God's

6. "As for the war he had levied against his parliament, it was wrongfully asserted, and without the least proof, that the king had raised and begun it on purpose to avoid giving his people security. And under colour of desiring security for the future, a desire wholly founded upon mere suspicions and bare possibilities that the king might abuse his power, it was pretended to strip him of all his prerogatives, in a word, of the regal authority, and leave him only a shadow of royalty. Thus, supposing it true that the king had begun the war, which was by no means evinced, it would also be true, that the parliament had excited it, by attempting, under a vain pretence of peace and concord, to reduce the king to the most melancholy state a sovereign can possibly be in.

7. "The justice, pretended to be executed upon the king, was founded intirely on two suppositions, supported with no proof. The first, that the king had undertaken the war, only to free himself from giving security. The second, that there was reason to fear he would employ the power that should be left him, in altering the constitution. All reasonable persons were therefore left to judge, whether there was justice in trampling upon all laws divine and human, and inflicting upon their sovereign a capital punishment on two such rash suppositions.

8. "As for the plunder, ruin, murder, and other mischiefs occasioned by the wars, before they could be charged to the king's account, it ought at least to have been well proved that he was the author of the war. But if this point were fully examined, it would doubtless be found, that the complainers themselves could alone be charged with it.

9. "The king was proceeded against for intending to change the government, and make it arbitrary and tyrannical. But every Englishman was convinced, that the government had never been more despotic, more tyrannical, and more arbitrary than since the meeting of this parliament. There was scarce a law but what had been violated. The two houses had, for several years, usurped the supreme authority contrary to the known laws. And lately the commons had voted, that all power was lodged in them, without the concurrence of king and peers, a maxim unknown to the English from the foundation of the monarchy.

10. "The commons, in establishing, by a bare vote, that it belonged to them alone to try the king, had plainly declared, they owned neither superior nor equal, which was really introducing an arbitrary government.

11. "Lastly, till 1643, the parliament had only suspected the king's intention to alter the government, but after the parliament had assumed the direction, the government was really and truly changed. The king was moreover suspected of designing to alter the established religion: but the parliament had indeed changed it, and reduced it to a deplorable confusion, and the project of this unfortunate change had been the true cause of the war, and of all the subsequent calamities.

IV. "The fourth circumstance I intend to observe, is, that the king was brought three times before the high court of justice, and as often called upon to answer the charge entered against him, which was read in his hearing. But he constantly refused to own the authority of the court, and of those who erected it. On the other hand, the court would never hear his reasons for declining their jurisdiction. They always took for granted, that the authority by which the court was established, was sufficient; which was the very thing the king would have combated, but was never suffered. At last, seeing he could not prevail to be heard on that subject, he left his reasons in writing.

V. "Of all the witnesses, as I said, examined against the king, there was not one which proved the king to be author of the war. But among the depositions, there were two which must not pass unobserved, supposing they were neither forged nor altered. The first shows, the king was much less incensed against the independents than against the presbyterians, though afterwards he had but too much cause to perceive, that the principles of the former, were more destructive to him, than those of the latter. The second seems to prove, that the king did not act with sincerity, even in the treaty of Newport.

"Richard Price, a scrivener of London, deposed, that the committee of safety being informed, that the king was privately negotiating with the independents, sent the deponent to Oxford, under colour of carrying proposals to the king, from the independents: that he was introduced to the king by the earl of Bristol, and received orders to say to the leading independents, from his majesty, that if they would take his part against the parliament, he would grant them whatever freedom they desired.

"The second deposition was that of Henry Gooche of Grey's-Inn, who said: 'That on the 30th of September last, having access to, and discourse with, the king at Newport, he told him, that since his majesty had justified the parliament's taking up arms, by consenting to the preface of the bill, he did not question, but most of the presbyterian-party, both soldiers and others, would stick close to him.' To which the king answered, 'That ' laws, or the municipal laws of the country where he lives. Now I am most confident, this day's proceeding cannot be warranted by God's law; for, on the contrary, the authority of obedience unto kings is clearly warranted, and strictly commanded both in the Old and New Testament: which if denied, I am ready instantly to prove.

' And for the Question now in hand, there it is said, That where the word of a king is, there is power; and who may say unto him, What dost thou? Eccl. viii. 4. Then for the law of this land, I am no less confident, that no learned lawyer will affirm, That an Impeachment can lie against the king, they all going in his name: And one of their maxims is, That the king can do no wrong. Besides, the law upon which you ground your Proceedings, must be either old or new; if old, shew it; if new, tell what authority, warranted by the fundamental laws of the land, hath made it, and when. But how the House of Commons can erect a Court of Judicature, which was never one itself, (as is well known to all lawyers) I leave to God and the world to judge. And it were full as strange, that they should pretend to make laws without king or lords house, to any that have heard speak of the laws of England.

' And admitting, but not granting, That the People of England's Commission could grant your pretended power, I see nothing you can shew for that; for certainly you never asked the question of the tenth man in the kingdom: and in this way you manifestly wrong even the poorest ploughman, if you demand not his free consent; nor can you pretend any colour for this your pretended Commission, without the consent at least of the major part of every man in England, of whatsoever quality or condition, which I am sure you never went about to seek; so far are you from having it. Thus you see that I speak not for my own right alone, as I am your King, but also for the true Liberty of all my Subjects; which consists not in the Power of Government, but in living under such Laws, such a Government, as may give themselves the best assurance of their lives, and property of their goods. Nor in this must or do I forget the Privileges of

' he would have all his old friends know, that though for the present he was contented to give the parliament leave to call their own war what they pleased, yet that he neither did then, nor ever should decline the justice of his own cause.' Moreover, upon the deponent's saying, 'That his business was much retarded through want of commissions,' The king made answer, 'That being upon a treaty he would not dishonour himself, but if the deponent would go over to the prince his son, (who had full authority from him,) he, or any for him, should receive whatever commissions should be desired.' That, besides, he expressed much joy, that his good subjects would engage themselves for his restoration."

' both Houses of Parliament, which this day's Proceedings do not only violate, but likewise occasion the greatest breach of their public faith, that (I believe) ever was heard of; with which I am far from charging the two Houses: for all pretended crimes laid against me, bear date long before this Treaty at Newport, in which I have concluded as much as in me lay, and hopefully expecting the Houses agreement thereunto, I was suddenly surprized and hurried from thence as a Prisoner: upon which account I am against my will brought hither; where since I am come, I cannot but, to my power, defend the antient Laws and Liberties of this kingdom, together with my own just Right. Then, for any thing I can see, the Higher House is totally excluded. And for the House of Commons, it is too well known that the major part of them are detained or deterred from sitting; so as, if I had no other, this were sufficient for me to protest against the lawfulness of your pretended Court. Besides all this, the peace of the kingdom is not the least in my thoughts; and what hopes of settlement is there, so long as power reigns without rule or law, changing the whole frame of that Government, under which this kingdom hath flourished for many hundred years? (Nor will I say what will fall out, in case this lawless unjust Proceeding against me do go on.) And believe it, the Commons of England will not thank you for this change; for they will remember how happy they have been of late years under the reign of queen Elizabeth, the king my father, and myself, until the beginning of these unhappy Troubles, and will have cause to doubt that they shall never be so happy under any new. And by this time it will be too sensibly evident, that the arms I took up, were only to defend the fundamental laws of this kingdom, against those who have supposed my power hath totally changed the antient government.

' Thus having shewed you briefly the Reasons why I cannot submit to your pretended Authority, without violating the trust which I have from God for the Welfare and Liberty of my People; I expect from you either clear Reasons to convince my judgment, shewing me that I am in an error, (and then I will truly answer) or that you will withdraw your Proceedings.'

[This I intended to speak in Westminster-hall, on Monday, January the 22nd; but, against Reason, was hindered to shew my Reasons.]

Here the Court sat private.

And taking into consideration the Proceeding of the last court the last day, fully approved of what in their behalf had been then said and done; and likewise taking into consideration the demeanor of the king at the said Court, have notwithstanding resolved to try him once more, whether he will own the Court; and to that purpose,

Ordered, That the Lord President do acquaint the king, in case he shall continue contumacious, that he is to expect no further time; and that the Lord President do therefore in the name of the Court require his positive and final Answer: and if he shall still persist in his obstinacy, that the Lord President give command to the Clerk to read as followeth, viz.

'Charles Stuart, king of England, you are accused on the behalf of the people of England of divers high Crimes and Treasons, which Charge hath been read unto you; the Court now requires you to give your final and positive Answer, by way of Confession or Denial of the Charge. Nevertheless, if the King should submit to answer, and desire a Copy of his Charge, that it be granted him by the Lord President; notwithstanding giving him to know, That the Court might in justice forthwith proceed to Judgment for his former contumacy and failure to Answer; and that he be required to give his Answer to the said Charge the next day at one of the clock in the afternoon. Whereupon the Court adjourned to Westminster-hall forthwith.

Westminster-Hall, 23 Jan. 1648, post Merid.
 Three Proclamations being made, and At-

The Court being called, the Serjeant is required to send for the Prisoner, who was accordingly brought to the bar, where he took his seat as formerly. Proclamation is thereupon made for silence, while the Pleas of the Commonwealth are in hand, and the Captain of the Guard commanded by proclamation to take into custody all that shall disturb the proceedings of the Court.

Mr. Solicitor Cook addressing himself to the Court, repeated the former Delays and contempt of the Prisoner, so as that no more needed on his part, but to demand Judgment; yet offered, notwithstanding the notoriety of the facts charged, mentioned in the common Act appointing the Trial, to prove the truth of the same by Witnesses, if thereto required: and therefore prayed, and yet, he said, not so much he, as the innocent blood that had been shed, the cry whereof was very great, that a speedy Sentence and Judgment might be pronounced against the Prisoner at the bar according to justice.

Hereupon the Court putting the Prisoner in mind of former proceedings, and that although by the rules of justice, if advantage were taken of his past Contempts, nothing would remain but to pronounce Judgment against him, they had nevertheless determined to give him leave to answer his Charge; which, as was told him in plain terms, (for justice knew no respect of persons) was to plead Guilty or Not Guilty thereto.

To which he made Answer as formerly, That he would not acknowledge the jurisdiction of the Court, and that it was against the Fundamental laws of the kingdom; that there was no law to make a king a Prisoner; that he had done nothing against his trust; and issued out into such-like discourses.

Upon which the Court's Resolution was again remembered to him, and he told, That he had now the third time publicly disowned and affronted the Court: That how good a preserver he had been of the fundamental laws and freedoms of the people, his actions had spoken; that men's intentions were used to be shewed by their actions, and that he had written his meaning in bloody characters throughout the kingdom; and that he should find at last, though at present he would not understand it, that he was before a Court of Justice.

Hereupon, in the manner appointed, the Clerk in the name of the Court demanding the Prisoner's Answer to his Charge, and the same refused, the default was recorded, the Prisoner remanded, and the Court adjourned to the Painted Chamber.

Painted Chamber.

The Court, according to their former adjournment from Westminster-hall, came together from thence into the Painted Chamber, where they sat privately, and ordered as followeth: Ordered, "That no Commissioner ought, or shall depart from the Court, without the special leave of the said Court."

This Court took into consideration the managing of the business of the Court this day in the Hall, and the King's refusal to answer, notwithstanding he had been three several times demanded and required thereunto; and have thereupon fully approved of what on the Court's part had then passed; and resolved, "That notwithstanding the said contumacy of the King, and refusal to plead, which in law amounts to a standing mute, and tacit confession of the charge; and notwithstanding the notoriety of the fact charged, the Court would nevertheless however examine witnesses, for the further and clearer satisfaction of their own judgments and consciences; the manner of whose Examination was referred to further consideration the next sitting, and warrants were accordingly issued forth for summoning of witnesses.

Mr. Peters moveth the Court as a messenger from the King, viz. That the king desires he might speak with his chaplains that came unto him privately: but the House of Commons having taken that into their consideration, the Court conceived it not proper for them to intermeddle therein. The Court adjourned itself till nine o'clock to-morrow morning, to this place.

[What passed in the Hall more at large than is related by Phelps in this Day's Transactions, see in the following Discourse.

The King being brought in by the guard, looks with a majestic countenance upon his pretended judges, and sits down. After the second O Yes, and silence commanded, Cook began more insolently:

Cook. May it please your lordship, my Lord President; this is now the third time, that, by the great grace and favour of this High Court, the Prisoner hath been brought to the bar, before any issue joined in the cause. My lord, I did at the first court exhibit a Charge against him, containing the highest Treason that ever was wrought upon the theatre of England: That a king of England trusted to keep the law, that had taken an oath so to do, that had tribute paid him for that end, should be guilty of a wicked design to subvert and destroy our laws, and introduce an arbitrary and tyrannical government, in the defiance of the parliament and their authority, set up his standard for War against the Parliament and People: and I did humbly pray, in the behalf of the people of England, that he might speedily be required to make an Answer to the Charge.—But, my lord, instead of making any Answer, he did then dispute the authority of this High Court. Your lordship was pleased to give him a further day to consider, and to put in his Answer; which day being yesterday, I did humbly move, that he might be required to give a direct and positive Answer either by denying or confession of it: but, my lord, he was then pleased for to demur to the jurisdiction of the Court; which the Court did then over-rule, and command him to give a direct and positive Answer. My lord, besides this great delay of justice, I shall now humbly move your lordship for speedy Judgment against him. My lord, I might press your lordship upon the whole, that according to the known rules of the law of the land, That if a prisoner shall stand as contumacious in contempt, and shall not put in an issuable plea, Guilty or not Guilty of the Charge given against him, whereby he may come to a fair trial; that, as by an implicit confession, it may be taken pro confesso, as it hath been done to those who have deserved more favour than the prisoner at the bar has done. But besides, my lord, I shall humbly press your lordship upon the whole fact. The House of Commons, the supreme authority and jurisdiction of the kingdom, they have declared, That it is notorious, that the matter of the Charge is true, as it is in truth, my lord, as clear as crystal, and as the sun that shines at noon-day: which if your lordship and the Court be not satisfied in, I have notwithstanding, on the people of England's behalf, several Witnesses to produce. And therefore I do humbly pray, (and yet I must confess it is not so much I, as the innocent blood that hath been shed, the cry whereof is very great for justice and judgment; and therefore I do humbly pray) that speedy Judgment be pronounced against the Prisoner at the bar.

Bradshaw went on in the same strain :

Sir, You have heard what is moved by the counsel on the behalf of the kingdom against you. Sir, you may well remember, and if you do not, the Court cannot forget what dilatory dealings the Court hath found at your hands. You were pleased to propound some questions; you have had our Resolution upon them. You were told over and over again, That the Court did affirm their own jurisdiction; that it was not for you, nor any other man, to dispute the jurisdiction of the supreme and highest authority of England, from which there is no appeal, and touching which there must be no dispute: yet you did persist in such carriage, as you gave no manner of obedience, nor did you acknowledge any authority in them, nor the High Court that constituted this court of justice.—Sir, I must let you know from the Court, that they are very sensible of these delays of yours, and that they ought not, being thus authorized by the supreme Court of England, to be thus trifled withal; and that they might in justice, if they pleased, and according to the rules of justice, take advantage of these delays, and proceed to pronounce Judgment against you: yet nevertheless they are pleased to give direction, and on their behalfs I do require you, that you make a positive Answer unto this Charge that is against you, sir, in plain terms (for justice knows no respect of persons;) you are to give your positive and final Answer in plain English, whether you be guilty or not guilty of these Treasons laid to your Charge.

The King, after a little pause, said,

When I was here yesterday, I did desire to speak for the Liberties of the people of England: I was interrupted: I desire to know yet, whether I may speak freely or not.

Bradshaw. Sir, you have had the Resolution of the Court upon the like question the last day, and you were told, that having such a Charge of so high a nature against you, your work was, that you ought to acknowledge the jurisdiction of the Court, and to answer to your Charge. Sir, If you answer to your Charge, which the Court gives you leave now to do, though they might have taken the advantage of your contempt; yet if you be able to answer to your Charge, when you have once answered, you shall be heard at large, make the best Defence you can. But, sir, I must let you know from the Court, as their commands, that you are not to be permitted to issue out into any other discourses, till such time as you have given a positive answer concerning the matter that is charged upon you.

King. For the Charge, I value it not a rush; it is the Liberty of the People of England that I stand for. For me to acknowledge a new Court that I never heard of before, I that am your king, that should be an example to all the people of England for to uphold justice, to maintain the old laws; indeed I know not how to do it. You spoke very well the first day that I came here, (on Saturday) of the obligations that I had laid upon me by God, to the maintenance of the Liberties of my People; the same obligation you spake of, I do acknowledge to God that I owe to him and to my people, to defend as much as in me lies the ancient laws of the kingdom. Therefore, until that I may know that this is not against the Fundamental Laws of the kingdom, by your favour I can put in no particular Answer. If you will give me time, I will shew you my reasons why I cannot do it, and this—

Here being interrupted, he said,

By your favour, you ought not to interrupt me: how I came here I know not; there is no Law for it to make your King your Prisoner. I was in a Treaty upon the public faith of the kingdom, that was the known—two Houses of Parliament that was the Representative of the kingdom; and when I had almost made an end of the Treaty, then I was hurried away, and brought hither: and therefore—

Bradshaw. Sir, you must know the pleasure of the Court.

King. By your favour, Sir.

Bradshaw. Nay, Sir, by your favour, you may not be permitted to fall into those discourses; you appear as a Delinquent, you have not acknowledged the Authority of the Court, the Court craves it not of you: but once more they command you to give your positive Answer—Clerk, do your duty.

King. Duty, Sir!

The Clerk reads:

‘Charles Stuart, king of England, you are accused in the behalf of the Commons of England, of divers High Crimes and Treasons; which Charge hath been read unto you: The Court now requires you to give your positive and final Answer, by way of confession, or denial of the Charge.’

King. Sir, I say again to you, so that I might give satisfaction to the People of England of the clearness of my proceeding, not by way of Answer, not in this way, but to satisfy them that I have done nothing against that trust that hath been committed to me, I would do it: but to acknowledge a new Court, against their privileges, to alter the fundamental laws of the kingdom, Sir, you must excuse me.

Bradshaw. Sir, this is the third time that you have publicly disowned this Court, and put an affront upon it: How far you have preserved the Privileges of the people, your actions have spoke it; but truly, Sir, men's intentions ought to be known by their actions; you have written your meaning in bloody characters throughout the whole kingdom. But, Sir, you understand the pleasure of the Court. —Clerk, record the Default.—And, Gentlemen, you that took Charge of the Prisoner, take him back again.

King. I will only say this one word more to you; if it were only my own particular I would not say any more, nor interrupt you.

Bradshaw. Sir, you have heard the pleasure of the Court, and you are (notwithstanding you will not understand it) to find that you are before a Court of Justice.

Then the King went forth with the Guard; and Proclamation was made, That all persons which had then appeared, and had further to do at the Court, might depart into the Painted-Chamber; to which place the Court did forthwith adjourn, and intended to meet at Westminster-Hall by ten of the clock next morning.

Cryer. God bless the Kingdom of England !]

Here the Court sat private.

The Court ordered, That the Marshal-general of this Army, or his Deputy, do bring forthwith Mr. Holder prisoner at Whitehall, to the end that he may testify his knowledge of all such matters as shall be propounded unto him concerning the Charge against the King.

Ordered, That the Dean's House in Westminster-Abbey be provided and furnished for the Lodging of the Lord President and his Servants, Guards and attendants; and a Committee are appointed to take care hereof accordingly.

Mr. Henry Gouge and Mr. William Cuthbert, Witnesses produced to the Charge against the King, were sworn and examined.

The Witnesses sworn in open Court, and after examined by the Committee appointed for that purpose the 24th instant, were now in open Court called, and their respective Depositions were read to them; who did avow their said several Depositions, and affirm what was so read unto them respectively was true, upon the oaths they had taken.

The Court being informed, that major Fox, being of the guard attending the Lord President, is arrested and committed to the Keeper of Ludgate: Ordered, that the said Keeper do forthwith bring the said major before this Court, and attend this Court in person himself.

Mr. Holder being brought before this Court according to the Order of this day, and his oath tendered unto him, to give evidence to such matters as should be propounded unto him concerning the Charge against the king; the said Mr. Holder desired to be spared from giving Evidence against the king. Whereupon the Commissioners finding him already a Prisoner, and perceiving that the Questions intended to be asked him, tended to accuse himself, thought fit to wave his Examination, and remanded him (and accordingly did so) to the prison from whence he was brought.

Jan. 25, 1649.

William Cuthbert of Patrington in Holderness, (in the county of York,) gent. aged 42 years, or thereabouts, sworn and examined, saith, That he, this Deponent, living at Hull-Bridge near Beverly, in July 1642, did then hear that forces were raised, about 3,000 foot, for the King's Guard under sir Robert Strickland.—And this Deponent further saith, That about the second of July 1642, he saw a troop of horse come to Beverly, being the Lord's-Day, about four or five of the clock in the afternoon, called the Prince's Troop; Mr. James Nelthorpe being then major of the said town.—And this Deponent further saith, That he did see that afternoon the said troop march from Beverly aforesaid into Holderness, where they received ammunition brought up by the river Humber unto them.—And this Deponent further saith, That the same night, being Sunday, there came about 300 foot-soldiers (said to be sir Robert Strickland's regiment), under the command of lieutenant. col. Duncombe, and called the King's Guard, unto this Deponent's house, called Hull-Bridge, near Beverly, about midnight, and broke open, entered, and possessed themselves of the said house; and that the earl of Newport, the earl of Carnarvan, and divers others, came that night thither to the said forces: And that the same night, as this Deponent was then informed, sir Tho. Gower, then high sheriff of the said county, came thither, and left there a Warrant for staying all provisions from going to Hull to sir John Hotham; which said Warrant was then delivered to this Deponent, being constable, by lieutenant. col. Duncombe.—And this Deponent further saith, That he was by the said forces put out of his house, and did with his family go to Beverly; and that after that, viz. the Thursday following, to this Deponent's best remembrance, he did see the king come to Beverly, to the lady Gee's house there; where he, this Deponent, did often see the king with prince Charles and the duke of York: and that the Trained Bands were then raised in Holderness; who were raised (as was generally reported) by the king's command.—And this Deponent further saith, That the night after the said forces had, as aforesaid, possessed themselves of this Deponent's house, col. Legard's house was plundered by them, being upon a Monday; which aforesaid entry of this Deponent's house, was the first* act of hostility that was committed in those parts.—And this Deponent further saith, That after the said sir Robert Strickland's said Company was gone from Hull-Bridge, having continued there about ten days, there then came to the said house col. Wivel, with about seven hundred foot soldiers, who then took up his quarters at Hull-Bridge aforesaid. And this Deponent further saith, That the Warrant he now produceth to this Court, is the same original Warrant aforesaid spoken of.—And this Deponent further saith, That the General's name of the said forces that were there, and raised as aforesaid, was the earl of Lindsey; and that this Deponent was brought before him the said General, in the name of the king's Lord General, for holding intelligence with sir John Hotham, then governor of Hull; and because it was then informed to the said general, that he this Deponent had provisions of corn to send over unto Ireland, which he this Deponent was forbidden by the said general to send unto Ireland, or any place else, without his or the king's direction or warrant first had in that behalf.

The aforesaid Warrant, mentioned in the Deposition of the said William Cuthbert, is as followeth:

'It is his majesty's command, that you do not suffer any victuals or provision, of what sort soever, to be carried into the town of Hull, without his majesty's special licence first obtained. And of this you are not to fail at your peril.' THO. GOWER, Vi. Co. Dated at Beverley, 3 Julij, 1642. To all Head-Constables and Constables in the East-Riding of the County of York, and to all other his majesty's Loyal Subjects.

* "Sir John Hotham's keeping Hull as a Garrison against the King, which was before this, was, it seems, no Act of Hostility, in this perjured Villain's account." Nalson.

Richard Blomfield, citizen and weaver of London, aged 35 years, or thereabouts, sworn and examined, saith, That at the Defeat of the earl of Essex's army in Cornwall, he this Deponent was there; it being at the latter end of the month of August, or beginning of September 1644, at which time, he this Deponent saw the King at the head of his army, near Foy, on horseback: and further he saith, That he did then see 'divers of the lord of Essex's soldiers plundered, contrary to Articles then lately made, near the person of the King.

William Jones of Uske in the county of Monmouth, husbandman, aged 22 years, or thereabout, sworn and examined, saith, That he this Deponent did see the King within two miles of Naseby-Field, the King then coming fromwards Harborough, marching in the head of his Army, towards Naseby-Field where the Fight was; and that he this Deponent did then see the king ride up to the regiment which was col. St. George's, and there the Deponent did hear the King ask the regiment, 'Whether they were willing to fight for him?' To which the soldiers made an acclamation, crying, 'All,' 'All.'—And this Deponent further saith, That he saw the King in Leicester with his forces, the same day that the King's Forces had taken it from the parliament's forces.—And this Deponent further saith, That he saw the King in his Army that besieged Gloucester, at the time of the said siege.

Humphrey Browne of Whitsondine in the county of Rutland, husbandman, aged 22 years or thereabouts, sworn and examined, saith, That at such time as the town of Leicester was taken by the King's Forces, being in or about June, 1645, Newark-Fort in Leicester aforesaid was surrendered to the King's Forces, upon composition, that neither clothes nor money should be taken away from any of the soldiers of that fort, which had so surrendered, nor any violence offered to them; and that as soon as the said Fort was upon such composition so surrendered as aforesaid, the king's soldiers, contrary to the Articles, fell upon the soldiers of the said fort, stripped, cut and wounded many of them: whereupon one of the King's officers rebuking some of those that did so abuse the said Parliament's Soldiers, this Deponent did then hear the King reply, 'I do not care if they cut them three times more, for they are mine enemies,' or words to that effect: And that the King was then on horseback, in bright armour, in the said town of Leicester.

David Evans of Abergenny in the county of Monmouth, smith, aged about 23 years, sworn and examined, saith, That about half an hour before the Fight at Naseby, about Midsummer in June 1645, he saw the King marching up to the Battle in the head of his Army, being about half a mile from the place where the said Battle was fought.

Diogenes Edwards of Carston, in the county of Salop, butcher, aged 21 or thereabouts, sworn and examined, saith, That in June 1645, he this Deponent saw the King in the head of his Army an hour and a half before the Fight in Naseby-Field, marching up to the Battle, being then a mile and a half from the said field: And this Deponent saith, that he did afterwards the same day see many slain at the said Battle.

Gyles Gryce of Wellington, in Shropshire, gent. sworn and examined, deposes, That he this deponent saw the king in the head of his army at Cropredy-Bridge, with his sword drawn in his hand that day when the fight was against sir William Waller, on a Friday, as this deponent remembereth, in the year 1644, about the month of July. And he further saith, That he saw the king in the same summer in Cornwall, in the head of his army, about Lewitliel, at such time as the earl of Essex was there with his army. And he further saith, That he also saw the King in the head of his Army at the second Fight near Newbury. And farther saith, That he saw the King in the front of the army in Naseby-Field, having back and breast on. And he further saith, That he saw the King at the head of the Army, at what time the town of Leicester was stormed, and saw the King ride into the town of Leicester, after the town was taken, and he saw a great many men killed on both sides, at Leicester, and many houses plundered.

John Vinson of Damarham, in the county of Wilts, gent. sworn and examined, saith, That he did see the King at the first Newbury Fight, about the month of September 1643, in the head of his Army, where this Deponent did see many slain on both sides. This Deponent also saith, That he did see the king at the second Battle at Newbury, about the month of November 1644, where the King was at the head of his Army in complete armour, with his sword drawn; and this Deponent did then see the King lead up col. Tho. Howard's regiment of horse, and did hear him make a Speech to the soldiers, in the head of that regiment, to this effect; that is to say, 'That the said Regiment should stand to him that day, for that his crown lay upon the point of the sword; and if he lost that day, he lost his honour and his crown for ever.' And that this Deponent did see many slain on both sides at that Battle. This Deponent further saith, That he did see the King in the Battle at Naseby-Field in Northamptonshire, on or about the month of June 1645, where the King was then completely armed with back, breast and helmet, and had his sword drawn, where the King himself, after his Party was routed, did rally up the horse, and caused them to stand; and at that time this Deponent did see many slain on both sides.

George Sealey of London, cordwainer, sworn and examined, saith, That he did see the King at the head of a brigade of horse at the Siege of Gloucester, and did also see the King at the first Fight at Newbury, about the month of September 1643, where the King was at the head of a regiment of horse, and that there were many slain at that fight on both sides. This Deponent also saith, That he did see the King at the second Fight at Newbury, which was about November, 1644, where the King was in the middle of his army.

John Moore of the city of Cork in Ireland, gent. sworn and examined, saith, That at the last Fight at Newbury, about the month of November 1644, he this Deponent did see the King in the middle of the horse, with his sword drawn; and that he did see abundance of men at that Fight slain upon the ground on both sides. This Deponent also saith, That he did see the King ride into Leicester before a party of horse the same day that Leicester was taken by the King's forces, which was about the month of June, 1645. This Deponent further saith, That he did see the King, before the Fight at Leicester, at Cropredy-bridge, in the midst of a regiment of horse; and that he did see many slain at the same time, when the King was in the fight at Cropredy-bridge. And lastly, this Deponent saith, That he did see the King at the head of a regiment of horse at Naseby Fight, about the month of June 1645, where he did see abundance of men cut, shot, and slain.

Thomas Ives of Boyset, in the county of Northampton, husbandman, sworn and examined, saith, That he did see the King in his army at the first Fight in Newbury in Berkshire, in the month of September 1643, and that he did see many slain at that Fight; he this Deponent and others, with a party of horse, being commanded to face the Parliament's forces, whilst the foot did fetch off the dead.—He saith also, That he did see the King advance with his army to the Fight at Naseby field in Northamptonshire, about June 1645, and that he did again at that Fight see the King come off with a party of horse after that his army was routed in the field; and that there were many men slain on both parts, at that Battle at Naseby.

Thomas Rawlins of Hianslop, in the county of Bucks, gent. sworn and examined, saith, That he did see the King near Foy in Cornwall, in or about the month of July, 1644, at the head of a party of horse; and this Deponent did see some soldiers plunder after the Articles of Agreement made between the King's Army and the Parliament's Forces; which soldiers were so plundered by the King's party not far distant from the person of the King.

Thomas Read of Maidstone, in the county of Kent, gent. sworn and examined, saith, That presently after the laying down of arms in Cornwall, between Lestwithiel and Foy, in or about the latter end of the month of August, or the beginning of September, 1644, he this Deponent did see the King in the head of a guard of horse.

James Crosby of Dublin in Ireland, barber, sworn and examined, saith, That at the first Fight at Newbury, about the time of barley-harvest 1643, he this Deponent did see the King riding from Newbury Town, accompanied with divers lords and gentlemen, towards the place where his forces were then fighting with the Parliament's Army.

Samuel Burden of Lyneham, in the county of Wilts, gent. sworn and examined, saith, That he this Deponent was at Nottingham in or about the month of August, 1642, at which time he saw a flag flying upon the tower of Nottingham castle; and that the next day afterwards he did see the King at Nottingham, when the said flag was still flying; which flag this Deponent then heard was the King's Standard.—He saith also, That he did afterwards see the King at Cropredy bridge in the head of his army, in a fallow field there; and did see the King in pursuit of sir William Waller's army, being then routed, which was about the month of July, 1644, and at that time this Deponent did see many people slain upon the ground.—And further this Deponent saith, That in or about the month of November, 1644, he did see the King at the last Fight at Newbury, riding up and down the field from regiment to regiment, whilst his army was there fighting with the Parliament's Forces; and this Deponent did see many men slain at that battle, on both sides.

Michael Potts of Sharpereton, in the county of Northumberland, vintner, sworn and examined, deposes, That he this Deponent saw the King in the head of the Army in the fields about a mile and a half from Newbury Town, upon the heath, the day before the Fight was, it being about harvest-tide in the year 1643.—And he further saith, That he saw the King on the day after, when the Fight was, standing near a great piece of ordnance in the fields.—And he further saith, That he saw the King in the second Newbury Fight in the head of his Army, being after or about Michaelmas, 1644.—And he further saith, That he saw a great many men slain at both the said battles.—And he further saith, That he saw the King in the head of his Army near Cropredy bridge in the year 1644.—And he further saith, That he saw the King in the head of his Army in Cornwall, near Lestwithiel, while the earl of Essex lay there with his forces about the middle of harvest, 1644.

George Cornwall of Aston, in the county of Hereford, ferry-man, aged 50 years, or thereabouts, sworn and examined, saith, That he, this Deponent, did see the King near Cropredy bridge, about the time of mowing of corn 1644, in the van of the Army there, and that he drew up his Army upon a hill, and faced the Parliament's Army; and that there was thereupon a skirmish between the King's and the Parliament's Army, where he, this Deponent, saw divers persons slain on both sides.

Henry Gooche of Grays-Inn, in the county of Middlesex, gent. sworn and examined. This Deponent saith, That upon or about the 30th day of September last, he, this Deponent, was in the Isle of Wight, and had access unto and discourse with the King, by the means of the lord marquis of Hertford and commissary Morgan: where this Deponent told the king, that his majesty had many friends; and that since his majesty was pleased to justify the Parliament's first taking up arms, the most of the presbyterian party, both soldiers and others, would stick close to him. To which the King answered thus, That he would have all his old friends know, that though for the present he was contented to give the Parliament leave to call their own war what they pleased, yet that he neither did at that time, nor ever should decline the justice of his own cause.—And this Deponent told the king, That his business was much retarded, and that neither col. Thomas, nor any other, could proceed to action, through want of commission. The King answered, That he being upon a Treaty, would not dishonour himself; but that if he, this Deponent, would take the pains to go over to the prince, his son, (who had full authority from him) he the said Deponent, or any for him, should receive whatsoever commissions should be desired; and to that purpose he would appoint the marquis of Hertford to write to his son in his name: and was pleased to express much joy and affection, that his good subjects would engage themselves for his restoration.

Robert Williams of the parish of St. Martin's, in the county of Cornwall, husbandman, aged 23 years, or thereabouts, sworn and examined, saith, That he, this Deponent, did see the king marching in the head of his army about September, 1644, a mile from Lestwithiel in Cornwall, in armour, with a short coat over it unbuttoned. And this Deponent further saith, That he saw him after that in St. Austell Down, drawing up his army. And this Deponent saith, He did after that see the king in the head of his army near Foy, and that the earl of Essex and his army did then lie within one mile and a half of the king's army.

The Witnesses being examined as aforesaid, the Court adjourned for an hour.

Richard Price of London, scrivener, was produced a Witness to the Charge against the King; who being sworn and examined, saith, That upon occasion of some tampering by the king's agents with the Independents in and about London, to draw them from the Parliament's cause to the king's party; and this being discovered by some of those so tampered with, unto sundry members of the Committee of Safety, who directed a carrying on of a seeming compliance with the king; he, this Deponent, did travel to Oxford in January, 1613, having a Safe-Conduct under the king's hand and seal, which he this Deponent knoweth to be so; for that the king did own it when he was told that this Deponent was the man that came to Oxon with that Safe-Conduct.—And this Deponent also saith, That after sundry meetings between him and the earl of Bristol, about the drawing of the Independents unto the King's cause against the Parliament, the substance of the discourse at which meetings, the said earl told this Deponent, was communicated to the king; he, this Deponent, was by the said earl brought to the king to confer further about that business; where the king declared, That he was very sensible that the Independents had been the most active men in the kingdom for the parliament against him: And thereupon persuaded this Deponent to use all means to expedite their turning to him and his cause. And for their better encouragement, the king promised in the word of a king, That if they, the Independents, would turn to him, and be active for him against the parliament, as they had been active for them against him, then he would grant them whatsoever freedom they would desire. And the King did then refer this Deponent unto the earl of Bristol, for the further prosecuting of the said business.—And the said Earl thereupon (this Deponent being withdrawn from the king) did declare unto this Deponent, and willed him to impart the same unto the Independents for their better encouragement, That the king's affairs prospered well in Ireland; That the Irish subjects had given the Rebels (meaning the Parliament's Forces) a great defeat; That the king had sent the lord Byron with a small party towards Cheshire, and that he was greatly multiplied, and had a considerable army, and was then before Nantwich, and would be strengthened with more soldiers out of Ireland, which were com-and expected daily. And when this Deponent was to depart out of Oxford, four Safe-Conducts with blanks in them, for the inserting of what names this Deponent pleased, were delivered to him, under the King's hand and seal. And one Ogle was sent out of Oxon with this Deponent, to treat about the delivering up of Ailsbury to the king, it being then a garrison for the parliament, and at the same time Oxford was a garrison for the king.

Several Papers and Letters of the King's, under his own hand, and of his own writing, and other papers, are produced, and read in open Court.

Mr. Thomas Challoner [a member of the house, Rushw.] also reporteth several Papers and Letters of the king's writing, and under the king's own hand.

After which the Court sat private.

The Court taking into consideration the whole matter in Charge against the King, passed these Votes following, as preparatory to the Sentence against the King, but ordered that they should not be binding finally to conclude the Court, viz.

“Resolved, upon the whole matter, That this Court will proceed to Sentence of Condemnation against Charles Stuart, king of England. That the Condemnation of the King shall be for a Tyrant, Traitor, and Murderer. That the Condemnation of the King shall be likewise for being a public Enemy to the commonwealth of England. That this Condemnation shall extend to Death.”

Memorandum, The last fore-mentioned Commissioners were present at these Votes.

The Court being then moved concerning the Deposition and Deprivation of the King before, and in order to that part of his Sentence which concerned his Execution, thought fit to defer the consideration thereof to some other time; and ordered the Draught of a Sentence grounded upon the said Votes, to be accordingly prepared by Mr. Scot, Mr. Marten, col. Harrison, Mr. Lisle, Mr. Say, commissary gen. Ireton and Mr. Love, or any three of them, with a blank for the manner of his Death.

Ordered, That the members of this Court, who are in or about London, and are not now present, be summoned to attend the service of this Court to-morrow at one o'clock in the afternoon: for whom summons were issued forth accordingly.

The Court adjourned itself till the morrow at one o'clock in the afternoon.

Here the Court sat private.

The Draught of a Sentence against the King is, according to the Votes of the 25th instant, prepared: and after several readings, debates, and amendments, by the Court thereupon,

“Resolved, &c. That this Court do agree to the Sentence now read. That the said Sentence shall be ingrossed. That the King be brought to Westminster to-morrow to receive his Sentence.”

The Court adjourned itself till the morrow at ten of the clock in the morning to this place; the Court giving notice, That they then intended to adjourn from thence to Westminster-hall.

* He died in Ireland, where he was Lord Deputy, Nov. 26th, 1651. Whitelocke mentioning this event says, “This gentleman, colonel Ireton, was a person very active, industrious and stiff in his ways and purposes: he was of good abilities for council as well as action, and made much use of his pen, and was very forward to reform the proceedings in law, wherein his having been bred a lawyer was a help to him. He was stout in the field, and wary and prudent in his council, and exceedingly forward as to the business of a Common-Wealth. He married Cromwell's daughter, who had a great opinion of him, and no man could prevail so much nor order him so far as Ireton could. His death struck a great sadness into Cromwell, and indeed it was a great loss to him of so able and active, so faithful and so near a relation and officer under him.” Memorials; p. 491.

The Sentence agreed on, and ordered by this Court the 26th instant to be ingrossed, being accordingly ingrossed, was read.

"Resolved, that the Sentence now read, shall be the Sentence of this Court for the Condemnation of the King, which shall be read and published in Westminster-hall this day."

The Court hereupon considered of certain Instructions for the Lord President, to manage the Business of this day in Westminster-Hall; and ordered,

"That the Lord President do manage what Discourse shall happen between him and the King, according to his discretion, with the advice of his two Assistants: and that in case the King shall still persist in excepting against the Court's Jurisdiction, to let him know that the Court do still affirm their Jurisdiction.—That in case the King shall submit to the Jurisdiction of the Court, and pray a Copy of the Charge, that then the Court do withdraw and advise.—That in case the King shall move any thing else worth the Court's Consideration, the Lord President, upon advice of his said Assistants, do give order for the Court's withdrawing to advise.—That in case the King shall not submit to answer, and there happen no such cause of withdrawing, that then the Lord President do command the Sentence to be read; but that the Lord President should hear the King say what he would before the Sentence, and not after."

"And thereupon it being further moved, Whether the Lord President should use any Discourse or Speeches to the King, as in the case of other Prisoners to be condemned was usual before the publishing of the Sentence, received general directions to do therein as he should see cause, and to press what he should conceive most seasonable and suitable to the occasion. And it was further directed, That after the reading of the Sentence, the Lord President should declare, That the same was the Sentence, Judgment and Resolution of the whole Court, and that the commissioners should thereupon signify their consent by standing up."

The Court forthwith adjourned itself to Westminster-Hall.

Westminster-Hall, 27 Jan. 1649. P. M.

The Lord President and the rest of the Commissioners come together from the Painted-Chamber to Westminster-Hall, according to their adjournment, and take their seats there, as formerly; and three Proclamations being made for Attendance and Silence, the Court is called.

Sixty-seven Commissioners present.

The Prisoner is brought to the Bar, and Proclamation is again (as formerly) made for Silence; and the Captain of the Guard ordered to take into his custody all such as should disturb the Court.

The President stood up with an intention to address the People, and not to the Prisoner, who had so often declined the Jurisdiction of the Court; which the Prisoner observing, moved he might be heard before Judgment given. Whereof he received assurance from the Court, and that he should be heard after he had heard them first.

Whereupon the Court proceeded, and remembered the great assembly then present of what had formerly passed betwixt the Court and the Prisoner; the Charge against him in the Name of the People of England exhibited to them, being a Court constituted by the supreme Authority of England; his refusal three several days and times to own them as a Court, or to answer to the matter of his Charge; his thrice recorded Contumacy, and other his Contempts and Defaults in the precedent Courts. Upon which the Court then declared, That they might not be wanting to themselves, or to the trust reposed in them; and that no man's wilfulness ought to serve him to prevent Justice; and that they had therefore thought fit to take the substance of what had passed into their serious consideration, to wit, the Charge and the Prisoner's Contumacy, and the Confession which in the law doth arise upon that Contumacy, the notoriety of the fact charged, and other the circumstances material in the cause: and upon the whole matter, had resolved and agreed upon a Sentence then ready to be pronounced against the Prisoner. But that in regard of his desire to be further heard, they were ready to hear him as to any thing material, which he would offer to their consideration before the Sentence given, relating to the Defence of himself, concerning the matter charged; and did then signify so much to the Prisoner: Who made use of that leave given only to protest his respects to the Peace of the Kingdom, and Liberty of the Subject, and to say, That the same made him at last to desire, that having somewhat to say that concerned both, he might before the Sentence given be heard in the Painted Chamber before the Lords and Commons; saying, It was fit to be heard, if it were Reason which he should offer, whereof they were Judges. And pressing that point much, he was forthwith answered by the Court, and told,

That that which he moved was a declining of the Jurisdiction of the Court, whereof he had caution frequently given him.

That it tended to further Delay, of which he had been too much guilty.

That the Court being founded (as often had been said) upon the Authority of the Commons of England, in whom rested the supreme Jurisdiction, the motion tended to set up another, or a co-ordinate Jurisdiction, in derogation of the Power whereby the Court sat, and to the manifest delay of their Justice; in which regard, he was told, they might forthwith proceed to Sentence: Yet for his further satisfaction of the entire pleasure and Judgment of the Court upon what he had then said, he was told, and accordingly it was declared, That the Court would withdraw half an hour.

The Prisoner by command being withdrawn, the Court make their recess into the room called the Court of Wards, considered of the Prisoner's motion, and gave the President direction to declare their dissent thereto, and to proceed to the Sentence.

The Court being again set, and the Prisoner returned, was, according to their direction, informed, That he had in effect received his Answer before the Court withdrew; and that their Judgment was (as to his motion) the same to him before declared, That the Court acted, and were Judges appointed by the highest Authority; and that Judges were not to delay, no more than to deny Justice; That they were good words in the great old Charter of England, "Nulli negabimus, nulli vendemus, nulli differemus justitiam vel rectum:" That their Duty called upon them to avoid further Delays, and to proceed to Judgment; which was their unanimous Resolution.

Unto which the Prisoner replied, and insisted upon his former Desires, confessing a Delay; but that it was important for the Peace of the Kingdom: and therefore pressed again with much earnestness to be heard before the Lords and Commons.

In answer whereof, he was told by the Court, That they had before fully considered of his Proposal, and must give him the same Answer to his renewed Desires; and that they were ready to proceed to Sentence, if he had nothing more to say.

Whereunto he subjoined, He had no more to say; but desired that might be entered which he had said.

Hereupon, after some discourse used by the President, for vindicating the Parliament's Justice, explaining the nature of the Crimes of which the Prisoner stood charged, and for which he was to be condemned; and by way of exhortation to the Prisoner to a serious repentance for his High Transgressions against God and the people, and to prepare for his eternal condition.

The Sentence formerly agreed upon, and put down in parchment-writing, O Yes being first made for Silence, was, by the Court's command, solemnly pronounced and given. The tenor whereof followeth:

Whereas the Commons of England, assembled in Parliament, have by their late Act, entitled, 'An Act of the Commons of England, assembled in parliament, for erecting of an High Court of Justice for the Try-

‘ing and Judging of Charles Stuart, king of ‘England,’ authorized and constituted us an ‘High Court of Justice for the Trying and ‘Judging of the said Charles Stuart, for the ‘Crimes and Treasons in the said act men‘tioned: By virtue whereof the said Charles ‘Stuart hath been three several times con‘victed before this High Court; where the ‘first day, being Saturday the 20th of Jan. inst.
 ‘in pursuance of the said Act, a Charge of ‘High Treason, and other High Crimes, was,
 ‘in the behalf of the people of England, exhi‘bited against him, and read openly unto him;
 ‘wherein he was charged, That he the said
 ‘Charles Stuart, being admitted King of Eng‘land, and therein trusted with a limited power ‘to govern by and according to the law of the ‘land, and not otherwise; and by his Trust, ‘Oath, and Office, being obliged to use the ‘power committed to him, for the good and ‘benefit of the people, and for the preservation ‘of their Rights and Liberties; yet neverthe‘less out of a wicked design to erect and up‘hold in himself an Unlimited and Tyrannical ‘Power to rule according to his will, and to ‘overthrow the Rights and Liberties of the ‘People, and to take away and make void the ‘foundations thereof, and of all redress and ‘remedy of misgovernment, which by the fun‘damental constitutions of this kingdom were ‘reserved on the people’s behalf, in the Right
 ‘and Power of frequent and successive Parlia‘ments, or national Meetings in Council; he
 ‘the said Charles Stuart, for accomplishment ‘of such his Designs, and for the protecting of ‘himself and his adherents in his and their ‘wicked practices, to the same end, hath trait‘torously and maliciously levied War against
 ‘the present Parliament, and people therein ‘represented, as with the circumstances of ‘time and place is in the said Charge more ‘particularly set forth: And that he hath there‘by caused and procured many thousands of ‘the free people of this nation to be slain; and ‘by divisions, parties, and insurrections within ‘this land, by invasions from foreign parts, en‘deavoured and procured by him, and by many
 ‘other evil ways and means, he, the said Charles ‘Stuart, hath not only maintained and carried ‘on the said War both by sea and land, but also ‘hath renewed, or caused to be renewed, the ‘said War against the Parliament and good ‘people of this nation in this present year 1648,
 ‘in several counties and places in this king‘dom, in the Charge specified; and that he ‘hath for that purpose given his Commission
 ‘to his Son the Prince, and others, whereby, ‘besides multitudes of other persons, many,
 ‘such as were by the parliament intrusted and ‘employed for the safety of this nation, being ‘by him or his agents corrupted, to the betray‘ing of their trust, and revolting from the Par‘liament, have had entertainment and com‘mission for the continuing and renewing of ‘the War and Hostility against the said Parlia‘ment and People: And that by the said cruel
 ‘and unnatural War so levied, continued and re‘newed, much innocent blood of the free peo‘ple of this nation hath been spilt, many fami‘lies undone, the public Treasure wasted, Trade ‘obstructed and miserably decayed, vast Ex‘pence and Damage to the nation incurred, ‘and many parts of the land spoiled, some of ‘them even to desolation: And that he still ‘continues his Commission to his said Son, and ‘other Rebels and Revolters, both English and ‘foreigners, and to the earl of Ormond, and to ‘the Irish Rebels and Revolters associated with ‘him, from whom further invasions upon this ‘land are threatened by his procurement, and ‘on his behalf: And that all the said wicked ‘Designs, Wars and evil Practices, of him, the ‘said Charles Stuart, were still carried on for ‘the advancement and upholding of the per‘sonal interest of Will, Power, and pretended ‘Prerogative to himself and his family, against

 ‘the public Interest, common Right, Liberty, ‘Justice, and Peace of the People of this na‘tion: And that he thereby hath been, and is ‘the Occasioner, Author, and Contriver of the ‘said unnatural, cruel, and bloody Wars, and ‘therein guilty of all the Treasons, Murders, ‘Rapines, Burnings, Spoils, Desolations, De‘mage, and Mischief to this Nation, acted and ‘committed in the said Wars, or occasioned ‘thereby. Whereupon the Proceedings and ‘Judgment of this Court were prayed against ‘him as a Tyrant, Traitor, and Murderer, and ‘public Enemy to the Commonwealth, as by ‘the said Charge more fully appeareth. To ‘which Charge, being read unto him as afore‘said, he the said Charles Stuart was required ‘to give his Answer; but he refused so to do.
 ‘And upon Monday the 22d day of Jan. inst.
 ‘being again brought before this Court, and ‘there required to answer directly to the said ‘Charge, he still refused so to do: Whereupon ‘his Default and Contumacy was entered.
 ‘And the next day, being the third time brought ‘before the Court, Judgment was then prayed ‘against him on the behalf of the People of ‘England for his Contumacy, and for the Mat‘ters contained against him in the said Charge, ‘as taking the same for confest, in regard of ‘his refusing to answer thereto: Yet notwith‘standing, this Court (not willing to take ad‘vantage of his Contempt) did once more re‘quire him to answer to the said Charge; ‘but he again refused so to do. Upon which ‘his several Defaults, this Court might justly ‘have proceeded to Judgment against him, ‘both for his Contumacy and the Matters of ‘the Charge, taking the same for confest, as ‘aforesaid.
 ‘Yet nevertheless this Court, for their own ‘clearer information, and further satisfaction, ‘thought fit to examine Witnesses upon oath,
 ‘and take notice of other Evidences touching
 ‘the Matters contained in the said Charge, ‘which accordingly they have done.
 ‘Now therefore upon serious and mature ‘deliberation of the premises, and considera‘tion had of the notoriety of the Matters of ‘Fact charged upon him, as aforesaid, this ‘ Court is in judgment and conscience satisfied ‘ that he the said Charles Stuart is guilty of ‘ levying War against the said Parliament and ‘ People, and maintaining and continuing the ‘ same; for which in the said Charge he stands ‘ accused, and by the general course of his ‘ Government, Counsels, and Practices, before ‘ and since this Parliament began (which have ‘ been and are notorious and public, and the ‘ effects whereof remain abundantly upon re‘ cord), this Court is fully satisfied in their ‘ judgments and consciences that he hath been

 ‘ and is guilty of the wicked Designs and En‘ deavours in the said Charge set forth; and ‘ that the said War hath been levied, main‘ tained, and continued by him, as aforesaid, in ‘ prosecution and for accomplishment of the ‘ said designs: And that he hath been and is ‘ the Occasioner, Author, and Continuer of the ‘ said unnatural, cruel, and bloody Wars, and ‘ therein guilty of High-Treason, and of the ‘ Murders, Rapines, Burnings, Spoils, Desola‘ tions, Damages, and Mischief to this Nation, ‘ acted and committed in the said War, and oc‘ casioned thereby. For all which Treasons ‘ and Crimes this Court doth adjudge, That he
 ‘ the said Charles Stuart, as a Tyrant, Traitor,
 ‘ Murderer, and public Enemy to the good ‘ people of this nation, shall be put to death by ‘ the severing his head from his body.’

This Sentence being read, the President spake as followeth.

‘ The Sentence now read and published, is ‘ the Act, Sentence, Judgment and Resolution
 ‘ of the whole Court.’

Whereupon the whole Court stood up, and owned it.

The Prisoner being withdrawn, the Court adjourned itself forthwith into the Painted Chamber.

The Court being sat in the Painted Chamber, according to adjournment from Westminster-hall, aforesaid:

[The more full Account of this Day's Action, take as follows:]

The King being come in, in his wonted posture, with his hat on, some of the soldiers began to call for Justice, Justice, and Execution.
 But silence being commanded, his majesty began:

King. I desire a word to be heard a little, and I hope I shall give no occasion of interruption.

Bradshaw answered, You may answer in your time, hear the Court first.

King. If it please you, Sir, I desire to be heard, and I shall not give any occasion of interruption, and it is only in a word: a sudden Judgment—

Bradshaw. Sir, you shall be heard in due time, but you are to hear the Court first.

King. Sir, I desire, it will be in order to what I believe the Court will say; and therefore, Sir, an hasty Judgment is not so soon recalled.

Bradshaw. Sir, you shall be heard before the Judgment be given, and in the mean time you may forbear.

King. Well, Sir, shall I be heard before the Judgment be given?

Bradshaw. Gentlemen, it is well known to all, or most of you here present, that the Prisoner at the bar hath been several times convened and brought before this Court to make answer to a Charge of Treason, and other high Crimes exhibited against him in the Name of the People of England [Here a lady interposed, saying, ‘Not half the people;’ but was silenced with threats*] to which Charge being required to answer, he hath been so far from obeying the commands of the Court by submitting to their justice, as he began to take

upon him to offer reasoning and debate unto the authority of the Court, and of the highest Court that constituted them to try and judge him: but being over-ruled in that, and required to make his Answer, he was still pleased to continue contumacious, and to refuse to submit or answer. Hereupon the Court, that they might not be wanting to themselves, to the trust reposed in them, nor that any man's wilfulness prevent justice, they have thought fit to take the matter into their consideration; they have considered of the Charge, they have considered of the Contumacy, and of that Confession, which in law doth arise upon that Contumacy: They have likewise considered of the notoriety of the fact charged upon this Prisoner, and upon the whole matter they are resolved, and are agreed upon a Sentence to be pronounced against this Prisoner: But in respect he doth desire to be heard, before the Sentence be read and pronounced, the Court hath resolved that they will hear him. Yet, sir, thus much I must tell you before-hand, which you have been minded of at other Courts, that if that which you have to say, be to offer any debate concerning the Jurisdiction, you are not to be heard in it; you have offered it formerly, and you struck at the root, that is, the power and supreme authority of the Commons of England, which this Court will not admit a debate of; and which indeed is an irrational thing in them to do, being a Court that acts upon Authority derived from them. But, sir, if you have any thing to say in defence of yourself concerning the matter charged, the Court hath given me in command to let you know they will hear you.

King. Since I see that you will not hear any thing of debate concerning that which I confess I thought most material for the Peace of the Kingdom, and for the Liberty of the Subject, I shall wave it; I shall speak nothing to it; but only I must tell you, That this many a day all things have been taken away from me, but that that I call more dear to me than my life, which is my conscience and my honour: And if I had a respect to my life more than the Peace of the Kingdom and the Liberty of the Subject, certainly I should have made a particular Defence for myself; for by that at leastwise I might have delayed an ugly Sentence, which I believe will pass upon me. Therefore, certainly, Sir, as a man that hath some understanding, some knowledge of the world, if that my true zeal to my country had not over-borne the care that I have for my own preservation, I should have gone another way to work than that I have done. Now, Sir, I conceive, that an hasty Sentence once passed, may sooner be repented of than recalled; and truly, the self-same desire that I have for the Peace of the Kingdom, and the Liberty of the Subject, more than my own particular ends, makes me now at last desire, that I have something to say that concerns both, before Sentence be given, that I may be heard in the Painted Chamber before the Lords and Commons.* This delay cannot be prejudicial to you, whatsoever I say; if that I say no reason, those that hear me must be judges; I cannot be judge of that that I have: if it be reason, and really for the Welfare of the Kingdom, and the Liberty of the Subject, I am sure on it, it is very well worth the hearing; therefore I do conjure you, as you love that that you pretend, I hope it is real, the Liberty of the Subject, the Peace of the Kingdom, that you will grant me this hearing before any Sentence be past. I only desire this, that you will take this into your consideration, it may be you have not heard of it before-hand; if you will, I'll retire, and you may think of it: but if I cannot get this Liberty, I do protest, that these shewes of Liberty and Peace are pure shewes, and that you will not hear your King.

Bradshaw. Sir, you have now spoken.

King. Yes, Sir.

Bradshaw. And this that you have said is a further declining of the Jurisdiction of this Court, which was the thing wherein you were limited before.

King. Pray excuse me, Sir, for my interruption, because you mistake me; it is not a declining of it, you do judge me before you hear me speak: I say it will not, I do not decline it, though I cannot acknowledge the Jurisdiction of the Court; yet, Sir, in this give me leave to say, I would do it, though I did not acknowledge it: in this I do protest it is not the declining of it, since I say, if that I do say any thing, but that that is for the Peace of the Kingdom and the Liberty of the Subject, then the shame is mine. Now I desire that you will take this into your consideration; if you will, I'll withdraw.

Bradshaw. Sir, this is not altogether new that you have moved to us, not altogether new to us, though the first time in person that you have offered it to the Court. Sir, you say you do not decline the jurisdiction of the Court.

King. Not in this that I have said.

Bradshaw. I understand you well, Sir; but nevertheless that which you have offered seems to be contrary to that saying of your's; for the Court are ready to give a sentence; it is not as you say, That they will not hear their King; for they have been ready to hear you, they have patiently waited your pleasure for three Courts together, to hear what you would say to the People's Charge against you, to which you have not vouchsafed to give any Answer at all. Sir, this tends to a further delay. Truly, Sir, such delays as these neither may the Kingdom nor Justice well bear; you have had three several days to have offered in this kind what you would have pleased. This Court is founded upon that Authority of the Commons of England, in whom rests the supreme Jurisdiction; that which you now tender, is to have another Jurisdiction, and a co-ordinate Jurisdiction. I know very well you express yourself, Sir, that notwithstanding that you would offer to the Lords and Commons in the Painted Chamber, yet nevertheless you would proceed on here, I did hear you say so. But, Sir, That you would offer there, whatever it is, must needs be in delay of the Justice here; so as if the Court be resolved, and prepared for the Sentence, this that you offer they are not bound to grant. But, Sir, according to that you seem to desire, and because you shall know the further pleasure of the Court upon that which you have moved, the Court will withdraw for a time.

* Some have thought this was a Proposal of renouncing the Crown in favour of his eldest son. Rapin says, "It is generally believed, he intended to propose to the parliament, that he would abdicate the crown in favour of his eldest son."

["This he did to prevent the disturbance of their scene by one of their own members, col. John Downes, who could not stifle the reluctance of his conscience, when he saw his majesty press so earnestly for a short hearing: but declaring himself unsatisfied, forced them to yield to the King's request." Nelson.]

King. Shall I withdraw?

Bradshaw. Sir, you shall know the pleasure of the Court presently.

The Court withdraws for half an hour into the Court of Wards.

Serjeant at Arms. The Court gives command, that the Prisoner be withdrawn; and they give order for his return again.

["Then withdrawing into the Chamber of the Court of Wards, their business was not to consider of his majesty's Desire, but to chide Downes, and with reproaches and threats to harden him to go through the remainder of their villainy with them." Nelson.]

Which done, they return; and being sat, Bradshaw commanded—"Serjeant at Arms, send for your Prisoner." Who being come,

Bradshaw proceeded. Sir, you were pleased to make a motion here to the Court, to offer a desire of yours, touching the propounding of somewhat to the Lords and Commons in the Painted Chamber, for the Peace of the Kingdom. Sir, you did, in effect, receive an Answer before the Court adjourned; truly, Sir, their withdrawing and adjournment was pro forma tantum; for it did not seem to them that there was any difficulty in the thing: they have considered of what you have moved, and have considered of their own Authority, which is founded, as hath been often said, upon the supreme Authority of the Commons of England, assembled in parliament. The Court acts according to their Commission. Sir, the return I have to you from the Court is this: That they have been too much delayed by you already, and this that you now offer hath occasioned some little further delay; and they are Judges appointed by the highest Authority; and Judges are no more to delay, than they are to deny Justice: they are good words in the great old Charter of England; "Nulli negabimus, nulli vendemus, nulli differemus justitiam." There must be no delay; but the truth is, Sir, and so every man here observes it, that you have much delayed them in your contempt and default, for which they might long since have proceeded to Judgment against you; and, notwithstanding what you have offered, they are resolved to proceed to Punishment and to Judgment, and that is their unanimous Resolution.*

King. Sir, I know it is in vain for me to dispute; I am no sceptic for to deny the power that you have; I know that you have power enough. Sir, I must confess, I think it would have been for the Kingdom's Peace, if you would have taken the pains to have shewn the lawfulness of your Power: for this Delay that I have desired, I confess it is a delay, but it is a delay very important for the Peace of the Kingdom: for it is not my person that I look at alone, it is the Kingdom's welfare, and the Kingdom's Peace; it is an old sentence, That we should think on long before we resolve of great matters suddenly. Therefore, Sir, I do say again, that I do put at your doors all the inconveniency of a hasty Sentence. I confess I have been here now, I think, this week; this day eight days was the day I came here first, but a little delay of a day or two farther may give Peace whereas a hasty Judgment may bring on that trouble and perpetual inconveniency to the kingdom, that the child that is unborn may repent it; and therefore again, out of the duty I owe to God and to my country, I do desire that I may be heard by the Lords and Commons in the Painted Chamber, or any other chamber that you will appoint me.

Bradshaw. Sir, you have been already answered to what you even now moved, being the same you moved before, since the Resolution and the Judgment of the Court in it; and the Court now requires to know whether you have any more to say for yourself, than you have said, before they proceed to Sentence.

King. I say this, Sir, That if you hear me, if you will give me but this Delay, I doubt not but I shall give some satisfaction to you all here, and to my people after that; and therefore I do require you, as you will answer it at

* Whitelocke says, "Many of the Commissioners in the debate of it" (the Resolution that what the King had tendered tended to delay, &c.) "in the Court of Wards, were against this Resolution, and pressed to satisfy the King's desire, and themselves to hear what the King would say to them in the Painted Chamber, before Sentence; but it was voted by the major part in the negative. Upon which colonel Harvey, and some others of the Commissioners, went away in discontent, and never sat with them afterwards. This proposal of the King's being denied by the Commissioners, the King thereupon declared himself, that he had nothing more to say."

the dreadful Day of Judgment, that you will consider it once again.

Bradshaw. Sir, I have received direction from the Court. King. Well, Sir.

Bradshaw. If this must be re-enforced, or any thing of this nature, your Answer must be the same; and they will proceed to Sentence, if you have nothing more to say.

King. Sir, I have nothing more to say; but I shall desire that this may be entered what I have said.

Bradshaw. The Court then, Sir, hath something to say unto you; which, although I know it will be very unacceptable, yet notwithstanding they are willing, and are resolved to discharge their duty.

["Then Bradshaw went on in a long Harangue, endeavouring to justify their Proceedings, misapplying Law and History, and raking up and wrestling whatsoever he thought fit for his Purpose, alledging the Examples of former Treasons and Rebellions, both at Home and abroad, as authentic proofs; and concluding, That the King was a Tyrant, Traitor, Murderer, and public Enemy to the Commonwealth of England. His majesty having with his wonted patience heard all these reproaches, answered:" Nelson.]

King. I would desire only one word before you give Sentence; and that is, That you would hear me concerning those great Imputations that you have laid to my Charge.

Bradshaw. Sir, you must give me now leave to go on; for I am not far from your Sentence, and your time is now past.

King. But I shall desire you will hear me a few words to you; for truly, whatever Sentence you will put upon me; in respect of those heavy Imputations, that I see by your Speech you have put upon me; Sir, It is very true, that—

Bradshaw. Sir, I must put you in mind; Truly, Sir, I would not willingly, at this time especially, interrupt you in any thing you have to say that is proper for us to admit of; but Sir, you have not owned us as a Court, and you look upon us as a sort of people met together; and we know what language we receive from your party. King. I know nothing of that.

Bradshaw. You disavow us as a Court; and therefore for you to address yourself to us, not to acknowledge us as a Court to judge of what you say, it is not be permitted. And the truth is all along, from the first time you were pleased to disavow and disown us, the Court needed not to have heard you one word: for unless they be acknowledged a Court, and engaged, it is not proper for you to speak. Sir, we have given you too much liberty already, and admitted of too much delay, and we may not admit of any farther. Were it proper for us to do, we should hear you freely, and we should not have declined to have heard you at large, what you could have said or proved on your behalf, whether for totally excusing, or for in part excusing those great and heinous Charges that in whole or in part are laid upon you. But, Sir,

I shall trouble you no longer; your sins are of so large a dimension, that if you do but seriously think of them, they will drive you to a sad consideration, and they may improve in you a sad and serious repentance: and that the Court doth heartily wish that you may be so penitent for what you have done amiss, that God may have mercy, at least-wise, upon your better part: truly, Sir, for the other, it is our part and duties to do that which the law prescribes. We are here not jus dare, but jus dicere. We cannot be unmindful of what the Scripture tells us, 'For to acquit the Guilty is of equal abomination, as to condemn the Innocent.' We may not acquit the guilty. What Sentence the law affirms to a Traitor, Tyrant, a Murderer, and a public Enemy to the Country, that sentence you are now to hear read unto you; and that is the Sentence of the Court.

Make an O-yes, and command silence while the Sentence is read.—Which done,

The Clerk read the SENTENCE,

(drawn up in parchment:)

"Whereas the Commons of England in Parliament had appointed them an High Court of Justice, for the Trial of Charles Stuart, King of England, before whom he had been three times convened; and at the first time a Charge of High Treason, and other Crimes and Misdemeanours, was read in the behalf of the kingdom of England," &c. [Here the Charge was repeated.] "Which Charge being read unto him, as aforesaid, he the said Charles Stuart was required to give his Answer; but he refused so to do:" [expressing the several Passages of his refusing, in the former Proceedings.] "For all which Treasons and Crimes this Court doth adjudge, That he the said Charles Stuart, as a Tyrant, Traitor, Murderer; and a public Enemy, shall be put to death, by the severing of his Head from his Body."

Which being read,

Bradshaw added; The Sentence now read and published is the Act, Sentence, Judgment, and resolution of the whole Court.

To which they all expressed their assent by standing up as was before agreed and ordered.

His Majesty then said, Will you hear me a word, Sir?

Bradshaw. Sir, you are not to be heard after the Sentence. King. No, Sir?

*Bradshaw. No, Sir; by your favour, Sir, Guard, withdraw your Prisoner.

King. I may speak after Sentence, by your favour, Sir: I may speak after my Sentence, ever. By your Favour (Hold!), the Sentence, Sir—I say, Sir, I do—I am not suffered to speak: expect what justice other people will have.

[His Majesty being taken away by the Guard, as he passed down the stairs, the insolent Soldiers scoffed at him, casting the smoke of their tobacco, a thing very distasteful unto him, in his face, and throwing their pipes in his way; and one more insolent than the rest, spitting in his face*; his majesty, according to his wonted heroic patience, took no more notice of so strange and barbarous an indignity, than to wipe it off with his handkerchief.

As he passed along, hearing the rabble of Soldiers crying out, 'Justice!' 'Justice!' he said, 'Poor souls, for a piece of Money they would do so for their commanders.'

Being brought first to sir Robert Cotton's, and thence to Whitehall, the soldiers continued their brutish carriage toward him, abusing all that seemed to shew any respect, or any pity to him; not suffering him to rest in his chamber, but thrusting in, and smoking their tobacco, and disturbing his privacy. But through all these trials, unusual to princes, he passed with such a calm and even temper, that he let fall nothing unbecoming his former majesty and magnanimity.

In the evening, a Member of the Army acquainted the Committee, with his majesty's Desire, That seeing they had passed a Sentence of Death upon him, and his time might be nigh, he might see his Children; and Dr. Juxon, bishop of London, might be admitted to assist him in his private Devotions, and receiving the Sacrament. Both which at length were granted.†

And the next day, being Sunday, he was attended by the guard to St. James's,‡ where the bishop preached before him upon these words, "In the Day when God shall judge the Secrets of all Men by Jesus Christ according to my Gospel. *Nalson.]

Martial of an exorbitant extent and latitude. His majesty (as I heard) read some few of the Propositions, and throwing them aside, told them he would rather become a sacrifice for his People than betray their Laws and Liberties, Lives and Estates, together with the Church and Commonwealth, and the honour of his crown, to so intolerable a bondage of an armed faction." Clarendon says nothing of this, nor does Hume repeat it.

* "Sunday Jan. 28, the King was attended by a Guard from Whitehall to St. James's; where the Bishop of London, after Prayers, preached before him on these words, Rom. 2, 16. 'In the Day when God shall judge the secrets of all men by Jesus Christ according to my Gospel.' Upon which he explained the doctrine of a future Judgment, and made an application suited to the sad Occasion, and after that administered the Sacrament. The King spent the remainder of the day in prayer and meditation, and pious conference with the good Bishop, avoiding all interruption, and for that reason refusing to admit the Prince Elector, the duke of Richmond, marquis of Hertford, earls of Southampton and Lindsey, and some others, who came to offer their last duties to him; but, said the King, 'My time is short and precious, and I am desirous to improve it the best I may in preparation: I hope they will not take it ill that none have access to me but my Children: the best office they can do now, is to pray for me.'

"Monday Jan. 29, the King's Children being brought to take their leave of him, he first gave his blessing to the lady Elizabeth, and bid her remember to tell her brother James, whenever she should see him, that 'it was his Father's last desire, that he should no more look upon Charles as his eldest brother only, but be obedient unto him as his Sovereign; and that they should love one another, and forgive their Father's enemies.' Then said the King to her, 'Sweet-heart, you will forget this.' 'No,' said she, 'I shall never forget it whilst I live.' He wished her not to grieve and torment herself for him; for 'it would be a glorious death that he should die, it being for the Laws and Liberties of this Land, and for maintaining the true Protestant religion.' He bid her read bishop Andrews's Sermons, Hooker's Ecclesiastical Policy, and bishop Laud's Book against Fisher, which would ground her against Popery. He told her, 'He had forgiven all his enemies, and hoped God would forgive them.' He bid her tell her Mother, that 'his thoughts had never strayed from her, and that his love should be the same to the last.'

"Then taking the duke of Gloucester on his knees, he said, 'Sweet-heart, now they will † Ludlow, Mem. vol. 1, p. 244, after mentioning that the King refused such ministers as the Court appointed to attend him, relates, in a tone of spleen and contempt very little creditable to his feelings, some particulars of Juxon's attendance upon his Majesty.

‡ Clement Walker, in his History of Independency, part 2, s. 90, says, "28th Jan. Being the last Sabbath the King kept in this life, some of the grantees of the army and parliament tendered to the King a Paper book with promise of life and some shadow of regality, as I hear, if he subscribed it. It contained many particulars destructive to the Fundamental Government, Religion, Laws, Liberties and Property of the People. One whereof was instanced to me; viz. that the King should, amongst many other demands, pass an act of parliament for keeping on foot the Militia of this army, during the pleasure of the grantees who should be trusted with that Militia, and with power from time to time to recruit and continue them to the number of 40,000 horse and foot under the same general and officers; with power, notwithstanding, in the Council of War to chuse new officers and generals from time to time as occasion shall happen, and they think fit, and to settle a very great Tax upon the people by a Land Rate for an established pay for the Army, to be collected and levied by the Army themselves; and a Court

At which the Child sighing, said, 'I will be torn in pieces first:' which falling so unexpectedly from one so young, it made the King rejoice exceedingly. At parting, the King commanded them both to be obedient to their Mother, and bid the lady Elizabeth send his blessing to the rest of her Brothers and Sisters, with commendation to all his friends.

'The Prince, then in Holland, had conveyed a Letter to his majesty by Mr. Seamour, and by the States Ambassadors had interceded with the Parliament, and used all possible means with the Army, to prevent, or at least to defer, the Execution. But all in vain; for a Warrant was this Day signed and sealed by 59 of those execrable Judges, directed to colonel Francis Hacker, colonel Huncks, and lieutenant-colonel Phray, and to every of them, 'Willing and requiring them to see the said Sentence executed in the open Street before Whitehall, upon the morrow, being the 30th day of this instant month of January, between the hours of ten in the morning and five in the afternoon of the same day, with full effect.' Which original Warrant has been lately discovered, and now remains a Record of Infamy to this nation.

'Tuesday Jan. 30, the King having slept soundly for about four hours, awakened near two hours before day; and calling to Mr. Herbert, who lay by his bed-side, bid him rise; 'For' (says the King) 'I will get up, having a great Work to do this day. Herbert, This is my second Marriage-Day: I would be as triumphant to day as may be, for before night I hope to be espoused to my blessed Jesus.' He then appointed what cloaths he would wear; and, says he, 'Let me have a shirt on more than ordinary, by reason the season is so sharp as probably may make me shake: which some observers will imagine proceeds from fear: I would have no such imputation; I fear not Death; death is not terrible to me: I bless my God, I am prepared.' Soon after the King was dressed, came Dr. Juxon bishop of London, precisely at the time his majesty had the night before appointed; and being first an hour in private with him, called in Mr. Herbert, and prayed in the Prayers of the Church, reading the 27th Chapter of St. Matthew, which relates the Passion of our Saviour. After Service, the King thanked the Bishop for making choice of that Chapter, being applicable to his present condition: the Bishop replied, 'May it please your gracious majesty, it is the proper Lesson for the day, as appears by the Calendar.' At which the King was much affected, and thought it a providential Preparation for his Death.

'About ten o'clock colonel Hacker knocked easily at the King's chamber-door; and knocking louder a second time, the King commanded Mr. Herbert to go to the door, who demanding why he knocked? Hacker said, He would speak with the King: the King said, 'Let him come in.' He came in trembling, and told his majesty, It was time to go to Whitehall, where he might have some farther time to rest. 'Well,' (says the King) 'Go forth, I will come presently.' Soon after, the King took the Bishop by the hand, and said, 'Come, let us go;' and spoke thus to Mr. Herbert, 'Open the Door, Hacker has given us a second Warning.' The King passed through the Garden into the Park, where several Companies of Foot were drawn up, and made a Guard on each side, the Bishop walking on the King's right-hand, and colonel Thomlinson on his left, both bare-headed: the King walked very fast, and calling on them to walk faster, said, 'He now went before them to strive for a heavenly Crown, with less solicitude than he had often encouraged his Soldiers to fight for an earthly diadem.' At the end of the Park the King went up the Steps leading to the Long Gallery, and so into the Cabinet-Chamber, where, after several Prayers and pious Discourse, about twelve he ate a bit of bread, and drank a glass of Claret. Soon after colonel Hacker came to the Chamber-door, and gave his last signal. The Bishop and Mr. Herbert weeping fell upon their knees, and the King gave them his hand to kiss, and helped up the aged Bishop, and said, 'Open the Door;' and bidding Hacker go on, said, 'I'll follow.' So he was conducted through the Banqueting-house to the Scaffold by a passage made through a window. Many Companies of Foot and troops of horse were placed to keep off the spectators, whereby the majesty was disappointed of speaking to the People: and therefore directing himself chiefly to colonel Thomlinson, he said, &c.,' 3 Kenn. Forty-eight Commissioners present.

Upon Report made from the Committee for considering the Time and Place of the executing of the Judgment against the King, that the said Committee have resolved, That the open street before Whitehall is a fit Place, and that the said Committee conceive it fit that the King be there executed the morrow, the King having already notice thereof: The Court approved thereof, and ordered a Warrant to be drawn for that purpose. Which said Warrant was accordingly drawn and agreed unto, and ordered to be engrossed; which was done, and signed and sealed accordingly, as followeth, viz.

At the High Court of Justice for the Trying and Judging of Charles Stuart King of England, Jan. 29, 1649.

‘Whereas Charles Stuart, King of England, is and standeth convicted, attainted and condemned of High Treason, and other High Crimes; and Sentence upon Saturday last was pronounced against him by this Court, to be put to death, by the severing of his head from his body, of which Sentence execution yet remaineth to be done: These are therefore to will and require you to see the said Sentence executed in the open street before Whitehall, upon the morrow, being the thirtieth day of this instant month of January, between the hours of ten in the morning, and five in the afternoon of the same day, with full effect: And for so doing, this shall be your sufficient Warrant. And these are to require all officers, soldiers, and others, the good people of this Nation of England, to be assisting unto you in this service.’

then drawn by him into seeking God by Prayer, till the blow was over. Sir Thomas Herbert assures us, That while the Bishop and he were going with the King's body to be embalmed, he stepped into the Long Gallery, and the General there meeting him, asked him, ‘How the King did?’ Which he at first thought strange; but he afterward perceived, that the General knew not what had passed, being all that morning using his power and interest to have the Execution deferred for some days, forbearing to come among the officers, and fully resolving with his own regiment to prevent the blow, or to defer it till he could make a party in the army to second his design: but being with the officers of the army then at prayer in colonel Harrison's apartment, he came from thence without knowledge of the matter, and was much surprised when Mr. Herbert told him of it.” 3 Kenn. Compl. Hist. 172.

Hume says, “A fresh instance of hypocrisy was displayed the very day of the King's death. The generous Fairfax, not content with being absent from the Trial, had used all the interest which he yet retained, to prevent the execution of the fatal Sentence; and had even employed persuasion with his own regiment, though none else would follow him, to rescue the King from his disloyal murderers. Cromwell and Ireton, informed of this intention, endeavoured to convince him, that the Lord had rejected the King; and they exhorted him to seek by prayer some direction from heaven on this important occasion: but they concealed from him that they had already signed the warrant for the execution. Harrison was the person appointed to join in prayer with the unwary general. By agreement, he prolonged his doleful cant, till intelligence arrived, that the fatal blow was struck. He then rose from his knees, and insisted with Fairfax, that this event was a miraculous and providential answer, which heaven had sent to their devout supplications.”

This anecdote is ben trovato, and has with it a dramatic air, in favour of which Mr. Hume's style of writing history, disposes him on all occasions to sacrifice a scrupulous attention to authenticity. But there is scarcely a possibility of its truth. The part assigned to Harrison is grossly incongruous with his character, and the whole story is contradicted by the evidence of colonel Huncks on the Trial of colonel Hacker, Oct. 15, 1660, post. For these reasons it is rightly rejected by Harris. See his Life of Oliver Cromwell, note (G. G.), in which he investigates the principal share which Cromwell had in bringing about the death of Charles. Some particulars of the Application in favour of Charles by the Dutch Ambassadors, and of

Ordered, That Mr. Marshall, Mr. Nye, Mr. Caryl, Mr. Salway, and Mr. Dell, be desired to attend the King, to administer to him those Spiritual Helps as should be suitable to his present condition. And lieutenant-colonel Goffe is desired forthwith to repair unto them for that purpose.

Who did so, but after informed the Court, That the King being acquainted therewith, refused to confer with them; expressing, that he would not be troubled with them.

Ordered, That the Scaffold upon which the King is to be executed, be covered with black.

the Answer of the Lords, after the King's Execution, "that the Lord had disposed of him," may be found in 3 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 1279—1284. Lord Clarendon, as is stated there, gives a very particular account of the motives and other circumstances of the Embassy.

The Bishop of London read divine service before his Majesty; and the 27th of St. Matthew, the History of our Saviour's Passion, being appointed by the Church for that day, he gave the Bishop thanks for his seasonable choice of the Lesson; but the Bishop acquainting him that it was the service of the day, it comforted him exceedingly; then he proceeded to receive the Holy Sacrament. His devotions being ended, he was brought from St. James's

* We have seen (p. 1130) that on Sunday the 28th, the King was taken to St. James's; (see Hacker's Trial, A.D. 1660, infra). Nevertheless Clement Walker in his History of Independency, p. 110, says, "The King lay Sunday night so near the place appointed for the separation of his soul and body, that he might hear every stroke the workmen gave upon the scaffold, where they wrought all night. This is a new device to mortify him, but it would not do." Hume, vol. 7, p. 143, citing, as his authority Walker, says, "Every night during the interval between the sentence and the execution of the King, he slept sound as usual, the noise of the workmen employed in framing the scaffold and other preparations for his execution, continually resounded in his ears."

Upon this, Laing, 3 Hist. of Scotland, 397, (n. 63), observes: "That his slumbers were disturbed each night by the noise of erecting his scaffold, is an injudicious fiction, first invented by Clement Walker in order to aggravate the deed. Herbert attended the king's person and slept in his chamber, from the beginning of his Trial to the last hour of his life. But that Hume should assert, on such authority as Clement Walker, a fact contradicted by every other historian, is the more surprising, as Herbert's Memoirs lay open before him; and from the copy in the Advocate's Library, now in my hands, appear to be marked with his pencil at the very passage (p. 117), which mentions that the king was removed, two hours after his Trial, from Whitehall to St. James's. But, on this occasion, Hume wrote too much for dramatic effect."

Fox writing to Mr. Laing says, "I had detected the trick of Hume's theatrical and false representation of Charles the First hearing the noise of his scaffold, but did not know that he had had Herbert's authentic account so lately under his eye. In general, I think you treat him (Hume) too tenderly. He was an excellent man, and of great powers of mind, but his partiality to kings and princes is intolerable. Nay, it is, in my opinion, quite ridiculous, and is more like the foolish admiration which women and children sometimes have for kings, than the opinion, right or wrong, of a philosopher." See Lord Holland's Preface to Mr. Fox's History of the early part of the reign of King James the Second, p. xx.—Oldmixon and Mrs. Macaulay (Hist. vol. 4, p. 415), had before noticed the falsehood of Walker's tale, though, indeed, Mr. Macaulay's account is not very accurate. In a pamphlet intitled, "King Charles his Speech to Whitehall, by a regiment of foot, besides his private guard of partisans; the bishop of London on the one hand, and colonel Tomlinson, who had the charge of him, on the other, bare-headed. The Guards marching a slow pace, the King bid them go faster, saying, That he now went before them to strive for an heavenly crown. Being come to the end of the Park, he went up the stairs leading to the Long-Gallery in Whitehall, where formerly he used to lodge, and there finding an unexpected delay, the scaffold being not ready, he past most of the time in prayer. About twelve o'clock, (his Majesty having eat a bit of bread, and drank a glass of claret), colonel Hacker, with other officers and soldiers, brought the King, with the Bishop, and colonel Tomlinson, through the Banqueting-house to the Scaffold. A strong guard of several Regiments of Horse and Foot were planted on all sides, which hindered the near approach of the people, and the King from being heard, and therefore he chiefly directed his Speech to the bishop and colonel Tomlinson, as follows:

‘I shall be very little heard of any body else; I shall therefore speak a word to you here: Indeed, I could hold my peace very well, if I did not think that holding my peace would make some men think that I did submit to the Guilt, as well as the punishment: but I think it is my duty to God and my country to clear myself, both as an honest man, a good King, and a good Christian. I shall begin first with my Innocency; in troth, I think it not very needful to insist long upon this; for all the world knows that I did never begin a War with the two Houses of Parliament; and I call God to witness, to whom I must shortly make an account, that I did never intend to encroach upon their privileges; they began upon me. It is the Militia they began upon; they confessed the Militia was mine, but they thought fit to have it from me: and, to be short, if any body will look to the Dates of Commissions, of their Commissions and mine, and likewise to the Declarations, he will see clearly that they began these Troubles, not I. So that as for the Guilt of these enormous crimes that are laid against me, I hope in God that God will clear me of. I will not, I am in charity, and God forbid I should lay it upon the two Houses of Parliament; there is made upon the scaffold at Whitehall-Gate immediately before his execution, on Tuesday the 30th of Jan. 1649. With a Relation of the manner of his going to execution. Published by special Authority, 1649, (and which seems to have been written very soon after the event, for in the end of the pamphlet, it is said, “The King’s body now lies in his lodging chamber in Whitehall.”) it is noticed, that “the King desired to have the use (for his reception, as it seems, at Whitehall, preparatory to his execution) of the cabinet and the little room next it, where there was a trap-door.”

‘no necessity of either: I hope they are free of this guilt; for I believe, that ill instruments between them and me have been the cause of all this bloodshed; so that as I find myself clear of this, I hope, and pray God that they may too: yet, for all this, God forbid I should be so ill a Christian, as not to say God’s Judgments are just upon me; Many times he doth pay justice by an unjust Sentence, that is ordinary. I will only say this, that an unjust Sentence that I suffered to take effect, is punished now by an unjust Sentence upon me: So far I have said to shew you that I am an innocent man.

‘Now, to shew you that I am a good Christian, I hope there is a good man’ [pointing to bishop Juxon] ‘that will bear me witness, that I have forgiven all the world, and even those in particular that have been the chief causes of my death; who they are, God knows; I do not desire to know: I pray God forgive them. But this is not all, my charity must go further; I wish that they may repent. For, indeed, they have committed a great sin in that particular. I pray God, with St. Stephen, that it be not laid to their Charge; nay, not only so, but that they may take the right way to the peace of the kingdom; for my charity commands me not only to forgive particular men, but to endeavour, to the last gasp, the peace of the kingdom. So, Sirs, I do wish, with all my soul (I hope there are some here that will carry it farther), and endeavour the Peace of the kingdom. Now, Sirs, I must shew you both how you are out of the way, and will put you in the way. First, you are out of the way; for certainly all the ways you ever had yet, as I could find by any thing, is in the way of Conquest; certainly this is an ill way; for Conquest, Sirs, in my opinion, is never just, except there be a good and just cause, either for Matter of Wrong, or a just Tide; and then if you go beyond the first quarrel, that makes that unjust at the end that was just at first; if there be only Matter of Conquest, then it is a great robbery, as a pirate said to Alexander, that he was a great robber, he was but a petty robber. And so, Sirs, I think the way you are in is much out of the way. Now, Sirs, to put you in the way, believe it, you shall never go right, nor God will never prosper you, until you give God his due, the King his due (that is, my successor), and the People their due: I am as much for them as any of you. You must give God his due, by regulinting rightly his Church, according to the Scripture, which is now out of Order; to set you in a way particularly now, I cannot; but only this, a national Synod freely called, freely debated among themselves, must settle this when every opinion is freely heard. For the King’ [Then turning to a gentlemen that touched the Ax, he said, ‘Hurt not the Ax, that may hurt me.’]—Indeed I will not—the Laws of the land will clearly instruct you for that;

'therefore because it concerns my own particular, I shall only give you a touch of it. For the People, truly I desire their Liberty and Freedom as much as any body whatsoever; but I must tell you, that their Liberty and Freedom consist in having government, those laws by which their lives and their goods may be most their own. It is not their having a share in the government—that is nothing appertaining to them. A subject and a sovereign are clean different things; and therefore until you do that, I mean, that you put the People in that Liberty, as I say, certainly they will never enjoy themselves.

'Sirs, it was for this that now I am come here. If I would have given way to an Arbitrary Way, to have all Laws changed according to the power of the sword, I needed not to have come here; and therefore I tell you (and I pray God it be not laid to your charge), that I am the Martyr of the People. In troth, Sirs, I shall not hold you much longer: I will only say this to you, That I could have desired a little time longer, because I would have a little better digested this I have said, and therefore I hope you will excuse me; I have delivered my conscience, I pray God you take those courses that are the best for the good of the kingdom and your own salvation.'

Bishop. Though your majesty's affections may be very well known as to Religion; yet it may be expected that you should say something thereof for the world's satisfaction.

King. 'I thank you heartily, my Lord, for that I had almost forgotten it. In troth, Sirs, my conscience in Religion, I think, is very well known to all the world; and therefore I declare before you all, that I die a Christian, according to the profession of the Church of England, as I found it left me by my father; and this honest man I think will witness it.'

Then turning to the officers, he said, 'Sirs, excuse me for this same: I have a good cause, and I have a gracious God, I will say no more.'

Then to colonel Hacker, he said, 'Take care that they do not put me to pain: And Sir, this and it please you—'

But a gentleman coming near the Ax, the King said, 'Take heed of the Ax, pray take heed of the Ax.'

Then speaking unto the Executioner, he said, 'I shall say but very short prayers, and when I thrust out my hands—'

Then he called to the Bishop, for his night-cap, and having put it on, he said to the Executioner, 'Does my hair trouble you?' who desired him to put it all under his cap, which the King did accordingly, by the help of the Executioner and the Bishop. Then turning to Dr. Juxon, he said, 'I have a good Cause, and a gracious God on my side.'

Bishop. There is but one stage more, this stage is turbulent and troublesome, it is a short one; but you may consider it will soon carry you a very great way, it will carry you from earth to heaven; and there you will find a great deal of cordial joy and comfort.

King. 'I go from a corruptible to an incorruptible crown, where no disturbance can be, no disturbance in the world.'

Bishop. You are exchanged from a temporary to an eternal crown, a good exchange.

Then the King said to the Executioner, 'Is my hair well?' and took off his cloke and his George*, giving his George to the Bishop,

* Hume says, "It being remarked, that the King, the moment before he stretched out his neck to the Executioner, had said to Juxon, with a very earnest accent, the single word 'Remember;' great mysteries were supposed to be concealed under that expression; and the generals vehemently insisted with the prelate, that he should inform them of the king's meaning. Juxon told them, that the king, having frequently charged him to inculcate on his son the forgiveness of his murderers, had taken this opportunity, in the last moment of his life, when his commands, he supposed, would be regarded as sacred and inviolable, to reiterate that desire; and that his mild spirit thus terminated its present course, by an act of benevolence towards his greatest enemies." But he does not cite any authority. In the "Regii sanguinis Clamor ad Cœlum contra Parricidas Anglicanos;" of the younger Peter Du Moulin (a work not destitute of just thoughts or eloquent passages, though the Latin of it is not in all parts unexceptionable, and some of the sentiments are by no means over charitable,) is the following passage, 'At detrusus in carcerem episcopus Londinensis non simplici de causâ asservabatur. Auditus fuerat Rex in fatali pegmate Episcopo ingemissans, Memento, Memento. Exprimendus igitur erat à magno viro, quid id rei esset, quod tantâ cum curâ Rex, morti proximus, juberet eum meminisse. Productus Episcopus coram Regis judicibus, jussusque non sine gravissimis minis illud edere, didi conticuit adjuratus tandem mœram et totam veritatem eloqui, "Jusserat me," inquit, "Rex Dominus meus ut si possem ad Principem filium et hæredem suum pervenire, hoc supremum meritis patris mandatum ad eum preferrem, ut Regno et Potestati suæ restitutus, vobis suæ necis authoribus ignosceret: Hoc vero me meminisse Rex ite:um atque iterum jussit. O! Regem etiam interfectoris suis venerandum! O! piûm Populi sui Patrem! O! genuinæ Christi Discipulum, qui etiam post mortem pro inimicis suis deprecatur!"' Whether Hume believed this Anecdote to be genuine may possibly admit of doubt. He relates it indeed, as we have seen, upon an occasion on which it tends to raise the character of Charles the First: but in his account of the treatment of the Regicides, where this anecdote might operate to the disadvantage of Charles the Second's character, not only he mentions it not, but he makes not the saying, 'Remember.' Then he put off his doublet, and being in his waistcoat, he put on his cloke again; then looking upon the block, he said to the Executioner, 'You must set it fast.'

Executioner. It is fast, sir.

King. 'When I put out my hands this way,' (stretching them out) 'then'—After that, having said two or three words to himself, as he stood with his hands and eyes lift up, immediately stooping down, he laid his neck upon the block*. And then the Executioner again putting his hair under his cap, the King thinking he had been going to strike said, 'Stay for the sign.'

Executioner. Yes, I will, an't please your majesty.—After a little pause, the King stretching forth his hands, the Executioner at one blow severed his head from his body, and held it up and shewed it to the people, saying, 'Behold the head of a Traitor!'. At the instant slightest allusion to it. In "King Charles his Speech," &c. published 1640, it is said to be then supposed that the word 'Remember,' referred to the giving the King's George to his son. Rushworth's words are, "Then the King took off his cloke and his George, giving his George to Dr. Juxon, saying, 'Remember,' (it is thought for the Prince)." Oldmixon, who however cites no authority, says, (vol. 2, p. 369.) "The Council of State after the King was beheaded, was willing to know the meaning of his last expression 'Remember,' and called Dr. Juxon before them to give an account of it, who told them, "That the King immediately before his coming out to the place of execution, had charged him to carry to the Prince his George, with these his two last commands, 'That he should forgive his murderers, and that if ever he came to the crown, he should so govern his subjects as not to force them upon extremities.'" Neither Clarendon nor Whitelocke attempt to explain the word 'Remember.' It should be noticed, that by a Letter dated Nov. 49, 1648, king Charles, in strong though general expressions, exhorts his son (afterwards Charles the Second) to placability, and dissuades him from revenge. See the Works of King Charles the First, fol. p. 351.

* Kennett says, "It must be dreadfully remembered, that the then cruel powers did suspect, that the king would not submit his head to the block; and therefore to bring him down by violence to it, they had prepared hooks and staples (made by a smith in Aldgate) to hawl him as a victim to the slaughter. But by the example of his Saviour, he resisted not, he disappointed their wit, and yielded to their malice." See too the Trial of Hulet, n. d. 1660, infra.

† Kennett (Compl. Hist. 2d ed. vol. 3, p. 367, note a) says, "It was never yet proved or discovered, who was the bold Executioner of the King: that which most led to the knowledge of him, was a story I heard related by archbishop Denison, who when vicar of St.

when the blow was given, there was a dismal Universal Groan among the people; and as soon as the Execution was over, one troop of horse marched immediately from Charing-Cross to King-street, and another from King-street to Charing-Cross, on purpose to disperse and scatter the people. The corpse was put into a coffin, and the Bishop and Mr. Herbert went with it to the Back-stairs to have it embalmed; after embalming, his head was sewed on, and the corpse was wrapt in lead, and the coffin covered with a velvet pall, and then removed to St. James's. Mr. Herbert then made application to such as were in power, that it might be interred in Henry 7's chapel; but it was denied, for that his burying there would attract infinite numbers of all sorts thither; which, as the times then were, was judged unsafe and inconvenient. Mr. Herbert acquainting the Bishop with this, they then resolved to bury the King's body in the royal chapel of St. George, within the Castle of Windsor, both in regard that his majesty was sovereign of the most noble Order of the Garter, and that several Kings had been there interred; namely, king Henry 6, Edward 4, and Henry 8, upon which consideration, the Committee of Parliament was addressed to the second time, who, after some deliberation, gave Orders, bearing date Feb. 6, 1649, authorizing Mr. Herbert and Mr. Anthony Mitham to bury the King's body there. Accordingly the corpse was carried thither from St. James's, Feb. 7, in a hearse covered with black velvet, drawn by six horses covered with black cloth, and attended by about a dozen gentlemen*.

Martins, had a young woman come to him to visit her dying father in a yard or lunc in King's-street Westminster, and importuning him much to go with her; she said her father lay under the horror of having cut off the King's head. When he came the person was dead, and no Confession was left in writing, nor any other account to be got but that the person had been a sort of a butcher or cattle drover, at St. Ives in Huntingdonshire, was sent for up by Oliver Cromwell about the end of 1648, had ever since lived obscurely by a feigned name, and received a yearly pension, which died with him. The Archbishop sent me to enquire at the Griffin or Green Dragon Tavern in Fleet-street, about the said surviving daughter, but the people of the house being changed, I could learn nothing." It has been said that col. Joyce was the King's Executioner. Whitelocke (Mem. 370) says, "Two men in disguises and vizors stood upon the scaffold for Executioners." See different relations concerning this matter in the Trials of Axtell, and Hacker, and Hulet, n. d. 1660, post, and some farther particulars in the Gentleman's Magazine for Nov. 1767 (vol. 37, p. 548, 549). Jan. 1768 (vol. 38, p. 90.) and for 1784 (vol. 54, p. 409).

The King's Statue was afterwards taken down from the Royal Exchange in London, where it was set up again by the city in the

to his lodging chamber in Whitehall. Being embalmed and laid in a coffin of lead to be seen for some days, at length upon Wednesday the 7th of February, it was delivered to four of his servants, Herbert, Mildway, Preston, and Joyner, who with some others in mourning equipage attended the hearse that night to Windsor, and placed it in the room which was formerly the King's bed-chamber. Next day it was removed into the Deans-hall, which was hung with black, and made dark, and lights were set burning round the hearse. About three in the afternoon the duke of Richmond, the marquis of Hartford, the earls of Southampton and Lindsey, and the bishop of London, came thither, with two Votes passed that morning, whereby the ordering of the King's Burial was committed to the Duke, provided that the Expences thereof exceeded not 500*l*. This Order they shewed to col. Whichcot the Governor of the Castle, desiring the interment might be in St. George's Chapel, and according to the form of the Common Prayer: The latter request the Governor denied, saying, That it was improbable the Parliament would permit the use of what they had so solemnly abolished, and therein destroy their own Act. The lords replied, That there was a difference betwixt destroying their own Act, and dispensing with it; and that no power so binds its own hands, as to disable itself in some cases. But all prevailed not." See, too, 3 Cobb. Parl. Hist. p. 1282, 1283. The House of Commons ordered the common post to be stopped till Letters were prepared to be sent to the several Sheriffs in England and Wales, to publish and proclaim, in their different counties and districts, the said Act, which was in these words: "Whereas Charles Stuart, king of England, being, for the notorious treasons, tyrannies, and murders committed by him in the late unnatural and cruel wars, condemned to death; whereupon, after execution of the same, several pretences may be made, and title set on foot, unto the Kingly Office, to the apparent bazard of the public peace; for prevention thereof, be it enacted and ordained by this present parliament, and by the authority of the same, That no persons whatsoever do presume to proclaim, declare, publish, or any way promote Charles Stuart, (son of the said Charles) commonly called the Prince of Wales, or any other person, to be king or chief magistrate of England or Ireland, or any the dominions belonging to them, or either of them, without the said consent in parliament signified as aforesaid, he shall be deemed and adjudged a Traitor to the Commonwealth, and shall suffer pains of death, and such other punishments as belong to the crime of High Treason."

* On the 9th of August, 1649, an Order was made in the House of Commons, for taking down and demolishing the Arms of the late king in all public places, and likewise all Statues of him, and Inscriptions. There is a story, that the Equestrian Statue of king Charles, now at Charing-Cross, was sold to one River, a brazier, who buried it in his garden, and offered for sale articles, which he represented to be composed of the materials of the statue; and that those articles were eagerly purchased by the royalists, as relics of a martyr, and by their adversaries, as tokens of their success.

The Character of this Prince has been represented more variously than that, perhaps, of any other person mentioned in English story. It were vain to refer the Reader to the numerous Historians of his reign, and biographers of himself. Hume is his professed panegyrist; yet he admits that, "The king had in some instances stretched his prerogative beyond its just bounds, and, aided by the Church, had well nigh put an end to all the liberties and privileges of the nation." Hist. c. 60, last paragraph. Hume also incidentally and I believe truly, ascribes to the King two qualities, which at the same time that they are an infallible indication of very great imbecility of character, can scarcely in a King fail to be very mischievous to himself and to his people. Speaking of Charles's averseness to make peace with Spain after the breach in 1696, between him and his second Parliament, Hume says, "There are two circumstances in Charles's character, seemingly incompatible, which attended him during the whole course of his reign, and were in part the cause of all his misfortunes: he was very steady, and even obstinate in his purpose; and he was easily governed, by reason of his facility, and of his deference to men much inferior to himself both in morals and understanding. His great ends he inflexibly maintained: but the means of attaining them, he readily received from his ministers and favourites; though not always fortunate in his choice."

Among the representations of this Prince which I have met with, one which appears to me to be most candid and judicious occurs—where perhaps but few would look for such a character of him—in a 30th of January Sermon before the House of Lords.

"Thus fell the unhappy King in a popular storm; raised indeed by himself; but influenced by his enemies, even after he had corrected the disorder of those unruly elements which gave it birth, and were now ready, as he saw too late, to bear down all things in their course: The king had many virtues, but all of so unsociable a turn as to do him neither service nor credit. His religion, in which he was sincerely zealous, was over-run with scruples; and the simplicity if not the purity of his morals were debased by casuistry. His natural affections (a rare virtue in that high situation) were so excessive as to render him a slave to all his kin, and his social so moderate as only to enable him to lament, not to preserve, his friends and servants. His knowledge was extensive though not exact, and his courage clear though not keen: yet his modesty far surpassing his magnanimity, his knowledge only made him obnoxious to the doubts of his more ignorant ministers, and his courage to the irresolutions of his less adventurous generals. In a word, his princely qualities were neither great enough nor bad enough to succeed in that most difficult of all attempts, the enslaving a free and jealous people." The full conviction of this truth made Laud, (who was not so despicable a politician as we commonly suppose him) upon seeing his Co-adjutor, Strafford, led out to slaughter, lament his fate in these emphatic and indignant words; "He served a Prince who knew not how to be, nor to be made, great." Warburton's Works, vol. 5, p. 301, 311, 312, 4to edit. 1788. In the original edition of the Sermon preached by Warburton on January 30th, 1760, before the House of Lords, printed in that year agreeably to the Vote of the House, this character of King Charles was not inserted, and much of the Warburtonian raciness to be found in Hurd's edition was very discreetly diluted. Take a specimen or two: "What was policy in 'James' ['the Father' original edit.] became religion in the 'Martyr Charles' ['Son' original edit.] 'King-craft' ['State-craft' original edit.] is made of much more ductile 'stuff' ['matter' original edit.] than Church Bigotry." It may, perhaps, be excusable to observe, that very many of the Sermons, in Hurd's edition of Warburton's Works, can scarcely be believed to be exact representations of the discourses, which were pronounced. What Warburton speaks of, as Laud's exclamation, is to be found in the "History of the Troubles and Trial of Walter Laud, &c. p. 178. "The only imperfections which he [Strafford] had, that were known to me, were his want of bodily health, and a carelessness, or rather, roughness, not to oblige any: and his mishaps in this last action were that he groaned under the public envy of the nobles, and served a mild and a gracious prince, who knew not how to be, or to be made great." The fate of King Charles calls forth from his descendant, Mr. Fox, the following original reflections:

"The execution of the King, though a far less violent measure than that of lord Strafford,

is an event of so singular a nature, that we cannot wonder that it should have excited more sensation than any other in the annals of England. This exemplary act of substantial justice, as it has been called by some, of enormous wickedness, by others, must be considered in two points of view. First, was it not in itself just and necessary? Secondly, was the example of it likely to be salutary or pernicious? In regard to the first of these questions, Mr. Hume, not perhaps intentionally, makes the best justification of it, by saying, that while Charles lived, the projected republic could never be secure. But to justify taking away the life of an individual, upon the principle of self-defence, the danger must be not problematical and remote, but evident and immediate. The danger in this instance was not of such a nature; and the imprisonment, or even banishment, of Charles, might have given to the republic such a degree of security as any government ought to be content with. It must be confessed however on the other side, that if the republican government had suffered the King to escape, it would have been an act of justice and generosity wholly unexampled; and to have granted him even his life, would have been one among the more rare efforts of virtue. The short interval between the deposit and death of princes is become proverbial; and though there may be some few examples on the other side, as far as life is concerned, I doubt whether a single instance can be found, where liberty has been granted to a deposed monarch. Among the modes of destroying persons in such a situation, there can be little doubt but that adopted by Cromwell and his adherents is the least dishonourable. Edward 2, Richard 2, Henry 6, Edward 5, had none of them long survived their deposit; but this was the first instance, in our history at least, where, of such an act, it could be truly said, that it was not done in a corner.

"As to the second question, whether the advantage to be derived from the example was such as to justify an act of such violence, it appears to me to be a complete solution of it to observe, that with respect to England, (and I know not upon what ground we are to set examples for other nations, or in other words, to take the criminal justice of the world into our hands,) it was wholly needless, and therefore unjustifiable, to set one for kings, at a time when it was intended the office of king should be abolished, and consequently, that no person should be in the situation to make it the rule of his conduct. Besides, the miseries attendant upon a deposed monarch, seem to be sufficient to deter any prince, who thinks of consequences, from running the risk of being placed in such a situation; or, if death be the only evil that can deter him, the fate of former tyrants deposed by their subjects, would by no means encourage him to hope he could avoid even that catastrophe. As far as we can judge from the event, the example was certainly not very effectual, since both the sons of Charles, though having their father's fate before their eyes, yet feared not to violate the liberties of the people even more than he had attempted to do.

"If we consider this question of example in a more extended view, and look to the general effect produced upon the minds of men, it cannot be doubted but the opportunity thus given to Charles, to display his firmness and piety, has created more respect for his memory than it could otherwise have obtained. Respect and pity for the sufferer on one hand, and hatred to his enemies on the other, soon produce favour and aversion to their respective causes; and thus, even though it should be admitted, (which is doubtful,) that some advantage may have been gained to the cause of liberty, by the terror of the example operating upon the minds of princes, such advantage is far outweighed by the zeal which admiration for virtue, and pity for sufferings, the best passions of the human heart, have excited in favour of the royal cause. It has been thought dangerous to the morals of mankind, even in fiction and romance, to make us sympathize with characters whose general conduct is blamable; but how much greater must the effect be, when in real history our feelings are interested in favour of a monarch with whom, to say the least, his subjects were obliged to contend in arms for their liberty? After all, however, notwithstanding what the more reasonable part of mankind may think upon this question, it is much to be doubted whether this singular proceeding has not, as much as any other circumstance, served to raise the character of the English nation in the opinion of Europe in general. He who has read, and still more he who has heard in conversation, discussions upon this subject by foreigners, must have perceived, that, even in the minds of those who condemn the act, the impression made by it has been far more that of respect and admiration, than that of disgust and horror. The truth is, that the guilt of the action, that is to say, the taking away of the life of the king, is what most men in the place of Cromwell and his associates would have incurred; what there is of splendour and of magnanimity in it, I mean the publicity and solemnity of the act, is what few would be capable of displaying. It is a degrading fact to human nature, that even the sending away of the Duke of Gloucester was an instance of generosity almost unexampled in the history of transactions of this nature."

Let us now turn to the fine spun distinctions, the delicately poised doubts, and the nicely antagonised conclusions of Mr. Hume:

"The tragical death of Charles began a question Whether the people, in any case, were entitled to judge and to punish their sovereign? and most men, regarding chiefly the atrocious usurpation of the pretended judges, and the merit of the virtuous prince who suffered, were inclined to condemn the republican principle as highly seditious and extravagant: But there still were a few who, abstracting from the particular circumstances of this case, were able to consider the question in general, and were inclined to moderate, not contradict, the prevailing sentiment. Such might have been their reasoning. If ever, on any occasion, it were laudable to conceal truth from the populace, it must be confessed that the doctrine of resistance affords such an example; and that all speculative reasoners ought to observe, with regard to this principle, the same cautious silence, which the laws in every species of government have ever prescribed to themselves. Government is instituted in order to restrain the fury and injustice of the people; and being always founded on opinion, not on force, it is dangerous to weaken, by these speculations, the reverence which the multitude owe to authority, and to instruct them beforehand, that the case can ever happen, when they may be freed from their duty of allegiance. Or should it be found impossible to restrain the license of human disquisitions, it must be acknowledged, that the doctrine of obedience ought alone to be inculcated, and that the exceptions, which are rare, ought seldom or never to be mentioned in popular reasonings and discourses. Nor is there any danger, that mankind, by this prudent reserve, should universally degenerate into a state of abject servitude. When the exception really occurs, even though it be not previously expected and descanted on, it must, from its very nature, be so obvious and undisputed, as to remove all doubt, and overpower the restraint, however great, imposed by teaching the general doctrine of obedience. But between resisting a prince and dethroning him, there is a wide interval; and the abuses of power, which can warrant the latter violence, are greater and more enormous than those which will justify the former. History, however, supplies us with examples even of this kind; and the reality of the supposition, though, for the future, it ought ever to be little looked for, must, by all candid enquirers, be acknowledged in the past. But between dethroning a prince, and punishing him, there is another very wide interval; and it were not strange, if even men of the most enlarged thought should question, Whether human nature could ever in any monarch reach that height of depravity, as to warrant, in revolted subjects, this last act of extraordinary jurisdiction. That illusion, if it be an illusion, which teaches us to pay a sacred regard to the persons of princes, is so salutary, that to dissipate it by the formal trial and punishment of a sovereign, will have more pernicious effects upon the people, than the example of justice can be supposed to have a beneficial influence upon princes, by checking their career of tyranny. It is dangerous also, by these examples, to reduce princes to despair, or bring masters to such extremities against persons endowed with great power, as to leave them no resource, but in the most violent and most sanguinary counsels. This general position being established, it must however be observed, that no reader, almost of any party or principle, was ever shocked, when he read, in ancient history, that the Roman senate voted Nero, their absolute sovereign, to be a public enemy, and, even without trial, condemned him to the severest and most ignominious punishment; a punishment from which the meanest Roman citizen was, by the laws, exempted. The crimes of that bloody tyrant are so enormous, that they break through all rules, and extort a confession that such a de-throned prince is no longer superior to his people, and can no longer plead, in his own defence, laws, which were established for conducting the ordinary course of administration. But when we pass from the case of Nero to that of Charles, the great disproportion, or rather total contrariety, of character immediately strikes us; and we stand astonished, that, among a civilized people, so much virtue could ever meet with so fatal a catastrophe. History, the great mistress of wisdom, furnishes examples of all kinds; and every prudential, as well as moral precept, may be authorised by those events, which her enlarged mirror is able to present to us. From the memorable revolutions which passed in England during this period, we may naturally deduce the same useful lesson, which Charles himself, in his later years, inferred; that it is dangerous for princes, even from the appearance of necessity, to assume more authority than the laws have allowed them. But it must be confessed, that these events furnish us with another instruction, no less natural, and no less useful, concerning the madness of the people, the furies of fanaticism, and the danger of mercenary armies."

Hume says of Charles that, "his virtues predominated extremely above his vices, or more properly speaking, his imperfections, for scarce any of his faults rose to that pitch as to merit [this is Hume's phrase] the appellation of vices, his dignity was far from pride, his humanity from weakness, his bravery from rashness, his temperance from austerity, his frugality from avarice." He is also bold enough to affirm, that, "though some historians have rashly questioned the good faith of this prince, for this reproach the most malignant scrutiny of his conduct, which in every circumstance, is now thoroughly known, affords not any reasonable foundation. On the contrary, if we consider the extreme difficulties, to which he was so frequently reduced, and compare the sincerity of his professions and declarations; we shall avow, that probity and honour ought justly to be numbered among his most shining qualities. In every treaty, those concessions which he thought he could not in conscience maintain, he never could, by any motive or persuasion, be induced to make." See, too, in vindication of Charles's sincerity, the Notes C. and F. to the 7th volume of Hume's History; upon which, however, two observations may be made in addition to those of Mr. Laing, in the passages inserted below. First, It is not perfectly ingenuous in Mr. Hume to say of Roger Coke simply that "he wrote so late as King William's reign," suppressing how much earlier he had lived, and what intimacy he had had before the Restoration with leading people: Secondly, It is strange in Mr. Hume to say that, "the imputation of insincerity on Charles, seems to be of a later growth than his own age," since that vice is imputed to him by the Essexians, as well as by Ludlow: and by the uniform tenor of parliamentary proceedings, respecting the Petition of Right, and indeed during almost the whole of his reign.

Lilly says that King Charles the First "had much of self-ends in all he did, and a most difficult thing it was to hold him close to his own promise; so that some foreign princes bestowed on him the character of a most false prince, and one that never kept his word unless for his own advantage." See 2 Oldmixon's Hist. 350.

"In the second parliament," says that able and intelligent Historian May, in his Breviary of the History of England, ed. 1680, p. 6. "King Charles granted and signed the Petition of Right, but suddenly breaking up that parliament he acted the same things in violation of laws which he had done before: so that it was manifest, that the people's liberties by grant of that Petition were not fortified, but utterly overthrown, and it appeared neither laws themselves could give protection, nor the King's faith security to the people." After noticing the Battle of Naseby and the interception of Letters made there, he proceeds, "From the reading of these Letters many discourses of the people arose: for there appeared his [the King's] transactions with the Irish rebels, and with the Queen for assistance from France, and the duke of Lorraine, of which before is spoken. Many good men were sorry that the King's actions agreed no better with his words, that he openly protested before God with horrid imprecations, that he endeavoured nothing so much as the preservation of the Protestant Religion, and rooting out of Popery, yet in the mean time under-hand, he promised to the Irish Rebels an abrogation of those laws against them, which was contrary to his late expressed promises, in these words, 'I will never abrogate the laws against the Papists:' and again, 'I abhor to think of bringing foreign soldiers into the kingdom:' and yet he solicited the duke of Lorraine, the French, the Danes, and the very Irish for assistance: they were vexed, also, that the King was so much ruled by the will of his wife as to do every thing by her prescript; that Peace, War, Religion and Parliament should be at her disposal. It appeared, besides, out of those Letters, with what mind the King treated with the Parliament at Uxbridge, and what could be hoped by that Treaty, when, writing to the Queen, he affirms, that if he could have had but two more consenting to his vote, he would not have given the name of Parliament to them at Westminster: at last he agreed to it in this sense, That it was not all one to call them a Parliament and to acknowledge them so to be, and upon that reason, which might have displeased his own side, he calls those with him at Oxford 'a 'Mungrel Parliament.' See, too, the constitutional representation of the conduct and of the character of King Charles the First, which Mr. Hatsell has given in the 4th volume of his 'Precedents,' and the very judicious reflections which he has subjoined.

In short, as Mr. Laing observes; "Sincerity was certainly no part of his character. It is not sufficient to affirm that the difficulties of his situation, his own imprudence, or even the utmost malignity of fortune, occasioned the great and almost unexampled calamities of his reign. We must add that the early and repeated instances of his insincerity, which we have occasionally described, had created such a firm belief of his dissimulation, that the popular leaders, from a well-founded distrust of his ambiguous declarations, were ever afraid to treat with him, unless upon their own terms, to which he was unwilling or unable to accede. The evidence resulting from his confidential letters, where the proofs of a disingenuous mind can alone be found, is industriously suppressed by those partial historians, who asserting the unblemished integrity of his character, take no note of the principal cause of his misfortunes and death. A subtle and professed casuist, he was enabled to reconcile the most disingenuous protestations to his own conscience; and, without an absolute breach of veracity, he studied by verbal evasions to deceive his enemies, and by mental equivocation to deceive himself."

In the letter to the Queen he says, That "upon the Treaty at Uxbridge, he did not positively own the Parliament, it being otherwise to be construed, though they were so simple as not to find it out; and that it was recorded in the Notes of the King's Council that he did not acknowledge them a Parliament." Whitelocke's Memorials, 24th June, 1645, p. 147.

Horace Walpole, lord Orford, after relating that, "Charles the First translated Bishop Saunderson's Lectures 'De Juramenti promissori obligatione,' which he desired Bishop Juxon, Dr. Hammond, and Herbert, to compare with the original," (This Translation was printed in 8vo. at London, 1655.) shrewdly observes, "A man, who studies cases of Conscience so intimately, is probably an honest man, but at least he studies them in hopes of finding, that he need not be so very honest as he thought. Oliver Cromwell, who was not quite so scrupulous, knew that casuistry is never wanted for the observance of an oath: it may to the breach of it. Had he trusted the King, his majesty would probably not have contented himself with Dr. Saunderson, but would have consulted some casuist, who teaches that faith is not to be kept with rebels." Lord Orford's Works, 4to. vol. 1, p. 276.

The evidence in favour of the authenticity of the anecdote respecting an intercepted Letter from Charles to his Queen, is thus stated by Mr. Laing:

"Hume rejects the story of the Intercepted Letter, as a rumour totally unworthy of credit, as it was first mentioned by Roger Coke, a passionate historian, who wrote so late as king William's reign; yet he proceeds to transcribe from Carte, lord Broghill's Narrative of the Intercepted Letter, as more worthy of attention. But it is observable, 1. That Coke was a member of the Rota Club in 1657, and that the report is mentioned by other contemporaries, Dugdale, p. 378, and Herbert, 61, who endeavoured in vain to disprove it by arguments drawn from the sincerity of Charles, or from the improbability of his not having a secure mode of correspondence with the queen. 2. The Narrative of lord Broghill, (earl of Orrery) preserved by Maurice his chaplain, is distinct and explicit. Cromwell, riding out with Ireton and Broghill, after the latter had relieved them at Clonmell, observed repeatedly, in a familiar conversation, that they had once a mind to have closed with the king, and had he consulted his own judgment, or had his servants been true, he would have fooled them all. Finding then in a communicative humour, Broghill asked an explanation, to which Cromwell freely answered, that observing the Scots and the Presbyterians likely to agree with the king, they resolved to prevent them by obtaining reasonable conditions for themselves. While deliberating on the subject, they were informed by one of their spies of the bed-chamber, that their doom was fixed that day: and that it was communicated in a Letter to the Queen, which was sewed up in the skirt of a saddle, to be sent by a messenger ignorant of the charge, to an inn in Holborn, and conveyed to Dover. 'Ireton and I resolved immediately to take horse from Windsor, and watching at the inn in the disguise of troopers, we discovered the messenger, took away the saddle to examine it, and on unripping one of the skirts got possession of the letter.' His majesty acquainted the Queen that he was courted by both factions, the Scotch Presbyterians, and the Army; that which of them bid fairest for him should have him; but that he thought he should close with the Scots. 'Upon this,' continued Cromwell, 'we speeded to Windsor; and finding we were not likely to have any tolerable terms with the King, we resolved to ruin him.' Orrery's Life prefixed to his Letters, Lond. 1742. 3. The same fact is evidently mentioned by Coke, a contemporary, and with the same circumstances by Strype in his Notes on Kennet's Comp. Hist. (iii. 170, edit. 1719,) with this difference in the contents of the Letter, as preserved by Coke, that in assenting to Cromwell's proposals, it would be easier to take him off afterwards, than now at the head of his army. 4. The Letter itself appears to have existed at a later period. Wagstaff mentions and disputes an avowal of Millington's, that the Letter was then in his possession; but the fact is the more probable from the authenticity of lord Anglesea's Memoranda.

dum on the Icon, which was also in his possession; the existence of which, Wagstaff, like a true zealot, has also disputed. Strype informs us that Dr. Lane of the Commons had seen, as he frequently declared, the original Letter in the King's hand-writing. Harley, lord Oxford, frequently informed Bolingbroke that he had seen and examined the Letter, which was written in answer to one from the Queen, that had been intercepted and again forwarded to Charles: blaming him for too great concessions to those villains, Cromwell and Ireton. He replied, 'that she should leave him to manage, who was better informed of all circumstances than she could be; that she might be entirely easy as to whatever concessions he should make them, for that he should know in due time how to deal with the rogues, who, instead of a silken garter, should be fitted in due time with a hempen cord.' 'Thus,' said Harley, 'the Letter ended, which they waited for, and intercepting accordingly, it determined his fate.' (Richardsoniana, p. 132.) Here the contents of the Letter correspond with Coke; and the circumstance of the first Letter from the Queen being intercepted coincides with the statements of Dugdale and Herbert, who knew or have communicated no more of the report. Cromwell might employ his spy to procure intelligence of the last letter, in consequence of having intercepted the first. The contents of that letter, in which his 'doom' was fixed, though softened by Orrery or his chaplain, must have communicated something more energetic than an inclination rather to join with the Scots; namely, the design preserved by Coke, and recollected distinctly by Harley at the conclusion of the letter, to raise and afterwards to ruin Cromwell. A singular traditional Anecdote is certainly a slight foundation for an historical fact. But the concurrent reports of contemporaries, confirmed by Orrery upon the authority of Cromwell, when combined with the existence of such a letter at a subsequent period, must render the fact indisputable, that a letter from Charles, which revealed the insincerity of his intrigues with the army, was intercepted by Cromwell, and determined his fate."

In addition to which it may be worth while to give the first paragraph of the Note to 3 Kenn. Compl. Hist. 170, 2nd edit. "There has been a constant tradition, that at Hampton-court a secret Contract was made between the King and Cromwell, that the Army should restore his majesty, and that Cromwell, for his part in it, should have 10,000*l.* per ann., be Earl of Essex, and have a Garter: and that this bargain had certainly taken effect, had not the King made an Apology for it in a Letter to the Queen, and sufficiently implied, that he did it by constraint, and when at liberty and in power, he should think himself discharged of the conditions put upon him."—In fact, the whole 3rd vol. of Laing's History abounds with proofs of the habitual insincerity of Charles. See also 2 Clarendon State Papers, 337 (cit.

3 Laing, note xi.) "I could wish the King should sadly apply himself to the part he has to act, that is, to suffer resolutely, and have no tricks."

A few days after the King's Execution, was published Essai Historique. The impression which this book produced, and which Milton employed his pen to efface, seems to have been prodigious. We are told that it passed through fifty editions in a twelvemonth, and that many have not scrupled to ascribe to it the subsequent Restoration of the Royal Family. Mr. Laing thinks that if it had appeared a week sooner it might have preserved the King. The long disputed question of the authenticity of this work is at length set at rest. Mr. Laing has proved beyond a doubt, that it was written by Gauden (who upon the Restoration was made Bishop of Exeter, and shortly afterwards of Worcester) notwithstanding Hume's assertion, "That no human testimony seems sufficient to convince us that he was the author." Mr. Laing's review of the evidence respecting this matter (Hist. vol. 3, note xiv.) is very masterly. Hume relies on the internal testimony. The collation of what is said by him and Laing on that subject is interesting, and shows how hazardous it is to rely on conclusions derived, though by the most sagacious minds, from comparison of style alone. Upon this occasion, indeed, Hume's sagacity would be thwarted by his partiality and prejudice. See also Dr. Symonds's Observations on the same subject in his Life of Milton, and the Appendix to Nash's History of Worcestershire.

Du Moulin in his "Regii Clamor Sanguinis," Echard in his History, and Sanderson, give accounts of some preternatural events by which the ultimate sufferings of Charles were consecrated. Hume does not condescend to repeat Sanderson's story of the blind woman at Deptford, who was immediately restored to sight by the application of a relic. He is, however, unwilling to suffer the memory of any forged miracles to perish, and thus ambiguously expresses himself: "On weaker minds the effect of complicated passions was prodigious. Women are said to have cast forth the untimely fruit of their womb. Others fell into convulsions, or sunk into such a melancholy as attended them to their grave. Nay, some unmindful of themselves, as though they could not, or would not survive their beloved prince, it is reported, suddenly fell down dead."

Lord Clarendon gives an account of the examination and disposal of the King's body, and of the interment of it at Windsor. He mentions that after the Restoration, Charles the Second intended that it should be solemnly deposited with the royal ancestors in King Henry the Seventh's chapel, for which purpose a search was made for it, but unsuccessfully. A man of Charles the Second's character is not likely to have felt much anxiety about the matter.*

* In a Note to the Proceedings against the Regicides, A.D. 1660, post, is related a curious story concerning the subsequent fate of the king's body.

183. The Trial of JAMES Duke of HAMILTON, and Earl of CAMBRIDGE, before the High Court of Justice, for High Treason: 1 CHARLES II. A. D. 1649.*

MR. Steel and Mr. Cook, the Counsel for the People of England, did exhibit on the 9th of February, 1649, being Friday, the following Charge:

‘ That the earl of Cambridge, about the 19th of July last, traitorously invaded this nation in a hostile manner, and levied War to assist the King against the Kingdom and People of England, and had committed sundry Murders, Outrages, Rapines, Wastes, and Spoils, upon the said People; and particularly about the 20th of August, near Preston, did make War, join Battle, and fight against the forces of the parliament, and therein did murder and kill col. Thornley and others.’

To this the Duke put in the Declinatour and special Plea following, intending at last to answer the Charge, if the Plea was not sufficient:† having first told the Court, he was better known by another name than the Earl of Cambridge. His Plea consisted of three Heads: First, He pleaded this his undertaking that employment was by command of the Parliament, and Supreme Authority of the kingdom of Scotland, for such ends as he conceived were good and justifiable, and in no way derogatory to the peace and happiness of these dominions: That he did earnestly endeavour to decline it, but that not being accepted of, he could not disobey their commands without incurring the severest censures. Secondly, That he was born in Scotland before the naturalization of his father in England; therefore he conceived himself an Alien, and not triable in England. Thirdly, That he had rendered himself prisoner upon capitulation and articles with those who had major-general Lambert’s commission; and that by these he was first a prisoner of war; next, his life and the safety of his person was secured to him by the Articles, which were signed by the Commissioners of both sides, before he was their Prisoner, and that they could fasten neither a Breach nor non-performance on him. Upon this the Counsel of the People caused the Act of his father’s naturalization to be read, and spake a little, to aggravate and set out his fact: but he desired a convenient time to procure Papers, Witnesses, and other Evidences material to his Plea, which he said was seldom denied to any in that condition; and it was well known to many there, how that since the beginning of this Parliament, many weeks were granted to an eminent man upon his trial (by whom he meant the earl of Strafford, who had time allowed him to send to Ireland). The Court adjourned to the next day, without giving him any satisfactory Answer. But the Duke’s Carriage and Discourse that day gained much on all the spectators, being so serene and calm, that his very enemies did applaud it.

Saturday the 10th, in the evening, his Grace was again brought to the Bar, and he desired Counsel, which was granted; and it was referred to him, whether the Court or himself should name them: which he then passed over, and without much speaking on either side, the Court adjourned; notice being given him, that he must appear again on Tuesday the 13th. But no Order being issued forth for Counsel, some counsel who were dealt with did decline the employment.

Tuesday the 13th, his Grace being brought again to the Bar, desired a longer time, since, notwithstanding serious means had been used, no lawyer would be his counsel, without the Court’s Orders. This was granted by the President (serjeant Bradshaw) after some expostulation, and, upon his Grace’s nomination, Mr. Chute, Mr. Hales, Mr. Parsons, and Dr. Walker, were assigned him for Counsel, to have free access to him, in the presence and hearing of some of his keepers, and to be ready against Thursday following to maintain his Plea: upon which the Court adjourned till the 15th.

Thursday the 15th, his Grace being again brought before the Court, declared that their Order being offered to his Counsel, they all found themselves unable to plead for him, or to do what was otherwise fitting, and so had refused to come and speak with him at St. James’s. The Court objected the time they had already granted, and alledged this was a mere delay; but his Grace protested it was true, and offered one of his servants to attest it. Dr. Walker in court declared, he would not be of his counsel, by reason of his employment under the parliament. His Grace desired a convenient time, as was usual in the like cases, not only in respect of his lawyers, but that he might send to Scotland, and other remote places, for Witnesses and Evidences necessary for his Defence; since no prejudice could come by that delay, and this was denied to none in Trial for Life, and had been granted to MacGuire and Mac-Hun, two Irishmen. But for his Counsel, the Court ordained, that any of the six he should name might be authorized to advise with him in private, and to speak in Court in the matter of law arising out of the Fact of the Plea, after the Matter of Fact was handled, which his Grace was to maintain next Saturday. And for the time he craved, they said, he looked on the unreasonable time that was granted to Strafford and Canterbury, those grand offenders, with whom he had been too familiar, as precedents; but those were precedents without a precedent, and none were to expect the like at this time, especially since there were now so many prisoners to be tried.

† John Lilburne, in the account of his Trial, in October of this same year [infra] seems to refer to something which passed on the Duke’s being required to plead, but which is not mentioned here.

Saturday the 17th, his Grace was brought to the Court with some Witnesses, his Counsel being near, but not present; and in order to the parts of his Plea, he first produced Duplicates of the Commission, and Orders from the Parliament of Scotland, and Committee of Estates there. The Court demanded Evidence for both. His Grace answered, Were time granted, he would not only sufficiently prove these, but many other points belonging to his justification. But the Court answered, That unless they were presently attested, vide voce, they would not suffer them to be read. Whereupon his Grace desired that his servant, Mr. Lewis, might be examined, whose testimony was accepted, and the Papers he produced were received for Evidences, and read. Next, the Declaration containing the ends of the Engagement was read, and being proved by the same Witness, was left in Court with the former papers. Then the Court, upon his Grace's desire, produced the original Articles of Capitulation, which were read; and Mr. Cole proved he saw them delivered to his Grace about nine in the morning, before the lord Gray came in.

The lord Gray deposed, That two several Summons, which were sent by him to his Grace to yield upon mercy, were both answered negatively in respect of the Cessation and Treaty; That by a Letter from Cromwell, dated Warrington, August 20, he was enjoined to pursue the Scottish forces with all vigour; That he had received letters from the Staffordshire gentlemen with whom the Cessation begun, intimating that they had condescended to it, on purpose to gain a few days time to strengthen themselves, in regard the Scots were so numerous; and that he dispatched away Wayte and Peters that morning in which the Treaty ended, to protest against it.

Peters was next examined, and answered, That going that morning to protest, by order from the lord Gray, he came accidentally to the Duke, where he found the hostages in his chamber, and asked if he was willing to be the lord Gray's prisoner, who answered, he could not in regard of the Treaty; but if he were afterwards to be disposed of, he had rather be his lordship's prisoner than any other's, being of his acquaintance: That he had seen the Summons, and the negative Answer to them: That this was about five in the morning; and that Wayte and he went a part of the way towards the place of treaty, where he heard the Articles were concluded.

Lilburn was next examined, who deposed, That the Articles were signed by himself, and the other Treaties, about five in the morning, and were to be ratified by the Duke and Lambert; and that his own meaning of preserving the Duke's life (he knew not how the rest meant) was only to preserve him from the violence of the soldiers, and not from the justice of the Parliament. At this, Peters rose up, expressing great dislike of Lilburn's gloss, saying, That much tenderness was to be used where the life of so eminent a person was concerned: That he had seen many Articles of War, but never heard of such ambiguity; and that it was clear by those Articles the Duke held his life secured, as well from the Parliament as from the soldiers; and wished to God, that if their Commissioners had meant otherwise, it had been so expressed in the Articles, it being most necessary that Articles in a concernment of life should be plain and certain. The President answered, You say well for the future, but it is now too late.

His Grace resumed what had been said, and spoke much on the Articles for weakening Lilburn's gloss.

Next the Governor and Marshal of Windsor were examined about his Escape from Windsor-Castle. The Governor deposed, That the Duke said to him, he needed not fear his escape, he would be a true prisoner, and not go away though the gates were opened. The Marshal said, he only heard this from the Governor.

The Duke expressed a deep resentment of this injury done him by the Governor, who wounded his honour so much, which he valued above all earthly things; and did shew how unlike it was, that any such thing was either demanded or granted, since that is only done for a little more liberty, whereas he was all the while kept under strict guards; nor had he the liberty of walking in the park, but was always guarded by two keepers, the one lying all night in the room next him, and the other every night locking the door, and carrying the key with him: That the Governor's testimony in this matter was not to be received, he being a party, and now in hazard for his negligence, for he was told that if he escaped, he should die for it; adding, that if he were not a prisoner, he would desire right of the Governor for that scandal cast on him, and chuse no other place for it but Westminster-Hall. But to all this the Governor made no Reply; only the President said, that though he could not blame the earl of Cambridge for what he said, yet for all that the Governor was not to be discredited.

After this, the Duke spoke a little to all the three branches of his plea, reserving the fuller enlarging upon them to his counsel. He insisted most on the Articles, which he doubted not were sufficient to protect him: he desired them to consider, how sacred Articles of War were reputed in all places, and among all nations, and how inviolably they were kept, all princes and states being most careful to observe them, not only to strangers, but to subjects; having great regard to Articles, though only for quarter, much more when there was a capitulation for life: adding the following instances. Elisha the prophet would not suffer the king of Israel to kill the Syrian captains, saying, 'Wouldst thou smite those whom thou hast taken captive with thy sword and thy bow?' The blood of Abner lay on Joab's head, who killed one that had the king's Safe-Conduct. The Gibeonites also, though they used Joshua deceitfully, yet were preserved according to the Articles given them; and not only Saul's house, but the whole land suffered for the violation of them. That prince Robert and the lord Cottington, though excepted from life or pardon by act of parliament, were notwithstanding that, upon the Articles of the Rendition of Oxford, permitted to go beyond sea, and never questioned for life: and the like justice was done the earl of Bristol and the lord Paulet, upon the Articles of the surrender of Exeter, though both were excepted from Pardon: And that the lord Fairfax and the Officers of the army were most careful to see Articles always kept, in which they judged their honour deeply concerned, and had often written to the parliament to that end; therefore he did not doubt the like justice would be done him. By this time it was late, and the President appointed Monday next for the Duke to finish his plea in Matter of Fact, ordering his counsel to be in the Court, for their better information; and so they adjourned.

Monday the 19th, the Duke and his Counsel were brought to the bar. Col. Wayte was examined, who deposed, That the Duke rendered himself to be the lord Gray's prisoner, and desired Wayte to protect him from the multitude, who thereupon left a guard at his going away. But during his Deposition, Peters said, 'He lies, he lies!' And Peters, Spencer, and other officers who were with Wayte at Uttoxeter, being examined, did totally falsify his Deposition. Divers were also that day examined about the place of the Duke's birth, who all swore, they heard it always said that he was born at Hamilton, and that it was not a thing to be doubted of. Others were examined about the signing of the Articles, who all witnessed that they were signed long before the lord Gray came: and major Blackmore deposed, That the Duke's being the lord Gray's prisoner, was by an agreement betwixt him and Lambert, whose occasions pressed him to go suddenly northward.

After this the Duke spake a little, to shew how little weight was to be laid on Wayte's testimony, which was so evidently disproved. Next, his Counsel asked the Court's directions how they should proceed; and the Court answered, That after the matter of fact was handled, they might plead in law upon all the parts of the Plea: And they told the Duke by the next Wednesday to finish his Evidence.

He desired a Warrant for bringing some gentlemen, then prisoners in Whitehall, who were his material Witnesses; but the Court adjourned, and promised to consider of that motion in the Painted Chamber; yet they granted it not.

Wednesday the 21st, the Court sat, and the Duke was brought to the bar. Some were interrogated about the time of his birth, to prove him Post-natus: But it was not proved, one person only swearing, that he heard him say he was some years younger than the king. Evidence was also brought of his conjunction with Langdale, which they accounted Treason; yet even that was not clearly proved, though it was much laboured. Some letters of his to Langdale had been taken, and were brought into Court: but as the letters proved no conjunction, so it did not appear that they were his letters; only Peters asserted they were like his hand. Then a Vote of the two Houses was read, repealing a former vote of setting 100,000*l.* sterling upon him for ransom; and Proof was brought, that notwithstanding Articles were given, yet some had been forced to take the Negative Oath; and thereby they studied to evince that the parliament did not hold themselves bound to stand to Articles.

After this, his Grace resumed the substance of all these Evidences, and shewed that it was not proved he was a Post-natus, nor that he joined with sir Marmaduke Langdale, who neither received orders nor the word from him, but marched and quartered apart; and that though he had done otherwise, it could not be criminal in him, since he had no orders to the contrary from the parliament of Scotland, but was commanded by them to join with all who would concur with him for prosecuting the ends of the Engagement; of which sir Marmaduke approving, he had no reason to refuse concurrence with him; neither could this be made Treason by the law of England: Of all which it seemed the Parliament was once well-satisfied, since by a vote they had fined him in 100,000*l.* sterling as the price of his liberty; by which it appeared they looked not on him as a Traitor, but as an enemy who had life granted him by Articles.

Upon this, the Court adjourned till Thursday the 22nd, and his counsel were appointed to plead, and he was to close his Evidence. The Duke was brought to the bar, and by divers Witnesses it was proved, that there was no Rendition made to the lord Gray, but a plain refusal; and that the Treaty was ended, the Articles signed, and Lambert come up, before the lord Gray came thither. There was also produced an Order of Parliament, made four years before, That no quarter should be given to any of the Irish in arms, which inferred that others might have them; and another Order was read of the 14th of July last, declaring all the Scots who entered England enemies, and all the English and Irish who assisted them traitors; and with this he closed his Evidence.

"That he was sent by the kingdom of Scotland, which was a free kingdom, and independent on England; That he having had his birth, honour, and fortune there, was bound to give obedience to their orders; that for himself, he had lived much out of business, and was seldom in public trust in that kingdom, nor very desirous of any; but that being commanded to undertake the charge of General, for ends which he conceived lawful, and no way contrary to the peace or interest of England, he was obliged to follow their orders: And that by some Papers emitted by the Parliament of England against that expedition, they declared they looked on it as a National Breach, whereby Scotland had violated their Leagues and Treaties with them, so that it was no private act of his: That the entering of the Scottish Army into England, A. D. 1640, was accounted no Invasion nor Treason, but on the contrary was acceptable to this kingdom, which gave a brotherly assistance for it; and that the late unfortunate Army was designed fully for as good ends, and would have so been looked on had it prospered. And for his joining with sir Marmaduke Langdale, he answered it as was before set down. Therefore he being taken Prisoner in such a War, he conceived it without a precedent that he should be tried for his life, for serving his native kingdom in an open war. As for his being an alien, he referred that to his counsel, but said it was undeniable he was born in Scotland, nor was he proved a Post-natus; he was also born before his Father's Naturalization, and so not included in it, and his own naturalization had been in agitation in the beginning of this parliament: That his sitting in parliament did not conclude him an English earl; for if questioned, he might probably have been expelled out of the House of Peers, as his countryman Mr. Walter Stuart was out of the House of Commons; and that his being an Earl did not naturalize him, that being the king's single act, whereas naturalization was only by Act of parliament. As for the Articles, it was clear, that Lambert being a general officer, commissioned by Parliament, was impowered to capitulate both by the parliament and by Cromwell, the lord Gray having no authority from the parliament, but only from Cromwell's Letter: that he became the lord Gray's prisoner only by Lambert's order, and that he made no Surrender till the Articles were signed and delivered: That though the lord Gray had protested against it (and yet only an intension to do it was proved), he was not concerned in it, nor bound to take notice of it, Lambert being the Parliament's officer, and sent against him by them: That Articles were to be expounded by their plain meaning, and not by any mental reserves pretended by the commissioners: That by the first Article, he was a prisoner of war, and that it was seldom known that the life of any such was taken; and that by the second Article, Life and Safety of person were expressly secured without any exception: That if Articles were now violated, it would make the sequel of the wars, if any more followed, a downright butchery, since none would any more trust to a capitulation; which mischief he prayed God to avert: That his Escape out of prison was no breach, he being only bound by the Articles to deliver himself prisoner, which he did, but not to continue so. And he concluded, That he was confident, had he no better Plea, his Articles were sufficient, according to the laws of all nations, to preserve his life."

Then the President asked him, if he had any thing to say as he was earl of Cambridge? Whereupon he and his counsel moved, That if what he had said and proved was not satisfactory for the averment of his Plea, he might answer the Charge exhibited, which he had not yet done. But to this, neither the Court nor their Counsel would yield, though they gave no reason for it, save only that it implied a desire of delay: but the reason, as was said, was, That they knew, had they yielded to that, the Charge had been overthrown, since the law of England does not admit that to be Treason which they charged on him, that he had assisted the king against the kingdom and people by levying war. Then the Court told his Counsel, that Saturday was the longest time they allowed them for performing their part: But the Counsel answered, That it was impossible for them to undertake it, and discharge their consciences to their client, having so short a time allowed them; there being a necessity of searching divers Records for Precedents, which required a competent time, as had been allowed in former cases. But the Court refused to promise it, only they said they would take it into their consideration. The Counsel insisted, and said plainly, they declined the employment on those terms, and would be forced to declare it.

Monday the 26th, the other two officers that had signed the Capitulation for the Duke and his troops, who had been sent for a great way off, were examined, who agreed with the former Witnesses in Matters of Fact, and also with Lilburn, that by signing the Articles they only meant the Duke should be preserved from the violence of the soldiers, and not from the justice of the parliament. Then the counsel began to plead, and all four spoke on the several heads of the plea. Mr. Heron spoke cursorily and elegantly, but not very materially: Mr. Parsons, a young man, spoke boldly, and to good purpose: Mr. Chute the civilian spoke learnedly and home: and Mr. Hales (since the much-renowned Lord Chief Justice of the King's-Bench) elaborately and at length. The heads of their arguments follow:

The Duke being, as was granted, a horn Scotchman, his tie of obligation and subjec-

to that kingdom was indispensable and indubitable; so that his late employment could be refused when laid on him by the authority of that kingdom, no more than a native of and, living in it, can disobey the commands of his parliament: whereas any subjection the Duke owed the parliament of England, was acquired, and dispensable. That since man can be a subject of two kingdoms, never the tie lay on him to the kingdom of land, it was not to be put in competition what he owed Scotland; it being a maxim in law. That 'major relatio trahit ad minorem,' and that 'Jus originis nemo tunc potest.' That there was an allegiance to the king, and another to the kingdom, no treason could be without a breach of it and allegiance due to them against whom was committed, for these kingdoms were two distinct kingdoms; and though the allegiance to the king was the same in both kingdoms, that due to the kingdoms was distinct: was the actual administration of the king's in the king's person, when the Duke got employment. Therefore as his allegiance to the kingdom of Scotland was antienter and longer than any tie that lay on him in England, so what he did by their order might well be him an enemy to this kingdom, but did not infer treason. Yet all this of the allegiance due to the kingdom was founded on common or statute law, as Mr. Hales himself confessed afterwards: but he urged this against those who asserted it, it being universally received maxim at that time. That whether he was a Post-natus or Ante-natus, did not appear; but though he were, it did not vary the case, nor his obligation to the king of his nativity: and so though he were Ante-natus, or accounted a denizen by his father's naturalization, his offence could not be treason, but hostility at most; and by that supposed hostility, he could only lose his privilege of a denizen, but could not be made a traitor, there being no precedent where ever man was attainted of treason for a hostile action; and it was questionable if this offence did amount to that. Nor could any case be alleged, where one born in another independent kingdom, acting by a commission from that kingdom, and residing there when he received his commission, and raising the body of an army in that kingdom, and coming into this in an open hostile manner, was ever judged guilty of treason. Naturalization was intended as a benefit, and not a snare; so that one might well lose it, but was not to be punished for it. And so when France and England were under one sovereign, divers of both nations were naturalized in the other; yet when hostility broke out betwixt them, many so naturalized fought on the side of their native kingdom, for which none were put to death, though divers were taken prisoners. And in Edward the third's time, though he claimed France as his by his right; yet when the constable of France invaded England, and was taken prisoner, he was not tried, nor put to death, but sent back to France, as being a native of that kingdom. And when David Bruce, king of Scotland, invaded this kingdom, and was taken prisoner, great endeavours were used to find a legal ground for his trial, he being earl of Huntingdon in England; but this plea was waved, for it was found that it could not be done justly, that being but a less degree of honour, though king Edward claimed a kind of homage from the crown of Scotland. That if the Duke were on that account put to death, it might prove of sad consequence, in case there was war any more betwixt the kingdoms; since most of the present generation were Post-nati and all would be so quickly: and yet if the lord Fairfax, who was both a Post-natus, and had his honour in Scotland, were commanded to lead an army thither, and being taken were put to death, it would be thought hard measure. For the duke's father's naturalization, it was true, by the statute of the 25th of Edward 3, provision was made, that children born without the kingdom, whose parents were then in the king's allegiance, should be denizens: but the duke was born before his father's naturalization, which can never reach him, none but the issue after his father's naturalization being included within it: and the word Hæres in the act is only a word of limitation, and not of creation: nor did his making use of the assistance of some English forces make him a traitor. It is true, if an Englishman conduct a foreign army, or if a foreigner come of his own head, or in a rebellious way, to assist an English rebellion, it will amount to treason: for the act of such an alien is denominated from the crime of those he assists here, where he owed a local obedience, which was the case of Shirley the Frenchman and of Lopez. But if an alien come with a foreign force, though he make use of English auxiliaries, that only infers a hostility, but no treason; and was the case of the lord Harris, Scotchman, 15 Eliz. and of Perkin Warbeck, both having English help: and though Warbeck was put to death, it was by no civil judicatory, but only by the will of Henry 7, who erected a court-martial for that purpose. The present case was yet clearer, where the alien had authority from his native kingdom, and was commanded by them to make use of English help: so that though Langdale's assisting the duke did make himself a traitor, yet the duke's accepting of it only infers an act of hostility. And whereas it was objected, That the parliament had already by their act which constituted this court for his trial, declared him a traitor; it was not to be disputed what the parliament had power to do, but no parliament had ever done the like before: and the meaning of the act must be, that he should be tried whether guilty of treason or not, since if the parliament have already declared him a traitor, further trial was needless. And it was clear, the parliament by their act in July last, which declared all the Scots who entered England enemies, considered not the distinction of Post-nati, nor judged that inferred treason, since most of them all were Post-nati: that many of the officers of that army, who had been taken prisoners, though clearly Post-nati, were ransomed, others banished, others still in prison; why then should the imputation of treason be fastened on the duke, when the rest were used only as enemies?

And for the Articles, they made it appear, they were the public faith of the kingdom, when given by persons publicly authorized, upon the observing of which inviolably, depended the whole intercourse of all nations, and their mutual confidence, which is founded on all states being bound by the acts of their public ministers: That this was not a pure rendition, but a paction concluded upon deliberation, wherein the parliament lost nothing, but on the contrary were gainers; That the parliament had ratified this upon the matter, by voting a hundred thousand pounds sterling fine, to be the price of the duke's liberty: That the secret sense of the traitors pretended, was not to be considered, since all compacts are to be understood according to the clear meaning of the words, and the universal sense of mankind, who look on articles wherein life is granted, as a sufficient security, not only from the soldiers, but from the civil powers; and that these traitors, when the articles were agreed, should have made known their secret meaning, otherwise it was not to be regarded. And it was a most dangerous precedent to admit of collateral averments of secret meanings against express words, much more in a case of life, and yet much more in military agreements, wherein the concerns of armies and nations were included, and which concerned the honour and security of all soldiers. And for this divers precedents were cited. The argument ended thus: That as the court consisted of gentlemen and lawyers, and of martial men; so the plea, consisting of three branches, was the more proper for their cognizance, a part of it being drawn from the law of England, another part from the civil law, and a third part from the martial law: and if the plea, in any of the three branches, was made good (and they doubted not but it would be found so in them all), the court would be satisfied there was reason and justice for preserving the duke's life.

The Court adjourned till Friday the 2d of March, and the Duke being again brought to the bar, the Counsel for the people pleaded, but so poorly, that all who heard them were ashamed: but they had one advantage, that neither the Duke nor his counsel were allowed to speak after them, nor to discover their impertinent allegations: which made the Duke's counsel obviate all they could imagine they might say, though they said a great deal so far out of the way of reason, that none could have thought of it; and yet it was so weak, that it needed neither be obviated, nor replied to. Yet at the end of every branch of their Pleadings, I shall add the Answers against them, as they are set down in some Notes taken by the Duke's Counsel.

They begun with Alienage, and studied to make it appear, that though he was a Scotchman born, yet he was no Alien, having enjoyed all the privileges an Englishman was capable of, as being a peer, a privy counsellor, possessing lands and inheritances, and marrying in England. [But Naturalization cannot be but by act of parliament, and not by the king's single deed; much less by those privileges of which any stranger might participate.]

Next, they urged his father's Naturalization: and since his name was not in that Act, as was in other acts of naturalization, that proved him not to be an Alien, otherwise his name had been put in. [From that it rather appeared he was an Alien, since others found it necessary to insert their children's names; which his father not doing, proves the son an alien still.]

They also urged his being Post-natus, which must be held true, since he brought no Evidence to the contrary; and it being so, his tie of subjection was as great in England as in Scotland: That allegiance was only due to the king, and not to the kingdom: That there was a king when he entered into England, and that though he was secluded from the government, yet all writs were issued in his name; so that this Expedition was a breach of the Allegiance he owed the king. [This was the oddest part of all their Plea, since his Charge was, That he assisted the king against the kingdom; and now they did plead, he owed no Allegiance to the kingdom, but to the king, whom they had so lately murdered; the Duke's coming with his army being only to relieve him from the barbarous usage he had met with.]

They also urged at large, That an Englishman's children, in what place of the world soever they were born, were denizens of England, and cited many Precedents. [But the misapplication of them was gross and palpable, those being of persons who were Englishmen before their children were born: whereas the Duke's father was naturalized after he was born; so that he could not communicate that privilege to him, which he did indeed transmit to his children born after his naturalization.]

Next, they pleaded, That the parliament of Scotland had no power to commissionate him to enter into England; and that if some of them were there, they ought likewise to suffer for it; and it was fit he suffered for his masters who had employed him. That it was a pity the king had not suffered sooner. They also produced many Precedents of strangers being condemned as guilty of Treason, for Treasons committed in England; as the queen of Scots, Lopez, Perkin Warbeck, the lord Harris, Shirley the Frenchman, and the Spanish ambassador. [All this was obviated in the former argument, where distinction was made betwixt secret practices and an open invasion with a foreign foe.] They added, That Scotland belonged to the crown of England, and so was to be looked on as some of the counties of England. [But Scotland had no Subjection to the crown, but only to the king of England, whom they had murdered, and so they had no power to judge any Scotchman.]

As for the Articles, they pleaded, it was not in the power of the Army to absolve any from the justice of the Parliament, which being above them, was not tied to their Articles; and therefore, though they confessed the words ought to have been less ambiguous, yet they said, the exposition of those who signed them was to be admitted, since every man was to be the expounder of his own words; and pleaded some Precedents about the exposition of ambiguous words. [But the Words here were plain and not ambiguous; only a treacherous equivocation was invented to break them.]

Cook, by a strange subtilty, said, The Articles only secured his life during imprisonment; so that his breaking of prison, and being retaken, put an end to the obligation of the Articles. [Though he broke not prison, but went out at door and gate, which was no crime.]

Mr. Steel, Attorney-General, on behalf of the Commonwealth.

My Lord; The Counsel for the Earl of Cambridge have framed their Arguments upon the fact, as they conceived it proved; and also by admittance of the contrary in some points. I shall use the same method: first arguing from the fact, as I conceive it stated by the Proofs produced; and then by admittance of the contrary, that though the fact should be as they would have it, that yet the law will fall out to be against them.

The Charge being read to the Prisoner, he hath thereunto put in his Plea, consisting of three parts; the truth and validity whereof hath been denied on the behalf of the Commonwealth.

First, The first part of his plea was, That he was employed by the Parliament of the kingdom of Scotland, not to invade this kingdom, but for the ends declared by them. The improvement made of this part of the Plea, is, That the earl was but a servant in this Expedition, and under the authority and command of another, and tied under oaths and penalties to give obedience; if he had disobeyed, he had been liable to punishment; therefore it were hard for him to be punished for obeying also: That he hath not exceeded his Commission: Besides, the Parliament of England, in their Declaration of the 17th of February last, lay the blame of this Invasion upon the Parliament of Scotland: And lastly, That the Earl's case is not unlike that of an Ambassador, who is not to be blamed for acting against a state, if he have it in mandatis, as in the Case of the Bishop of Ross, in the reign of queen Elizabeth.

By endeavouring to give satisfaction to all which, I shall dispatch what I have to say upon this first part of the Plea. I shall admit it proved, That he had that commission and authority mentioned; and also, that the rule is generally true, That a man is not to be punished for an Act which he doth by the necessity of obedience, because he hath not solutum arbitrium, which is required to denominate actions either blame-worthy or excusable: but I shall easily prove, that this rule is capable of restriction, both by the rules of law and reason; and if we observe the distinctions aright, which determine this question, we shall still find the earl of Cambridge within that part which renders him inexcusable.

First, The first Difference is, where the action is lawful, and where unlawful, which is commanded: If it be lawful, a superior command may dispense with some circumstances: but if unlawful, the servant obeying, is not the less to be blamed. I never held that law of Iaa the Saxon king to be warrantable divinity: 'Servus si quid opens patrârit die Dominico ex præcepto Domini sui, liber esto,' if the precept itself were unjust.

Now for the action in question, wherein the Earl was engaged; it is not defended by his own counsel, the dispute being only de modo, whether he be to be punished as an Enemy, or as a Traitor; though if this argument held, he were neither way to be punished: and therefore certainly the necessity of his obedience is no mitigation for his crime; and if it should, Empson and Dudley,* with all their monopolizing successors, had been unjustly censured, who always have had Patents and Commissions from authority to plead: And so also all that Catalogue of former Traitors, who have hatched their Treasons and Designs against this state in foreign parts, and have ever had the Pope or foreign princes to put a stamp of authority and command upon them, must by this argument be in some measure justified.—It was never expected from any under command, to write himself more a Servant than usque ad aras, those being the Hercules's pillars whereon a non plus ultra is written; and therefore whoever exceeds those bounds, he will find it to be at his peril.

Secondly, The second Difference is, where the Instrument is inanimatum, and where an active living Instrument: Of the first it is truly said, 'Instrumenti nulla vis,' all being therein attributed to the principal Efficient, but otherwise of the other. From hence the Statute of 1, 2 Phil. and Mary, c. 10, did justly repeal the Statute of 33 H. 8, c. 20, which had punished a man for Treason, though he became non compos mentis before the execution. And no less justly did 25 Ed. 3, de proditoriis, by the word 'Imagination' alter in the like point that law which was in use till then, concerning such a person's committing the Act of Treason, such an one being no better than quasi inanimatus. But who can affirm this Earl to be other than an active and vigorous Instrument? 'Non modo vivit, sed in Senatum venit,' being a chief member of that Parliament, under whose command he would shelter himself; and by that means he is a Master rather than a Servant, and so met with by that Declaration of the Parliament of this kingdom, of which he would have made an argument for himself.

Thirdly, Where there is necessitas culpabilis, the law will not excuse, as it will where there is no crime in contracting the necessity. Those who in former times gave victuals and provision to sir John Oldcastle,* were not punished as Traitors, because they did it (say our Records) 'pro timore mortis, et recesserunt quam cito potuerant,' 3 Inst. 10. And upon this reason seems that opinion of Tremayle to be grounded in 21 H. 7, 39, That a Servant may justify the killing of another, to save his master's life, if he cannot otherwise escape.—But if one being drunk commits a crime, though he hath not properly and immediately the free exercise of his will, yet the law reputes him voluntarius Dæmon; and he is not at all the less excusable by our law, 1 Inst. 247. 4 li. Beverley's Case: and by the Philosopher's rule, such a one doth ignorans, not per ignorantium agere; and is therein so far from being excused, that he is therefore to be doubly punished.—Now to assume that whereby the Earl's Counsel would excuse him, viz. his Oath and Commission, renders him the less excusable; because both are strong arguments of a free and full consent: for who can imagine them of Scotland to be such mean Statists, as to think that oath equally obliging, which was compulsive to the same, if freely taken; or that that General should be trusted with a Commission over all their forces both by sea and land, as his Commission runs, whose heart as well as hand had not embraced it? And truly, they that have heard his Letters read to sir Marmaduke Langdale, wherein he prays for the increase of the Distractions at London, and for his friends at Colchester, would not judge him an unwilling instrument, but one exceeding, rather than falling short in executing his commission.

Lastly, Necessity of obedience may excuse in privatis, but never in publicis. If a Feme-covert, together with her husband, commit an act which in another would amount to Felony, yet in her it shall not, because sub potestate viri, 27 Ass. p. 40, but otherwise the law is in point of Treason; and so is the Judgment of my lord Verulam: 'Nec valet privilegium' saith he 'contra rempublicam.' And as to the Case of an Ambassador urged on the other side, and in particular of the bishop of Ross in the days of queen Elizabeth; I answer, First, The privileges of those who are entertained as ambassadors, are very great, and not to be made Precedents, or assumed by any other; whence 'Proregis Dedecus redundat in Regem'; and therefore before 25 Ed. 3, it was Treason to kill an Ambassador, 22 ass. p. 49. And from hence might arise that privilege shewed to the bishop of Ross. Secondly, It appears rather to be an Act of Grace than of Justice, that the Bishop was freed, because he was set at liberty after a long imprisonment; which, if not liable to the censure of the law, he should not at all in justice have endured. Also by the Judgment of my lord Bacon, cited by the learned Doctor on the other side, in point of Conspiracy against the State, even an Ambassador is not privileged; yet of this Bishop learned Camden saith in his Eliz. 'Fuit liberatus; qui Rebellioni clam faces subjecerat.' All which were Arguments of Grace; and therefore that Case will be no Precedent for this, wherein also Conspiracies and Correspondencies with many of this Nation have been proved, and are otherwise notorious.—And for that inevitable Labyrinth, out of which the earl of Cambridge cannot extricate himself, but that whether obey or not obey, he is under a mischief, he may for that thank himself; 'Vocati lenti non fit injuria;' this is like the plague of an erroneous conscience, which whether obeyed or not, proves a tormentor to its subject.

Secondly, The second Part of the Earl's Plea is, That he is no Englishman, notwithstanding the Naturalization of his father; which, in effect, is as much as to say, and so it hath been insisted on, he is by birth a Scotsman, and by consequence an alien too, and not triable as a Traitor by the laws of England. Concerning the handling of which question, it being that whereupon the validity of the other two doth, in my judgment, principally depend; I shall first answer the material objections which I conceive made by the counsel on the other side, before I offer any thing positively to assert the invalidity of this part of the Plea.

Obj. It hath been said, The Proof is not clear for the Earl of Cambridge's being a Post-natus; viz. one born after king James's access to the crown of England; and that being but a 'non liquet in favorem vite,' the most favourable construction is to be taken for the prisoner.

Ans. First, I deny that the Proof amounts to no more in this particular than a non liquet; for there is one positive Witness that speaks directly to the Earl's birth after king James's coming to the crown of England: Another speaks to the Earl's own Confession, being about two-or-three-and-forty years of age, which speaks him born since that time; and a third speaks to the common report of his being born since: and if the Proof were but semiplena probatio, yet as Bracton saith, that amounts to a presumption; and, saith he, 'presumptio stabitur donec probetur in contrarium,' especially when the Earl himself, who should have proved the contrary for the making good his Plea, hath offered nothing against it; and being asked, never absolutely denied it.

Secondly, I do agree, that what the Jewish Expositors observe in the exposition of their laws, which founded in favour, is to be observed in our law, in those things which we usually say the law favours; viz. 'Favores sunt am'plandi;' and that strict expositions are only for penal rules, according to that of the civilians, 'Constitutio penalís non excedit casum':

* See No. 20, vol. 1, p. 225.

yet we shall find, that where the penalty of a penal law is against one or few persons, and the benefit redounds to the generality, in that case even a penal statute shall be taken largely against the offender; so the Rule is put, Plow.
Com. 36. Plat's Case, where it is resolved, though the statute of 1 R. 2, c. 12, give an Action of Escape against the Guardian of the Fleet, yet for the reason abovesaid, it is, though a penal law, by a benign interpretation, to extend to the sheriff of London: and in like manner, if there were any latitude in cases of Treason and Murder (as there is not), yet to extend it on the behalf of the prisoners, might prove to many thousands crudelis misericordia.

Thirdly, Add to this, that the Law of England is so tender of the public weal, that though in other cases it may seem to insist too much upon formalities, yet herein it will dispense sometimes with its most certain rules. Hence it is, that if one pass over another's land, without his consent, to fetch a falcon, or the like, he may be punished as a Trespasser; but not so, if to hunt or kill a fox or an otter (which instances I suppose not unsuitable to the Prisoner), because these are creatures contra bonum publicum; which reason the Book gives of the law in that case, 12 H. 8, 10. For the same reason no man shall be punished as a Trespasser for erecting bulwarks on another's land, Dyer 36. Maleverer's Case. And hence certainly was the reason of that ancient law,
That capital offenders, who had transgressed against the law, had Lupina Capita, and might therefore by the Justice of 'Lex talionis, arte
'perire sua;' wherein the law followed Nature Ordinem: The Rules of Nature are most constant, yet for the preservation of the whole, it will sometimes contradict itself; as to prevent a vacuum, and the like, what an inversion do we see of Nature's most constant and ordinary rules! Do not they, then, in this prove somewhat unnatural, embrace a cloud instead of substance, that fear not to omit the weightiest things of the law, rather than in cases of invincible necessity dispense with some formalities?

Obj. But though the earl of Cambridge were a Post-natus, yet he is quasi ligens acquisitus unto England; and if so, as his allegiance began with an act of the nation, so it might determine by an act of the same power, to wit, by command from the parliament of Scotland.

Ans. First, The strength of this Objection, if admitted, would, as I conceive, by a new invented distinction, overthrow the learned and solemn Resolution of all the judges and chancellor of England, 6 Jac. in Calvin's Case, [see vol. 2. p. 559.] wherein all allegiances that the wits of men could imagine, are enumerated, and they are but four, viz. Ligeantia naturalis, acquisita, localis, and legalis: and by the judgment of that case Robert Calvin, son and heir to James lord Calrin of Colcross in Scotland, born three years after king James's access to the crown (as also all other so born), were adjudged subjects of this kingdom of England, Ligeantia naturali, by the best and highest allegiance, without any quasi at all, in the same kind, and to all intents and purposes that any natural-born Englishman was.

Secondly, The Objection seems to me not only to be against the Judgment of this Case, but against reason also: For what acquisition is there by the party, or what contributes he to it, whether he be born in this or that time or place? The conceit that there is any act of the party's in this (as there must be to make a quasi ligens acquisitus) seems to savour of the Pythagorean Metempsychosis, or that opinion of Plato, who held a pre-existence of souls, which after came into the bodies, tanquam in ergu-lula.

Obj. It is inconsistent to have two natural Allegiances to two several kingdoms, as it is impossible to have two fathers; in which case
'major relatio trahet ad se minorem.' And in that case the Earl is rather to be reputed a subject of Scotland, where he was born, than of England.

Ans. First, It is indeed inconsistent that the same person should in two several kingdoms have two original Allegiances, in a physical acceptation, to wit, to be so born: Yet by construction of law, he that is born in Scotland may have an allegiance to England, equivalent with the other. Thus Calvin by the Resolution of that case was Scotus patriæ, and Anglus privilegio.—And thus, without any contradiction, it was ever held for law, That the natives of Gascoign and Aquitain, and those other countries which were geographically out of England, were yet in construction of law equally denizens and subjects of England with those born here; in regard of one allegiance and protection wherein they were equally involved, 27 Ass. Pla. 48.

Secondly, No allegiance which gains the name of 'Alta et Naturalis Ligeantia,' can by the Common Law of England be divested, though otherwise it may be by the Civil Laws, there being no Magis et Minus that it is capable of, which the Objection would suppose.
And the truth is, the Resolution of Calvin's Case answers all the suppositions of any future contingencies, and positively resolves, That this Allegiance cannot possibly be lost by any matter ex post facto, no, not by difference of Descents and Governments, 7 Li. 27. And what is agreed to be inherent to a natural-born Englishman, belongs also to a Post-natus.
'Non potest patriam in qua natus est eversare,
'nec Ligeantia Debitum ejurare,' 1 Inst. 129.

Thirdly, And for the Inconsistencies of Allegiances that the Objection seems to insinuate, in the Case of Competition between the kingdoms, Bracton hath met with that Supposed long since, Li. de Accep. 427, speaking of one that is 'ad fidem utriusque regis, si contingant 'guerram acciderent inter regna;' putting the Case of one born in France, and indenized in England: 'Remanent personahiter cum eo cai ligeantiam fecerit, et faciat servitium debitum' 'et cum quo non sieterit in persona.'

Obj. Though the earl of Cambridge were a Post-natus, yet, as this Case is, it makes him not to differ from an Alien, because the kingdoms of England and Scotland were at the time of this Invasion divided, and there were then several administrations of their powers; from whence a double allegiance is to be considered, Regis et Regni.

Ans. First, if we look upon the judicial powers of the kingdoms in a legal consideration, even at the time mentioned in the Objection, besides the Union of the Kingdoms made by force of 1 Jac. cap. 1, we shall find no strong stipulations and engagements by treaties, confirmed by Parliament and otherwise, betwixt the nations, as were possibly to be made; none of which were repeated at the time of this Expedition: And so far from that, that the Earl himself hath often at the bar professed, That neither his coming or commission were against the Parliament or Kingdom of England. How then were the powers of these nations so legally and judicially different?

Secondly, The Union of the Laws and Governments of these nations was a thing desired and endeavoured by some, as may appear by the latter part of the statute of 4 Jac. cap. 1, but it was not effected. Therefore the distinction of the kingdoms was taken into consideration in Calvin's Case, where 'Regna,' was one of the nomina operativa, and granted, That though the kingdoms, laws, and nobilities of the nations of England and Scotland were several and distinct, yet the allegiance of all born in either nation after the Union was one and the same. And the Pleading of that Case (which best denotes the law) demonstrates this, That such distinction of the kingdoms was under consideration: for the Pleading was, That Calvin was born 'extra ligeantiam regni regis Angliæ,' and 'infra ligeantiam regni regis Scotiæ.' And the learned Chancellor of that time saith, in his Post-nati, that the Judgment was, That neither Calvin, nor any other Post-nati, were aliens to the king or kingdom of England.

Thirdly, It is agreed on the other side, That there was always one Ligeantia Regis: And therefore, even thence, I do infer that there was also one Ligeantia Regni: because that Allegiance which was due to the king, was certainly due to him in his politic capacity, though not to that only, or divided in the subject from his natural capacity. However, it may be said nevertheless, as it is in Calvin's Case, (by a Community of Properties) that it was due to the natural capacity also, viz. as it ought ever to be accompanied with the politic; thence it was but just in the Parliament, notwithstanding the King's personal command and opposition against them, yet to permit the taking of the Oath of Allegiance, and not to abolish it till after his death, it being ad Legem Legatio;

yet the person was so necessary, that without it, it had been ridiculous to administer it in the form it was, in which case 'Majus dignum trahit ad se minus.' And hence it was that capital crimes committed in one king's time, might be proceeded against after the death of that king, 3 Ed. 3. Fitz. Reattach. 18. et Bro. Cor. 178. If the king had purchased land to him and his heirs, though the word "Successors," the word of his politic capacity, had not been mentioned, yet he was seized thereof in Jure Coronæ, 43 Ed. 3. 20. And if land had been given to the king and another, and their heirs, they had for the same reason been tenants in common, and not joint-tenants, Com. 239, for the same reason. And though many of those persons who have been kings have often oppressed, instead of preserving their subjects; yet still that which Bracton hath said upon the same ground remains true of the regal power, 'Non aliud Rex potest, quam quod de jure potest,' his Office still being ex Officio, as 2 Littl. Co. Wiseman's Case saith; and Fitz. Nat. Brev. 113, out of the Register, to provide for the preservation of his people. And if any other construction should be made, then it must have followed in the king's personal absence, minority, or disability, the kingdom must either have been but weakly, or not at all governed. From all which it may be inferred, That the Obligation and Allegiance which was owing to the king, did include that which sano sensu was the kingdom's also.

It remains now that somewhat be spoken for the further invalidating of this part of the Plea; wherein I shall, First, prove, That one born in Scotland, after the Union of the crowns, cannot be to any purpose considered as an alien to England: Secondly, That though the earl of Cambridge had been born before the Union, yet he had not been an alien to England, partly from a national consideration, but more principally from personal considerations; viz. 1. By reason of his local Allegiance both in Scotland and England. 2. Ligeantia acquisita; and that by the Naturalization of his Father, or his own denization. Thirdly, That though he had been an Alien, yet as this case is upon the Proofs, he will prove triable for Treason by the laws of this kingdom.

Before I speak of any of these, I might touch upon that part which layeth Murder to the Charge of this Earl; it having been fully proved that several persons by name, amongst many others, were slain and murdered by the Scottish Army. And to make him punishable for this crime there is no need of Denization; it being an offence in 'itself' against the law of God and nations, and no trust requisite to be an ingredient to it, as is required in Treason.

Hence we find Rape punishable in England, committed by a Scot, 15 Eliz. Dyer, 304. and murder done by the lord Zanchur of the same nation, 9 Co. 116.* where we find him indicted by the name of Robert Creighton, esq; which, together with the express authority of 11 Ed. 3. Fitz. Brev. 473, are, by the way, sufficient Warrants for our charging the Prisoner by the name of James earl of Cambridge, without mentioning his dukedom, as he hath often intimated we should have done.

And if the earl should say, he killed not these persons himself, his counsel can soon tell him that's not material; the law being, That if divers persons come to do an unlawful act, and one commit a Murder or Treason, it is so in all. 1 Mar. Dyer, 38. 13 H. 4, 13. 9 Ed. 2, Fitz. Cor. 433. But the truth is, I shall not rely upon this, being not willing so high an offence should pass under any other name than that of Treason; therefore I pass to those afore-mentioned considerations, which will evince his crime to be no less than Treason.

1. As to the first of these, there being so much said in the argument of Calvin's Case, I shall omit the citing of any thing particularly from thence, and select something from the statutes made shortly after the Union. It is agreed by all historians, that these two kingdoms were antiently but one, 'Divisos orbe Britannos, et subducta Britannia mundo.' Thence it is observable, that in the Preface of 1 Jac. cap. 1. by the access of the king of Scotland to this kingdom, the Parliament, speaking of the Union, correct themselves in these words. 'Or rather a re-uniting of these two Nations (though antiently but one).' If so, this Re-union amounted to no less than (as it were) a national remitter of the antient Union.

For the settlement of this Union, Commissioners were chosen to compose some differences betwixt the nations, and to consider what was fit and necessary to be done for the commonweal of both kingdoms, 1 Jac. cap. 2. These commissioners consult long about it; and because they could not perfect it within the time prefixed, an Act passeth for longer time, 3 Jac. cap. 3.

At length the work is finished by the Statute of 4 Jac. cap. 1. By which all statutes that express or imply any strangeness of the one nation to the other are repealed. And moreover, it doth enact and say, 'That if there had appeared any other Statutes of this realm of England, wherein any thing is ordained, enacted, and established, expressly and by name, against the Scottish as enemies, or Scotland as an enemy-country to the king of this realm, or the state of the same; we should, for so much of them as concerneth Scottish men or Scotland, have utterly abrogated and annulled the same, seeing all enmity and hostility of former times between the two kingdoms and people is now happily taken away.' So the statute. After which it seems as strange, that any born in Scotland, after and during the continuance of that Union, should make themselves strangers to England, as if natural-born Englishmen should have made the same allegation.

In the aforesaid Statute of 4 Jac. 1, there is a Clause, That no Scottishman coming into England, to prosecute the law against any Englishman offending in Scotland, is to be arrested here, except for Treason and Murder. And in the latter end of the Act, amongst other things, it is enacted, 'That if any Englishman should commit Treason or other crimes in Scotland, and come into England, he shall not, upon his apprehension here, be sent into Scotland, to have his trial there, but be tried where he is taken.' But the Statute of 7 Jac. cap. 1. which was the year after the Resolution in Calvin's Case, repealed that clause of 4 Jac. 1. last mentioned, as to all offences but Treason, leaving the offenders in that kind to be tried in the kingdom where they were apprehended. And though the Statute speak only of English, yet the like Act was to pass in Scotland, in case any of that nation committed treason here; else neither was to be binding to the nations.

2. In the next place, somewhat may be said from a national consideration, to prove the Earl no alien here, though born before the Union; not that my purpose is to endeavour the revival of that antient homage done formerly by that kingdom to this; it is not worth the mentioning, in comparison of that love and those engagements which have been betwixt us: 'Gens una summa' was heretofore said of us, and, if it may be, I wish 'sic semus in ævum.' But because somewhat hath been on the other side cited from the Stories of Bruce and Baliol, in the days of Edward 1, and for that I find both Law and History afford some matter for this argument, I hold it my duty not to be altogether silent in what passed in those times, and since. I will not insist upon those several Appeals made by Magdolphus, and others of the Scottish nation, to Edward 1, contra custodes Scotie, and against the kings of Scotland themselves: All Arguments of Allegiance then acknowledged from that kingdom to this.

But to instance in some Precedents nearer to this in question, Symon Fyssel, in 34 Ed. 1, anno 1306, a native of Scotland, came in an hostile manner from that kingdom to invade this; and being apprehended here, he was condemned as a Traitor. The words of Mat. West. 456, concerning him, are, 'That he was a Turri Londiuensi per plateas distractus, ut proditor.'

In the same year of Edward 1, William Wallis, the commander in chief of the Scottish forces, and a native of that nation also, as the Prisoner was, came into this kingdom: and being apprehended, was, saith Walsingham, fol. 61, 'Londonias usque ductus et judicialiter condemnatus, traitur, suspenditur, et ultimo decollatur;' though he pleaded, as our Historians tell us, what this Earl doth, That he was a subject of Scotland, and not of this kingdom, and therefore ought not to be tried here for Treason. In 42 Ed. 3, cap. 3, in the lord Beaumont's Case, when it was replied that the party objected against to be an alien was a Scotsman, the Plea is no longer insisted upon. A protection, quia projecturus, lies not into a country that is within the allegiance and protection of England, 7 H. 4, cap. 14. Yet we shall find the only reason given wherefore it was granted into Scotland was because of the wars that were then betwixt the nations, 7 Ed. 4, c. 27. After the ceasing of which wars, it may be collected by the Book, a protection would have lien no more thither, than it would have lien into Wales or Ireland.

In 13 and 14 Eliz. Dyer 304, one was arraigned for a Rape. At the return of the venire facias to try him, he pleaded that he was a Scotsman, and desired a medietate lingue, which manner of Trial is granted to Aliens by the statutes of 27 and 28 Ed. 3. But by the Judgment of the Judges of both beuches it was denied him, for this reason, amongst others, Because, saith the Book, a Scotsman was never here reputed for an Alien, but rather a Subject.

Obj. Whereas it hath been said, This was because the statutes of 27 and 28 Ed. 3, were made when Scotsmen were generally reputed subjects to this kingdom:

Assw. I answer, 1. That the Book gives no such reason. 2. To affirm this, is to suppose the Judges, by such a foreign conceit, to go against the express provision of two acts of parliament, and the constant practice in pursuance thereof.

In the same year of 13 Eliz. in the Case of the Duke of Norfolk,* the Evidence of the bishop of Ross, a Scotsman, was offered against the Duke by the counsel for the Commonwealth; which the Duke opposed from the Judgment of Bracton, That a foreigner's testimony was not in that case to be received. But Catlin, Chief Justice, though he says nothing to Bracton's opinion, touching exteriorum testimonium, yet he gives the rule of the court, That the testimony was to be received. Camden's Eliz. 214.

After this time also the queen of Scots was tried in this kingdom, though not upon the statute of 25 Ed. 3, yet upon the statute of 27 Eliz. cap. 2, then in force. And though in the Proceedings of that business Commissioners of both nations met, and that the Scots Commissioners did protest, that though they did join with our Commissioners, yet they did thereby make no acknowledgment that they were other than a foreign nation to this; yet the Englishmen protested against that Protestation, as we find in the History of that Queen.†

3rdly, But to pass from this national to a more personal consideration, and from thence (though he were an Ante-natus) to prove the Earl liable to punishment for Treason against this State, and that by a local allegiance both in Scotland and England: Wherein it must be granted as a principle, and cannot be denied, but that if an Alien come into this nation, and there abide and commit that Act which would always be Treason in an English subject, it is by the law Treason in him during that abode, because he oweth Localem Ligeantiam, and the Indictment against him shall say, 'contra Ligeantiam suam debitum,' 7 li. Calvin's Case. Thus in 36 Eliz. the Portugals here in England join in an Act of Treason with doctor Lopez; and it was adjudged Treason in all. Thus this Earl, though he had been born before the Union, yet he lived in Scotland after the Union, and at the very time of this Invasion, whereby he became a subject, at least Locali Ligeantia.

So in England also, not only by his former residence here, which he will say perhaps was avoided by his removal hence, but by his late coming in, he became Ligeus here Locali Ligeantia, because he came from a kingdom then, by his own confession, in amity with this. This was the Case of Shirley, a Frenchman, 4 Mar. who came from France, then in amity with England; and being taken levying war in an hostile manner, was indicted and executed as a Traitor, Dyer 144. And as the Book puts it, 7 li. Calvin's Case, if he had had issue here, that issue should have inherited.

4thly, In the next place, I shall prove the Earl of Cambridge (though he had been an Ante-natus) to be a subject of England Ligeantia acquisita, and that by the Naturalization of his Father, or by his own denization. But, first, as to the Naturalization of his Father:

1. The Act of Parliament hath been read and proved, whereby the father of this Earl, by the name of James marquis of Hamilton, earl of Cambridge, in 21 Jac. was naturalized to be to all intents and purposes a subject of this nation, as if he had been here born; with a further Clause, That his heirs might inherit and purchase any lands, tenements, &c. By which Act it clearly appears that this Earl is naturalized also: For, 1st, though in the case of a Denization there may need the word Heirs to extend it to them, because it goes as it is limited, it may be for life, in tail, or upon condition, 9 Ed. 4, cap. 7, yet it is repugnant to suppose that in point of a Naturalization, because he that is born in England, as by relation this makes him, without any other expressions, conveys the right to his heirs. Hence Naturalization is never temporanea, though data, 1 Inst. 129. 2ndly, Here are not wanting words neither, that reach to the heirs, if necessary; for the Act is, That his heirs may inherit and purchase, &c. And in pursuance hereof it is notorious that this Earl hath done both. But we shall find that oftentimes no more goes to express a Naturalization than this; no other expression is used to import the privilege of being English, to them that are born of English parents beyond sea, but only that they may have, and freely bear the inheritance within the same allegiance as other inheritors, 25 Ed. 3, 'De natis ultra Mare.' And in 3 H. 6, cap. 55, Hall and his Wife brought a Writ of Trover: The Tenant pleaded that the Feme was an Alien. The Demandants reply, That the Feme in the time of Henry 4, was enabled by act of parliament to purchase lands and tenements, &c. With which Reply the Defendant's counsel rested satisfied, as if the replication expressed it sufficiently that she was naturalized; and thereupon demanded view.

* See No. 56, vol. 1, p. 957.

Obj. But it hath been objected, That this Act can have no other effect than if the now Earl's father had been born in England: And though he were a native Englishman, yet having issue this Earl by a native Scotswoman in Scotland, the issue thereby remains an Alien, though his father were naturalized or born in England.

Answer. 1. I shall easily grant both that this Earl was so born in Scotland, and that the Naturalization amounts to no more than if the old Earl had been born in England; but do deny the inference drawn from thence, That therefore the now Earl must be an alien: For though in former time some controversy hath been touching this question, viz. Whether the issue of an Englishman, going out of the kingdom, born of an alien woman, shall be a subject of England, or no? yet I take the law to be clear at this day, that such issue is a subject of England.

By the Common Law, if Father and Mother, both English, have issue beyond sea, that issue is English, 1 R. 3, 4, the statute of 25 Ed. 3, 'De natis ultra mare,' being declarative of the Common Law, 42 Ed. 3, cap. 10. And if the reason and practice of the Law be examined, we shall find it to be the same, where the Father only is English, for these reasons:

First, Because at this day any person may go from this kingdom to another without Licence, though he be neither nobleman, merchant, or soldier, except some restraint by a Ne eras Regnum, Proclamation, or other act of state be against him. So is it resolved, 12 and 13 Eliz. Dyer 296. And though all, except persons so qualified, were restrained by 5 R. 2, c. 2, yet that statute is repealed by the statute of 4 Jac. cap. 1, made principally in reference to Scotland. Therefore however the law may be as to such as go when prohibited, or who stay beyond sea when commanded to return; yet as to all others, at this day, and always as to noblemen, as the father of this Earl was, upon whom no restraint was ever put by common or statute law, certainly the law is otherwise, especially when the removal is to a country in amity, as Scotland was.

Secondly, 'Partus sequitur patrem,' by the common law: therefore, in 4 Ed. 4, 25, Staitham Villen. 9, if a Freeman marry a Nief, and have issue, that issue is free; but otherwise, if the man had been villain, and the woman free.

Thirdly. The woman alien by the marriage is denizenized, and the issue then must needs partake of the privilege. And it appears by 26 Ed. 1. Rot. Parl. 1, that when Edmond, the brother of Edward 1, who married the queen of Navarra, died, all the Judges resolved she should be indowed. And what though she should not, as in other cases it hath been doubted, yet that hinders not, but during cover-ture she was denizenized, and that's enough to denizenize the issue. If a Nief marry a Freeman, it is and hath been a doubt, whether this be a perpetual enfranchisement to the woman after the death of her baron: But it never was doubted but that both herself, during coverture, and her issue ever after, were enfranchised. Lit. Sect. 187. 1 Inst. 136

And for express Authority in the point in hand, besides the antient Authority of Abridg. Ass. 39. tit. Bastard. 7. and Bro. Denizen 21. it was the Judgment of all the Judges of England, 2 Ca. in the Dutchy-Chamber, between the King and Eaton, usually called Stephenson's Case, the Record whereof is ready to be produced; where Judge Yelverton, and Hervey then Judges Assistant to that Court, declared it to be their Judgment, as also of all the other Judges, that the two sons of Stephenson, born beyond-sea upon the body of an alien, were denizens.

Object. I observed but one book cited for maintenance of the contrary opinion, and that was 26 Hen. 6, where indeed it is 22 H. 6, 38.

Answer. Which Authority is against, not for that Opinion for which it is cited: for in an action there brought, the Defendant pleads that the Plaintiff's ancestor, in the time of Hen. 4, went beyond-sea without licence, and there had issue the Plaintiff. Upon this Plea, Ardenne the Plaintiff's Counsel demurs; he saith the book, Prisset the Defendant's Counsel durst not demur.

Secondly, If the book were as it is supposed, yet it makes nothing against the law at this day; because by the book it appears, that the Plaintiff's ancestor went beyond sea in the time of H. 4. without licence; which being after R. 2, there was a restraint upon him, except by licence, or qualified as that statute of R. 2, requires: which restraint is now abrogated, as is before said; and the inhabitants of England, as is suitable to all Islanders, may travel at pleasure, except especially forbidden: and so whatever the law was then, it is otherwise now; 'Mutata ratione legis, mutatur Lex.'

Object. What if the present Earl did himself endeavour, or, as he saith was advised notwithstanding the Naturalization of his father, to procure himself to be naturalized, or indenzized?

Answer. Yet that could be but in major cautela; as some savings have been inserted into acts of parliament themselves, not for necessity, but for satisfaction of the lay-gent, as our Books express it, 1 li. Co. 24. Plow Com. 379, upon the statute of 5 Ed. 6. And even in that case of Stephenson, though the Judges assistants delivered what was their own Opinions and of the rest of the Judges; yet if making the party a denizen would end the controversy, they did advise it.

5thly, Besides this purchase of his father's the Earl hath himself contributed to his own denization, not so much by inheriting his father's dignity, and purchasing and enjoying himself lands in England, that being rather an evidence of what he formerly was, than making him what he was not before; but by the Writ of summons sent to this Earl himself, 15 Car. The Record whereof hath been read, commanding him 'ex fide et ligeantia sua' to appear in parliament as a peer of this realm; who accordingly did appear, and acted in this parliament, being chosen of several committees in the Lords House, to consider of many things of great concernment, some whereof were for the Strength of the Nation, as hath been fully proved by the Records of the Lords House. All which actions are so inconsistent with his being an alien, and would be such a solecism in state to admit an alien to be invested amongst others with a judicial power, that rather than it should be admitted, all this laid together will (I conceive) amount to at least a denization.

I will not say, that the granting of every office, or the being employed in any transaction which concerns the law or government of the kingdom, will make an alien a denizen; the Books of Ed. 4. 1. and 14 H. 4. 19. forbid me to say so: but it is another thing to have a judicial power in parliament, and to sit by virtue of such Summons in the Parliament of England. The lord Delaware was disabled to sit in the house of peers during his life; but he dying, and a Writ of Summons coming to his son, he was by virtue thereof enabled not only to sit, but to enjoy that place which his ancestors formerly had done, 11 li. Co. 1. And in 39 Ed. 3. 29. Umfrevil earl of Angus ought to be named Earl in the Writ against him, because by that name he was summoned to the parliament; and for not naming him so, the Writ abated. A Denization is a kind of a national manumission: now as there is in law an express enfranchisement of a villain, and an enfranchisement in law, Lit. sect. 205. so it may be said of denizations. And amongst other manumissions by act in law, I find in Britton, fol. 79 and 82. If a villain were made a knight, this did make him free ratione dignitatis, and did not make the conferring of that dignity to be a void act, parallel whereunto is the case in hand.

Sixthly, The last thing I shall insist upon, touching this second part of the Plea, is to make it appear, that though the earl had been born before the Union, and an Alien, that yet there are other circumstances in this Case yet remaining, which will clearly make this act of his to amount to no less than treason, viz. his coming from a kingdom in amity with this, and his marching in hither with English traitors. That he marched in and held correspondence with sir Marmaduke Langdale and his son, and with sir Thomas Glesham, and divers others, hath been fully proved; and that that kingdom was then in amity with this, besides the National Treaties and Engagements unrepealed, it appears as well by the Earl's own Confessions at the bar, as by the words of the Scottish Declaration made upon this Expedition, read at the Earl's own request; which, whatever it be, doth yet conclude this Earl and all his party from alledging the contrary for their advantage, it having been often reiterated by him; and also therein said, That this Expedition was neither against the Parliament nor People of England: besides, that it is no slight matter to make nations in amity to become open enemies in a legal construction, which we are now upon, as appears by the book of 19 Ed. 4. 6.

Now that these circumstances will make this Act reach to Treason, appears by these authorities of law. In the days of queen Mary, France and England were in amity; Shirley, a French native, during that amity, joins himself with some English traitors: Shirley is apprehended, and indicted as a traitor, 'contra ligentiam suam debitum,' 4 Mar. Dyer 144, which is confirmed for good law likewise, 7 li. in Calvin's Case, by all the Judges: with which agrees Bro. Treason 32, and Crompton's Jurisdiction of Courts 72, and Mr. Justice Dalli-son's Reports, 3, 4 Mar. All which Authorities agree in this difference, That if alien enemies join with English Rebels, and be apprehended, the aliens shall be tried by martial law, or ransomed; but if alien armies so join, it is treason in all. And it is observable that the Case is put cautiously in li. 4, and so abridged by Bro. Treason 1. That where alien enemies join with English, the aliens shall be tried by martial law, and the English as traitors.

Obj. The Objection hath been made, and so far it seems the law is agreed, That if Aliens fight under the banner of English, that this may be Treason in all; but not if the English fight under the command of Aliens, which is alleged to be the case in hand.

Ans. 1. I cannot safely admit that which the Objection takes for granted, that the English were the Auxiliaries, and the Scots the Principals in this act, when I find it in the Proof offered by the Earl himself, that he came in by the invitation of their friends in England, and when I remember what was designed and produced in the South of England before and at the same time with this expedition. 2. But admit it to be otherwise, yet if this difference were material, then it should follow likewise, That if alien enemies did fight under an English command, it should be treason in all: but it is not so. 3. The law makes no such difference, nay, the very Objection seems to be made and answered, 4 Mar. Dyer 144, for the book saith, That though Shirley were an Alien, yet 'hoc non refert tempore pacis inter Anglos et Gallos;' the weight is laid upon tempus pacis only. 4. The true reason of the law in one Case is the same in both; which I conceive to be from the detestation of conspiring with an inward secret enemy, and from the trust the law reposeth in such as are of a country in amity. There is no treason, but where there is a trust: hence anciently Treason, in its genuine and original acceptation, was only and properly amongst allies and friends, who mutually did repose confidence in each other, as may be seen in the Mirror, fol. 30 and 201. And that a greater trust was placed in Aliens armies than in others, appears in that our law allows not only traffic and commerce with them, but also allows them to be to some purposes denizens; namely, as to the bringing personal actions; which if they bring, it shall not be allowed to plead that the plaintiffs are aliens; 19 Ed. 4, 6, and 6 H. 8, Dyer 2.

Obj. But the Earl hath objected, That upon the Scottish forces coming in under his command, they of that nation were by the House of Commons voted Enemies, and those of this kingdom who adhered to them, traitors.

Ans. 1. The words of that Vote seem to be exclusive of the prisoner, mentioning only those under his command. 2. Though every enemy, in the legal signification of the word, be not a Traitor, yet every traitor is an enemy; and therefore if now he be proved a traitor, he may be well enough an enemy within that Vote. The present Charge against him is a Charge of High-Treason, yet the Conclusion doth not improperly pray judgment against him both as a traitor and public enemy. 3. Take the words in the strictest sense, and the Vote only names those of the Scottish nation enemies, but those of this kingdom traitors. Now the labour hath been, and I suppose it clear that the Earl himself is of this nation, and so a Traitor by that Vote, from which he would derive an argument for himself. 4. If yet any other construction should be made, 'Leges posteriores priores abrogant;' he is, by the act whereby this court now sits, ordered to be tried for Treason in the same kind as the rest, who are now under question: and if his fact be Treason, it will easily follow by an argument of à denominatis, that he is a Traitor.

The third part of the earl of Cambridge's Plea is, That he is a Prisoner of War, and rendered upon Articles, and that those Capitalations were made before his rendition with major-general Lambert's commissioners. That there were Articles, and he a Prisoner of War, I shall agree to be proved; as also that one of those Articles was, That he should have quarter, and have his life assured: and it must be agreed on the other hand, That the lord Gray, who had equal authority, protested from the first against that Treaty, and after took him Prisoner before any assent thereunto. But whether, by the proof, the Earl were not a Prisoner before signing the Articles; and whether before the Articles were to have any effect, the same were not to be ratified by the commanders in chief, is submitted to judgment upon the Evidence. That therefore I may do the Prisoner right in this point, which he seems to make his strongest asylum, I shall admit that there were such Articles, and waive the relying upon the other circumstances, which may not seem so clear in proof.—Nevertheless I shall briefly shew my reasons, wherefore I apprehend no security from the stroke of Civil Justice belongs to the Prisoner by this refuge; for as to the military, is not the contention.

First, if these Articles be of avail against the civil power of the state, they must in effect amount to a pardon or discharge of Treason (for this point doth take the last point by admittance, viz. that the Fact is Treason). Now though the military power may exempt a Prisoner of War from the execution of the sword, and of their own power; yet it is not in their power, nor do they assume or ever challenge such a power, as to exempt Delinquents and Traitors from the execution of the magistrate; for the bringing of whom to condign punishment, the soldier was at first armed, and the war principally begun: and if it should be in the power of one soldier, it would partition be in the power of all, as well to spare all as one; and if to grant a pardon of life, then likewise for their livelihoods. And so the end of the war, and the satisfaction promised, would be in the power of the servants of the state to frustrate; not that the Articles have no effect, for he was by them freed from the immediate execution of the sword.

Secondly, The pardoning of Treason is a power so inseparable to the Supreme Power, that by the authorities of law it is not communicable to any other: in 5 Ed. 4, 125, it is made a great doubt, and so said to be 1 Bro. Treason 22. Mercy and Justice being so transferable. 7 li. Co. in the case of penal statutes, 9 Ed. 4, 2, and 20 H. 7, 6. It is true indeed, there was a time when some had gotten this power into their hands, but by the statute of 27 H. 8, cap. 24, this power was resumed into the supreme power, and there it hath since lodged. And however we dispute not what the parliament may do by express words, as they have done in many acts and tenders of Indemnity; yet without such expressions, not by any implicit power, nor ex officio can any justly assume it.

Thirdly, By the rules of law no Officer or minister of state can give away or dispense with the interest of the Commonwealth. If a customer, who is an officer of state, take a bond in his own name for the importation of bullion, he cannot discharge this bond; 4 Ed. 4, 4 and 12. The King was the supreme Officer of the Commonwealth, yet if an indictment of misfeasance had been preferred against one in his name, it had not been in his power to have discharged this offence; 3 Ed. 3, Fitz. 445. Nor could he for the same reason by any Non-obstante dispense with the penalty of any Statute which did concern the interest of the commonwealth. 12 Jac. sir Arthur Ingram's Case, and 11. 36 Eliz. betwixt Harmond and Griffith, in an Information upon a penal Statute, the Informer died, yet the King's Attorney might proceed. The difference I apprehend to be, as to the point in hand, betwixt one triable by Martial Law merely, as an Alien enemy is; for such a one being triable by the sword, if taken, may be discharged by that power, though in that case I totally exclude not the legislative power; but for a Traitor, originally and legally only triable by the municipal laws of a state, to be absolutely discharged by a subordinate power, without the concurrence or confirmation of the magistrate, will ever be strange to me, till I find that Rule overturned of 'Nil dat quod habet,' which can never be in a just and moral sense.

Fourthly, However the words sound, the intention and true meaning of the parties was not to free those that were concerned from Justice, if the State required it; and intentions are the best rules for construction in these cases. That it was intended only in this Treaty to free the prisoner from the present execution of the sword by Martial Law, and no otherwise, hath been sworn by two of those gentlemen that were Commissioners under major-general Lambert, who have sworn their own intentions. 'Words,' saith Bracton, 'are but testimenta rerum,' as the body and outward form; the true meaning and intention of parties is the life and soul of every contract; as for 'sensus literalis,' it hath been (I have observed) 'via regia,' but it hath not proved unto that side 'via tuta.' However words sound, the Exposition must be 'secundum subjectam materiam.' In 41 E. 3, 6, if one having divers faculties hath an annuity granted to him 'pro concilio impenso,' the Words are general, but it shall be construed for counsel in that art which was intended. And as Brudnel saith, in 14 H. 8, 2. Contracts shall be expounded according to the intents of those that did contract. Cicero saith, speaking 'de justitia,' as a Judge, not as an advocate, fol. 24, to cavil with words against the mind of the parties, 'est calumnia quædam et malitiosa Juris Interpretatio;' in which place he puts a case upon a Treaty, as ours is, of one who had made a truce for 130 days with his enemy, and taking advantage of the letter, fell upon his enemy in the night, alleging the truce was only for days, which the orator derides as mere injustice. And no otherwise may the literal construction, contended for, be in the present Case, except the letter must be observed or not observed, as it proves advantageous or disadvantageous to the Prisoner. Besides, it is usual in law, that by Averments the intentions of parties take place, where the letter would not so decide the question; as 5 li. Co. 68, and 21 E. 2, Fitz. Devis. 27. Nor do I see, how in the penning those Articles any other expressions could well have been. If provision had been made, that the Prisoner should have been exempted from the power of Civil Justice, that had been void; and if it had been expressed, that nothing was by those Articles intended to exempt him from Civil Justice, that had also implied a power in them, if they had seen cause, to have given an absolute discharge from the magistrate; which had been equally by construction derogatory to the Civil Power.

Fifthly, If the Earl had ever been de facto pardoned, yet he may seem to have lost the benefit thereof by his Escape made after a special promise to the governor with whom he was Prisoner. The Civil Law, as Fortescue observes, cap. 46, 'Libertinum ingratum in pristinum redigit Servitutum;' and our Law saith, If one hath committed a capital crime, and, being pardoned after, do but break the peace, he forfeits the benefit of the Pardon: 3 H. 7, 7, as Bartue did the benefit of his Licence to travel, by his resort to the Fugitives, 2 Eliz. Dy. 176. And I conceive no difference, whether the condition be expressed or implied; which I infer not to make the Escape Treason, being not so charged, and the Statutes of 2 H. 6, and 14 Eliz. being expired concerning that; but only for this purpose it is enforced, that he who rendered himself up a Prisoner of War, and had for that consideration Quarter granted him, and yet after breaks that which was on his part to be performed, hath thereby deprived himself of that privilege which otherwise he might have enjoyed.

Obj. If now the Prisoner shall be questioned for his life, who by the Rendition of himself had quarter given him for it, how is the consideration made good which did induce him to surrender? Besides, there if he had died (as the Earl himself said), he had preserved his Estate, and avoided the consequences of Attainder.

Ans. It is strange that it should be thought no Privilege to have so much time to die, in case there were certainty of it, above a death by military execution, which usually is sudden, and 'sine strepitu Judicii.' 2. Is it no privilege above an immediate death by the sword, to have a fair judicial Proceeding by a Charge against him, putting in his own Plea thereunto, the Matter of Fact by Witnesses and other Evidence proved on both sides, and counsel assigned him of his own choice to argue his own cause in point of law, and himself to be heard as much as he could speak in his own Defence? 3. And the Danger seems by this manner of Trial not greater than before; for he that dies a Traitor in furore belli, because himself is the cause why formalities of legal proceedings against him cannot be observed, by the ancient law forfeited his estate, and remained attainted notwithstanding. Plowd. Com. 262. Fitz. Dower. 106, where, in a Writ of Dower, the Demandant was barred, for that her husband went into Scotland, and joining himself with the enemies, died in enmity.

Object. As to the Examples of Joshua with the Gibeonites, and of the prophet Elisha forbidding the king of Israel to smite those whom he had taken captive with his sword and bow:

Ans. I answer, As to the first, viz. that of Joshua with the Gibeonites, God forbid but that as that, so all other Leagues and Treaties should be kept so far, as to bind that Power that made them, and who can rationally expect more? Now, Joshua was the successor of Moses, and a magistrate as well as commander. Besides, it is said the Princes of the Congregation swore unto them ; and, had these circumstances been incident to this case, the dispute had been ended. 1. As to the other Instance, the Men of Syria had a personal quarrel against Elisha ; and therefore none being interested but the prophet, it might well become his piety to be their intercessor. 2. For any thing appears, the Prophet only speaks against their being smitten with the Sword of War, which, if it had been drawn in cold blood, might have been the Blood of war in peace ; but not against the sword of civil justice. 3. These enemies were taken in the midst of Samaria, in cruce prelio ; and therefore bread and water might well be set before them, that they might eat, and go to their masters : but there hath been in this case much blood drawn, and mischief done ; for the avenging and satisfaction whereof, justice cries to them that bear not the sword in vain.

And now (my lord) though I might have demanded Judgment for want of the Prisoner's making good his own Plea, which he ought to have done before I had said any thing to the contrary ; the Plea of being an Alien lying on his part to prove that pleads it : 9 Ed. 4, 12 and Dy. 300, and the Plea of a Pardon being a confession of the fact, if not made out, proves fatal and final also to the party ; Stanf. Cor. 150. Yet nevertheless, for that the Prisoner hath not been confined herein to the strict formalities of the law, I have also, on the behalf of the Commonwealth, taken the privilege of speaking thus much for asserting the Invalidity of his Plea. And therefore, upon the whole matter, having now said what hath prevailed with my Judgment to offer in this case, I humbly submit the same to the judgment and consideration of this Honourable Court.

The Court adjourned to Tuesday, being the 6th of March ; and then the Duke was brought to the bar, and the Judges sat in scarlet. They rejected the Duke's Plea in all its branches, and found him guilty of the Charge whereof he was indicted. But before Sentence, Bradshaw the President resumed all, and spoke long for aggravating of every particular, justifying every thing the Counsel had pleaded, as if it had been all both good law and good reason. Then he caused to be read the Earl of Essex's Commission, to shew how little power was given him : (But spoke nothing of Fairfax or Lambert their Commissions, which had been more pertinent, but the reason was, they were ampler, and yet the Parliament had never refused to ratify any Articles Essex gave.) He confessed the Duke's Articles were fuller than any others, therefore he would insist the more to invalidate them. He said, It was true, if there had been a war proclaimed, and prosecuted betwixt a foreign nation and enemy and England, then by the law of nations, to which their law was consonant, Articles signed by the Commissioners of both parties should have been kept inviolable : but the Prisoner was no enemy ; for when the ordinary course of justice was obstructed by the late king's prevailing party, so that neither constables nor sheriffs, nor other civil officers, could lay hold on such Delinquents as he was, or bring them to punishment, the Parliament was forced to raise an Army, commissionating their generals to bring such to condign punishment. This being the end and substance of their Commission, it was not in their power, who were but the Sword of Justice in the Parliament's hand, to give Articles for securing any from the justice of the parliament, since it was never intended their Acts should limit that power that gave bounds to them. He added also, That the Court was fully satisfied that the Duke was naturalized. At last Sentence was given against him, " That his head should be sever'd from his body on Friday next, being the ninth instant : " yet it was remitted to the Parliament's consideration, what mercy should be shewed to him ; and so the Duke was carried back.

The rest of that day, and the next day, the Duke was earnestly solicited to preserve himself by making Discoveries. And Mr. Peters, who appeared concerned for him during his Trial, did now insinuate himself on him to draw somewhat from him : but all was in vain, there being no choice to be made betwixt a glorious death and an infamous life.

The Duke's Execution.

On the 8th of that month, it being put to the Vote of the House, whether he should be reprieved or not, it was carried in the negative. And he was executed the 9th of March.

The night before his Execution, the Duke, the earl of Norwich, the lord Capel, and sir John Owen (who had all received Sentence of death) were brought into one room. Having spent great part of that night in taking leave of their friends, and in their devotions, the next day the Duke made the following Speech to his friends that attended him, which his brother published from the original he sent him :

" I know you that are here to be true and faithful to me ; I will therefore, in your hearing, say somewhat in order to myself and to my present condition, and give you also this Copy of it ; which, after I am gone, may, perhaps, be thought necessary to be published as the last testimony of my loyalty to my king, for whom I now die, and of my affection to my country, for the pursuance of whose pious and loyal commands I am now to suffer.

" That my Religion hath always been, and still is orthodox, I am confident no man doubts ; I shall not therefore need to say much to that particular, only that I am of the true Reformed Protestant Religion, as it is professed in the church of Scotland.

" I take God to witness, that I have been constantly a loyal and faithful subject and servant to his late majesty, in spite of all malice and calumny ; I have had the honour, since my childhood, to attend and be near him till now of late; and, during all that time, I observed in him as eminent virtues and as little vice as in any man I ever knew; and I dare say he never harboured thought of countenancing Popery in any of his dominions, otherwise than was allowed by the laws of England, and that among all his subjects there could not be found a better Protestant than himself; and surely, also, he was free from having any intent to exercise any tyranny or absolute power over his subjects; and that he hath been so unfortunate, I rather impute the cause of it to the sins of his people, than to his own. For my own part, I do protest never to have swerved from that true allegiance which was due to him, and that hath constantly been paid (to my comfort I speak it) to his progenitors by my ancestors, for many ages, without spot or dishonour; and I hope shall be still, by my successors, to his posterity.

"I do heartily wish well to, and pray for his royal issue, and shall die a true and loyal subject to his eldest son Charles 2, the unquestionable king by right of all his father's kingdoms. I hope, though I do not live to see it, that God's justice and goodness will, in his own time, establish him on the throne of his father, which, I doubt not, some of you will see come to pass; and I am confident, till then, and so long as men, deeply plunged in guilt and self-interest, usurp power and government, these kingdoms will fall short either of peace, or any other permanent happiness.

"I speak from my just affection to the royal race, and much compassion to his majesty's subjects; but not from any malice, anger, or desire of revenge against any, for what I have, or am to suffer, for I forgive all men.

"It is well known what calumnies and aspersions have been thrown upon me by men of several parties and interests, not excepting those who would seem to carry much affection to his late majesty, as if I had expressed disservice or disloyalty to him; the which, how malicious and groundless they were, I appeal to God, who, with my own conscience, clearly beareth witness of my innocency therein, and I shall beg mercy from him to whom I am now to give an account of all my thoughts and actions, as I have still had a faithful and loyal heart to my master.

"It hath been a general complaint, that I persuaded his majesty to pass the act of continuing this parliament. I dispute not whether the doing of it at that time might have been reputed good or bad, but surely it was not I that did persuade it; neither did I at all deal with his majesty for his consent to the Bill of Attainder for taking away the life of the earl of Strafford, whose great parts and affections, it is known, I highly valued: Yet some have been pleased to attribute to me the cause of that concession; but were his majesty now living, I am confident he would publicly clear me in both these, as he hath been pleased many times in private formerly to do.

"And truly I am not conscious to myself,

(though I have been for many years a privy counsellor to him) of ever giving him any advice that tended to other ends, as I conceived, than the good and peace of his majesty and his dominions.

"It hath been rumoured, since my last imprisonment, that I should confess myself to be the greatest instrument under his majesty, by making use of his Scottish Great Seal, for authorizing the war in Ireland; a report so false and simple, as, in my opinion, judicious and honest men will not believe it. And truly, as I am free from having hand therein in any manner of way, so I am of nothing more confident, than that his majesty was also absolutely free thereof, and that he was not in any case a causer or countenancer of those Irish troubles.

"I have been often examined touching persons of several qualities within this kingdom, that, as is supposed, did invite into England the late Army from Scotland, or promised assistance after their coming; and of late much persuasion hath been used with me to that purpose, as that upon my discovery thereof depended the only means of my preservation. I will not say that I had any thing to reveal, which would have been satisfactory; but this I desire you to attest to the world, that I have not accused, or said any thing that may reflect on any man of what degree soever, within the king's dominions: And indeed it was so contrary to my conscience, and so derogatory to my honour, that if I had been able, yet should I never have prejudiced any in that nature, though it had been to save me an hundred lives.

"Touching that foul and senseless slander, that I betrayed the Army under my conduct, the care and pains I then took to prevent the loss of it, and the near approach of my suffering for it, will, I suppose, abundantly contradict this aspersion. I was satisfied with the justness and necessity of that Engagement upon the grounds of the Declaration of the Parliament of Scotland, fearing then the sad confusions which have since followed here both in church and state, and particularly the fatal fall of my master, to the preservation of whose person I was by obligation and natural affections as passionately tied, as I could be by duty and allegiance.

"And now I confess I am void of all rancour or displeasure against any, though I am within few hours to die, adjudged by a lawless and arbitrary Court of purpose erected, as is said, to destroy my Master, and some of his servants, and for a great part composed of men mechanic and unfit to be Judges; my Death being decreed right or wrong, as is reported, before ever the Trial begun. And though my Death is no less than Murder, yet I forgive all, and pray to God to do it, and, that my blood be not laid to their charge, or to some powerful and eminent men, who, as is thought, upon some sinistrous ends, have many months since contrived my destruction, which now is ready to take effect. And though I have answered to that Court in regard of the justness of my Defence, which I thought would have weighed with them : Yet I never thought, nor do I acknowledge any jurisdiction, or lawful authority in the same, notwithstanding I do with all Christian humility submit to the punishment, which for my other personal sins the Lord hath justly brought upon me. I should have spoken more, yet would not have said so much, but for fear lest either my memory might slip it on the Scaffold, or that the rudeness of some people, by noise or otherwise, might have interrupted me speaking on this subject. So I thank God I am well prepared. God bless you, remember me to all my friends. I know I have been a great sinner, yet through faith I have an assurance that God will forgive me, and have mercy upon me, through the alone suffering and intercession of Jesus Christ my Saviour. Amen."

About nine o'clock the officers called to the Prisoners to prepare to go, and they were carried in sedans, strongly guarded, to sir Robert Cotton's house : When they came to sir Robert Cotton's, three or four officers came from Cromwell, desiring the Duke to make some Discoveries, who should not only be preserved, but be made a great man ; but he refused, as he had formerly done on those occasions, and said, if he had as many lives as hairs on his head, he would lay them all down, rather than redeem them by so base a means. Then they all went to prayers, and they had some excellent preachers waiting on them, and praying with them. Some wine was brought them, and they all drank one to another, and embraced and kissed each other with much tenderness. The Duke was first led to the scaffold, and on the way other officers came from Cromwell, renewing the former offers, if he would make Discoveries, but he rejected them with scorn.

When the Duke came to the Scaffold, perceiving greater silence than he expected, though he had resolved to make no public Speech, yet being invited by the attention he observed, he spoke to the People ; but as he had not premeditated it, no Copy remains but what was printed from the Notes of the hearers, and therefore Dr. Burnet says he only gives us the Heads of it ; as follows :

He addressed himself to the Sheriff, and told him, " He judged it not very necessary for him to speak much, his voice was so weak and low, that few of the crowd that looked on would hear him ; nor was he ever so much in love with speaking, or with any thing he had to say, that he took much delight in it : yet since this was his last, he being by the Divine Providence of Almighty God brought justly to that end for his sins, he would speak a little to the Sheriff, for his voice could not reach others. He was now to suffer as a Traitor to the kingdom of England, a country which he had ever loved equally with his own, not having intended any general prejudice to it, or to any particular person in it : his late actings were the commands of his own country, which he could not disobey. It is true, it had pleased God so to dispose of the Army under his command, that it was ruined, and he for being clothed with a Commission to be General, stood now ready to die. He would not repent what he had pleaded for his own Defence, God was just ; nor would he say any thing of his Sentence, but that he did willingly submit to God's Providence, acknowledging that on many accounts he deserved punishment in this life, as well as in the next, for he confessed himself a great sinner : yet for his comfort he knew there was a God in heaven, who was very merciful, and that his Redeemer did sit at his right hand, and he was confident that he was mediating for him at that very instant, being hopeful, through his all-sufficient merits, to be pardoned all his sins, and to be received into his mercy, trusting only to the free grace of God through Jesus Christ. He declared he had never been tainted in the Religion professed and established in the land, in which he had been bred from his infancy : It was not this or that mode or fancy of religion that was to be built on, but one that was right and sure, and came from God."

Here observing some were taking Notes, he said he did not expect that, or he had digested what he had said into a better method : but desired that what he had said might not be published to his disadvantage, since he had not intended to speak any thing when he came to that place. Then he went on and said, " Many dreadful aspersions had been cast on him, as if his intentions had not been such as he pretended ; but he thanked God he was unjustly blamed : That for the King he had ever loved him, both as he was his king and master, with whom he had been bred many years, and had been his domestic servant, and that there was nothing the Parliament of Scotland declared for the King, that was not really intended by himself ; and as he hazarded his life for him one way, so he now was to lose it another ; and that his design of leading in the Army to England was really that which was published in the Declaration, in so far as concerned the King : He was not then to speak of the rest of the Declaration, which had many other particulars in it ; and for what he said of his duty to the King, there was no reason to suspect him of flattery, or any other end in saying it, (God having now disposed of his majesty) but though he could gain nothing by it, yet he owed the freeing himself of that calumny to truth, by which all men shall gain for ever. There had been many discourses founded on a part of the Scottish Declaration, which mentioned an invitation to come to England, upon which he had been much laboured for discovering the inviters ; but he had and did still remit himself to the Declaration without any other Answer. He was ever willing to serve this nation in any thing was in his power, which was known to many worthy persons in it ; and he would still have continued in those resolutions, had those, in whose hands the power was then, thought fit to have preserved his life. But since he was thenceforth to be of no more use, all he could do, was to wish the kingdom happiness and peace, and to pray that his blood might be the last should be shed: And though perhaps he had some reluctance within himself at the suffering for this fact, yet he freely forgave all men, and carried no rancour with him to the grave; but did submit to the will of him who created heaven and earth, and himself, a poor sinful creature then speaking before him: He conceived it could contribute to no end for him to speak of State business, of the Government of the kingdom, or things of that nature; his own inclinations had been still for peace. He was never an ill instrument betwixt the king and his people, nor had he acted to the prejudice of the parliament. And, as he had not meddled much in those Wars, so he was never wanting in his prayers to Almighty God for his king's happiness, and he earnestly prayed God to direct his majesty (who then reigned) that he might do what should tend to his glory, and the peace and happiness of the kingdoms. He said he was of the established religion, which he had professed in his own country where he was born and bred, but for particular opinions he was not rigid, he knew many godly men had scruples about divers things, wherein he had never concerned himself; nor did difference of opinion (which was never more than at this time) move him. His own was clear. He prayed the Lord to forgive him his sins, as he freely forgave even those against whom he had the greatest grounds of animosity, remembering that prayer, 'Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive them that trespass against us.'

He discovered a great composure by his looks and manner of expression; and when he was desired to change the posture he stood in, since the sun shined full in his face: He answered presently, No, it would not burn it; and he hoped to see a brighter sun than that very speedily.

After the Duke had done speaking, he called for the Executioner, and desired to know how he should fit his body for the blow, and told him his servants would give him satisfaction. Then he called to his servants, and commanded them to remember him kindly to divers of his friends in England, particularly to his mother-in-law, the countess of Denbigh, to whom he had ever paid a filial respect, and to the old countess of Devonshire: He bid them tell her she would no more question his loyalty (which she had done sometimes in raillery) since he was now to seal it with his blood: Then he kneeled down and prayed, after which Dr. Sibbald entertained him with some pious discourses; then the Duke prayed a short prayer himself, and with a cheerful countenance embraced the Doctor, and said 'Truly I bless God I do not fear, I have an assurance that is grounded here' (laying his hand on his heart) 'that gives me more true joy than ever I had. I pass out of a miserable world to go to an eternal and glorious kingdom; and though I have been a most sinful creature, yet I know God's mercy is infinite; and I bless my God I go with so clear a conscience, that I know not the man I have personally injured.' Then embracing his servants he said to every one of them, 'You have been very faithful to me, the Lord bless you.' He turned next to the Executioner, and after he had observed how he should lay his body, he told him he was to say a short Prayer to his God while he lay all along, and should give a sign by stretching out his right hand, and then he was to do his duty; whom he freely forgave as he did all the world. And then he stretched himself on the ground, and having placed his head right, he lay a little while praying with great appearance of devotion, and then gave the sign: Upon which the Executioner, at one blow, severed his head from his body, which was received in a crimson taffety scarf by two of his Servants, kneeling by him, and was, together with his body, immediately put in a coffin, which was ready on the scaffold, and from thence conveyed to a house in the Meuse, from whence it was, according to the orders he had given, sent down by sea to Scotland, and interred in the Burial-place of his family*.

Note, In the next Article, extracted from Whitelocke's Memorials, are interwoven some particulars of this Case.

"*Very shortly after the execution of the duke of Hamilton, as if," says Laing, "the northern kingdom were unwilling to be outdone in bloodshed, Huntley, though married to a sister of Argyle who opposed his death, was beheaded in Scotland; a weak though naturally a gallant nobleman, odious to the covenanters from his religion, and formidable from his power." Whitelocke reports "that a minister asking him a little before his Execution, whether he desired absolution from the sentence of Excommunication, which he lay under, he answered, 'he would have nothing to do with him, nor with any that taught such heretical doctrine as he did, to speak to him.'" In his speech to the people, the marquis told them, 'he was sentenced to lose his life for obedience to his sacred sovereign, to which this ought to encourage all men, and not to affright them, and that they should for that cause stoop to a scaffold, as if it were a theatre of honour in this world, as indeed it was a heavenly ladder. That he only craved in his behalf the prayers of those among them that were of this opinion, without desiring the prayers of others whose spirits perchance might be otherwise inclined.'

Huntley's death has been ascribed to the instigation of Argyle, who had possessed himself of his estate. See 3 Laing's Hist. of Scot. 412, note (3.)

184. Proceedings in the High Court of Justice,* against the Earl of HOLLAND,† the Earl of NORWICH,‡ Lord CAPEL, and Sir JOHN OWEN, for High Treason: 1 CHARLES II. A. D. 1649. [Rushworth's Coll. Whitelocke's Memorials. Heath's English Martyrs. Clarendon's Hist.]

IN the year 1648, about the time of Hamilton's entering England with the Scots army, considerable efforts on behalf of the king were made in various parts, particularly in North and South Wales, by sir John Owen and others; in Leicestershire by lord Loughborough, and in Hertfordshire, Essex, Kent, and Surrey, under the earl of Norwich, lord Capel, sir Charles Lucas, the earl of Holland and others. All these efforts were overpowered: Sir John Owen was taken prisoner near Carnarvon; The earl of Holland was taken prisoner at St.

* Clement Walker gives to the third part of his "History of Independency," the title of "The High Court of Justice, or Cromwell's New Slaughter-House in England, with the Authority that constituted and ordained it, Arraigned, Convicted, and Condemned, for Usurpation, Treason, Tyranny, Theft, and Murder." In that work he examines this Court, with considerable ability and some learning, under the following heads: 1. "By what persons and authority this new erected unprecedented Court is constituted? 2. Of what persons it is constituted? 3. The way and manner of their proceedings? What formalities and laws they observe therein? How suitable to the known laws of the land and the Parliament's Declarations, Protestations, and Covenant, they are? 4. To what end this Court is constituted?"—See also in the second part of the History of Independency, p. 123, "Four true and considerable Positions for the Sitting Members, the new Court of Justice, and new Judges, Sheriffs, Officers, Lawyers, Justices and others, to ruminate upon." And in his Additional Postscript to this third Part, he says of it, "This Court (as High as it is) not being constituted a Court of Record, the prisoner, and those that are concerned in him, can have no record to resort to either, 1. To demand a Writ of Error in case of erroneous judgment. 2. To ground a plea of Auterfois Acquite, in case of new question for the same fact. 3. Or to demand an enlargement upon acquittal. Or 4. To demand a writ of conspiracy, against such as have combined to betray the life of an innocent man. Whereby it follows, That this prodigious Court hath power only to condemn and execute; not to acquit and give enlargement, contrary to the nature of all Courts of Judicature, and of justice itself: it is therefore a mere Slaughter-house to commit free-state murders in, without, nay against law and justice: and not a Court of Judicature; to condemn the nocent, and absolve the innocent. And the judges of this court run parallel with their father the Devil; who is ever the minister of God's wrath and fury, never of his mercy." In another place (p. 14), he calls it "the second engine appointed to root out all such as are of a different party [from that of Cromwell]—a formidable monster upon which no pen that I know of hath yet ventured."

† "The earl of Holland was a younger son of a noble house, and of a very fruitful bed, which divided a numerous issue between two great fathers: the eldest, many sons and daughters to the lord Rich; the younger, of both sexes, to Mountjoy earl of Devonshire. The reputation of his family gave him no great advantage in the world, though his eldest brother was earl of Warwick, and owner of a great fortune; and his younger earl of Newport, of a very plentiful revenue likewise. He, after some time spent in France, betook himself to the war in Holland, which he intended to have made his profession; where, after he had made two or three campaigns, according to the custom of the English volunteers, he came in the leisure of the winter to visit his friends in England, and the court, that shined then in the plenty and bounty of king James; and about the time of the infancy of the duke of Buckingham's favours, to whom he grew in a short time very acceptable. But his friendship was more entire to the earl of Carlisle, who was more of his nature, and humour, and had a generosity more applicable at that time to his fortune and his ends. And it was thought by many who stood within view, that for some years he supported himself upon the familiarity, and friendship of the other; which continued mutually between them very many years, with little interruption to their death. He was a very handsome man, of a lovely and winning presence, and gentle conversation; by which he got so easy an admission into the court, and grace of king James, that he gave over the thought of further intending the life of a soldier. He took all the ways he could to endear himself to the duke, and to his confidence, and wisely declined the receiving any grace or favour, but as his donation; above all, avoided the suspicion that the king had any kindness for him, upon any account but of the duke, whose creature he desired to be esteemed, though the earl of Carlisle's friend. And he prospered so well in that pretence, that the king scarce made more haste to advance the duke, than the duke did to promote the other.—He first preferred him to a wife, the daughter and heir of Cope, by Neot's; The earl of Norwich, lord Capel, lord Loughborough, sir George Lisle, sir Charles Lucas, and others, threw themselves into Colchester, where they were besieged, and suffered extreme hardships. Many details of the history of this siege are to be found in Rushworth and Whitelocke, the former of whom gives the following Account of the final events of it. It will be seen, that questions arose out of the grant of Quarter, for which reason the Articles of Surrender are here inserted.

Aug. 25th, 1648. From the League before Colchester we understood of some Overtures made yesterday by Goring and the rest for the Surrender of the town; but not accepted of, as you may see by the Papers following:

"My lord: Upon a solemn debate of the Officers here, upon occasion of your former letters of demanding the Persons of all the officers here, above the quality of a lieutenant, to render themselves to mercy; it was unanimously resolved by them, not to yield to the mercy of any other, but that of God alone: And that all means may be on our part used, for the farther avoiding of the effusion of more English blood, we have sent you here inclosed the lowest conditions which in substance we can receive with honour, conceiving the like were never refused to any, far lower reduced than we can yet yield ourselves to be: But if there be any doubt in the form of words, or circumstances, we will, if you like of it, send one gentleman, or more, that by a conference whom he had a good fortune; and amongst other things, the manor and seat of Kensington, of which he was shortly after made baron. And he had quickly so entire a confidence in him, that the duke prevailed with the king to put him about his son the prince of Wales, and to be a gentleman of his bedchamber, before the duke himself had reason to promise himself any proportion of his highness's grace, and protection. He was then made earl of Holland, Captain of the Guard, Knight of the Garter, and of the Privy Council; sent the first Ambassador into France to treat the marriage with the Queen, or rather privately to treat about the marriage before he was ambassador. And when the duke went to the isle of Rce, he trusted the earl of Holland with the command of that army with which he was to be recruited, and assisted.—In this confidence, and in this posture he was left by the duke when he was killed; and having the advantage of the queen's good opinion, and favour (which the duke neither had, nor cared for) he made all possible approaches towards the obtaining his trust, and succeeding him in his power; or rather that the queen might have solely that power, and be only be subservient to her; and upon this account, he made a continual war upon the earl of Portland the treasurer, and all others who were not gracious to the queen, or desired not the increase of her authority. And in this state, and under this protection, he received with the like number appointed by you, may clear all scruples, and agree of the time of performance. Your Lordships Servants, NORWICH, ARTHUR CAPELL, CHARLES LUCAS." Colchester, Aug. 24, 1648.

The ARTICLES were as followeth;

"That the Town and Castle of Colchester, and all places of defence whatsoever in the same, with all the ordnance, arms, ammunition and provisions of war, all magazines and stores thereunto belonging, excepting what is allowed in the ensuing Articles, shall be delivered to the general, the lord Fairfax, or whom he shall appoint, without wilful spoil or embezzlement.—That the earl of Norwich, lord Capell, sir Charles Lucas, the lord Loughborough, and all the rest of the officers, gentlemen, and soldiers, both of horse and foot, shall march out of this town of Colchester, with their horses and arms, a mile without the town, and then all to render up their horses and arms, excepting as followeth.—That the earl of Norwich, the lord Capell, sir Charles Lucas, and the lord Loughborough, shall march away from thence with all their horses, arms, and other equipage, particularly belonging to them.—That all other general-officers, colonels, lieutenant-colonels, majors and captains of horse and foot, lieutenants and cornets of horse, and all gentlemen of quality, shall march away with two horses apiece, and one servant; themselves to march with their arms, their servants with their swords only, and their masters baggage; and all other officers to every day new obligations from the king, and great bounties, and continued to flourish above any man in the court, whilst the weather was fair: but the storm did no sooner arise, but he changed so much, and declined so fast from the honour he was thought to be master of, that he fell into that condition, which there will be hereafter too much cause to mention, and to enlarge upon." Clarendon.

In another place, Clarendon, relating the circumstances of the departure of King Charles the First from Westminster, in the year 1642, expresses himself with much indignation of the refusal of lord Holland (though Groom of the Stole) to accompany his master, and of his prevailing on lord Essex (who was Lord Chamberlain) also to remain with the Parliament.

Mr. Burke, in his "Reflections on the Revolution in France," particularises this lord Holland, as one of several persons who by themselves or their families had brought an odium on the throne by the prodigal dispensation of its bounties towards them, who afterwards joined in the rebellion arising from the discontents, of which they were themselves the cause; men who helped to subvert that throne to which they owed some of them their existence, others all that power which they employed to ruin their benefactors.

† Charles the First had, in 1628, created him a peer, by the title of lord Goring, and, in 1644, advanced him to the earldom of Norwich.

march with their swords only.—That all persons whatsoever, included in these Articles, shall have passes to go into their several countries and places of abode; and to be free from all violence and plunder in their march.—That all included in these Articles, who shall desire it, shall have passes granted them freely to pass beyond the seas within a month after their marching out, they only engaging themselves in mean time to act nothing prejudicial to the parliament now sitting at Westminster.—That all private soldiers shall be provided for in their passage, for Free-Quarter in their march homewards, lying but one night in a place. That convenient provision be made for all hurt and sick soldiers who shall be left in Colchester, untill they be recovered, and then passes to be given them, as before-mentioned, according to their several qualities.—That all the inhabitants of this town of Colchester be free, both in goods and persons, from any violence, without distinction. That all persons who have been taken prisoners on either side, shall have the benefit of these articles.

The General's Answer.

'When I looked upon your condition to be far better than now it is, I then offered such terms as were thought suitable to your condition; but you now being in a worse posture, both in relation to yourselves within, and in relation to any expectation of relief from without, it is not to be expected from me, that your Conditions should be better: Wherefore I am still resolved not to grant any such terms as are now demanded by you. Your Lordships
 'Servant,
 THO. FAIRFAX.'

Aug. 14. 1648.

August 26. From the League before Colchester came farther, "That this day about twelve of the clock, the Enemy sent out a drum, with Mr. Bernardiston, one of our Committee, and col. Tuke, one of their party; seeing no hope to treat upon the Articles, they sent out to desire to treat upon what was offered formerly by his Excellency, viz. Concerning the explanation of the words, 'To submit to mercy;' How far that mercy might extend; and concerning the inferior officers and soldiers, and townsmen. His Excellency called a very full Council of War, and upon debate it was resolved: 'That in regard the inferior officers and soldiers had slept their opportunity, that now they should have only fair quarter: and that a Treaty be admitted, provided the Committee under restraint be forthwith released, upon circumstances necessary for clearing, and orderly performance of the fair quarter now offered; Also, to treat as to the securing the town from plunder, &c. And that the lords, general officers, and captains &c. be rendered up to mercy.—This night about eight, col. Tuke returned with an Answer in substance as before; and all the whole Council of War sat this afternoon; the private soldiers on both sides held a Treaty amongst themselves; and this occasioned the enemy to send out so hastily to treat upon terms of mercy; for they said, That their private soldiers amongst themselves had agreed to deliver them up.—The last night the officers did give the soldiers sack, burnt claret, raisins, prunes, and good words, for to join with them to break through; they prepared poles and boards to break over North Bridge, which way they did intend to escape; and when they were all drawn out into the town, the soldiers did agree amongst themselves, that they would not condescend to their going out, for they knew then they would break through themselves, and leave the soldiers to the mercy of our soldiers; and some of the soldiers got to the gates, and said, 'That they would kill their Officers if they offered to stir out.' In this high distemper of mutiny the enemy now are, and we doubt not of conclusion concerning the Surrender of the town to-morrow, which we hope to have upon Monday next, or Tuesday at farthest."

Farther thus, "You may add the Surrender of Colchester; the business is as good as done: the three generals have, by a Letter under their hands, submitted themselves, with all the officers and soldiers, to mercy; our Committee are come to the General safe; sir William Compton, sir Abraham Shipman, col. Hammon, col. Tuke, and col. Ayloffe, came out to treat about circumstances; 300 of our soldiers are in the town."

Colchester, 27 Aug. 1648.

August 28. From Colchester, by an express to the Speaker of the House of Commons, came as followeth,

"Sir; the last night, about ten o'clock, the Articles were signed by the Commissioners on both sides, which were to this purpose: That all horse with furniture should be delivered this day by ten o'clock: That all private soldiers and officers, under captains, shall have fair quarter, and render themselves prisoners: That the lords, and all superior officers and gentlemen be drawn together in the King's-Head Inn, with their cloaths and baggage, by eleven o'clock, and there to render themselves to the mercy of the Lord General: That the enemies guards be drawn off, and the guards of this army appointed in their stead: That all ordnances, amunition, waggons, &c. be delivered to the comptroller: That the sick and wounded be provided for with accommodations, until recovered.—And this afternoon col. Rainsborough's regiment, and another regiment, entered the town, and accordingly the Articles in all things else performed; you will very suddenly receive an account from his Excellency, of the particulars of this business; as also a List of what persons of quality, officers and commanders, are at mercy; the number of ordnance, arms, and quantity of amunition. This morning we rode round about the wall of the town, and find it to be a very strong place in all parts of it; where it was weakest there they made strong works, and strengthened it with earth; it was a sad spectacle to see so many fair houses burnt to ashes, and so many inhabitants made so sickly and weak, with living upon horses and dogs; many glad to eat the very draught and grains for preservation of life. I remain your humble servant Colchester, Aug. 28, 1648. J. RUSHWORTH.

August 29. We had farther from Colchester, "That the town was surrendered yesterday according to the Articles, all prisoners at mercy: the town preserved from plunder, paying 14,000*l*. That afternoon a council of war was called, at which it was resolved, That sir Charles Lucas, sir George Lisle, and sir Ber-

* "Sir Bernard Gascoigne was a gentleman of Florence; and had served the king in the War, and afterwards remained in London till the unhappy adventure of Colchester, and then accompanied his friends thither; and had only English enough to make himself understood, that he desired a pen and ink and paper, that he might write a letter to his prince the Great Duke, that his highness might know in what manner he lost his life, to the end his heirs might possess his estate. The officer that attended the execution thought fit to acquaint the General and Council, without which he durst not allow him pen and ink, which he thought he might reasonably demand: When they were informed of it, they thought it a matter worthy some consideration; they had chosen him out of the list for his quality, conceiving him to be an English gentleman; and preferred him for being a knight, that they might sacrifice three of that rank.—This delay brought the news of this bloody resolution to the Prisoners in the town; who were infinitely afflicted with it; and the lord Capel prevailed with an officer or soldier, of their guard, to carry a letter, signed by the chief persons and officers, and in the name of the rest, to the General; in which they took notice of that judgment, and desired him 'either to forbear the execution of it, or that they might all, who were equally guilty with those three, undergo the same sentence with them. The letter was delivered, but had no other effect than the sending to the officer to dispatch his Order, reserving the Italian to the last. Sir Charles Lucas was their first work, who fell dead; upon which sir George Lisle ran to him, embraced him, and kissed him; and then stood up, and looked those who were to execute him in the face; and, thinking they stood at too great a distance, spake to them to come nearer; to which one of them said, 'I'll warrant you, 'sir, we'll hit you;' he answered smiling, 'Friends, I have been nearer you, when you have missed me.' Thereupon, they all fired upon him, and did their work home, so that he fell down dead of many wounds without speaking a word. Sir Bernard Gascoigne had his doublet off, and expected the next turn; but the officer told him 'he had order to carry him back to his friends;' which at that time was nard Gascoigne, a Papist, should be shot to death: the two first were, the third respited; sir Charles Lucas urged it much, that the way taken with him was without precedent; but this was sufficiently answered, and a soldier told him, how he had put some of ours to death in cold blood with his own hand. At first he seemed much dismayed, but took somewhat better courage before he died. Sir George Lisle and sir Bernard Gascoigne, after much expostulation and discourse, first with the General's chaplain, who did not like the offer of auricular confession, conferred with the lord Goring's chaplain.—Sir Bernard Gascoigne* had then unexpectedly a reprieve very indifferent to him. The Council of War had considered, that if they should in this manner have taken the life of a foreigner, who seemed to be a person of quality, their friends or children who should visit Italy, might pay dear for many generations; and therefore they commanded the officer, 'when the other two should be dead, to carry him back again to the other prisoners.' The two who were thus murdered, were men of great name and esteem in the War; the one being held as good a commander of horse, and the other of foot, as the nation had; but of very different tempers and humours. Lucas was the younger brother of the lord Lucas, and his heir both to the honour and estate, and had a present fortune of his own. He had been bred in the Low Countries under the prince of Orange, and always amongst the horse. He had little conversation in that court, where great civility was practised, and learned. He was very brave in his person, and in a day of battle a gallant man to look upon, and follow; but at all other times and places, of a nature scarce to be lived with, of no good understanding, of a rough and proud humour, and very morose conversation; yet they all desired to accompany him in his death. Lisle was a gentleman who had had the same education with the other, and at the same time an officer of foot; had all the courage of the other, and led his men to a battle with such an alacrity, that no man was ever better followed, his soldiers never forsaking him; and the party which he commanded, never left any thing undone which he led them upon. But then, to his fierceness of courage he had the softest and most gentle nature imaginable; was kind to all, and beloved of all, and without a capacity to have an enemy.—The manner of taking the lives of these worthy men was new, and without example, and concluded by most men to be very barbarous; and was generally imputed to Ireton, who swayed the General, and was upon all occasions of an unmerciful and bloody nature. As soon as this bloody sacrifice was ended, Fairfax, with the chief officers, went to the town house to visit the prisoners; and the General (who was an ill orator on the most plausible occasion) applied with his civility to the earl of Norwich, and the lord Capel; and, seeming in some de-sent him from the Lord General; by virtue whereof he was set at liberty, and continues to this day at the Court at Whitehall.*

Aug. 31. A letter was brought to both Houses from his excellency, with a List of the Prisoners of Colchester, by Mr. Gilbert Mabbot, agent for his Excellency; and the House spent some time in debate, concerning col. Farr, lieutenant-col. to the earl of Warwick, who engaged 1,000 of the Essex trained-bands to join with the enemy: The House ordered hereupon, "That it should be left to his Excellency the lord general, to execute the said col. Farr in such manner as sir Charles Lucas and sir George Lisle."

The express this day from his Excellency the lord Fairfax to both Houses, of the Surrender of Colchester, was as followeth;

For the Right Honourable, Edward Earl of Manchester, Speaker of the House of Peers: pro tempore.

"My Lord; I have herewith sent you the Articles, with the Explanations annexed; upon which it hath pleased God in his best time to deliver the Town of Colchester, and the enemy therein, into our hands, without farther bloodshed; saying that, for some satisfaction to military justice, and in part of revenge for the innocent blood they have caused to be gree to excuse the having done that, which he said 'the military justice required,' he told them, 'that all the lives of the rest were safe; and that they should be well treated, and disposed of as the Parliament should direct.' The lord Capel had not so soon digested this so late barbarous proceeding, as to receive the visit of those who caused it, with such a return as his condition might have prompted to him; but said, 'that they should do well to finish their work, and execute the same rigor to the rest;' upon which there were two or three such sharp and bitter replies between him and Ireton, that cost him his life in a few mouths after. When the General had given notice to the parliament of his proceedings, he received order to send the earl of Norwich and the lord Capel to Windsor Castle; where they had afterwards the society of duke Hamilton, to lament each others misfortunes; and after some time they two were sent to the Tower." Clarendon.

* "The siege of Colchester terminated in a manner no less unfortunate than Hamilton's engagement, for the royal cause. After suffering the utmost extremity of famine, after feeding on the vilest aliments; the garrison desired at last, to capitulate. Fairfax required them to surrender at mercy; and he gave such an explanation of these terms, as to reserve to himself power, if he pleased, to put them all instantly to the sword. The officers endeavoured, though in vain, to persuade the soldiers by making a furious assault, to break through, or at least, to sell their lives as dear as possible. They were obliged to accept of the conditions offered; and Fairfax, instigated by spilt, and the trouble, damage, and mischief, they have brought upon the town, this country, and the kingdom; I have, with the advice of a Council of War of the chief officers, both of the country forces and the army, caused two of them who were rendered at mercy, to be shot to death before any of them had quarter assured them. The persons pitched upon for this example were, sir Charles Lucas and sir George Lisle; in whose military execution, I hope your lordships will not find cause to think your honour or justice prejudiced. As for the lord Goring, lord Capel, and the rest of the persons rendered to mercy, and now assured of quarter, of whose names I have sent your lordships a particular List; I do hereby render unto the Parliament's judgment, for farther public justice and mercy to be used, as you shall see cause. I desire God may have the glory of his multiplied mercies towards you and the kingdom in this kind: and in the condition of instruments as to the service here, the Officers and Soldiers of Essex and Suffolk, who in this time of so dangerous defection have adhered constant to yours and the kingdom's interest, for their faithful demeanor, and patient endurance, in the hardship of this service, are not to be forgotten. Your lordship's most humble servant, Hieth, Aug. 29, 1648. THO. FAIRFAX.

Ireton, to whom Cromwell, in his absence, had consigned over the government of the passive general, seized sir Charles Lucas and sir George Lisle, and resolved to make them instant sacrifices to military justice. This unusual piece of severity was loudly exclaimed against by all the prisoners. Lord Capel, fearless of danger, reproached Ireton with it; and challenged him, as they were all engaged in the same honourable cause, to exercise the same impartial vengeance on all of them. Lucas was first shot, and he gave himself, orders to fire, with the same alacrity, as if he had commanded a platoon of his own soldiers. Lisle instantly ran and kissed the dead body, and then cheerfully presented himself to a like fate. Thinking that the soldiers, destined for his execution, stood at too great a distance, he called to them to come nearer: one of them replied, 'I'll warrant you, Sir, we'll hit you.' He answered smiling, 'Friends, I have been nearer you when you have missed me.' Thus perished this generous spirit, not less beloved for his modesty and humanity, than esteemed for his courage and military conduct. Soon after, a gentleman, appearing in the King's presence, clothed in mourning for sir Charles Lucas; that humane prince, suddenly recollecting the hard fate of his friends, paid them a tribute, which none of his own unparalleled misfortunes ever extorted from him: he dissolved into a flood of tears." Hume.

† Yet from a subsequent passage in Rushworth, it seems doubtful whether he were executed.

ARTICLES agreed upon the 27th of August 1648, by and between the Commissioners of His Excellency the Lord General Fairfax, on the one part, and the Commissioners of the Earl of Norwich, Lord Capel, Sir Charles Lucas, on the other part; for and concerning the Rendition of the Town and Garrison of Colchester, which follows:

"That all the horses belonging to the officers, soldiers, and gentlemen, engaged in Colchester, with saddles and bridles to them, shall be brought into St. Mary's Church-yard, by nine of the clock to morrow morning; and the spare saddles and bridles into that Church; and delivered, without wilful spoil, to such as the Lord General shall appoint to take charge of them.—2. That all the arms, colours, and drums, belonging to any of the persons in Colchester abovementioned, shall be brought into St. James's Church, by ten of the clock to morrow morning, and delivered, without wilful spoil or imbezzlement, to such as the lord general shall appoint to take charge of them.—3. That all private soldiers and officers under captains, shall be drawn together into the Fryars yard, adjoining to the East-gate, by ten of the clock to morrow morning, with their cloaths and baggage; their persons to be rendered into the custody of such, as the lord general shall appoint to take charge of them; and that they shall have fair quarter, according to the explanation made, in the Answer to the first Quere of the commissioners from Colchester; which is hereunto annexed.—4. That the lords, and all captains, and superior officers, and gentlemen of quality, engaged in Colchester, shall be drawn together to the King's-head, with their cloaths and baggage, by eleven of the clock to morrow morning, and there to render themselves to the mercy of my lord general, or into the hands of such, as he shall appoint to take charge of them; and that a list of the names of all the general officers, and field officers, now in command in the town, be sent out to the lord general, by nine of the clock in the morning.—5. That all the guards within the town of Colchester shall be withdrawn from the line, forts, and other places, by eight of the clock to morrow morning: and such as the lord general shall appoint, shall thereupon come into their rooms.—6. That all the ammunition shall be preserved in the places where it lies, to be delivered to the comptroller of his excellency's train, by ten of the clock to morrow morning; and all the waggons belonging to the soldiery, or persons engaged with the harnesses belonging thereunto, shall be brought to some convenient place near the ammunition, to be delivered to the same person, by the same hour.—7. That such as are wounded and sick in the town, shall be there kept and provided for, with accommodation requisite for men in their condition; and not removed thence, until they be recovered, or able without prejudice to their healths to remove; and shall have such chirurgeons allowed to look to them, as are now in the town.—8. That all Ordnance in the town, with their appurtenances, shall without wilful spoil be left at the several platforms, or places, where they are now planted, and so delivered, to his excellency's guard that shall take the charge of those places respectively.—9. That from henceforth, there shall be a cessation of arms on both parts; but the forces within the town to keep their own guards, and the lord general's to keep theirs, until they shall be removed, according to the articles aforegoing.

"Signed by us the commissioners on the behalf of his excellency the lord Fairfax, Tho. Honeywood, Hen. Ireton, Tho. Rainsborough, Edw. Whaley, Will. Bloys, Brain. Gurdon, John Sparrow, Isaac Ewer, Tho. Cooke, G. Barnardiston.

"Signed by us the commissioners on the behalf of the earl of Norwich, the lord Capel, and sir Charles Lucas, Will. Compton, Ab. Shipman, Edw. Hammond, S. Tuke, Will. Ayloffe." Hieth, Aug 27, 1648.

Queries propounded by the Commissioners from Colchester, to the Commissioners of his excellency the lord Fairfax, upon the Conditions sent into the town. I. What is meant by Fair Quarter? II. What by rendering to Mercy?

To the first, "By fair Quarter we understand, That with Quarter for their lives they shall be free from wounding or beating, shall enjoy warm cloaths to cover them and keep them warm; shall be maintained with victuals fit for prisoners, while they shall be kept prisoners." To the second, "By rendering to Mercy we understand; That they be rendered, or render themselves to the Lord General, or whom he shall appoint, without certain assurance of Quarter; so as the Lord General may be free to put some immediately to the sword, if he see cause; although his Excellency intends chiefly, and for the generality of those under that condition, to surrender them to the mercy of the Parliament in general. There hath been large experience, neither hath his excellency given cause to doubt of his civility to such as he shall retain prisoners; although by their being rendered to mercy he stands not engaged thereby."

Upon return of these Answers, the Commissioners from Colchester propounded these two farther Queries: I. Whether those that were surrendered to mercy, should enjoy their wearing cloaths, as well those on their backs, as what other change they have? II. Whether the noblemen and officers shall have use of their own horses, to the places where they shall be confined?

To which it was answered by his Excellency's Commissioners: To the first, it is intended, That those who shall be rendered and received to mercy, shall enjoy the wearing cloaths on their backs; but for more, the general will not be engaged. To the second, it is expected, in case of Surrender upon Treaty, That all horses as well as arms be delivered up; and for circumstance thereof, there is to be an article; yet for the gentlemen and officers under this condition in question, when any shall be removed to the place of confinement, his excellency will take care for horses to carry them with respect to their qualities; but for allowing their own horses, he will not be engaged."

A List of the Prisoners taken at the Surrender of Colchester, Aug. 28, 1648.

The earl of Norwich, the lord Capel, the lord Loughborough, sir Charles Lucas, sir William Compton colonel, Sir George Lisle, sir Bernard Gascoyne, sir Ab. Shipman, sir John Watts, sir Lodowick Dyer, sir Henry Appleton, sir Dennard Strutt, sir Hugh Oriley, sir Richard Mauliverer, made an escape but taken again; quarter-master-general Carter, col. Gilbaine, col. Farr, escaped and taken; col. Hammond, col. Chester, col. Till, col. Heath, col. Tuke, col. Ayliffe, col. Sawor, 8 lieutenant-colonels, 9 majors, 30 captains, the marshal-general, commissary general, Francis Lovelace master of the ordnance waggon; master-general Gravisdien, servants attending upon the lords; gentlemen 65, lieutenants 72, ensigns and cornets 69, sergeants 183. private soldiers 3067.

WHITELOCK'S ACCOUNT OF THESE PROCEEDINGS.

July 26, 1648. Sir John Owen was sent to Windsor castle, upon a charge of High Treason and Murder against him, for the business of North Wales.

Aug. 29. Letters from Colchester, that the town was surrendered according to Articles, all prisoners at mercy, the town preserved from plunder, paying 14,000*l*. That by the resolution of a Council of War, sir Charles Lucas, sir George L'Isle, and sir Marmaduke Gascoigne a Papist, were to be shot to death. That the two first were executed, and the last respited. That sir Charles Lucas urged this was to be without precedent, but a Parliament soldier standing by, told him 'that he had put to death with his own hand some of the Parliament soldiers in cold blood;' at which he was dismayed, but took better courage afterwards before he died. That sir George L'Isle kissed his dead friend, and then after much expostulation, and discourse, first with the general his chaplain, then, by his own desire, with one of the lord Norwich his chaplains, and some private prayers with him, sir George died, both he and sir Charles Lucas with very much courage.

Aug. 31. Letter from the General of the particulars of the Surrender of Colchester, and a copy of the Articles, with the explanations upon them. "That for some satisfaction to Military Justice, and in part of revenge for the innocent blood they had caused to be spilt, and the trouble, damage and mischiefs, they had brought upon that Town, that county and kingdom, He had with the advice of a Council of War, of the chief officers both of the county forces, and the army, caused two of them who were rendered to mercy, sir Charles Lucas and sir George L'Isle, to be shot to death, before any of them had quarter assured them, and hopes the parliament will not find cause, in the military execution of these two persons, to think their own honour or justice prejudiced. That as for the lord Goring, lord Capel, and the rest of the persons rendered to mercy, and now assured of quarter, whose names he sent in a List, he did render to the Parliament's judgment for public justice and mercy to be used as they should see cause; he desires that God may have the glory of his multiplied mercies."

Sept. 25. The House of Commons ordered an Impeachment against the lord Goring, and an Act of Attainder against the lord Capel to be brought in.

Oct. 21. The Lord-General explained to the house of commons his former Letter concerning the Quarter given to the lord Goring and lord Capel, "That it did not extend to any other but the military power, and that they were notwithstanding liable to Trial and Judgment by the Civil Power; otherwise any who was treacherous, or had revolted, might get quarter from a private soldier, and so not be further questionable." With divers other reasons given by him to the same purpose.

Nov. 10. The House of Commons voted That the lords Goring, Capel, Loughborough, the earl of Holland, major general Laugherne, and sir John Owen, shall be banished out of the kingdom.

January 31, 1649. Sir Lewis Dives escaped the last night, and Mr. Holder the Prince's Agent, escaped through the house of office in Whitehall standing over the Thames. The escapes of these persons put the house in debate, of bringing Hamilton, the earl of Holland, Laugherne, Poyer, Powell, and other chief Delinquents to a speedy trial.—They appointed a Committee to bring in an Act, for constituting a Court for the Trial of these persons, and ordered the earl of Holland to be forthwith removed to London.

Feb. 1. Voted, That duke Hamilton, the earl of Holland, lord Goring, lord Capel, and colonel Owen, shall be the next persons to be proceeded against for justice.

After this the lord Capel by a desperate attempt, escaped this evening out of the Tower over the moat, and warrants were sent out, and 100*l*. promised to any that should take him.

The High Court met to prepare matters for the Trial of duke Hamilton, the earl of Holland and others.

Feb. 2. Divers Members of the Parliament, of the Army, of the City, and private Gentlemen, in all to the number of 60, whereof 15 to be of the Quorum, were by Act made a High Court of Justice for Trial of duke Hamilton, the earl of Holland, and others.

Feb. 3. Two watermen of London discovered and apprehended the lord Capel in a house at Lambeth: the house gave 40*l.* to the watermen.

Feb. 5. The High Court of Justice sat in the Painted Chamber, and elected the Lord President, and Officers, as were before, they agreed upon a Proclamation: 'That they had adjourned themselves till to-morrow morning in the Painted Chamber, and such who had any evidence to give against the earl of Holland, earl of Cambridge, lord Goring, lord Capel, and sir John Owen, or any of them, were to repair thither, where they might be heard.'

Feb. 6. The High Court of Justice sat, receiving Witnesses and preparing the Charges against the five persons to be tried. The earl of Holland sent up by post, that he was dangerously sick at Warwick-castle.

Feb. 9. The High Court of Justice sat in Westminster-hall, about fifty of the members present, the earl of Cambridge, lord Goring, lord Capel, and sir John Owen were brought before them, and the President made a Speech to them, of the occasion of their coming thither, to trial for Treason, and other high crimes, after which, they were all commanded to withdraw, except the earl of Cambridge.

Then Mr. Steel, Attorney General for the Commonwealth, set forth the notoriousness of the facts of the Prisoner at the bar, by his invading the kingdom, committing many murders, and rapines, and all under pretence of the covenant; that as the war was called Hypocritarum bellum, so he might be called Hypocritarius Princeps. He desired the Charge might be read, and that the Earl might make answer to it.

After the Charge read, the Earl of Cambridge pleaded, That he was of another nation, and what he did, was as a servant to that kingdom, and not as a contriver of it, neither was he ever naturalized earl of Cambridge that he knew of, that he was a prisoner of war, and had Articles given him.

The Court caused the Act to be read for Naturalization of his father, and consequently of him, being his heir.

The lord Goring was next brought to the bar, and his Charge being read to him, he pleaded Not Guilty, and was dismissed, behaving himself with great respect to the Court.

The lord Capel pleaded, "That he was a prisoner to the Lord General, and had conditions given him, and his life promised him, that if all the magistrates in Christendom, were combined together, they could not call him in question." He never minded nor looked upon the Court, but upon the people on all sides, and with an austere countenance.

Sir John Owen pleaded Not Guilty.

The next day the earl of Cambridge being brought to the bar, Mr. Steel moved, That he might answer his Charge, which the President required him to do.

The Earl desired time to put things into a method, and that he might send to major general Lambert, by whom he had Articles given, and to Scotland from whence he received his commission.

The Court gave him two days to answer, and upon his motion for Counsel, he had liberty to name them, which he said he could not, not knowing any one counsellor in England.

The lord Capel brought in and demanded to plead in chief to his Charge, did again insist upon the Articles of Colchester, whereby he said, 'He had fair quarter given him, and that all the gowns in the world had nothing to do with him.'

Feb. 12. A certificate of the doctor, and apothecary of the earl of Holland, "That he could not with safety of his life be removed up to London;" and a Petition of his lady for favour to him, referred to the High Court of Justice to send for him if they should think fit.

Feb. 13. The High Court of Justice sat, and the lord Capel being brought into the Court, the Attorney General moved, That the Prisoner might make good his plea.

The President told the lord Capel, That he had put in a Plea, concerning Articles, for proof whereof, the Lord General was by order of the Court, there present; that he had liberty to ask any thing of him, if not, then the counsel of the Commonwealth were to offer what they could in proof of it.

Then the Attorney General went on, and produced the General's Letter to the Parliament, upon the rendition of Colchester, and the Articles, and the explanation of them, whereby, and upon the testimony of the Lord General and general Ireton, col. Whaley and col. Barksted, all present by order of the Court, it appeared, 'That the lord Capel was to have fair quarter for his life,' which was explained to be, 'a freedom from any execution of the sword, but not any protection from the judicial proceedings of a Civil Court;' and mercy was explained to be only 'from the promiscuous execution of the sword, but that he might be tried by a Council of War.' But of this learning, I hope none of this nation will have use hereafter.

It was clearly proved that the Articles were only to free him from the present power of the sword to take away his life, and colonel Barksted swore, 'That, he told him, the day after the Articles, that he believed, the Parliament would proceed against them that were taken at Colchester, as Traitors.'

The Counsel moved for Judgment against the lord Capel, that he should be hanged, drawn; and quartered, at which he seemed to startle; and after a short Speech to the Court, he concluded, "That however he was dealt with here, he hoped for a better resurrection hereafter."

Then the earl of Cambridge was brought to the bar, and required to make good his Plea: he thanked the Court for the time they had given, which he said was so short, that he could not be provided. Upon his desire there were assigned to him for counsel, Mr. Chute, Mr. Hales, Mr. Parsons, and Dr. Walker. He desired leave to send to Scotland, and further time; it was answered, "That it was for prisoners to prepare their proofs against the Trial, he having been in prison so long;" he replied, "That during his six months imprisonment, he never sent about any private business but only to get monies to maintain him, and prayed the mercy of the Court, that if they would spare him, he might be useful; and that he was sorry for what he had done." He had two days time longer given to him, to prepare for his defence.

Feb. 15. The High Court of Justice sat, and the earl of Cambridge moved the Court for further time, and new Council, in regard that those formerly assigned to him for Council, refused to plead for him, which was granted to him.

Feb. 16. The High Court of Justice sat, and the lord Goring was brought to the bar, Mr. Coke, Solicitor General, set forth the heinousness of his Crimes at Colchester, in Kent, Essex, &c.

He said, 'he could not deny the matter of fact, in much of them, but should clear himself of some particulars.'

Divers Witnesses were produced viva voce, who proved the Death of several of the Parliament Party before Colchester, the shooting of poisoned bullets, boiled in copperas, from the town, the cruel usage of the prisoners in Colchester, the lord Goring's reviling them, calling them 'Rebellious rogues,' the burning of 600 houses at Colchester, and many other particulars.

The lord Goring by way of Defence made a Narrative of his Proceedings since his last coming into England, acknowledged his receiving a Commission from the Prince, and his giving Commissions to others. That what he did was out of a good intention for peace and accommodation; That Treason not being in the intention, he could not be guilty of it; that he intended not to raise Forces against the Parliament, he pleaded his peerage, and the Articles of Colchester, by which quarter was given him.

To this the Counsel for the Commonwealth replied, 'That a man's actions did best expound his intentions; that the lord Goring's actions spake him guilty of Murder, Treason, &c. that to his peerage, the power by which the Court sat, was an answer. That for the Articles of Colchester, though he had at first waved them, by pleading not guilty, yet he should have as full a benefit of them, as the lord Capel, who had largely pleaded for them.'

Against sir John Owen, Witnesses testified the Death of the high Sheriff of Caernarvon and others: sir John alledged, 'That what he did, was to free himself from violence and plunder,' but it was proved that he was in the first war, had the Articles of Conway, upon which he was admitted to compound, took the Covenant, and negative oath, and yet engaged a second time.

The earl of Holland was removed from Warwick castle to London.

Feb. 17. The High Court of Justice sat, and witnesses proved the escape of the lord Capel out of the Tower. He pleaded, That he did not escape as he was a Prisoner of War, but as he was sent to the Tower in another condition.

The earl of Cambridge urged, That the Counsel assigned to him were not ready, for want of longer time, and held it not proper for them to plead in matter of law till the fact were first proved.

The Court declared that he had been often moved to make his Defence; whereupon he proceeded in it, produced his Commissions from the parliament, to command all the forces of that kingdom, and the order of the Committee of Estates there, for him to advance into England, then the large Declaration from Scotland.

He pleaded the ends thereof being for his majesty's honour, the settling of Religion and the Covenant; he also pleaded the Articles agreed unto by major-general Lambert, when he yielded himself Prisoner, whereby he was assured by him of quarter and life; to prove which, he produced the lord Grey, colonel Lilburn, and Mr. Peters, for Witnesses.

Concerning the point of Naturalization, he pleaded, That his father, being naturalized, could not make him a subject of England, no more than the son of an Englishman, born in any foreign parts, was entitled thereby to any inheritance here; that he had a Petition and Bill prepared for his Naturalization, but it passed not.

Colonel Whichcot the Governor, and the marshal of Windsor Castle, proved the Earl's escape, after he had passed his word to the governor to be a true Prisoner. The Earl earnestly denied this, and offered upon it a challenge to the governor, were he not in his present capacity; but it was left to the judgment of the Court.

Feb. 19. The High Court of Justice sat, and Witnesses proved, That the earl of Cambridge was prisoner to the lord Grey, before the Articles with major-general Lambert were concluded. Letters produced, signed with his own hand, to sir Marmaduke Langdale, touching the carrying on of the design in England, and passages touching his friends in Colchester. Proved also, That he was called by the late king's writ to sit in parliament in the lords' houses, by the name of Earl of Cambridge, and appeared as Earl of Cambridge, and acted as a peer of England, sitting in the lords' house, and in divers committees. That as a peer of England he took the national Covenant, and subscribed to it 'Cambridge' in the house of peers, and took the negative oath, before the commissioners of the great seal, as a peer of England.

Feb. 21. The High Court of Justice sate, and their order was read to the lord Capel, that they would hear what he could say this day, and then proceed to Judgment.

He said, He was to be comprehended wholly in the Martial Law, and urged the Articles again, which excepted Trial after by parliament; that divers that were in Colchester in his condition had compounded. That breaking Prison for Treason by common law was but felony, and benefit of clergy might be had; at last when he could not get the resolution of the Court, to be referred to a Trial by Martial Law, He moved, That he might not be barred of additional Defence, and that if he must be judged by the common law, he hoped he might have the full benefit of it. He urged for it the late Act, which saith, Though king and lords be laid aside, yet the fundamental laws shall be in force. He recommended to the Court Magna Charta and the Petition of Right, and pressed the consideration of the Act made in favour of those who assisted king H. 7, and the exception in the acts touching the lord Strafford and Canterbury, that they should not be drawn in precedent.* He desired to see his Jury, and that they might see him, and to be tried by his peers, and said, he believed that a

* See lord Strafford's Case, ante, vol. 3, p. 1381, and the Note to p. 1519 of that volume. Much light is thrown on this matter by Mr. Hatsell, in a Note to p. 219 of the 4th vol. of his valuable work, entitled "Precedents of Proceedings in the House of Commons, &c. with Observations."

"There is a clause in this Act [of Attainder of Lord Strafford] which, as it has often been made the subject of discussion, and the source of much mistake, it may be proper here to take notice of; it is as follows: "Provided that no judge or judges, justice or justices, whatsoever, shall adjudge or interpret any act or thing to be treason, nor hear or determine any treason, in any other manner than he or they should or ought to have done before the making of this Act, and as if this Act had never been had or made." By those who wish to represent this proceeding against lord Strafford, by Bill of Attainder, as illegal, this proviso has been cited to prove that the same Parliament, which passed the Bill, admitted that the proceeding was so arbitrary, that they thought it necessary to enact, "That it should never be used as a precedent." But I apprehend that this is not the true construction of this clause. The intention of inserting it was to obviate a misconstruction of that clause of the statute of 25th Edw. 3. statute 5, ch. 2, which, after declaring what offences shall be deemed to constitute acts of High Treason, enacts, "And, because that many other like cases of treason may happen in time to come, which a man cannot think nor declare at this present time, it is accorded,

Precedent could not be given of a subject tried for his life, but either by Bill in Parliament, or by a Jury.

Witnesses were heard against the earl of Cambridge.

That if any other case, supposed treason, which is not above specified, doth happen before any Justices, the Justices shall tarry, without any going to judgment of the treason, till the cause be shewed and declared before the King and his Parliament, whether it ought to be judged treason, or other felony." The clause in this Act of Attainder, therefore, means only to declare, That though, in the judgment of Parliament, these offences, charged against the earl of Strafford, were by them adjudged to amount to the crime of High Treason; yet that this judgment should not authorize the Judges of the realm hereafter to adjudge or interpret any similar act to be High Treason; but that if such a case should occur, they should, in obedience to the statute 25th of Edw. 3, "tarry," and not form any judgment upon the authority of what had been done upon this occasion. There is a similar clause in the Rolls of Parliament, in the 11th year of Richard 2, which, after confirming and establishing several accusations and judgments that had been held, concludes, "Et comment q'diverse pointz sont declarez pur treson, en cest present Parlement, 'autres q'ne furent declarez par estatut devant, 'que null Justice ait poir de rendre jugement d'autre cas de treason, n'en autre manere, d'ails n'avoient devant le commencement de cest present Parlement.' Rot. Parl. vol. 3, p. 250, No. 38. Sir M. Hale, therefore, in his Plac. Cor. vol. 1, ch. 24, p. 269, speaking of the Act of Lord Strafford's Attainder, very properly observes, "That this clause seems a cautious, but a very needless proviso; because this Bill of Attainder was a particular judgment, that did not 'egredi personam,' and no general declarative law to serve the statute of 25th of Edw. 3." That this is the true construction of this clause is confirmed by what Serjeant Maynard says: "I myself drew this proviso; that the judgment upon Lord Strafford should not be drawn into example; else," says he, "liberty had been given to the Judges to have judged treason accumulative; and therefore this should not be drawn into example; but the Judges should hold to the statute of 25th of Edward 3." See also the speeches of Mr. Solicitor-General Winnington, Mr. Finch, and Mr. Powle, in the same debate, and Sir Harbottle Grimstone's construction upon the clause of the 25th of Edward 3. Grey's Debates, vol. 6, p. 379—386. 4 Cobb. Parl. Hist. p. 1065. The Act, 13 and 14 Charles 2, ch. 20, which reverses the earl of Strafford's attainder, alleges several grounds: 1. "That he was condemned upon accumulative treason, none of the pretended crimes being treason apart. 2. That he was judged guilty of constructive treason. 3. That this Bill was violently forced through both Houses,

Feb. 21. The earl of Cambridge, brought before the High Court, produced his Witnesses, some of whom were disallowed, being officers under him, and so participes criminis.

Feb. 22. He pleaded, That he had not broken the Negative Oath; for he had not engaged against the parliament, but for the ends in the Scots declaration.

His Counsel moved, That they might, with the Counsel of the Commonwealth, state the case of the Earl; but this was denied, being in case of Treason, and that the Earl's Counsel could only declare their opinions in point of law. Upon the Earl's desire, he had further time granted him.

Feb. 23. The Earl of Holland being extremely ill, as was deposed by his physician, was appointed a further day to be brought before the High Court.

Feb. 26. The Counsel of the earl of Cambridge were heard before the High Court of Justice, they pleaded, That the Earl was no free denizen, and though his father was naturalized, and his heirs, yet he not being born in the kingdom, could receive no benefit thereof. That if he had been a free denizen; yet it was not prejudicial to him, because he acted by command and authority of the parliament of another nation, and not of himself, who was governed by another distinct law.

The Earl pleaded the Articles given him by major general Lambert, who had power to do it and secured him, by a party of his forces; that he was ordered to be banished by parliament, paying 100,000*l.* for his delinquency.

Feb. 27. The earl of Holland was brought to the High Court, and the Charge of High Treason read against him, and aggravated by the Solicitor General, That the Earl was an eminent courtier, and probably did ill offices, by mobs of armed and tumultuous persons.

4. That when the King signed the commission for giving the royal assent to the Bill, 'he did it with exceeding great sorrow, and it was ever remembered by him with inexpressible grief of heart; and out of his majesty's great pity he did publicly express it, when his own sacred life was taken away by the most detestable traitors that ever were.' For all which causes the Act of Attainder is repealed, revoked, and reversed." See vol. 3, p. 1527. See in the 10th vol. of Grey's Debates, p. 206, a debate in the year 1691, in which Mr. Solicitor-General Somers says, "The power of impeachment ought to be, like Goliath's sword, kept in the Temple, and ought not to be used but on great occasions. The security of your constitution is lost, when you lose this power. The statute of 25 Edward 3. did foresee that men would be above the law, and, I believe, did not take away those that were treasons at the common law. 'Seductio Regis' can be punished no otherwise than in Parliament." 5 Cobb. Parl. Hist. 677.

and persuaded the king to go from the parliament, and went afterwards himself to Oxford. That he returned from thence, had his sequestration taken off: that he published a Declaration promising in the word of a gentleman, and a Christian, that he would stand by the Parliament, he took the Negative Oath, and the Covenant. Yet the last year he engaged, and probably contrived the insurrection, wherein the duke of Bucks, and his brother, and others were drawn in, and he boasted that he should shortly be 12,000 strong, and master the parliament, and restore the king.

The Earl pleaded, That his fact was not capital, but Criminal, that he had quarter given him, when he was taken at St. Needs, and that both houses had past an Order since for his banishment; the which excused the aggravations, especially in his last action.

March 1. Upon a Petition of the countess of Holland to the High Court, and proof of the Earl's being very sick, the Court gave him further time to answer.

March 3. The Earl of Holland before the High Court pleaded the same Plea he had done before, of Free Quarter given him, and Witnesses were examined on both sides; he desired Counsel, but it was denied.

The earl of Cambridge made an additional defence, not much varying from what he had said before; in answer whereunto, the Counsel of the Common-Wealth did speak five or six hours.

March 6. The earl of Cambridge brought before the High Court, and asked what he had further to say, why Sentence should not be pronounced against him, spake to the same effect as formerly.

The earl of Holland and lord Goring extenuated what they could their offences, as being rash, not much hurtful, &c.

The lord Capel briefly repeated what he had formerly said, and further observed an Ordinance of Parliament, 'That Quarter should not be given to Irish Rebels for life,' which implied, that quarter given to others, should be inviolable for-life.

Sir John Owen pleaded quarter.

The President in his Scarlet robes spake many hours, in answer to the several pleas of the Prisoners, and at last Sentence was given against them all, that their heads should be severed from their bodies, yet with relation to the mercy of parliament.

March 7. The earl of Warwick, and the countess of Holland, presented a Petition to the House of Commons for the life of the earl of Holland, and divers ladies for the others, against whom the High Court had pronounced sentence of Death. After some hours debate upon these Petitions, the House resolved upon the question, not to proceed any further upon these Petitions, but to leave them to the Justice of the Court that sentenced them.

Then the Ladies Petitioned the High Court, who only reprieved the Execution for two days.

March 8. The House of Commons ordered, "That the lord Capel should not be reprieved."

And carried by one vote, That the lord Goring should be reprieved; this one vote was the Speaker, who carried the House being equally divided 24 of each part; and he said he did it, because he had formerly received some civilities from the lord Goring, and his single Vote now saved his life.

The House was divided upon the question, Whether the earl of Holland should be reprieved or not, and the Speaker gave his voice against him.*

The Resolution touching duke Hamilton's Reprieve past in the Negative, and for sir John Owen in the affirmative, and these Votes ordered to be sent to the High Court of Justice.

March 9. The earl of Cambridge was brought to the Scaffold in the Palace-Yard at Westminster, and after some discourse with Dr. Sibbalds a minister that came with him, he turned to the people, and seeing them so great a multitude, he said his voice would not serve for them to hear him, and therefore directed his Speech to those upon the Scaffold with him.

He confessed "his Religion to be according to that of the kirk of Scotland, that he had ever been loyal to the late king, and wished well to his posterity, and that none more desired the peace and happiness of this and other kingdoms than himself.—That his coming into England with the late Army, was out of no reasonable or ill intent, but for the ends contained in the Scots Declaration, and what he did, was as a servant to that parliament and kingdom.—That in that employment, next to the settling of Religion, the establishing the King was his greatest aim: and he wished his blood, in order to the kingdom, might be the last that should be spilt. That if he would have confessed who invited the Scots army into England, it would probably have saved his life."

* "Thus," says Whitlocke, "the lord Goring, who had been no friend to the religious party, was saved, and the earl of Holland, who had been a most civil person to all, and a very great friend to the Old Puritans, and protected them in the time of his greatest interest, by the same single Vote lost his life. This may be a caution to us against the affectation of popularity, when you see the issue of it in this noble gentleman, who was as full of generosity and courtship to all sorts of persons, and readiness to help the oppressed, and to stand for the rights of the people, as any person of his quality in this nation. Yet this person was by the representatives of the people, given up to Execution for Treason; and another Lord, who never made profession of being a friend to liberty, either civil or spiritual, and exceeded the Earl as much in his crimes, as he came short of him in his popularity, the life of this lord was spared by the people."

VOL. IV.

Then he made a short Prayer, Dr. Sibbalds kneeling with him, and being risen, he cast off his cloak and doublet, put on a little white satten cap, forgave the Executioner, and gave him ten pounds, a little after he spake a while in private with his servants, and again made a short prayer. His countenance was cheerful, and all the time of his being on the Scaffold, there appeared in him no fear, disorder, change of countenance, or discomposure. He took his leave of Dr. Sibbalds, embracing him; and of his servants, whom he commended, particularly Mr. Lewys his secretary.—He laid down his head upon the Block, and after a short Prayer he gave the signal, by stretching out his hand, and the Executioner struck off his head at one blow; which was wrapped in a red sarcenet scarf, and with his body put into the coffin and carried away.

Next came upon the Scaffold the earl of Holland, who was accompanied by Mr. Hodges, and Mr. Boltou, ministers, divers of his servants and other gentlemen with him: from Mr. Hodges, a person of eminent parts and piety, and who it is believed would not tell an untruth, was this relation:

That between the time of his Sentence and Execution, he only lay in the Earl's bed-chamber, to discourse with him, and to comfort him, being admitted and desired by him to that freedom, when he would not see his lady, nor any of his children, which he said would add too much to his sorrow, and discompose his thoughts, which were now to be set only upon another world. That the Earl for several days after his Sentence, was in great perplexity and agony of his thoughts, and said, 'he had not assurance of Pardon of his sins, and of the love of God to him, that he was not prepared to die, that Christ would not be advantage to him.' Mr. Hodges endeavoured to allay these doubts, and to comfort the Earl with declaring to him 'the infiniteness of God's mercies, and his willingness to pardon all poor sinners that come to him through Christ, that never any who sought the love of God in Christ with a true faith in Christ did ever fail to obtain the assurance of it to his distressed soul.'

The Earl desired Mr. Hodges to pray with him, to seek God for this mercy, which Mr. Hodges did; and upon this subject, with as earnest a seeking of the Lord, for it, as he could express; and the Earl himself frequently prayed to the same effect, and with wonderful fervency of expression. That still the Earl continued in a desponding condition, till the day before his suffering, when immediately after Prayer, the Earl with rejoicing, told Mr. Hodges, 'that God had heard their prayers, and his Spirit was come in to comfort him, that he had prevailed, through the strength of Christ, over Satan and all his spiritual enemies, and all temptations; that the Lord had given into him an assurance of his love in Christ; and that now he was both ready and willing to die.'—Mr. Hodges was much joyed at this, and they went to Prayer together, to bless God for this great mercy, and to beg the continuance of this frame of Spirit to the last, and God heard them in this also.

The Earl, who had not slept several nights before, nor eat his meat, now supped, and went to bed, with no more disturbance in his spirits, than in his best health, and slept so soundly all the night and this morning that they were much troubled to awaken him.

He went to the Scaffold without being any whit daunted, and after some discourse with the gentlemen, he showed himself to the people, who were generally moved with sorrow, for the suffering of so gallant a person, whose mien and comeliness would move compassion. He directed his Speech to the people at the front of the Scaffold towards Westminster-Hall, made a large profession of his Religion as a Protestant, mentioned his Birth and Education, excused his going to the King from the Parliament, and return to the Parliament again, and extenuated his late Insurrection.

After he had ended his Speech, he turned to the other side of the Scaffold and kneeled down to his private Prayers, after which he had conference with Mr. Hodges and Mr. Bolton. Then he pulled off his gown and doublet, having on him a white satin waistcoat, and put on a white satin cap, and prepared himself for the block, took his leave and embraced with much affection Mr. Hodges, Mr. Bolton, his servants, and others, forgave the Executioner, and gave him money ten pounds in gold. Then he laid himself down on the block, prayed a while, and gave the sign by stretching forth his arms, upon which the executioner severed his head from his shoulders at one blow, which with his body was presently put into a coffin, and carried away.

Next was my lord Capel brought to the scaffold, much after the manner of a stout Roman: he had no minister with him, nor shewed any sense of death approaching, but carried himself all the time he was upon the Scaffold, with that boldness and resolution as was to be admired. He wore a sad coloured suit, his hat cocked up, and his cloak thrown under one arm; he looked towards the people at his first coming up and put off his hat in manner of a salute, he had a little discourse with some gentlemen upon the Scaffold, and passed up and down in a careless posture.

He went to the front of the Scaffold and leaning over, made a Speech to the people, he said, 'He died a Protestant according to the Religion professed in the 39 Articles, the best he knew of. That he was condemned for keeping the fifth Commandment written by God's own finger, which commanded to obey magistrates; and he died for obeying his King, the most religious of all princes; and his son prince Charles, who he said, was King, and the rest of the king's children heirs to the crown.' He concluded with a desire to the people to pray for him, and after a short discourse with some on the Scaffold, he spake once or twice to the Executioner, and gave him money, then he put off his cloak and doublet with much confidence, and put on a white cap, took leave briefly of the gentlemen on the scaffold, and prepared for the block. Where laying himself down, with hands and eyes lifted up, he prayed a while, after that, fitting himself to the block, upon the signal of stretching forth his right hand, the Executioner severed his head from his body at one blow, which were coffined up and carried away.

May 7th, upon the Petitions of Lord Goring and C. Owen, there were orders for their pardon and enlargement.

The following Account of the Execution of the Earl of Holland and Lord Capel* is taken from "Heath's English Martyrs."

The Earl of Holland's Speech on the Scaffold, immediately before his Death, March 9, 1649.

Holland. It is to no purpose (I think) to speak any thing here. Which way must I speak? And then being directed to the front of the Scaffold, he (leaning over the rails) said; I think it is fit to say something, since God hath called me to this place. The first thing which I must profess, is, what concerns my religion, and my breeding, which hath been in a good family, that hath ever been faithful to the true Protestant Religion, in the which I have been bred, in the which I have lived, and in the which, by God's grace and mercy, I shall die. I have not lived according to that education I had in that family where I was born and bred. I hope God will forgive me my sins, since I conceive it is very much his pleasure to bring me to this place, for the sins that I have committed. The cause that hath brought me hither, I believe, by many hath been much mistaken. They have conceived, that I have had ill designs to the state, and to the kingdom; truly I look upon it as a judgment, and a just judgment of God, not but I have offended so much the state, and the kingdom, and the parliament, as that I have had no extreme vanity in serving them very extraordinarily. For those actions that I have done, I think it is known they have been ever very faithful to the public, and very particularly to parliaments. My affections have been ever expressed truly and clearly to them. The dispositions of affairs now have put things in another posture than they were when I was engaged with the parliament. I have never gone off from those principles that ever I have professed; I have lived in them, and by God's grace will die in them. There may be alterations and changes that may carry them further than I thought reasonable, and, truly there I left them : but there hath been nothing that I have said, or done, or professed, either by covenant or declaration, which hath not been very constant and very clear, upon the principles that I ever have gone upon ; which was to serve the king, the parliament, religion (I should have said in the first place) the commonwealth, and to seek the peace of the kingdom ; that made me think it no improper time, being pressed out by accidents and circumstances, to seek the peace of the kingdom, which I thought was proper, since there was something then in agitation, but nothing agreed on, for sending Propositions to the king, that was the furthest aim that I had, and truly beyond that I had no intention, none at all. And God be praised, although my blood comes to be shed here, there was I think scarce a drop of blood shed in that action that I was engaged in. For the present affairs as they are, I cannot tell how to judge of them ; and truly they are in such a condition, as (I conceive) no body can make a judgment of them, and therefore I must make use of prayers, rather than of my opinion ; which are, That God would bless this kingdom, this nation, this state ; that he would settle it in a way agreeable to what this kingdom hath been happily governed under ; by a king, by the lords, by the commons ; a government that I conceive it hath flourished much under, and I pray God the change of it bring not rather a prejudice, a disorder, and a confusion, than the contrary. I look upon the posterity of the king, and truly my conscience directs me to it, to desire, that if God be pleased, that these people may look upon them with that affection that they owe, that they may be called in again, and they may be, not through blood nor through disorder, admitted again into that power, and to that glory, that God in their birth intended to them. I shall pray with all my soul for the happiness of this state, of this nation, that the blood which is here spilt, may even be the last that may fall among us ; and truly I should lay down my life with as much cheerfulness as ever person did, if I conceived that there would be no more blood follow us ; for a state of affairs that are built upon blood, is a foundation for the most part that doth not prosper. —After the blessing that I give to the nation, to the kingdom, and truly to the parliament, I do wish with all my heart, happiness and a blessing to all those that have been authors in this business ; and truly, that have been authors in this very work that bringeth us hither : I do not only forgive them, but I pray heartily and really for them, as God will forgive my sins, so I desire God may forgive them.

I have a particular relation, as I am Chancellor of Cambridge, and truly I must here, since it is the last of my prayers, pray to God that that university may go on in that happy way which it is in, that God may make it a nursery to plant those persons that may be distributed to the kingdom, that the souls of the people may receive a great benefit, and a great advantage by them, and, I hope, God will reward them for their kindness, and their affections that I have found from them. [Looking towards Mr. Bolton.] I have said what religion I have been bred in, what religion I have been born in, what religion I have practised, I began with it, and I must end with it. I told you that my actions and my life have not been agreeable to my breeding. I have told you likewise that the family where I was bred, hath been an exemplary family (I may say so, I hope, without vanity) of much affection to religion, and of much faithfulness to this kingdom, and to this state. I have endeavoured to do those actions that became an honest man, and a good Englishman, and which became a good Christian. I have been willing to oblige those that have been in trouble, those that have been in persecution, and truly I find a great reward of it ; for I have found their prayers and their kindness now in this distress, and in this condition, and I think it a great reward, and I pray God reward them for it.

I am a great sinner, and I hope God will be pleased to hear my prayers, to give me faith to trust in him, that as he hath called me to death at this place, he will make it but a passage to an eternal life through Jesus Christ, which I trust to, which I rely upon, and which I expect by the mercy of God. And so I pray God bless you all, and send that you may see this to be the last execution, and the last blood that is likely to be spilt among you. And then turning to the side-rail, he prayed for a good space of time ; after which,

Mr. Bolton said, My lord ; now look upon him whom you have trusted. My lord, I hope that here is your last prayer, there will no more prayers remain, but praises ; and I hope that after this day is over there will a day begin that shall never have end ; and I look upon this, my lord, the morning of it, the morning of that day. My lord, you know where your fulness lies, where your riches lie, where is your only rock to anchor on ; you know there is fulness in Christ : If the Lord comes not in with fulness of comfort to you, yet resolve to wait upon him while you live, and to trust in him when you die ; and then say, I will die here, I will perish at thy feet, I will be found dead at the feet of Jesus Christ. Certainly, he that came to seek and save lost sinners, will not reject lost sinners when they come to seek him ; he that intreateth us to come, will not slight us when we come to intreat him. My lord, there is enough there, and fix your heart there, and fix your eyes there ; that eye of faith, and that eye of hope ; exercise these graces now, there will be no exercise hereafter. As your lordship said, here take an end of faith, and take an end of hope, and take a farewell of repentance, and all these ; and welcome God, and welcome Christ, and welcome glory, and welcome happiness to all eternity ; and so it will be an happy passage then, if it be a passage here from misery to happiness. And though it be but a sad way, yet, if it will bring you into the presence of joy, although it be a valley of tears, although it be a shadow of death, yet if God will please to bring you, and make it a passage to that happiness, welcome Lord. And I doubt not, but God will give you an heart to taste some sweetness and love in this bitter potion, and to see something of mercy and goodness to you, and shew you some sign and token of good, so that your soul may see that which we have had already experience of (blessed be God for it) many experiences, many expressions, not only in words, nor tears; God hath not left us without much comfort and evidence, and I hope, my Lord, you that have given so many evidences to us, I hope you want none yourself, but that the Lord will be pleased to support you, and bear up your spirit, and if there want evidence, there is reliance, my security lies not in my knowing that I shall come to Heaven, and come to glory, but in my resting and relying upon him; when the anchor of faith is thrown out, there may be shakings and tossings, but there is safety; nothing shall interrupt safety, although something may interrupt security: my safety is sure, although I apprehend it not: and what if I go to God in the dark? What if I come to him, as Nicodemus did, staggering in the night? It is a night of trouble, a night of darkness, tho' I come trembling and staggering in this night, yet I shall be sure to find comfort and fixedness in him. And the Lord of Heaven be the strength, stay, and support of your soul, and the Lord furnish you with all those graces which may carry you into the bosom of the Lord Jesus, that when you expire this life, you may be able to expire it into him, in whom you may begin to live to all eternity; and that is my humble prayer.

Holland. Mr Bolton, God hath given me long time in this world; he hath carried me through many great accidents of fortune, he hath at last brought me down into a condition, where I find myself brought to an end, for a disaffection to this state, to this parliament, that, as I said before, I did believe nobody in the world more unlikely to have expected to suffer for that cause; I look upon it as a great judgment of God for my sins. And truly, sir, since that the death is violent, I am the less troubled with it, because of those violent deaths that I have seen before; principally my Saviour, that hath shewed us the way, how, and in what manner he hath done it, and for what cause, I am the more comforted, I am the more rejoiced. It is not long since the king my master passed in the same manner; and truly I hope that his purposes and intentions were such, as a man may not be ashamed, not only to follow him in the way that was taken with him, but likewise not ashamed of his purposes, if God had given him life. I have often disputed with him concerning many things of this kind, and I conceive his sufferings, and his better knowledge, and better understanding (if God had spared him life) might have made him a prince, very happy toward himself and this kingdom. I have seen and known that those blessed souls in Heaven have passed thither by the gate of sorrow, and many by the gate of violence; and since it is God's pleasure to dispose me this way, I submit my soul to him, with all comfort, and with all hope, that he hath made this my end, and this my conclusion, that though I be low in death, yet nevertheless this lowness shall raise me to the highest glory for ever.—Truly, I have not said much in public to the people, concerning the particular actions that I conceive I have done by my counsels in this kingdom, I conceive they are well known, it were something of vanity, methinks, to take notice of them here. I will rather die with them, with the comfort of them in my own bosom, and that I never intended in this action, or any action that ever I did in my life, either malice, or blood-shed, or prejudice to any creature that lives. For that which concerns my religion, I made my profession before of it, how I was bred, and in what manner I was bred, in a family that was looked upon to be no little notorious in opposition to some liberties they have conceived them to be taken; and truly, there was some mark upon me, as if I had some taint of it, even throughout my whole ways that I have taken: every body knows what my affections have been to many that have suffered, to many that have been in troubles in this kingdom, I endeavoured to relieve them, I endeavoured to oblige them, I thought I was tied so by my conscience, I thought it by my charity, and truly, very much by my breeding; God hath now brought me to the last instant of my time, all that I can say, and all that I can adhere unto, is this, That as I am a great sinner, so I have a great Saviour: that as he hath given me here a fortune to come publicly in a shew of shame in the way of this suffering (truly I understand it not to be so) I understand it to be a glory; a glory, when I consider who hath gone before me, and a glory, when I consider I had no end in it, but what I conceive to be the service of God, the king, and the kingdom, and therefore my heart is not charged much with any thing in that particular, since I conceive God will accept of the intention, whatsoever the action seems to be. I am going to die, and the Lord receive my soul; I have no reliance, but upon Christ: For myself, I do acknowledge, that I am the unworthiest of sinners, my life hath been a vanity, and a continued sin, and God may justly bring me to this end, for the sins I have committed against him, and were there nothing else but the iniquities that I have committed in the way of my life, I look upon this as a great justice of God, to bring me to this suffering, and to bring me to this punishment; and those hands that have been most active in it, if any such there hath been; I pray God forgive them; I pray God there may not be many such trophies of their victories, but that this may be (as I said before) the last shew that this people shall see, of the blood of per-ons of condition, of persons of honour : I might say something of the way of our trial, which certainly hath been as extraordinary, as any thing I think hath ever been seen in this kingdom ; but because that I would not seem as if I made some complaint, I will not so much as mention it, because nobody shall believe I repine at their actions, that I repine at my fortune ; it is the will of God, it is the hand of God under whom I fall ; I take it entirely from him, I submit myself to him, I shall desire to roll myself into the arms of my blessed Saviour, and when I come to this place, [pointing to the block,] when I bow down myself here, I hope God will raise me up ; and when I bid farewell, as I must now to hope and to faith, that love will abide ; I know nothing to accompany the soul out of this world, but ore ; and I hope that love will bring me to be fountain of glory in heaven, through the arms, mediation, and the mercy of my Saviour Jesus Christ, in whom I believe, O Lord help my unbelief.

Hodges. The Lord make over unto you the righteousness of his own Son, it is that treasury that he hath bestowed upon you ; and the Lord shew you the light of his countenance, and fill you full with his joy and kindness. O my dear ord, the Lord of heaven and earth be with you, and the Lord of heaven and earth bring you to that safety.

Holland. I shall make as much haste as I can to come to that glory, and the Lord of heaven and earth take my soul ; I look upon myself entirely in him, and hope to find mercy through him, I expect it, and through that fountain that is opened for sin and for uncleanness, my soul must receive it ; for did I rest in any thing else, I have nothing but sin and corruption in me, I have nothing but that, which instead of being carried up into the arms of God, and of glory, I have nothing but may throw me down into hell.

Bolton. But my lord, when you are clothed with the righteousness of another, you will appear glorious, though now sinful in yourself ; The apostle saith, ' I desire not to be found in my own righteousness,' and when you are clothed with another, the Lord will own you, and I shall say but thus much : Doubt not that ever God will deny salvation to sinners that come to him, when the end of all his death and sufferings was the salvation of sinners, whenas, I say, the whole end, and the whole design, and the great work that God had to do in the world, by the death of Christ, wherein he laid out all his counsels, and infinite wisdom, and goodness, beyond which there was a non ultra in God's thoughts, when this was the great design and great end, the salvation of poor sinners, that poor souls should come over to him, and live ; certainly when sinners come, he will not reject, he will not refuse. And, my lord, do but think of this, the greatest work that ever was done in the world, was the blood of Christ that was shed, never any thing like it : And this blood of Christ that was shed, was shed for them that come, if not for them, for none, it was in vain else : You see the devils they are out of capacity of good by it, the angels they have no need of it, wicked men will not come, and there are but few that come over, but a few that come over, and should he deny them, there were no end nor fruit of the blood and sufferings of the Lord Jesus : and had your lordship been with Christ in that bloody agony, when he was in that bloody sweat, sweating drops of blood, if you had asked him, Lord, what art thou now a doing, art thou not now reconciling an angry God and me together, art thou not pacifying the wrath of God ? art thou not interposing thyself between the justice of God and myself ? Would he not have said, Yea ? and surely then he will not deny it now. My lord, his passions are over, his compassions still remain, and the larger and greater, because he is gone up into an higher place, that he may throw down more abundance of his mercy and grace upon you, and, my lord, think of that infinite love, that abundance of riches in Christ : I am lost, I am empty, I have nothing, I am poor, I am sinful ; be it so, as bad as God will make me, and as vile as I possibly can conceive myself, I am willing to be : but when I have said all, the more I advance that riches and honour that grace of God. And why should I doubt, when by this he puts me into a capacity, into a disposition for him to shew me mercy, that by this I may the better advance the riches of his grace, and say, Grace, grace to the Lord to all eternity, that God should own such a creature that deserves nothing ; and the less I deserve, the more conspicuous is his grace : And this is certain, the riches of his grace he throweth amongst men, that the glory of his grace might be given to himself ; if we can give him but the glory of his grace, we shall never doubt to partake of the riches of it ; and that fulness, my lord, that fulness be your comfort, that fulness of mercy, that fulness of love, that fulness of righteousness and power be now your riches, and your only stay, and the Lord interpose himself between God and you, as your faith hath endeavoured to interpose him between God and your soul ; so I doubt not there he stands, my lord, to plead for you, and when you are not able to do any thing yourself, yet lie down at the feet of him that is a merciful Saviour, and knows what you would desire, and wait upon him while you live, trust in him when you die, there is riches enough, and mercy enough, if he open not, yet die at his door, say there I'll die, there is mercy enough.

Holland. And here is the place where I lie down before him, from whence I hope he will raise me to an eternal glory through my Saviour, upon whom I rely, from whom only I can expect mercy : into his arms I commend my spirit, into his bleeding arms, that when I leave this bleeding body that must lie upon this place, he will receive that soul that ariseth out of it, and receive it into his eternal mercy, through the merits, through the worthiness, through the mediation of Christ, that hath purchased it with his own most precious blood.

Bolton. My lord, though you conclude here, I hope you begin above, and though you put an end here, I hope there will never be an end of the mercy and goodness of God, and if this be the morning of eternity, if this be the rise of glory, if God pleaseth to throw you down here, to raise you up for ever, say, Welcome Lord, welcome that death that shall make way for life, and welcome any condition that shall throw me down here, to bring me into the possession of Jesus Christ.

Hodges. My lord, if you have made a deed of gift of yourself to Jesus Christ, to be found only in him, I am confident you shall stand at the day of Christ, my dear lord, we shall meet in happiness.

Holland. Christ Jesus receive my soul, my soul hungers and thirsts after him, clouds are gathering, and I trust in God through all my heaviness, and I hope through all impediments, he will settle my interest in him, and throw off all the claim that Satan can make unto it, and that he will carry my soul in despite of all the calumnies, and all that the Devil and Satan can invent, will carry it into eternal mercy, there to receive the blessedness of his presence to all eternity.

Hodges. My lord, it was his own by creation, it is his own now by redemption and purchase, and it is likewise his own by resignation: O my lord, look therefore up to the Lamb of God that sits at the right hand of God, to take away the sins of the world, O that Lamb of God!

Holland. That Lamb of God, into his hands I commit my soul: and that Lamb of God that sits upon the throne to judge those 24 that fall down before him, I hope he will be pleased to look downward and judge me with mercy that fall down before him, and that adore him, that only trusts upon his mercy for his compassion; and that as he hath purchased me, he would lay his claim unto me now and receive me.

Bolton. My lord, think of this, there is no condemnation to them who are in Christ; who is it that can condemn? it is Christ that justifies: and therefore look now upon this, my lord, upon this Christ, upon this Christ that justifies: hell, death, sin, Satan; nothing shall be able to condemn, it is Christ that justifies you.

Holland. Indeed if Christ justify, nobody can condemn, and I trust in God, in his justification, though there is a confusion here without us, and though there are wonders and staring that now disquiet, yet I trust that I shall be carried into that mercy, that God will receive my soul.

Bolton. I doubt not my lord but as you are a spectacle of pity here, so you are an object of God's mercy above.

Holland. Then the Earl of Holland looking over among the people, pointing to a soldier said, This honest man took me a prisoner, you little thought I should have been brought: this, when I delivered myself to you upon conditions: and espying captain Watson on horse-back, putting off his hat, said to him, God be with you, Sir, God reward you, Sir.

Bolton. My lord, throw yourself into the arms of mercy, and say, there I will anchor, and there I will die, he is a Saviour for us in all conditions, whither should we go? he hath the words of eternal life: and upon him do you rest, wait while you live, and even trust in death.

Holland. Here must now be my anchor, a great storm makes me find my anchor; and but in storms nobody trusts to his anchor; and therefore I must trust upon my anchor, [Upon that God, said Mr. Bolton, upon whom your anchor trusts,] yea, God I hope, will anchor my soul fast upon Christ Jesus: and if I die not with that clearness and heartiness that you speak of, truly, I will trust in God, though he kill me, I will rely upon him, and in the mercy of my Saviour.

Bolton. There is mercy enough, my lord, and to spare, you shall not need to doubt; they shall never go begging to another door (my lord) that come to him.—Then the earl of Holland speaking to Mr. Hodges, said, I pray God reward you for all your kindness, and pray as you have done, instruct my family, that they may serve God with faithfulness and holiness, with more diligence, than truly I have been careful to press them unto; you have the charge of the same place, you may do much for them, and I recommend them to your kindness, and the goodness of your conscience.

Dr. Sibbald standing upon the scaffold, in his passage to col. Beecher expressed himself thus to his lordship.

Dr. Sibbald. The Lord lift up the light of his countenance upon you, and you shall be safe.

Holland. Then the earl of Holland embraced lieutenant col. Beecher, and took his leave of him: After which he came to Mr. Bolton, and having embraced him, and returned him many thanks for his great pains and affections to his soul, desiring God to reward him, and return his love into his bosom. Mr. Bolton said to him, the Lord God support you, and be seen in this great extremity; the Lord reveal and discover himself to you; and make your death the passage unto eternal life.

Then the earl of Holland turning to the executioner, said, Here, my friend, let my cloaths and my body alone, there is ten pounds for thee, that is better than my cloaths, I am sure of it.

Executioner. Will your lordship please to give me a sign when I shall strike?

And then his lordship said, You have room enough here, have you not? and the executioner said, Yes.

Bolton. The Lord be your strength, there is riches in him; the Lord of Heavens impart himself to you, he is able to save to the uttermost: We cannot fall so low as to fall ow the everlasting arms of God : and therefore the Lord be a support and stay to us in your low condition, that he will be pleased to make this an advantage to that : and glory that will make amends for Holland. Then the earl of Holland turning to the executioner, said, friend, do you spare me, if you take up my head, do not take my cap. Then turning to his servants, he said to one, fare you well, thou art an honest fellow ; and to another, God be with thee, thou art an honest man : and then said, stay, will kneel down, and ask God forgiveness ; and then prayed for a pretty space, with seeming earnestness.

Bolton. The Lord grant you may find life and death.

Holland. Which is the way of lying ? which they shewed him,) and then going to the front of the scaffold, he said to the people, God bless you all, and God deliver you from any such accident as may bring you to any such death as is violent, either by war, or by these accidents, but that there may be peace among you, and you may find that these accidents that have happened to us, may be the last that may happen in this kingdom ; it is not that I desire, it is that I beg of God, next the saving of my soul : I pray God give all happiness to this kingdom, to this people, and his nation : (and then turning to the Executioner, said) how must I lie ? I know not.

Executioner. Lie down flat upon your belly : (and then having laid himself down, he said, must I lie closer ?)

Execut. Yes, and backward.

Holland. I will tell you when you shall strike ; and then as he lay seemed to pray with much affection for a short space, and then lifting up his head, said, where is the man ? And seeing the Executioner by him, he said, stay while I give the sign ; and presently after stretching out his hand, and the Executioner being not fully ready, he said, now, now, and just as the words were coming out of his mouth, the Executioner at one blow severed his head from his body.*

* The Negative Oath referred to in the above Proceedings was as follows :

‘ I, A. B. do swear from my heart, that I will not directly, nor indirectly, adhere unto, or willingly assist the King in this War, or in this cause, against the Parliament, nor any Forces raised without the consent of the two Houses of Parliament, in this cause or war. And I do likewise swear, that my coming and submitting myself under the power and protection of the Parliament, is without any manner of design whatsoever, to the prejudice of the proceedings of this present Parliament, and without the direction, privacy, or advice of the King, or any of his Council, or Officers, other than what I have now made known. So help me GOD, and the contents of this Book.’

Account of the Execution of the Lord Capel.

We will now take a view of the lord Capel, after the time of his Condemnation, when he was to encounter and look death in the face. He always kept a very chearful and well composed temper of mind, which proceeded from true Christian principles, he would often say, ‘ it was the good God he served, and the good cause he had served for, that made him not to fear death,’ adding, ‘ that he never had the temptation of so much as a thought to check him for his engagement in this quarrel, for he took it for his crown and glory, and wished he had a greater ability, and better fortune to engage in it.’

The afternoon before his suffering, he was a great while in private with a minister, where bewailing, with that sense which became a true, and not despairing penitent, the sins of his life past, the greatest he could remember, was his voting my lord of Strafford’s death, which though, as he said, he did without any malice at all, yet he confessed it to be a very great sin, and that he had done it out of a base fear (his own words) of a prevailing party, of which he had very often and very heartily repented, and was confident of God’s pardon for it. Then he desired to receive the blessed sacrament before he died. After this, (being afraid of some danger to the minister that attended him, for that work of love) and some conference in order to his preparation, both for his provision and his voyage, the sacrament and his death, he desired to go to prayers, which being performed, he returned to his private devotions.

The next morning being the day of his death, he desired the minister, who was with him before, to hear and join with him in prayers, which he did, for half an hour in an excellent method, very apt expressions, and most strong, hearty, and passionate affections ; first confessing and bewailing his sins with strong cries and tears, then humbly and most earnestly desiring God’s mercy through the merits of Christ alone. Secondly, for his dear lady and children with some passion, but for her especially with most ardent affections, recommending them to the Divine Providence with great confidence and assurance, and desiring for them rather the blessings of a better life than of this. Thirdly, for the king, church, and kingdom. And lastly, for his enemies, almost with the same ardour and affection.

After Prayer ended, my lord of Norwich and sir John Owen being sent for, the minister read the whole office of the church for Good Friday, and then after a short homily for the occasion, he received the sacrament again, in which action he behaved himself with great humility, zeal, and devotion.

Being demanded after the receiving thereof how he found himself, he replied very much better, stronger and cheerfuller for that heavenly repast, and that he doubted not to walk like a Christian through the vale of death in the strength of it. But he was to have an agony before his passion, and that was the parting with his wife, eldest son, now earl of Essex, his son in law, two of his uncles, and sir T. C., especially his parting with his dearest lady, which indeed was the saddest spectacle that could be. In which occasion, as he could not choose but shew and confess a little of human frailty, yet even then, he did not forget both to comfort and counsel her, and the rest of his friends; particularly in blessing the young lord, he commanded him never to revenge his death, though it should be in his power, the like he said unto his lady. He told his son he would leave him a legacy out of David's Psalms, and that was this: 'Lord lead me in a plain path.' 'For boy,' saith he, 'I would have you a plain honest man, and hate dissimulation.'

After this was past, with much ado his wife and the rest of his friends were persuaded to be gone, and then being all alone with the minister, he said, 'Doctor, the hardest part of my work in this world is now past;' meaning the parting with his wife. Then he desired the said minister to pray preparatively for his death, that in the last action he might so behave himself, as might be 'most for God's glory, for the endearing of his dead master's memory, and his present master's service,' and that he might avoid the doing or saying of any thing, which might savour either of ambition or vanity. This being done, he was conveyed with the other two lords, who suffered with him, to sir Robert Cotton's, where the minister staid with him till he was called to the Scaffold, whither the guard of soldiers permitted him not to come, so that my lord took leave of him there.

The same day he died, he wrote the following Letter to his Wife.

'My dearest life; My eternal life is in Christ Jesus: my worldly considerations in the highest degree thou hast deserved, let me live long here in thy dear memory, to the comfort of my family, our dear children, whom God out of mercy in Christ hath bestowed upon us. I beseech thee take care of thy health, sorrow not, afflict not thyself too much; God will be unto thee better than an husband, and to my children better than a father: I am sure he is able to be so: I am confident he is graciously pleased to be so. God be with thee, my most virtuous wife. God multiply many comforts to thee and my children, which is the fervent prayer of thy, &c.'

When the other two Lords were beheaded, he was brought last to the Scaffold, where he spake as followeth:

His lordship in the way to the Scaffold, put off his hat to the People on both sides, looking very austere about him: And being come upon the Scaffold, lieut. colonel Beecher said to him, 'Sir, Is your chaplain here?'

Capel. No, I have taken my leave of him: and perceiving some of his servants to weep, he said, Gentlemen, refrain yourselves, refrain yourselves; and turning to lieut. col. Beecher, he said, What? did the lords speak with their hats off, or no?

And then coming to the front of the Scaffold, he said, I shall hardly be understood here, I think, and then began his Speech as followeth:

Capel. The conclusion that I made with those that sent me hither, and are the cause of this violent death of mine, shall be the beginning of what I shall say to you; When I made an address to them, which was the last, I told them with much sincerity, that I would pray to the God of all mercies, that they might be partakers of his inestimable and boundless mercies in Jesus Christ; and truly I still pray that prayer: and I beseech the God of Heaven forgive any injury they have done to me, from my soul I wish it. And truly, this I tell you as a Christian, to let you see I am a Christian. But it is necessary I should tell you somewhat more, that I am a Protestant: And truly, I am a Protestant, and very much in love with the profession of it, after the manner as it was established in England by the 39 articles; a blessed way of profession, and such a one as truly, I never knew none so good. I am so far from being a Papist, which some body have, truly, very unworthily at some time charged me withal, that truly, I profess to you, that though I love good works, and commend good works, yet I hold they have nothing at all to do in the matter of Salvation; my anchor-hold is this, 'That Christ loved me, and gave himself for me;' that is that that I rest upon.

And truly something I shall say to you as a citizen of the whole world, and in that consideration I am here condemned to die, truly contrary to the law that governs all the world, that is, the law of the sword; I had the protection of that for my life, and the honour of it, but truly I will not trouble you much with that, because in another place I have spoken very largely and liberally about it. I believe you will hear by other means what arguments I used in that case; But truly, that, that is stranger, you that are Englishmen, behold here an Englishman here before you, and acknowledged a peer, not condemned to die by any law of England: not by any law of England; nay, shall I tell you more? (which is strangest of all) contrary to all the laws of England that I know of. And truly I will tell you, in the matter of the civil part of my death, and the cause that I have maintained, I die (I take it,) for maintaining the fifth commandment, enjoined by God himself, which enjoins reverence and obedience to parents: All divines on all hands, though they contradict one another in many several opinions, yet all divines on all hands do acknowledge, that here is intended magistracy and order; and certainly I have obeyed that magistracy and that order under which I have lived, which I was bound to obey; and truly, I do say very confidently, that I do die here for keeping, for obeying that fifth commandment given by God himself, and written with his own finger. And now, gentlemen, I will take this opportunity to tell you, That I cannot imitate a better, nor a greater ingenuity than his, that said of himself, 'For suffering an unjust judgment upon another, himself was brought to suffer by an unjust judgment.' Truly, gentlemen, that God may be glorified, that all men that are concerned in it, may take the occasion of it, of humble repentance to God Almighty for it, I do here profess to you, that I did give my Vote to that Bill against the earl of Strafford; I doubt not but God Almighty hath washed that away with a more precious blood, the blood of his own Son, and my dear Saviour Jesus Christ; and I hope he will wash it away from all those that are guilty of it; truly, this I may say, I had not the least part nor degree of malice in doing it; but I must confess again to God's glory, and the accusation of mine own frailty, and the frailty of my nature, that truly it was unworthy cowardice, not to resist so great a torrent as carried that business at that time. And truly, this I think I am most guilty of, of not courage enough in it, but malice I had none; but whatsoever it was, God I am sure hath pardoned it, hath given me the assurance of it, that Christ Jesus his blood hath washed it away; and truly, I do from my soul wish, that all men that have any stain by it, may seriously repent, and receive a remission and pardon from God for it. And now, gentlemen, we have had an occasion by this intimation to remember his majesty our king, that last was; and I cannot speak of him, nor think of it, but truly I must need say, that in my opinion, that have had time to consider all the images of all the greatest and most virtuous princes in the world; and truly, in my opinion, there was not a more virtuous, and more sufficient prince known in the world, than our gracious king Charles that died last: God Almighty preserve our king that now is, his son; God send him more fortunate and longer days; God Almighty so assist him, that he may exceed both the virtues and sufficiencies of his father: For certainly, I that have been a counsellor to him, and have lived long with him, and in a time when discovery is easily enough made, for he was young, he was about 13, 14, 15, or 16 years of age, those years I was with him, truly, I never saw greater hopes of virtue in any young person than in him; great understanding, great apprehension, much honour in his nature, and truly a very perfect Englishman in his inclination; and I pray God restore him to this kingdom, and unite the kingdoms one unto another, and send a great happiness both to you and to him, that he may long live and reign among you, and that that family may reign till thy kingdom come, that is, while all temporal power is consummated: I beseech God of his mercy give much happiness to this your king, and to you, that in it shall be his subjects, by the grace of Jesus Christ.

Truly I like my beginning so well, that I will make my conclusion with it; that is, That God Almighty would confer, of his infinite and inestimable grace and mercy, to those that are the causers of my coming hither, I pray God give them as much mercy as their hearts can wish: and truly, for my part, I will not accuse any one of them of malice, truly I will not; nay, I will not think there was any malice in them. What other ends there are, I know not, nor will I examine; but let it be what it will, from my very soul I forgive them every one. And so the Lord of Heaven bless you all; God Almighty be infinite in goodness and mercy to you, and direct you in those ways of obedience to his commands, to his majesty, that this kingdom may be an happy and glorious nation again, and that your king may be an happy king in so good and so obedient a people. God Almighty keep you all, God Almighty preserve this kingdom, God Almighty preserve you all.

Then turning about, and looking for the executioner (who was gone off the scaffold) said, Which is the gentleman? which is the man? Answer was made, He is coming. He then said, Stay, I must pull off my doublet first, and my waistcoat; and then the executioner being come upon the scaffold, the lord Capel said, O friend! pray thee, come hither. Then the executioner kneeling down, the lord Capel said, I forgive thee from my soul, and not only forgive thee, but I shall pray to God to give thee all grace for a better life. There is five pound for thee; and truly, for my clothes, and those things, if there be any thing due to you for it, you shall be fully recompensed; but I desire my body may not be stripped here, and nobody to take notice of my body but my own servants. Look you, friend, this I shall desire of you, that when I lie down, you would give me a time for a particular short prayer.

Lieut. Col. Beecher. Make your own sign, my lord.

Capel. Stay a little. Which side do you stand upon? (speaking to the executioner;) stay, I think I should lay my hands forward that way (pointing fore-right) and answer being made, Yes, he stood still a little while, and then said, 'God Almighty bless all this people; God Almighty stanch this blood! God Almighty stanch, stanch, stanch this issue of blood! This will not do the business; God Almighty find out another way to do it.' And then turning to one of his servants, said, 'Baldwin, I cannot see any thing that belongs to my wife; but I must desire thee, and beseech her, to rest wholly upon Jesus Christ, to be contented and fully satisfied.' And then speaking to his servants, he said, 'God keep you; and, gentlemen, let me now do a business quickly, privately, and pray let me have your prayers at the moment of death, that God would receive my soul.'

Lieut. Col. Beecher. I wish it.

Capel. Pray, at the moment of striking, join your prayers; but make no noise (turning to his servants) it is inconvenient at this time.

Servant. My lord, put on your cap.

Capel. Should I? what, will that do me good? Stay a little, it is well as it is now; as he was putting up his hair.

And then turning to the Executioner, he said, Honest man, I have forgiven thee; therefore strike holdly—from my soul I do it.

Then a Gentleman speaking to him, he said, Nay, prythee, be contented; be quiet, good Mr. —, be quiet.

Then turning to the Executioner, he said, Well, you are ready when I am ready, are you not? And stretching out his hands, he said, Then pray, stand off, gentlemen. Then going to the front of the Scaffold, he said to the People, Gentlemen, though I doubt not of it, yet I think it convenient to ask it of you, That you would all join in prayers with me, that God would mercifully receive my soul, and that for his alone mercies in Christ Jesus. God Almighty keep you all.

Executioner. My lord, shall I put up your hair?

Capel. I, I, prythee, do. And then, as he stood, lifting up his hands and eyes, he said, O God, I do with a perfect and willing heart submit to thy will. O God, I do most willingly humble myself; and then kneeling down, said, I will try first how I can lie, and laying his head upon the block, said, Am I well now?

Executioner. Yes.

And then, as he lay with both his hands stretched out, he said to the Executioner, Here lie both my hands out, when I lift up my hands thus (lifting up his right hand) then you may strike.

And then, after he had said a short Prayer, he lifted up his right hand, and the Executioner at one blow severed his head from his body, which was taken up by his servants, and put, with his body, into a coffin.

Echard gives an account of Dr. Morley's* attendance on lord Capel, of which Oldmixon makes a contemptuous contrast with that of Mr. Hodges on lord Holland. Oldmixon also severely animadverts on lord Capel's having no

* "George Morley, some time chaplain to Charles 1, was a polite scholar, and an eminent divine, especially in controversy. He was, in the early part of his life, one of Ben Jonson's sons; he was also an intimate friend of lord Falkland, Mr. Hyde, Mr. Chillingworth, Mr. Waller, and others of the first eminence in the late reign. One of his excellencies, which raised him much in the esteem of all his friends, helped to degrade his character in the opinion of his enemies: this was his wit, which was natural, but uncommon; keen, but inoffensive. The very faculty was condemned by many in this age, without the least regard to its application. After the death of the king, he retired to the Hague, where he attended on Charles 2. He afterwards resided at Antwerp, where he was very assiduous in his ministerial duty. During his residence abroad, he contracted an intimacy with Rivetus, Heinsius,

Minister with him. The following transcript from bishop Morley's MS. * shews what passed between lord Capel and him, and why lord Capel was not attended on the scaffold by a minister:

Bishop MORLEY's Account, of the Manner of the Death of the Right Honourable ARTHUR Lord CAPEL; who was beheaded by the Rebels, March the 9th, 1649. Copied from the original Paper of that Bishop's own writing.

A true and short NARRATIVE of the Manner of the Death of the Right Honourable the Lord CAPEL.

I went often to visit the right honourable the lord Capel a little before his Death, whilst he was a Prisoner in St. James's House in the Park, and always found him in such a temper as became an innocent and well resolved person.

The night before he was to suffer, he told me, he had a great desire to receive the Sacrament before his Death, if he might receive it from a minister of the King's party, and according to the Liturgy of the Church of England; but said withal, he feared, no such person as he would receive it from, could give it him without endangering himself, and that he was loath to endanger any man. I replied, I knew not what danger there might be in doing that Christian office to a dying man; but, was resolved (if he pleased to take it from my hands) to venture any thing that could come of it, rather than his lordship should die without that satisfaction. He seemed to be, and no doubt was, very glad of this offer of mine, and gave me many thanks for it; desiring me, that (without losing any more of the little time he had left) I would confer and pray with him, in order to his preparation for receiving the Holy Sacrament next morning.

Salmasius, Bochart, and other persons of rank in the learned world. Upon the Restoration, he was made dean of Christchurch, and the same year bishop of Worcester, whence he was translated to Winchester. His constant practice was to rise at five in the morning, to go to bed at eleven, and eat but once a day. By these rules he preserved his health, with very little interruption, through the course of a long life. He died October 29, 1684. His writings are chiefly on polemical subjects. In 1688, he published several treatises in a quarto volume. In the preface is a good account of the religious character of Anne Hyde, dutchess of York, before her conversion to popery." Granger.

* Obligingly communicated to the Editor of the present Work by lord Capel's descendant, the earl of Essex, A. D. 1809.

I did so, and found that he could not accuse himself of any great known sin, committed against the light of his own conscience, but one only; and that was the giving his Vote in Parliament, for the Death of my lord of Strafford; 'Which, (said he,) I did against my conscience; not out of any malice to the person of the man; but out of a base fear' (they were his own words) 'and carried away with the violence of a prevailing faction; and for which' (said he) 'I have been, and am heartily sorry, and have often with tears begged, and (I hope) obtained pardon of Almighty God;' adding, 'that' (if I thought it necessary or fit) 'He would confess this great and scandalous sin of his, together with the cause of it, openly upon the Scaffold, to God's glory and his own shame:' which, I telling him I thought it would be ingenuously and Christianly done, of him to do, he did accordingly the next morning.

Then, having prayed again with him, I left him for that night, in a most Christian temper, to his own devout meditations.

The next morning, (at the hour agreed on between us, which was between six and seven) I came to him again, and found him ready to receive me. We went into a chamber alone together, where, after some spiritual conference suitable to the present occasion, I first prayed with him, and then he prayed himself, with very great zeal and fervor, and for others as well as for himself; nay for his enemies as well as for his friends, but especially for the King, the Kingdom and the Church. And all this with such apt and unaffected expressions, and in so regular a method, that one might easily perceive Prayer was a thing he had so often exercised, that it was grown habitual to him.

Having thus prepared himself, he did with great humility and devotion receive the Holy Sacrament, together with the earl of Norwich and sir John Owen, who were condemned to suffer with him, but are yet (thanks be to God) both living; and will live, I hope, to see justice done upon those who did condemn them.

Having received the Sacrament, and being much comforted, by it, (as finding in himself all the gracious effects of it) he was presently put to the trial of his spiritual strength, by taking his leave of the nearest and dearest relations that can be betwixt flesh and blood, and the strongest ties that a noble nature can have unto the world. For that excellent lady his wife and his eldest son, together with two of his uncles, and his nephew sir Thomas Corbett came all into the room at once (as being not permitted to do it severally) and at once assaulted him (as it were) with such passionate looks, gestures and words, bemoaning and bewailing him and themselves, (his Lady especially) with such sweet and tender expressions of love, sorrow and pity, that the greatest natural courage in the world must needs have been shaken with it, had it not been supported, (as his was) with more than human strength and firmness. I am sure it was the saddest sight that ever I saw; and such a one as even that great courage of his could not choose, but be a little softened and melted with it, but he quickly recollected himself, and then with a cheerful countenance, told his wife and the rest, that he and they must all submit, not only with patience, but cheerfulness to the Divine Providence, which, no doubt, had and would order all things so as should be best for him and them too, though perhaps it did not yet appear to them to be so. Then, having recommended the care of his Children and Servants unto his Lady, he commanded both her and his son, as they loved him, to forgive his enemies; 'And though' (said he unto his son) 'I would not have you neglect any honourable and just occasion to serve your King and Country, with the hazard of your life and fortune, yet I would have you to engage yourself, (as I, thanks be to God for it, have done) neither out of desire of revenge, nor hope of reward, but out of a conscience of your duty only. My land' (said he) 'was so settled upon you by your grandfather, that no pretence of crime in me can deprive you of it: the best legacy I can leave you is my prayers for you, and a verse of David's Psalms, which I command you, upon my blessing, to make a part of your daily prayers, as I have always made it a part of mine, viz. "Teach me thy way O Lord, and lead me in a plain path," Ps. lxxvii. v. 11. For I have always loved plainness and clearness both in my words and actions, and abhorred all doubling and dissimulation, and so I would have you to do also.' Then he gave him his Blessing; and, having embraced his uncles and nephew, he took his last leave of them all, not without some tears on his part, as well as many of theirs; His poor lady, being not able to support such a weight of grief, did sink under it, and was fain to be carried out from him. As soon as all were gone, and none left in the room but he and I; 'Well Doctor,' (said he) 'the hardest thing that I had to do here in this world is now past, the parting with this poor woman; Let us now again to our main concernment. I believe' (said he) 'I shall be called upon presently to go to the place where I am to take my leave of all the rest of the world, and, I thank my God, I find myself very well disposed to it, and prepared for it.' And then he told me he was in good hope that when he came to die, he should have nothing else to do but to die only. 'For' (said he) 'when I am upon the Scaffold, having made a Confession of my Faith, and said something in honour of my master that was, and for the service of my master that now is, I will only repeat the Lord's Prayer upon my knees, and then lay my head upon the block, desiring the Executioner, that upon the stretching forth of my right hand, (which shall be in the very act of recommending my soul unto my Saviour) he would instantly do his office,' and then he shewed me the heads of what he meant to speak off, written with his own hand, which after he had made use of, he gave unto his servant just as he laid himself down to receive the stroke, and commanded him to deliver that Paper unto me as soon as he was dead, which he did accordingly. We had scarce made an end of reading this paper, when lieutenant colonel Beecher, the officer appointed to convey him and the other condemned lords, with sir John Owen, to the place of Execution, knocked at the door, and told him it was time for his lordship to go, whose summons he very readily and cheerfully obeyed.

Presently afterwards, Duke Hamilton, the earl of Holland, the earl of Norwich, and he, together with sir John Owen, were carried through St. James's Park in sedans, to sir Robert Cotton's House beyond the upper end of Westminster Hall, where they were all put into one room, and stayed there at least an hour before Duke Hamilton (who was ordered to die first) was carried to the place of Execution, which was upon a Scaffold just before Westminster Hall in the new palace. During the time of their stay in sir Robert Cotton's House, my lord Capel, finding his stomach a little ill and fearing he might be worse, if he did not do then what he had for a long time accustomed himself to do daily, called me aside and asked me, whether he might not take a pipe of tobacco without scandal, saying, he was afraid it might very much discompose him if he did not; I told him I thought he might, and that in prudence he ought to do it, rather than hazard any such inconvenience at such a time when he had need to be in the best temper: whereupon duke Hamilton, and the earl of Holland, drinking each of them a little wine to comfort their spirits, he took a little tobacco to the same end also: all the time of his being there (which was at least two hours, he being the last of the three that was to be put to death) he spent either in conference with me, or in soliloquies and prayers unto God: at last, when (the other two lords being already executed) lieutenant col. Beecher came to fetch him to the Scaffold, he first took his leave of my lord of Norwich and sir John Owen, who were reprieved; giving my lord of Norwich his cane, and would have taken his leave there of me also, but I told him I would wait upon him to the Scaffold; and, if I might be suffered, do him the best service I could in assisting him in the last act of his tragedy: then, before he went out of the room, turning him to the lieutenant colonel and his soldiers (who were then, and had been his guard during his imprisonment in St. James's House) 'Gentlemen' (said he) 'I do not only from my heart forgive you, but thank you all for the kindness and civility I have found from you, and, as I forgive you, so I forgive your officers also, even those that are the authors of my death; for I verily believe that none of them do what they do out of any malice at all to me, but because I stand in the way of something 'else they have to do, which they think I must and will oppose as long as I live to the utmost of my power.' Then calling me to him, and giving me his watch to keep for a remembrance of him, 'Doctor' (said he) 'I believe they will not suffer you to accompany and assist me upon the Scaffold; but I thank God, the work, wherein I stood especially in need of your help, is done; I heartily thank God and you for it. All that I shall desire of you more, is to assist me with your prayers while I am alive, and to do the best you can to comfort my poor wife, when I am dead; and, in your prayers for me, desire Almighty God to assist me with his grace, that in this last act of my life, I may so behave myself as becomes a good Christian dying in and for so good a cause as this is; and particularly that, for the manner of my death, it may be with an humble confidence in God's mercy, and with a modest assurance of a better life, and, lastly, that I may neither say nor do any thing that may savour either of a base fear, or of a vain ostentation.'

When he had said this, he was immediately conducted by the foresaid lieutenant col. and soldiers through Westminster Hall, and betwixt the guard of soldiers which stood all along and kept off the people which thronged to see him, and who, admiring the courage and constancy that appeared in his very countenance, and mien itself, did generally commend and bless him, and prayed for him with loud exclamations as he went by them.

I followed him as far as the foot of the Scaffold, and would have gone up after him, but the lieutenant col. would not suffer me; though either of the other lords had their divines there with them, but they were Presbyterians, and I was generally known to be a Royalist and Episcopal, which was the only reason I can imagine why they would not suffer me to appear, before such a multitude of people, as an assistant at such an action; unless it were, perhaps, that they would have the people believe, that the lord Capel died indeed resolutely like an old Roman: but that the constancy and courage he shewed at his death, was but an effect of his natural temper and constitution, and not of a Christian faith and hope, or of any sense of piety, as appeared by his refusing or not caring to have a divine with him at his death; which was most false, indeed, dying for loyalty, as he did, he would not, in the last act of his life, make use of any of those ministers whom he had reason to think had been the contrivers and plotters, or, at least, the promoters and abettors of the most causeless and most horrid rebellion that ever had been in the world.

When I saw I could be no further useful to him (he having embraced me and taken his last leave of me at the foot of the Scaffold) I presently got myself out of the place, and out of the horror of that sight, which nothing but the consideration of doing him some service could have hired me to see.

How he behaved himself afterwards upon the Scaffold, both before, and at his Death, his best friends need desire no better testimony than that which was there given him by his enemies, who could not choose but admire and applaud that virtue of his which their barbarous cruelty would not suffer the world to enjoy any longer.

Thus died that truly noble, truly valiant, truly Christian, and every way most worthy, and right honourable the lord Capel; a great example of virtue, piety and loyalty, in the midst of a most villainous, profane and rebellious generation. A man, whom the world never valued to his worth, until it grew to be unworthy of him.

(Ita testor) GEOR. MORLEY.

Though I writ this Narrative whilst things were fresh in my memory, yet I omitted one thing worthy the taking notice of by posterity, viz. that a little before he went to the Scaffold, he told me that, if I thought there were nothing of vanity or of vain ostentation in it, he would give order that his heart should be taken out of his body, and kept in a silver box, until his majesty that now is, came home, (as he doubted not but he would) and then that it might be presented unto him, with his humble desire, that where the King his father was interred,* it might be buried at his feet, in testimony of the zeal he had for his service, and the affection he had for his person whilst he lived; which intention of his, being approved of by me, was afterwards put in execution, as far at least as it could be by him or those whom he intrusted with it. For, as soon as the king came home, (whom I had told of it whilst he was abroad) I brought sir Thomas Corbet to him, and saw him give the silver box, with that generous and loyal heart in it, to the king's own hands; what is since become of it I know not.

The following is Lord Clarendon's Account of these Transactions:

"Before they could model and finish all this," [the measures for consolidating and conducting their new government,] "and whilst it was preparing, they had, in several parts of the kingdom, terrified the people with Blood-Spectacles, in the executing many of the persons who had been taken. And that all hopes and preferences might be taken away from their subjects, the peers of England, that they should hereafter have any thing to do in declaring what the fundamental laws of the land were, a new High Court of Justice was appointed to air for the Trial of duke Hamilton, the earl of Holland, the earl of Norwich, the lord Capel, and another gentleman, one sir John Owen, (who, having been heretofore a colonel in the king's army, had, in a late insurrection in Wales, killed the High Sheriff) that they might see there should hereafter be no more distinction of quality in Trials for life, but that the greatest lord and the commoners should undergo the same judicatory and form of trial. Nor could it be thought unreasonable, that all the creations of the crown should be determined by that jurisdiction to which the crown itself had been subjected.

"Duke Hamilton could not well be thought other than a Prisoner of War, and so not liable to a Trial for his Life. He had attempted to make an Escape; in which he had so well succeeded, that he was out of his enemies hands full three days; but, being impatient to be at a greater distance from them, he was apprehended as he was taking horse in Southwark; and carried Prisoner into the Tower; from whence he was brought, with the others, before that High Court of Justice. He insisted upon "The Right and Privilege of the kingdom of Scotland; that it had not the least dependence upon the kingdom of England, but was entirely governed by its own laws: that he, being a subject of that kingdom, was bound to obey the commands thereof; and the parliament of that kingdom having thought it necessary to raise an army for the relief of their king, and constituted him general of that army, it was not lawful for him to refuse the command thereof; and whatever misfortune he had undergone with it, he could not be understood to be liable to any punishment but what a prisoner of war was bound to undergo." He was told, "That the Rights and Laws of the kingdom of Scotland were not called in question, nor could be violated by their proceedings against him, who was a subject of England; against which he was charged with Rebellion and Treason: that they did not proceed against him as duke Hamilton of Scotland, but as earl of Cambridge in England, and they would judge him as such." The earl of Holland was not at that time in a good disposition of health, and so answered little, as a man that would rather receive his life by their favour, than from the strength of his defence. The earl of Norwich behaved himself with great submission to the Court, and with all those Addresses as were most like to reconcile his Judges to him, and to prevail over their affections: spoke of "his being bred up in the court from his cradle, in the time of queen Elizabeth; of his having been a servant to king James all his reign; of his dependence upon prince Harry; afterwards, upon the late king; of the obligations he had to the crown, and of his endeavours to serve it;" and concluded as a man that would be beholden to them if they would give him leave to live.

"The lord Capel appeared undaunted, and utterly refused to submit to their jurisdiction;

"that in the condition and capacity of a soldier and a Prisoner of War, he said, the lawyers and gowmsmen had nothing to do with him, and therefore he would not answer to any thing which they had said against him," (Steel having treated him with great rudeness and insolence) but insisted upon "the law of nations, which exempted all prisoners, though submitting to mercy, from death, if it was not inflicted within so many days; which were long since expired." He urged "the Declaration which Fairfax the General had made to him and the rest of the prisoners, after the death of sir Charles Lucas and sir George Lisle, that no other of their lives should be in danger, which he had witnesses ready to prove, if they might be admitted;" and concluded, "that, if he had committed any offence worthy of death, he might be tried by his peers; which was his right by the laws of the land; the benefit whereof he required." Ireton, who was present, and sat as one of his Judges, denied "That the General had made any such promise, and if he had, that the Parliament's authority could not be restrained thereby; and put him in mind of his carriage at that time, and how much he neglected then the General's civility." The other insisted still on the promise; and urged "That the General might be sent for, and examined;" which they knew not how to deny, but, in regard of his indisposition of health, they said "they would send to him, whilst they proceeded against sir John Owen, who was the other prisoner."

"He answered them without any application, "That he was a plain gentleman of Wales, who had been always taught to obey the king; that he had served him honestly during the war, and finding afterwards that many honest men endeavoured to raise forces, whereby they might get him out of prison, he did the like; and the High Sheriff endeavoured to oppose him, and so chanced to be killed; which he might have avoided if he had stayed at home;" and concluded like a man that did not much care what they resolved concerning him.

"Whether the question was well stated to Fairfax, or what was else said to him to dissuade him from owning his Declaration and promise, he boggled so much in his Answer, that they would be of opinion, "That he had not made such direct and positive promise; and that the same was never transmitted to the Parliament; which it ought to have been; and that, at most, it could but exempt those prisoners from being tried before a court or council of war, and could not be understood as an obligation upon the Parliament, not to give direction to such a legal proceeding against them, as they should find necessary for the peace and safety of the kingdom." The President Bradshaw told the lord Capel, with many insolent expressions, "That he was tried before such Judges as the Parliament thought fit to assign him; and who had judged a better man than himself." So the Sentence of Death was pronounced against all five of them, That they should lose their heads; upon which sir John Owen made a low reverence, and gave them humble thanks, and being asked by a stander by, "what he meant?" he said aloud, "It was a very great honour to a poor gentleman of Wales to lose his head with such noble lords*:" and swore a great oath, That he was afraid they would have hanged him.

"The Prisoners were all carried to St. James's; where they were to remain till their execution two days after; which time their friends and relations had, to endeavour to preserve their lives by the power and authority of the Parliament; where there were so many sitting who had not sat in judgment upon them, and who were of several affections, and liable to several temptations, that there might be a reasonable hope to rescue them from the cruel and unjust judgment. Their wives and children, and friends, left no way untried to prevail; offered and gave money to some who were willing to receive it, and made promises accordingly. But they who had the greatest credit, and most power to terrify others who should displease them, were inexorable; yet dealt so much more honestly than the rest, that they declared to the ladies, who solicited for their husbands and their fathers, "That they would not endeavour to do them service." Ireton, above all men, continued his insolent and dogged humour, and told them, "If he had credit, they should all die." Others, who gave better words, had no better meaning than he.

"All their Petitions were read in order, being penned in such stiles, as the friends who solicited for them were advised. Duke Hamilton's Petition being read, many, upon the motives of justice, and as they imagined his death might be the occasion of new troubles between the two nations, since Scotland could not but resent it, would have been willing he should live. But he had fewer friends to his person than any of the rest; and Cromwell knew well that his being out of the way would not be unacceptable to them upon whom the peace of that kingdom depended: so that when his Petition was read, it was rejected by very much the major part of voices. The consideration of the earl of Holland took up a long debate: the interest and interposition of the earl of Warwick, his brother, was applied; and every presbyterian, to a man, was solicitous to preserve him. They urged "His merit towards the Parliament in the beginning of the troubles; how much he had suffered in the court for his affection to them: his age and infirmities, which would not suffer him long to enjoy that life they should give him: and the consideration of his wife and children, which were numerous." But these arguments stirred up others to inveigh against his backslidings with the more bitterness, and to undervalue the services he had ever done; to tax his vanities and his breach of faith. When the question was put concerning him, they who were for the negative, exceeded the number of the other by three or four votes; Cromwell having more than an ordinary animosity against him, for his behaviour in the beginning of the summer, and for some words of neglect and contempt he had let fall concerning himself. The earl of Norwich came next upon the stage; who having always lived a cheerful and jovial life, without contracting many enemies, had many there who wished him well, and few who had animosity against him; so that when the question was put concerning him, the house was equally divided, the votes which rejected his Petition, and those which would preserve his life, were equal: so that his life or death depended upon the single vote of the Speaker; who told the house, 'That he had received many obligations from that lord; and that once when he had been like to have incurred the king's displeasure, by some misinformation, which would have been very penal to him, the lord Goring (under which stile he was treated, the additional of Norwich not being allowed by them upon their old rule,) had by his credit preserved him, and removed the prejudice that was against him; and therefore he was obliged in gratitude to give his vote for the saving him.' By this good fortune he came to be preserved; whether the ground of it were true or no, or whether the Speaker made it only as an excuse for saving any man's life who was put to ask it in that place.

"The lord Capel, shortly after he was brought prisoner to the Tower from Windsor Castle, had by a wonderful adventure, having a cord and all things necessary conveyed to him, let himself down out of the window of his chamber in the night, over the wall of the Tower; and had been directed through what part of the ditch he might be best able to wade. Whether he found the right place, or whether there was no safer place, he found the water and the mud so deep, that, if he had not been by the head taller than other men, he must have perished, since the water came up to his chin. The way was so long to the other side, and the fatigue of drawing himself out of so much mud so intolerable, that his spirits were near spent, and he was once ready to call out for help, as thinking it better to be carried back again to the prison, than to be found in such a place, from whence he could not extricate himself, and where he was ready to expire. But it pleased God, that he got at last to the other side; where his friends expected him, and carried him to a chamber in the Temple, where he remained two or three nights secure from any discovery, notwithstanding the diligence that could not but be used to recover a man they designed to use no better. After two or three days a friend whom he trusted much, and who deserved to be trusted, conceiving that he might be more secure in a place to which there was less resort, and where there were so many harboured who were every day sought after, had provided a lodging for him in a private house in Lambeth Marsh; and calling upon him in an evening, when it was dark, to go thither, they chose rather to take any boat they found ready at the Temple stairs, than to trust one of that people with the secret; and it was so late that there was one only boat left there. In that the lord Capel, as well disguised as he thought necessary, and his friend, put themselves, and bid the water-man row them to Lambeth. Whether, in their passage thither the other gentleman called him my lord, as was confidently reported, or whether the water-man had any jealousy by observing what he thought was a disguise, when they were landed, the wicked water-man, undiscerned, followed them, till he saw into what house they went; and then went to an officer, and demanded, 'what he would give him to bring him to the place where the lord Capel lay?' And the officer promising to give him ten pounds, he led him presently to the house, where that excellent person was seized upon, and the next day carried to the Tower.

"When the Petition that his wife had delivered, was read, many gentlemen spoke on his behalf; and mentioned the great virtues which were in him; and 'that he had never deceived them, or pretended to be of their party; but always resolutely declared himself for the king;' and Cromwell, who had known him very well, spoke so much good of him, and professed to have so much kindness and respect for him, that all men thought he was now safe, when he concluded, 'that his affection to the public so much weighed down his private friendship, that he could not but tell them, that the question was now, whether they would preserve the most bitter and most implacable enemy they had: that he knew the lord Capel very well, and knew that he would be the last man in England that would forsake the royal interest; that he had great courage, industry, and generosity; that he had many friends who would always adhere to him; and that as long as he lived, what condition soever he was in, he would be a thorn in their sides; and therefore for the good of the commonwealth, he should give his vote against the petition.' Ireton's hatred was immortal: he spoke of him, and against him, as of a man of whom he was heartily afraid. Very many were swayed by the argument that had been urged against duke Hamilton, 'that God was not pleased that he should escape, because he had put him into their hands again, when he was at liberty.' And so, after a long debate, though there was not a man who had not a value for him, and very few who had a particular malice, or prejudice towards him, the question being put, the negative was more by three or four voices; S-that, of the four lords, three were without the mercy of that unmerciful people. There being no other petition presented, Ireton told them, 'there had been great endeavours and solicitations used to save all those lords; but that there was a commoner, another condemned person, for whom no one man had spoke a word, nor had he himself so much as petitioned them; and therefore he desired, that sir John Owen might be preserved by the mere motive, and goodness of the house itself;' which found little opposition, whether they were satiated with blood, or that they were willing, by this instance, that the nobility should see that a commoner should be preferred before them.

"A scaffold was erected before Westminster-Hall, and all the prisoners condemned were brought from St. James's, as well the two who were reprieved, as the three who were to suffer, upon the ninth of March, that was at the end of the year 1648, a little more than a month after the murder of the king, to sir Thomas Cotton's house, at the upper end of Westminster Hall; where they were suffered to repose themselves about the space of an hour, and then were led successively through the Hall to the scaffold, duke Hamilton being first; who seemed yet to have some hope of a reprieve, and made some stay in the Hall, till the earl of Denbigh came to him, and, after a short whisper, in which he found there was no hope, he ascended the scaffold. He complained much of 'the injustice that was done him; and that he was put to death for obeying the laws of his country; which if he had not done, he must have been put to death there.' He acknowledged the obligations he had to the king, and seemed not sorry for the gratitude he had expressed, how dear soever it cost him. His natural darkness, and reservation in his discourse, made him to be thought a wise man, and his having been in command under the king of Sweden, and his continued discourses of battles, and fortifications, made him be thought a great soldier. And both these mistakes were the cause that made him be looked upon as a worse and a more dangerous man, than in truth he deserved to be.

"The earl of Holland was brought next, who, by his long sickness, was so spent, that his spirits served not to entertain the people with long discourse. He spoke of 'his religion, as a matter unquestionable, by the education he had had in the religious family of which he was a branch;' which was thought a strange discourse for a dying man, who, though a son, knew enough of the iniquity of his father's house, which should rather have been buried in silence, than, by such an unseasonable testimony, have been revived in the memory and discourse of men. He took more care to be thought a good friend to parliaments, than a good servant to his master, and was thought to say too little of his having failed so much in his duty to him, which most good men believed to be the source from whence his present calamity sprung. He was a very well bred man, and a fine gentleman in good times; but too much desired to enjoy ease and plenty when the king could have neither; and did think poverty the most insupportable evil that could befall any man in this world. He was then so weak that he could not have lived long; and when his head was cut off, very little blood followed.

"The lord Capel was then called; who walked through Westminster-hall, saluting such of his friends and acquaintance as he saw there, with a very serene countenance, accompanied with his friend Dr. Morley; who had been with him from the time of his sentence; but, at the foot of the scaffold, the soldiers stopping the Doctor, his lordship took his leave of him; and, embracing him, thanked him; and said, he should go no farther, having some apprehensions that he might receive some affront by that rude people after his death; the chaplains who attended the two other lords, being men of the time, and the Doctor being well known to be most contrary.

"As soon as his lordship had ascended the scaffold, he looked very vigorously about, and asked, 'whether the other lords had spoken to the people with their hats on?' and being told, that 'they were bare;' he gave his hat to his servant, and then with a clear and a strong voice, he said, 'that he was brought thither to die for doing that which he could not repent of: that he had been born and bred under the government of a king, whom he was bound by conscience to obey; under laws, to which he had been always obedient; and in the bosom of a church, which he thought the best in the world: that he had never violated his faith to either of those, and was now condemned to die against all the laws of the land; to which sentence he did submit.'

"He enlarged himself in commending 'the great virtue and piety of the king, whom they had put to death; who was so just and so merciful a prince; and prayed to God, to forgive the nation that innocent blood.' Then he recommended to them the present king; who, he told them, 'was their true and their lawful sovereign; and was worthy to be so: that he had the honour to have been some years near his person, and therefore he could not but know him well;' and assured them, 'that he was a prince of great understanding, of an excellent nature, of great courage, an entire lover of justice, and of exemplary piety: that he was not to be shaken in his religion; and had all those princely virtues, which could make a nation happy;' and therefore advised them 'to submit to his government, as the only means to preserve themselves, their posterity, and the Protestant religion.' And having with great vehemence recommended it to them, after some prayers very devoutly pronounced upon his knees, he submitted himself, with an unparalleled Christian courage, to the fatal stroke, which deprived the nation of the noblest champion it had.

"He was a man in whom the malice of his enemies could discover very few faults, and whom his friends could not wish better accomplished; whom Cromwell's own character well described; and who indeed would never have been contented to have lived under that government. His memory all men loved and revered, though few followed his example. He had always lived in a state of great plenty and general estimation, having a very noble fortune of his own by descent, and a fair addition to it by his marriage with an excellent wife, a lady of very worthy extraction, of great virtue and beauty, by whom he had a numerous issue of both sexes, in which he took great joy and comfort: so that no man was more happy in all his domestic affairs; and he was so much the more happy, in that he thought himself most blessed in them.

"And yet the king's honour was no sooner violated, and his just power invaded, than he threw all those blessings behind him; and having no other obligations to the crown, than those which his own honour and conscience suggested to him, he frankly engaged his person and his fortune from the beginning of the troubles, as many others did, in all actions and enterprizes of the greatest hazard and danger; and continued to the end, without ever making one false step, as few others did, though he had once, by the iniquity of a fiction, that then prevailed, an indignity put upon him that might have excused him for some remission of his former warmth. But it made no other impression upon him, than to be quiet and contented, whilst they would let him alone, and, with the same cheerfulness, to obey the first summons when he was called out; which was quickly after. In a word, he was a man, that whoever shall, after him, deserve best of the English nation, he can never think himself undervalued, when he shall hear, that his courage, virtue, and fidelity, is laid in the balance with, and compared to that of the lord Capel."

COLONEL Morris being demanded to hold up his hand, refused, and the Indictment was read against him for Treason, for levying War against the late King and the Parliament, upon

* Mr. John Puleston should probably be Mr. Justice Puleston. He was called Serjeant, October 12th, 1648. Whitelocke, shortly after the execution of the king, on the 8th of Feb. 1649, tells us, "Instructions passed for Commissioners to the Judges; of whom six agreed to hold, viz. Rolles, Jermyn, St. John, Phensant, Wilde, and Yates, provided 'that by act of the commons the fundamental laws be not abolished.' The other six Judges, viz. Bacon, Brown, Bedingfield, Creswell, Trevor, and Atkins, were not satisfied to hold. Order for altering the Judges' Oaths, formerly 'in the name of the King,' now to be 'in the People.'"

"The next day, being the first day of the term, the six Judges, who were inclined to hold their places, were as yet much unsatisfied, because the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy were still continued, and because the house had not declared that the fundamental laws should be continued, and the judges to administer justitia accordingly. They debated these matters together, and in conclusion came to this result, 'That if the House would pass such a Declaration, repeal the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, and alter the Oath of a Judge, that then they would presently sit in their places.' It was told them, it would be hard to procure all this to be done in the House, so soon as that they might sit in the several Courts this morning, and if they should not sit, this first day of the term, it would be some interruption to the course of justice, and reflect upon the parliament. They were entreated to draw the Declaration themselves, as they desired the House should pass it; which they did presently, and the Commissioners of the Seal went into the house, and acquainted them with the consequence of the business, which they tendered to them, to be forthwith passed, to enable the six Judges to sit in Court this morning. The House were so sensible of the reasonableness, and fitness to give a speedy dispatch to this business, that they laid aside all other, and soon Voted, "That the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy should be null and void," made a satisfactory alteration of the Oath of a Judge, and passed the Declaration drawn by the Judges. They were satisfied herewith; and the Commissioners presently sealed their Patents, and gave them the new Oath of Judges; then they went and sate in their several Courts, and the Commissioners of the Seal sate in Chancery. They caused the Declaration to be read, and spake to the auditory concerning the business, to give them satisfaction, and to settle their minds; this they took occasion to do in their speeches to the Judges, and therein, it is believed, they did some service for the Parliament.

"Three days afterwards there were Orders appointing the several Judges to go the Circuits this Lent, and for completing the number of Judges in the several Courts, and voted, That the King's Bench Court should be called the Upper Bench.—An Act passed for some amendments in their Commissions, and for a new Oath to be given them, 'well and truly to serve the Commonwealth in the office of a Justice of the Upper Bench, &c. according to the best of their skill and knowledge.'

"June 1. Upon a Report from the Commissioners of the Great Seal, of the Names of fit persons to be Judges, and Barons of the Exchequer, the House voted, 'That Serjeant Nicholas and Mr. Ask be Judges of the Upper Bench. That Serjeant Puleston and Peter Warburton, esq. be Judges of the Common Pleas. That Serjeant Thorp and C. Rigby be barons of the exchequer. And that the Commissioners of the Seal do grant them patents accordingly.'

Whitelocke has left us the Speech which he made on the swearing in of Puleston and Warburton, on the 12th of June. Clement Walker, speaking of the transactions relative to the Judges, says, "Instructions were given by the Commons for drawing new Commissions for the Judges, according to the new Antimonarchical stile and way, the new Great Seal being new ready, a Committee of the House met the Judges about it: whereof six agreed to hold upon a provision to be made by Act of the House of Commons, 'That the Fundamental Laws be not abolished.' This very provision, so made by Act of the Commons, (beside all their former Votes against Monarchy, Peerage, altering in the stile of Writs, Coinage of Money, &c.) is itself an abolition of the Fundamental Laws. This is but a Fig-leaf to cover their shame. Those that held were, Of the King's Bench, Mr. Justice Rolls, &c. &c. Those who quitted their places, and kept their consciences, were, Justice Bacon, &c. &c."

It appears from Whitelocke, under date March 10th, 1649, that the salary of a Judge was 1,000*l.* per ann.

† Clement Walker, in his 'History of Indecency,' relates this Proceeding thus:

"August 16th, 1649. Colonel Morrice (who kept Pontefract Castle for the King) was indicted before Judge Thorpe and Pulestone, at York assizes, upon the statute 25 Edw. 3, for levying War against the late King and Parliament. The colonel challenged one Brook (foreman of the jury) for being his professed enemy; but the Court (knowing Brook to be the principal verb, the key of their work) answered Morrice, he spake too late; Brook was sworn already. Brook being asked the question, Whether he were sworn or no? re-

Morrice. My lords, I still conceive I ought not to be tried here; if I have done any thing worthy of death, I appeal to a martial Court, to my lord Fairfax, major-general, or a general Council of War: you have not any precedent for it, either for you to try me in this way, or me to suffer by it.

plied, he had not yet kissed the book. The Court answered, It was no matter; that was but a ceremony, alledging, he was recorded 'Sworn'; there was no speaking against a record. Sure they made great haste to record him 'Sworn,' before he could kiss the book. So Brook was kept in upon this cavil, by whose obstinacy Morrice was condemned. I cannot wonder that legal forms and ceremonies are laid by (although Justice cannot submit without those legalities to ascertain her proceedings, which otherwise would be left at large to the discretion of the Judge) when I see our known laws, Magna Charta, the Petition of Right, 3 Car. and the rest, with the fundamental government of this nation, pulled up by the roots, to carry on their designs of enslaving the people to their lusts, notwithstanding the Parliament's declarations, remonstrances, protestations, covenants, and oaths, to the contrary, and their late vote in the Act for Abolishing Kingly Government. That in all things concerning the lives, liberties, properties, and estates of the people, they would observe the known laws of the land. But to return to our relation: Then Morrice challenged sixteen more of the Jury, where Puleston was so pettish, that he bade Morrice keep his compass, or else he would give him such a blow as should strike off his head; until Morrice cited the statute 14 Hen. 7, folio 19, whereby he might challenge thirty-five men without shewing cause. Here you see the Judges (who ought to be of counsel with the prisoner in matter of law) endeavouring to outface and blind the prisoner with ignorance of the law, being a martial man. Then he desired a copy of his Indictment, that he might know what to answer, saying, he might plead special as well as general; which the Court denied him. Next, because there was a point of law in it, he desired to have Counsel, citing the statute 1 Hen. 7, folio 23; which was likewise denied him. Yet I am deceived, if Rolfe had not Counsel allowed him, being indicted at Winchester, for an endeavour to murder King Charles 1, and had many other favours, denied to Morrice. Then col. Morrice, for his discharge, produced the Prince's commission, as Generalissimo to the King his father. The Judges answered, The Prince was but a subject as Morrice was, and, if he were present, must be tried, as he was, and rejected the commission without reading. Morrice told them, the Prince had his authority from the King, in whose name all Judges and Officers did then act. The Court answered, The power was not in the King, but the Kingdom. Observe, they indicted him for Levying War against the King and Parliament. The word 'Parliament' was a surplussage, for which no indictment could lie. No Allegiance, no Treason; and we owe allegiance to the King alone. Whosoever levieth war in England (in the intendment of the law) is said to levy war against the King only, although he aim not at his person, but at some other person; and if he that levieth war against the King, his crown, and dignity, be a traitor, how much more must they be traitors that have actually murdered the King, and disinherited and proscribed his lawful and undoubted Heir, and, as much as in them lies, have subverted the monarchical government of the land, and consequently all monarchical laws, whereof the Statute of Treasons for Levying War against the King's Majesty is one; and therefore Morrice, under a free state, ought not to be condemned or tried upon any monarchical law. So Morrice was found guilty by a Jury for that purpose, and an illegal precedent begun, to cut off whom the Faction pleaseth, under a pretence and form of law, without help of a council of war, or a private slaughter-house, or a midnight coach, guarded with soldiers to Tyburn. These usurpers have got the old tyrannical trick, 'To rule the people by the laws, but first to over-rule the laws by their lawyers;' and therefore, 'Ut rei innocentis perant, sunt nocentes iudices;' that true men may go to the gallows, thieves must sit on the bench. But, 'Silent leges inter arma;' and now, 'Silet iustitia inter leges, silet ius inter iudices.' The mungrel, hypocritical, three-headed conquest we live under hath despoiled Justice of her balance, and left her in a military posture, with a sword to strike, but no scales to weigh withal. Our licensed news-books, like ill-boding birds, fore-told and fore-judged Morrice's death a month before 'He died resolutely.' Observe the thing aimed at in this new form of Indictment of High Treason, for Levying War against the King and Parliament, is, first, That the word 'King' may hold in the Indictment, which otherwise would be found to have error in it; and though the words 'for Levying War against the Parliament,' be a vain surplussage, signifying nothing, yet at last (by help of their own Judges and new-made Presidents) to levy War against the Parliament shall stand alone, be the only significator, and take up the whole room in the Indictment, and thrust the word 'King' out of doors, and then Treason shall be as frequent as Malignancy is now. Morrice had moved, 'he might be tried, like a Soldier, by a Council of War,' alledging the inconveniency of such a precedent, if the King's party should retaliate it, which would not be granted; yet Colonel Bethel wrote to the General, and his Council of War, desiring he might be reprimed;

but Colonel Pride opposed it, urging, 'That it would not stand with the justice of the Army,' (you see now who is the fountain of Justice) 'nor the safety of the Commonwealth, to let such enemies live, the Parliament having adjudged him worthy of death,' (without hearing) 'and given instructions to the Judges accordingly.' (O serviceable Judges!) So the General was overborne by this Drayman. This fellow sitteth frequently at the sessions-house in the Old Bailey, where the weight of his slings turneth the scale of Justice which way he pleaseth."

Lord Clarendon gives the following history of the Transactions at Pontefract, in which col. Morris or Morrice had so great a share:

"When the parliament had finished the war, they reduced and slighted most of the inland garrisons, the maintenance whereof was very chargeable; yet by the interest of some person who commanded it, or out of the consideration of the strength and importance of the place, they kept still a garrison in Pontfret Castle, a noble royalty and palace belonging to the crown, and then part of the queen's jointure. The situation in itself was very strong; no part whereof was commanded by any other ground: the house very large, with all offices suitable to a princely seat, and though built very near the top of a hill, so that it had the prospect of a great part of the West Riding of Yorkshire, and of Lincolnshire, and of Nottinghamshire, yet it was plentifully supplied with water. Colonel Cotterell, the governor of this castle, exercised a very severe jurisdiction over his neighbours of those parts; which were inhabited by many gentlemen, and soldiers who had served the king throughout the war, and who were known to retain their old affections, though they lived quietly under the present government. Upon the least jealousy or humour, these men were frequently sent for, reproached, and sometimes imprisoned by the governor in this garrison; which did not render them the more devoted to him. When there appeared some hopes that the Scots would raise an army for the relief and release of the king, sir Mar-maduke Langdale, in his way for Scotland, had visited and conferred with some of his old friends and country-men, who now lived quietly within some distance of Pontfret, who informed him of that garrison, the place whereof was well known to him. And he acquainting them with the assurance he had of the resolution of the principal persons of the kingdom of Scotland, and that they had invited him to join with them, in order to which he was then going thither, they agreed, 'that, when it should appear that an army was raised in Scotland upon that account, which must draw down the parliament's army into the other Northern counties, and that there should be risings in other parts of the kingdom' (which the general indisposition and discontent, besides some particular designs, made like to fall out) 'that then those gentlemen should endeavour the surprise of that castle, and after they had made themselves strong in it, and furnished it with provisions to endure some restraint, they should draw as good a body to them as those countries would yield:' and having thus adjusted that design, they settled such a way of correspondence with sir Marmaduke, that they frequently gave him an account, and received his directions for their proceeding. In this disposition they continued quiet, as they had always been; and the governor of the castle lived towards them with less jealousy, and more humanity, than he had been accustomed to.

"There was one colonel Morrice, who, being a very young man, had, in the beginning of the war, been an officer in some regiments of the king's; and out of the folly and impatience of his youth, had quitted that service, and engaged himself in the parliament army with some circumstances not very commendable; and by the clearness of his courage, and pleasantness of his humour, made himself not only very acceptable, but was preferred to the command of a colouel, and performed many notable services for them, being a stout and bold undertaker in attempts of the greatest danger; wherein he had usually success. After the new modelling of the army, and the introducing of a stricter discipline, his life of great licence kept not his reputation with the new officers: and being a free speaker and censurer of their affected behaviour, they left him out in their compounding their new army, but with many professions of kindness, and respect to his eminent courage, which they would find some occasion to employ, and reward. He was a gentleman of a competent estate in those parts in Yorkshire; and as he had grown elder, he had heartily detested himself for having quitted the king's service, and had resolved to take some seasonable opportunity to wipe off that blemish by a service that would redeem him: and so was not troubled to be set aside by the new general, but betook himself to his estate: enjoyed his old humour, which was chearful and pleasant; and made himself most acceptable to those who were most trusted by the parliament; who thought that they had dismissed one of the best officers they had, and were sorry for it.

"He now, as a country gentleman, frequented the fairs and markets, and conversed with equal freedom with all his neighbours, of what party soever they had been, and renewed the friendship he had formerly held with some of those gentlemen who had served the king. But no friendship was so dear to him, as that of the governor of Pontfret castle, who loved him above all men, and delighted so much in his company, that he got him to be with him some times a week and more at a time in the castle, when they always lay together in one bed. He declared to one of those gentlemen, who were united together to make that attempt, 'that he would surprise that castle, whenever they should think the season ripe for it:' and that gentleman, who knew him very well, believed him so entirely, that he told his companions, 'that they should not trouble themselves with contriving the means to surprise the place; which, by trusting too many, would be liable to discovery; but that he would take that charge upon himself, by a way they need not enquire into; which he assured them should not fail: and they all very willingly acquiesced in his undertaking; to which they knew well he was not inclined without good grounds. Morrice was more frequently with the governor, who never thought himself well without him; and always told him 'he must have a great care of his garrison, that he had none but faithful men in the castle; for that he was confident there were some men who lived not far off, and who many times came to visit him, had some design upon the place:' and would then in confidence name many persons to him, some whereof were those very men with whom he communicated, and others were men of another temper, and were most devoted to the parliament, all his particular friends and companions; 'but that he should not be troubled; for he had a false brother amongst them, from whom he was sure to have seasonable advertisement;' and promised him, 'that he would, within few hours notice, bring him at any time 40 or 50 good men into the castle to reinforce his garrison, when there should be occasion;' and he would shew him the list of such men, as would be always ready, and would sometimes bring some of those men with him, and tell the governor before them, 'that those were in the list he had given him of the honest fellows, who would stick to him when there should be need;' and others would accidentally tell the governor, 'that they had listed themselves with colonel Morrice to come to the castle, when ever he should call or send to them.' And all these men thus listed, were fellows very notorious for the bitterness and malice which they had always intended to make use of.

“He made himself very familiar with all the soldiers in the castle, and used to play and drink with them; and when he lay there, would often rise in the night, and visit the guards; and by that means would sometimes make the governor dismiss, and discharge a soldier whom he did not like, under pretence ‘that he found him always asleep,’ or some other fault which was not to be examined; and then he would commend some other to him as very fit to be trusted and relied upon; and by this means he had very much power in the garrison. The governor received several letters from his friends in the parliament, and in the country, ‘that he should take care of col. ‘Morrice, who resolved to betray him;’ and informed him, ‘that he had been in such ‘and such company of men, who were generally esteemed most malignant, and had great ‘intrigues with them;’ all which was well known to the governor; for the other was never in any of that company, though with all the shew of secrecy, in the night, or in places remote from any house, but he always told the governor of it, and of many particular passages in those meetings; so that when these letters came to him, he shewed them still to the other; and then both of them laughed at the intelligence; after which Morrice frequently called for his horse, and went home to his house, telling his friend ‘that though he had, ‘he knew, no mistrust of his friendship, and ‘knew him too well to think him capable of ‘such baseness, yet he ought not for his own ‘sake be thought to slight the information; ‘which would make his friends the less careful ‘of him: that they had reason to give him ‘warning of those meetings, which, if he had ‘not known himself, had been very worthy of ‘his suspicion; therefore he would forbear ‘coming to the castle again, till this jealousy ‘of his friends should be over; who would ‘know of this, and be satisfied with it:’ and no power of the governor could prevail with him, at such times, to stay; but he would be gone, and stay away till he was, after some time, sent for again with great importunity, the governor desiring his counsel and assistance as much as his company.

“It fell out, as it usually doth in affairs of that nature, when many men are engaged, that there is an impatience to execute what is projected before the time be thoroughly ripe. The business of the fleet, and in Kent, and other places, and the daily alarms from Scotland, as if that army had been entering the kingdom, made the gentlemen who were engaged for this enterprise, imagine that they deferred it too long, and that though they had received no orders from sir Marmaduke Langdale, which they were to expect, yet they had been sent, and miscarried. Hereupon they called upon the gentleman who had undertaken, and he upon Morrice, for the execution of the design. The time agreed upon was such a night, when the surprisers were to be ready upon such a part of the wall, and to have ladders to mount in two places, where two soldiers were to be appointed for sentinels who were privy to the attempt. Morrice was in the castle, and in bed with the governor, and, according to his custom, rose about the hour he thought all would be ready. They without, made the sign agreed upon, and were answered by one of the centinels from the wall; upon which they run to both places where they were to mount their ladders. By some accident, the other sentinel who was designed, was not upon the other part of the wall; but when the ladder was mounted there, the sentinel called out; and finding that there were men under the wall, run towards the court of guard to call for help; which gave an alarm to the garrison: so that, for that time, the design was disappointed. But, shortly after, Morrice, and some of the same gentlemen, surprized the castle, under the disguise of country-men coming in with carts of provision; and presently seized on and mastered the main guard, and made way for their friends, horse and foot, to enter. Then two or three of them went to the governor's chamber, whom they found in his bed, and told him ‘the Castle was surprized, ‘and himself a prisoner.’ He betook himself to his arms for his defence, but quickly found that his friend had betrayed it, and the other gentlemen appearing, of whom he had been before warned, his defence was to no purpose, yet he received some wounds. Morrice afterwards comforted him with assurance ‘of good ‘usage, and that he would procure his pardon ‘from the king for his rebellion.’

“They put the garrison in good order, and so many came to them from Yorkshire, Nottingham, and Lincoln, that they could not in a short time be restrained, and had leisure to fetch in all sorts of provisions for their support, and to make and renew such fortifications as might be necessary for their defence. From Nottingham there came sir John Digby, sir Hugh Cartwright, and a son and nephew of his, who had been good officers in the army, with many soldiers who had been under their command; many other gentlemen of the three counties were present, and deserve to have their names recorded, since it was an action throughout of great courage and conduct.

"Cromwell's marching towards the Scots with the neglect of these men after their first appearance, and only appointing some county troops to inclose them from increasing their strength, gave them great opportunity to grow; so that driving those troops to a greater distance, they drew contribution from all the parts about them, and made incursions much farther, and rendered themselves so terrible, that, as was said before, after the Scottish defeat, those of Yorkshire sent very earnestly to Cromwell, 'that he would make it the business of his army to reduce Pontfret.' But he, resolving upon his Scottish expedition, thought it enough to send Rainsborough to perform that service, with a regiment of horse, and one or two of foot, belonging to the army; which, with a conjunction of the country forces under the same command, he doubted not would be sufficient to perform a greater work. As soon as the castle had been reduced, they who were possessed of it were very willing to be under the command of Morris; who declared he would not accept the charge, nor be governor of the place, knowing well what jealousies he might be liable to, at least upon any change of fortune, but under the direction of sir John Digby; who was colonel general of those parts, and was a man rather cordial in the service, than equal to the command; which made him refer all things still to the counsel, and conduct of those officers who were under him; by whose activity, as much was done as could be expected from such a knot of resolute persons.

"The total defeat of the Scottish army being now generally known, and that their friends in all other places were defeated, they in the castle well knew what they were presently to expect, and that they should be shortly shut up from making farther excursions. They heard that Rainsborough was upon his march towards them, and had already sent some troops to be quartered near them, himself yet keeping his head quarters at Doncaster, ten miles from the castle. They resolved, whilst they yet enjoyed this liberty, to make a noble attempt. They had been informed, that sir Marmaduke Langdale (whom they still called their general) after the overthrow of the Scottish army, had been taken prisoner, and remained in Nottingham castle under a most strict custody, as a man the parliament declared, 'they would make an example of their justice.' A party of about twenty horse, but picked and choice men, went out of the castle, in the beginning of the night, with a resolution to take Rainsborough prisoner, and thereby to ransom their general. They were all good guides, and understood the ways, private and public, very exactly; and went so far, that about the break of day or a little after, in the end of August, they put themselves into the common road that led from York; by which ways the guards expected no enemy; and so slightly asked them 'whence they came?' Who negligently answered; and asked again, 'where their general was?' saying, 'they had a letter for 'him from Cromwell.' They sent one to shew them where the general was; which they knew well enough; and that he lay at the best inn of the town. And when the gate of the inn was opened to them, three of them only entered into the inn, the other rode to the other end of the town to the bridge, over which they were to pass towards Pontfret; when they expected, and did find a guard of horse and foot, with whom they entertained themselves in discourse, saying 'that they stayed for their officer, who went only in to speak with the general;' and called for some drink. The guards making no question of their being friends, sent for drink, and talked negligently with them of news; and, it being broad day, some of the horse alighted, and the foot went to the court of guard, conceiving that morning's work to be over. They who went into the inn, where no body was awake but the fellow who opened the gate, asked in which chamber the general (for so all the soldiers called Rainsborough) lay, and the fellow shewing them from below the chamber door, two of them went up, and the other stayed below, and held the horses, and talked with the soldier who had walked with them from the guard. The two who went up, opened the chamber door, found Rainsborough in his bed, but awaked with the little noise they had made. They told him in short 'that he was their prisoner, and that it was in his power to choose whether he would be presently killed (for which work he saw they were very well prepared) 'or quietly, without making resistance, or delay, to put on his cloaths and be mounted upon a horse, that was ready below for him, and accompany them to Pontfret.' The present danger awakened him out of the amazement he was in, so that he told them he would wait upon them, and made the haste that was necessary to put on his cloaths. One of them took his sword, and so they led him down stairs. He that held the horses, had sent the soldier away to those who were gone before, to speak to them to get some drink, and any thing else, that could be made ready in the house, against they came. When Rainsborough came into the street, which he expected to find full of horse, and saw only one man, who held the other horses, and presently mounted that he might be bound behind him, he began to struggle, and to cry out. Whereupon, when they saw no hope of carrying him away, they immediately run him through with their swords; and, leaving him dead upon the ground, they got upon their horses, and rode towards their fellows, before any in the inn could be ready to follow them. When those at the bridge saw their companions coming, which was their sign, being well prepared, and knowing what they were to do, they turned upon the guard, and made them fly in distraction; so that the way was clear and free; and though they missed carrying home the prize for which they had made so lusty an adventure, they joined together, and marched, with the expedition that was necessary, a shorter way than they had come, to their garrison; leaving the town, and soldiers behind in such a consternation, that, not being able to receive any information from their general, whom they found dead upon the ground without any body in view, they thought the Devil had been there; and could not recollect themselves, which way they were to pursue an enemy they had not seen. The gallant party came safe home without the least damage to horse or man, hoping to make some other attempt more successfully, by which they might redeem sir Marmaduke Langdale. There was not an officer in the army whom Cromwell would not as willingly have lost as this man; who was bold and barbarous to his wish, and fit to be entrusted in the most desperate interest, and was the man whom that party always intended to commit the maritime affairs to, when it should be time to dismiss the earl of Warwick; he having been bred in that element, and knowing the duty of it very well, though he had that misfortune spoken of in the beginning of the summer.

“And now to finish this business of Pontefret altogether, which lasted near to the end of this year, when Lambert came to this charge (instructed by Cromwell to take full vengeance for the loss of Rainsborough, to whose ghost he designed an ample sacrifice) and kept what body of men he thought fit for that purpose, he reduced them in a short time within their own circuit, making good works round about the castle, that they might at last yield to hunger, if nothing else would reclaim them. Nor did they quietly suffer themselves to be cooped up without bold and frequent sallies, in which many of the besiegers, as well as the others, lost their lives. They discovered many of the country who held correspondence with, and gave intelligence to the castle, whom they apprehended, whereof there were two divines, and some women of note, friends and allies to the besieged. After frequent mortifications of Court. Sir, I tell you, you cannot have it.

Morris. Then, my lords, I conceive I am not any way guilty of the Indictment for Treason: my lords, it is said to be against the king, his crown, and against his peace; whereas, my this kind, and no human hope of relief, they were content to offer to treat for the delivery of the castle, if they might have honourable conditions; if not, they sent word ‘that they had provisions yet for a good time; that they durst die, and would sell their lives at ‘as dear a price as they could.’ Lambert answered, ‘that he knew they were gallant men, ‘and that he desired to preserve as many of ‘them, as was in his power to do, but he must ‘require six of them to be given up to him, ‘whose lives he could not save; which he ‘was sorry for, since they were brave men;’ but his hands were bound. The six excepted by him were colonel Morris, and five more whose names he found to have been amongst those who were in the party that had destroyed Rainsborough; which was an enterprise so brave enemy would have revenged in that manner: nor did Lambert desire it, but Cromwell had enjoined it him: all the rest he ‘was ‘content to release, that they might return to ‘their houses, and apply themselves to the ‘parliament for their compositions, towards ‘which he would do them all the good offices ‘he could.’ They from within acknowledged ‘his civility in that particular, and would be ‘glad to embrace it, but they would never be ‘guilty of so base a thing, as to deliver up any ‘of their companions;’ and therefore they desired ‘they might have six days allowed ‘them, that those six might do the best they ‘could to deliver themselves; in which it ‘should be lawful for the rest to assist them;’ to which Lambert generously consented, ‘so ‘that the rest would surrender at the end of ‘that time;’ which was agreed to. Upon the first day the garrison appeared twice or thrice, as if they were resolved to make a sally, but retired every time without charging; but the second day they made a very strong and brisk sally upon another place than where they had appeared the day before, and beat the enemy from their post, with the loss of men on both sides; and though the party of the castle was beaten back, two of the six (whereof Morris was one) made their escape, the other four being forced to retire with the rest. And all was quiet for two whole days; but in the beginning of the night of the fourth day, they made another attempt so prosperously, that two of the other four likewise escaped: and the next day they made great shows of joy, and sent Lambert word, ‘that their six friends ‘were gone’ (though there were two still remaining) ‘and therefore they would be ready ‘the next day to surrender.’

“The other two thought it to no purpose to make another attempt, but devised another way to secure themselves, with a less dangerous assistance from their friends, who had lost lords, I can make it appear, I have acted only for the king, and nothing against him, which may appear here by my Commission.

The Court looks upon it, and answers,

Court. Sir, you are deceived, this is false, it is from the Prince.

Morris. My lords, it is very well known, my lord Fairfax hath his Commission derived from the Parliament, and upon that he grants Commission to his Officers, which is all one and the same. The Prince hath his from his father, and I have mine from the Prince, which is full power, he being Captain General of his majesty's forces.

Court. Sir, have you nothing else to say?

Morris. My lords, under correction, I conceive it is sufficient; for by the same power, all Judges, Justices of Peace, your lordships, your predecessors, and all other officers, did act by the same power, and all process and writs of law were acted, and executed in his name, and by his authority.

Court. His power was not in him, but the kingdom, for he was in trust for the kingdom; the king's highway, and the king's coin being so called, is not his own, but his subjects; and his natural power, and legal power, are different.

Morris. My lords, under correction, I conceive his legal and personal power are indivisible, all one, and cannot be separated.

Court. Sir, all is one; if the king bid me kill a man, is this a sufficient warrant for me to plead? No, Sir, it is unlawful. Sir, have you no more?

some of their own lives in the two former sallies to save theirs. The buildings of the castle were very large and spacious, and there were great store of waste stones from some walls, which were fallen down. They found a convenient place, which was like to be least visited, where they walled up their two friends in such a manner that they had air to sustain them; and victual enough to feed them a month, in which time they hoped they might be able to escape. And this being done, at the hour appointed they opened their ports, and after Lambert had caused a strict inquisition to be made for those six, none of which he did believe had in truth escaped, and was satisfied that none of them were amongst those who were come out, he received the rest very civilly, and observed his promise made to them very punctually, and did not seem sorry that the six gallant men (as he called them) were escaped. And now they heard, which very much relieved their broken spirits, that sir Marmaduke Langdale had made an escape out of the castle of Nottingham; who shortly after transported himself beyond the seas. Sir John Digby lived many years after the king's return, and was often with his majesty. Poor Morrice was afterwards taken in Lancashire, and happened to be put to death in the same place where he had committed a fault against the king, and where he first performed a great service to the parliament."

Morris. I beseech your honours give me leave, I am upon my life.

Court. Speak what you will, Sir, you shall be heard.

Morris. Your servant, my lord; then my lords, I conceive I have acted nothing against the Parliament, for that which I acted, it was for the king: and since the abolishing of regal power, I have not meddled with any thing against the parliament, for that Act was but enacted the 14th of July last, and before that time and Act of abolishing Kingly Government, that princely palace which I kept by his Commission was demolished. My lords, I beseech your honours, that my Commission may be read, to give satisfaction to the Court.

Lord Puleston. Sir, it will do you no good, you may as well shew a Commission from the Pope, all is one.

Morris. My lords, I desire your lordships to do me that justice.

Lord Thorpe. For my part I am willing, if my brother be not against it.

Lord Puleston. Sir, we hold it for law to be void, it is to no purpose.

Morris. Then if your lordships be not pleased to do me that justice that it may be read, I desire it may be restored me again. [Upon that, col. Morris received his Commission unread.] My lords, it seemeth strange, that your honours should do that which was never done the like before, never any of your predecessors ever did the like; I wish it may not be to your own and your friends wrong, that you make yourselves precedents of your acting, and myself of suffering. But, my lords, I do not speak for saving my own life, for (I thank my God) I am prepared, and very willing to part with this lump of clay: I have had a large time of repentance, it being twenty-two weeks since my imprisonment; and I am sorry for those which are like to undergo the same sufferings, if your lordships take away my life. And though I do not speak any way in glory, indeed at this present there is a cloud hanging over our heads, I desire there may be a fair sunshine to dispel it. And though there were a world of plots in the kingdom when I took the castle, there is not wanting the same now, only the time is not yet come; and as I was to be the fire-brand to Scarborough, so he (meaning Bainton) to Timmouth, and that to others; and though you take away my life, there will be others which will take up the lintstock to give fire, though I be gone.

Court. Sir, you have little hopes to talk of any fire to be given here, having received such a total rout in Ireland.

Morris. My lords, I should have been unwilling to have contradicted your late news concerning Ireland; but since you have given me a hint of it, you must give me leave to let your honours know, that I received letters from the marquis of Ormond, dated the 3rd of Aug. and your's is but the 2d; wherein he pleases to let me understand of the great care he hath of me, and that whatsoever shall befall me here, the like shall be to those which he hath prisoners there, which, as he saith, are good store. Therefore if your lordships did not at all value my person, yet methinks you should have some care of it for your own friends good.

Court. Sir, have you no more to say?

Morris. My lords, still I appeal to my Commission, which I conceive is sufficient to defend me withal, in what I have done, notwithstanding your power to the contrary.

Court. It is nothing at all, we have power to try you here.

Morris. Then, my lords, under correction, laymen may as well be tried at a Martial Court: which if granted, those excellent acts of Magna Charta, and the Petition of Right, would be destroyed.

Court. But you are not looked on here as a soldier; we shall do what in justice belongs to us.

Morris. My lords, still, under correction, I have taken the Oath of Allegiance, and I conceive in that I was bound to do as much as I did or have done, though I had not had any commission at all. And I beseech your lordships that you will do me justice, and not incline to the right-hand of affection, or the left to hatred; but to have an ear for the accused as well as for the accuser: neither have I acted any thing contrary to my allegiance, which allegiance I was willing to pay to the son, as well as to the father. Now for the allegiance, I owe to any person or authority but to these, I know none.

Lord Thorpe. Sir, if you have any thing else to say, speak for yourself, for this is not much to the purpose.

Morris. My lord, it is true, since you have rejected that authority which I acted by, I might as well have held my tongue at the first, and spake nothing, were it not for the satisfaction of the hearers; but if it must be so, that you will make me a precedent, you must do with me as you did with my dear and honoured lord [meaning my lord of Strafford] making an Act for the future, that this my suffering shall not be a precedent to any soldiers hereafter. Besides, my lord, this same Statute which you allege against me is, if that any shall act against the king, it is Treason; which I have not done; but contrary, for him, and by his authority. And there is an Act of 11 H. 7, cap. 1. 'That whosoever they are that shall aid or assist the King at home or abroad, shall not be questioned at all.'

Lord Thorpe. It is true, sir, but Hen. 7, then stood in a fickle condition, and being an Usurper, made that Act for his own safety; sometimes the duke of York ruling, sometimes the duke of Lancaster, and others contending, therefore it was enacted.

Morris. My lord, but this same Act of H. 7, was later than that of Ed. 3, which you have laid against me; and as yet was never repealed, until this last Act of 14th of July, before which time I had delivered up the place.

Lord Thorpe. Well, sir, it seems you have not any more to say.

VOL. IV.

After he had answered, the Court commanded irons to be laid on them. (Cornet Blackston being condemned at the same time.)

Morris. My lord, I humbly desire that we may not be manacled; if you make any doubt of us, that we may have a greater guard upon us.*

Lord Puleston. Sir, you that have made such attempts through such guards, as were of purpose set to receive you, ought to be looked to now. Yet, if Mr. Sheriff please, I am content.

Morris. Mr. Sheriff, I desire that this manacling may be forbore: if you please to clap a guard of an hundred men upon us, I shall pay for it. This is not only a disgrace to me, but in general to all soldiers; which doth more trouble me than the loss of my life. Mr. Sheriff, what do you say?

Mr. Sheriff. Sir, irons are the safest guards.

Morris. My lords, hitherto, I thank God, I have not done any unsoldiery or base act, and to begin now, I will not do it to save my life; and though you look upon me Sampson-wise, I vow to God, I would not touch the pillars, though it lay in my power to injure you; therefore I still beg pardon, that I may not be manacled.

Under-Sheriff. Come, sir, it cannot be helped, we are commanded.

Morris. My lord, I beseech you grant me this favour; it is not my life I beg, but to forbear this manacling, which shame and dishonour doth more trouble me, than the loss of my life.

Under-Sheriff. It must be done.

And upon that, did it, and carried him away. After dinner, the Jury brought in their verdict, Guilty of Treason. †

* As to prisoners being in irons at their Trial or Arraignment, see the ninth Resolution preparatory to the Trials of the Regicides, A.D. 1660 [infra.]

† "Letters from York, that one Morris, and one Blackston, were arraigned before Baron Thorpe, and Judge Puleston, for levying War against the Kingdom; they pleaded Not Guilty, but desired, 'as they were martial men, that they might be tried by martial law:' which was denied them. Morris at last said, 'He would be tried by God and the Country,' and seventeen Witnesses proved foul crimes against him. He had two sheets of paper written with matters of Law, and Statutes, many of which he pleaded, and urged the cause of the War betwixt the two Houses of York and Lancaster, the difference of which from his case was shewed by the Judges. Then he produced a Commission from the King when he was Prince; the Judges told him, that the Prince was a Subject as well as he, and must be tried by the same law. He was found guilty of Treason, and manacled with irons: at which he said, 'What, a martial man ironed? The like precedent was never before known.' He desired to have a strong guard, saying, 'Let me be damned if I escape;' but it was denied, so

Morris. My lord, I am here found guilty of Treason by that villain Brooke, whom I know to be mine enemy, and the first man that I did except against: in which I conceive I have received hard measure, for none could have found me guilty of Treason, had they gone according to the letter of the law, which they did not.

Lord Puleston. Sir, you speak too late, you are not to dispute it now.

Morris. Neither would I, my lord, if this were a Court of Chancery, but being a Court of Law, bound up in express words and letter, I conceive I ought to dispute it, and my business better weighed.

Lord Puleston. Well, sir, you are found guilty, therefore hold your peace.

Morris. If I must suffer, I receive it with all alacrity and cheerfulness, and I thank God I shall die for a good cause, and the testimony of a good conscience; for which, had I as many lives as there are stars in the firmament, I would sacrifice them all for the same.

Court. Sheriff, gaoler take them away.

Morris. Well, I beseech God bless king Charles, and fight for all those that fight for him, or have fought for him.

After he was condemned, col. Bethel writ to the General and his Council of War, that Morris might be reprieved; but col. Pride opposed it, urging, "That it would not stand with the justice of the Army, nor the safety of the Commonwealth, to let such enemies live, the Parliament having adjudged him worthy of death, and given instructions to the Judges accordingly."

The SPEECH of Colonel John Morris, Governor of Pontefract Castle, at the place of Execution at York, August 23, 1649.

When he was brought out of prison, looking upon the sledge that was there set for him, lifting up his eyes to heaven, knocking upon his breast, he said, 'I am as willing to go to my death, as to put off my doublet to go to bed; I despise the shame as well as the cross; I know I am going to a joyful place:' with many like expressions. When the post met him about St. James's church, that was sent to the Parliament to mediate for a reprieve; and told him he could not prevail in it, he said, 'Sir, I pray God reward you for your pains, I hope, and am well assured to find a better pardon than any they can give: my hope is not in man, but in the living God.'

At the place of Execution he made this profession of his faith, his breeding, and the cause he had fought in.

"Gentlemen, First I was bred up in the true Protestant Religion, having my education and breeding from that honourable house, my dear lord and master Strafford's, which place, I dare boldly say, was as well-governed and ruled as ever any yet was before it; I much doubt, better than any will be after it, unless it please God to put a period to these distracted times; this faith and religion, I say, I have been bred in, and I thank God I have hitherto lived in, without the least wavering, and now I am resolved by God's assistance to die in.

"These pains are nothing, if compared to those dolours and pains, which Jesus Christ our Saviour hath suffered for us; when in a bloody sweat he endured the wrath of God, the pain of hell, and the cursed and shameful death which was due to our sins; therefore I praise the Lord that I am not plagued with far more grievous punishment; that the like hath befallen others, who undoubtedly are most glorious and blessed saints with Christ in heaven. It is the Lord's affliction, and who will not take any affliction in good part when it comes from the hand of God? And what shall we receive good from the hands of God, and not receive evil? And though I desire, as I am carnal, that this cup may depart from me, yet not my will, but thy will be done. Death brings unto the godly an end of sinning, and of all miseries due unto sin: so that after death there shall be no more sorrow, nor cry, nor pain, for 'God shall wipe away all tears from our eyes;' by death our souls shall be delivered from thralldom; and this 'corruptible body shall put on incorruption, and this mortal immortality.'

"Therefore blessed are they that are delivered out of so vile a world, and freed from such a body of bondage and corruption; the soul shall enjoy immediate communion with God in everlasting bliss and glory; it takes us from the miseries of this world, and the society of sinners, to the city of the living God, the celestial Jerusalem.

"I bless God I am thought worthy to suffer for his name, and for so good a cause; and if I had a thousand lives, I would willingly lay them down for the cause of my king, the Lord's anointed; the Scripture commands us to fear God and honour the king, to be subject to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake; whether to the king as supreme, or to those that are in authority under him. I have been always faithful to my trust: and, though I have been most basely accused for betraying Liverpool; yet I take God to witness, it is a most false aspersion, for I was then sick in my bed, and knew not of the delivering of it, till the officers and soldiers had done it without my consent, and then I was carried prisoner to sir John Meldrum. Afterwards I came down into the country, and seeing I could not live quietly at home, I was persuaded by col. Forbes, col. Overton, lieut. col. Fairfax, whom I took for my good friends, to march in their troops: which I did, but with intention still to do my king the best service when occasion was, and so I did: and I pray God to turn the hearts of all the soldiers to their lawful sovereign, that this land may enjoy peace, which till then it will never do: and though thou kill me, yet will I put my trust in thee; wherefore I trust in God he will not fail me nor forsake me."

Then he took his Bible, and read divers Psalms fit for his own occasion and consolation, and then put up divers prayers, some publicly and some privately: the public was this which follows:

"Welcome blessed hour, the period of my pilgrimage, the term of my bondage, the end of my cares, the close of my sins, the bound of my travels, the goal of my race, and the haven of my hopes; I have fought a long fight in much weakness; I have finished my course though in great faintness; and the crown of my joy is, that through the strength of thy grace, I have both kept the true faith, and have fought for my king, the Lord's anointed's cause, without any wavering; for which, and in which I die; I do willingly resign my flesh, I despise the world, and I defy the devil, who hath no part nor share in me. And now what is my hope? my hope, Lord Jesus, is even in thee: for I know that thou my Redeemer livest, and that thou wilt immediately receive my soul, and raise up my body also at the last day, and I shall see thee in my flesh with these eyes, and none other. And now, O Lord, let thy spirit of comfort help mine infirmities, and make supplication for me with sighs, and groans that cannot be expressed; I submit myself wholly to thy will; I commit my soul to thee as my faithful Redeemer, who hast bought it with thy most precious blood. I confess to all the world, I know no name under heaven by which I may be saved, but thine my Jesus, my Saviour; I renounce all confidence in any merits save thine; I thankfully acknowledge all thy blessings; I unfeignedly bewail all my sins: I stedfastly believe all thy promises: I heartily forgive all my enemies: I willingly leave all my friends: I utterly loath all earthly comforts, and I entirely long for thy coming. Come Lord Jesus, come quickly; Lord Jesus receive my spirit."

The private were to himself, his hat being before his eyes. After this, he put up divers short ejaculations: As, "I know my Redeemer liveth: Father into thy hands I commend my spirit, for thou hast redeemed it, O God, thou God of truth: Lord Jesus receive my spirit:" and many of the like; and so he yielded to Death.

Nathaniel Snape,

At the Guild-Hall of London, the 24th of October 1649, being Thursday, at the Trial of Lieut. Col. JOHN LILBURNE.

O Yes made; all persons that were adjourned to the Court, required to make their appearance.

The Lieutenant of the Tower of London, col. Francis West, called to bring forth his prisoner, according to the precept.

Whereupon he brought up the Prisoner out of the Irish Chamber, where he had been some time before the sitting of the Court, and was guarded by the said Lieutenant, and a special guard of soldiers besides. And being brought to the bar, the Sheriffs of London were directed to take the Prisoner into their custody.

Silence commanded.

Cryer. John Lilburne, hold up thy hand.

Lieutenant-Col. Lilburne directed himself to Mr. Keble, one of the Keepers of the Great Seal, as the President of the Court, and said to this purpose: Sir, will it please you to hear me? and if so, by your favour thus. All the privilege for my part that I shall crave this day at your hands, is no more but that which is properly and singly the liberty of every free-born Englishman,† viz. The benefit of the Laws and Liberties thereof, which by my birth-right and inheritance is due unto me; the which I have fought for as well as others have done, with a single and upright heart; and if I cannot have and enjoy this, I shall leave this Testimony behind me, That I died for the Laws and Liberties of this nation; and upon this score I stand, and if I perish I perish. And if the fact that I have done, cannot be justified by the law of England, let me perish. I mention none of this for the gaining of mercy, or by way of merit; no, I scorn it: for mercy I crave from none, but from the hands of my God alone, with whom I hope, and am assured one day to rest; whom I have set before my eyes, and so walked, as believing I am always in his presence, in whose power my confidence is fixed, whom I take and own to be my stay, my staff, my strength and support, and in whom I rest as the life of my life, and whom I hope to meet with joy, when this fading and uncertain life shall have an end, to live with him in glory and blessedness for ever more. And therefore because I would not willingly trouble you with many words, to cause you to spend your time impertinently; therefore, Sir, in reference to the Court I shall crave but so much liberty from you as was given to Paul when he pleaded for his life before the heathen Roman Judges, which was free Liberty of Speech to speak for himself; the which I now humbly crave as my right, not only by the law of God and man, but also by the Law and light of nature. And I shall do it with that respect, reason and judgment, that doth become a man that knows what it is to plead for his life. I hope God hath given me ability to be master of my own passion, and endowed me with that reason, that will dictate unto me what is for my own good and benefit.

* See his Case in the Star-Chamber, A. D. 1637, ante, v. 3, p. 1315.

† Lilburne, it seems, had obtained the appellation of "Free Born John." In 1 Thurloe's

I have several times been arraigned for my life already. I was once arraigned before the house of peers for sticking close to the Liberties and Privileges of this nation, and those that stood for them, being one of those two or three men, that first drew their swords in Westminster-Hall against col. Lunsford and some scores of his associates. At that time, it was supposed, they intended to cut the throats of the chiefest men then sitting in the House of Commons: I say, for this, and other things of the like nature, I was arraigned by the king's special command and order, the 1st of May 1641. I mention it to this end, that when I came before the House of Peers, where was about three or four-score lords then sitting at the beginning of the Parliament, (who then were supposed the most arbitrary of any power in England) yet I had from them free Liberty of Speech, to speak for my life at their bar, without check or controul, in the best manner all those abilities God had given me would enable me. And when I was at Oxford, I was again arraigned as a Traitor before the Lord Chief Justice Heath, for levying War at the command of the then Parliament against the person of the king: And when I came before him in the Guild-Hall of Oxford, he told me (there being present with him, as his fellow-judge, Mr. Gardiner, sometimes recorder of the city of London, now sir Thomas Gardiner,* and others that sat by a special commission of Oyer and Terminer from the king; the which Commission I did not so well then understand, as I hope I do now:) And my Lord Chief Justice Heath stood up, and in the face of all the Court, and in the face of all the country present there, told me; Capt. Lilburne, you are brought here before us for High-Treason, for levying War in Oxfordshire against your sovereign lord and king; and though you be now in a garrison, and were taken in arms in open hostility against the king, (yea Sir, and I must now tell you, in such hostility, that we were but about 700 men at Brentford, that withstood the King's whole Army in the field above five hours together, and fought it out to the very sword's point, and to the butt-end of the musket; and thereby hindered the King from his then possessing the Parliament's train of artillery, and by consequence the City of London, in which very act I was taken a prisoner, without Articles or Capitulation, and was by the King and his party then looked upon as one of the activest men against them in the whole company) yet said Judge Heath, we will not take advantage of that, to try you by the rules of arbitrary Martial laws, or any other arbitrary ways; but we will try you by the rules of the good old laws of England: and whatsoever privilege in your Trial the laws of England will afford you, claim it as your birth-right and inheritance, and you shall enjoy it with as much freedom and willingness, as if you were in Westminster-Hall, to be tried amongst your own party. And this we will do for that end, that so at London your friends shall not have any just cause to say, we murdered you with cruelty, or denied you the benefit of the law, in taking away your life by the rules of our own wills. Nay, further said he, Capt. Lilburne, it is true I am a judge, made by my sovereign lord the king, according to his right by law, [See the 27 of Hen. 8, c. 24.] and so in a special manner am his servant and counsellor, and am to act for his good, benefit, and advantage: And yet notwithstanding, it is by the known laws of this land my duty to be indifferent and free from partiality betwixt my master and you the Prisoner, and I am specially bound unto it also by my oath. And therefore you shall have the utmost Privileges of the Law of England, which is a law of mercy, and not of rigour, and hath the life of a man in tenderest and highest estimation: [See the 2nd part Inst. fol. 28, 30, 42, 43, 53, 315, 316, 591. & part 3. fol. 34.] And therefore it is the duty of a judge by law, to be of Counsel * with the prisoner, in things wherein by his ignorance he falls short of making use of the benefit of the law, especially when he is upon the trial of his life. Yea, and to exhort him to answer without fear, if he perceive him daunted or amazed at the presence of the court. Yea, it is my duty to carry myself with all fairness and evenness of hand towards you; and wherein that there shall seem any mistakes to appear, in circumstances or formalities, to rectify you: for its my duty to help you, and not to use any boisterous or rough language to you in the least, to put you in fear, or any ways prevent the freedom of your defence; and according to the laws of England this is my duty, and this is the law. And accordingly he gave me liberty to plead to the errors of my indictment, before I ever pleaded Not Guilty; and also became willing to assign me what counsel I pleased to nominate, freely to come to prison to me, and to consult and advise with me, and help me in point of law. This last he did immediately upon my pleading to the indictment before any fact was proved: all which is consonant to the declared judgment of sir Edward Coke, that great oracle of the laws of England, whose books are published by special Orders † and authority of parliament for good law; who in his third part of his Institutes, chap. of High Treason, fol. 29, 34. compared with fol. 137, 230, asserts the same.

Truly, Sir, I being now come before you to answer for my life, and being no professed lawyer, may through my own ignorance of the practice part of the law, especially in the formalities, niceties, and punctilios thereof, run myself with over-much hastiness in snares and dangers, that I shall not easily get out of. And therefore being all of a sudden bid to hold up my hand at the bar, I cannot chuse but a little demur upon it, and yet with all respect to you, to declare my desireableness to keep within the bounds of reason, moderation, and discretion, and so to carry myself as it doth become a man, that knows what it is to answer for his life.

And therefore in the first place, I have something to say to the court about the first fundamental liberty of an Englishman in order to his trial; which is, That by the laws of this land all courts of justice always ought to be free and open for all sorts of peaceable people to see, behold and hear, and have free access unto; and no man whatsoever ought to be tried in holes or corners, or in any place, where the gates are shut and barred, and guarded with armed men: and yet, Sir, as I came in, I found the gates shut and guarded, which is contrary both to law and justice.

Sir, the laws of England, and the privileges thereof, are my inheritance and birth-right: and, Sir, I must acquaint you, that I was sometimes summoned before a committee of parliament, where Mr. Corbet, and several others have had the chair; and there I stood upon my right by the laws of England, and refused to proceed with the said committee, till by special order they caused their doors to be wide thrown open, that the people might have free and uninterrupted access to hear, see and consider of what they said to me; although I think the pretence that I am now brought before you for, be the very same in substance, that I was convened before Mr. Corbet for, which was about books: and I am sure there I did argue the case with him and the rest of the committee, soundly out in law; proving that they were bound in law and justice freely to open their doors, for the free access of all sorts and kinds of auditors: and I did refuse (as of right) to proceed with them, till by special order they did open their doors. For no trial in such cases ought to be in any place, unless it be public, open and free; and therefore if you please that I may enjoy that legal right and privilege which was granted unto me by Mr. Miles Corbet, and the rest of that committee, (when I was brought before them in the like case that now I am brought before you) which privilege I know to be my right by the law of England; I shall, as it becomes an understanding Englishman (who in his actions hates deeds of darkness, holes or corners) go on to a trial. But if I be denied this undoubted privilege, I shall rather die here than proceed any further. And therefore foreseeing this before-hand, and being willing to provide against all jealousies of my escape, the fear of which I suppose might be objected against me as a ground to deny me this my legal right; and therefore before hand I have given my engagement to the Lieutenant of the Tower, that I will be a faithful and true prisoner to him.

And I hope the gentleman hath so much experience of my faithfulness to my word, that he doth not in the least question or scruple it; I am sure he hath often so declared to me that he doth not.

Nay, I have not only engaged to be a true prisoner in the Tower to him, but I have also solemnly engaged to him, that I will come civilly and peaceably with him, and that I will go civilly and peaceably back with him again: and that if any tumult or uproar shall arise in the crowd, of which I lose him, and he me: or in case I should be any ways by force and power rescued from him, I have also faithfully engaged to him, that I will come again to him (by the assistance of God) as soon as ever I can get away from that force or rescue. And all this I entreated him to acquaint you with, that all jealousies and disputes might be avoided.

Judge Keble. Mr. Lilburne, look behind you, and see whether the door stands open or no.

Lt. Col. Lilburne. Well then, Sir, I am satisfied as to that. But then in the next place, † "Which Orders are dated May 12, 1641, and June 3, 1642. You may at large read at the last end of his Instit. part 2." Orig. Edit.

I have read the Petition of Right, I have read Magna Charta, and abundance of laws made in confirmation of it; and I have also read the 'Act that aboliseth the Star Chamber,' which was made in the year 1641, which last recited Act expressly confirms those statutes that were made in Edward the Third's time, which declares all acts, laws and statutes that were made against Magna Charta, to be null and void in law, and holden for error.

In the reading of which laws I do not find a special Commission of Oyer and Terminer to be legal and warrantable. I beseech you, sir, do not mistake me; for I put a vast difference betwixt an ordinary and common Commission of Oyer and Terminer for holding ordinary and common assizes and sessions, and betwixt an extraordinary and special Commission of Oyer and Terminer to try an individual person or persons, for a pretended extraordinary crime. The laws I last recited, and the fundamental or essential basis of freedom therein contained, knows no such names or commissions of special Oyer and Terminer.

And those statutes in Edward the First, and Edward the Third's time, that do erect those special and extraordinary Commissions, and warrant the usage of them, are merely irrational (a) innovations upon our indubitable rights contained in Magna Charta, and mere court and prerogative devices to destroy the best of men, by extraordinary courts appointed to prejudice proceedings that should manfully stand in the way of the prince, or any of his great favourites; for sure I am from the Petition of Right, no ground or foundation from any extraordinary or special Commission of Oyer and Terminer, upon any pretended, special, or great occasion, cannot be founded; but rather the absolute quite contrary, as to me clearly appears by the very plain letter of that most excellent law. And therefore such a special Commission upon any pretended special occasion, being expressly against our indubitable rights contained in Magna Charta, and the Petition of Right, viz. That no Englishman shall be subjected to any other trial, but the ordinary, universal and common trials at ordinary assizes sessions or gaol-deliveries, and not in the law to be tried by extraordinary and special prejudged, packed, over-awing Commissions of Oyer and Terminer; and therefore all such extraordinary and dangerous trials are absolutely abolished, by the late excellent acts that confirm the Petition of Right, and all and every the clauses therein contained, and abolished the Star Chamber, both made anno 1641.

And, Sir, with your favour, the then parliaments that made the last cited laws, were a far from countenancing any special commissions of Oyer and Terminer, upon any special or pretended great occasions whatsoever that I can read of, that I rather find and read the parliament's proceedings in the year 1641, as extreme out-cry of the house of commons against special commissions of Oyer and Terminer, with a great deal of bitterness and vehemency, as may fully and clearly be read in that excellent argument of Mr. Hyde, April 1641, printed and published in a book, called "Speeches and Passages of Parliament," p. 409 to 417, which I have here at the bar to produce; which Mr. Hyde was then the special and appointed mouth of the house of commons before the lords, who unto them in conformity to his commission from the then house of commons, complains to the house of lords extremely of a special commission of Oyer and Terminer that was exercised in the five northern counties of England; and earnestly, in the name of the house of commons, craves the special assistance of the house of lords to pluck up that court by the very roots, founded upon a special commission of Oyer and Terminer, being so illegal and unjust in the very foundation of it, as it is inconsistent with the people's liberties, and as that which destroyed and disinherited all the people that were tried, both of their birth-right and inheritance, viz. their liberties and freedoms contained in Magna Charta. And this, Sir, was the declared and avowed judgment and opinion of the house of commons in April, 1641, in their primitive purity and non-defilement, when they acted bravely and gallantly for the universal liberties and freedom of this nation (and not self-interest) when they were in the virginity of that glory and splendour, as he there fully and most excellently declares; and yet he there gives an extraordinary reason for the original erection of that court, founded upon a special commission of Oyer and Terminer, as can be rendered.

The original reason or occasion of which, he there declares to be thus: That by reason of the suppression of the abbies in the 27th of Hen. 8's time, in the north of England, through discontent thereat, there did arise from the said 27th year to the 30th no fewer than six grand insurrections, most of them under the command of some eminent man of those countries; which insurrections and rebellions occasioned the levying of great armies, which he like to have set the whole kingdom in an inversal flame: for the suppressing and preventing of which in future times, king Henry 8, caused a special court to be erected, by a special commission of Oyer and Terminer; which court also continued in Edward 6th's time, queen Mary's, and first and second of king James: The basis of which commission was founded upon those forementioned innovating statutes made in Edw. 2nd's and Edw. 3rd's time (b): Which special commission of Oyer and Terminer was several times renewed by the late king Charles, as in the 5th, 8th, and 13th year of his reign. And the said Mr. Hyde there in his argument or speech, which I have here in print, names several of the precedents of that illegal court of special commission of Oyer and Terminer: And he there also declares in what an extraordinary manner, and upon what an extraordinary occasion it was granted; which was so great, as that a greater could not be imagined: and yet notwithstanding he declares, that this extraordinary commission, which being granted to suppress and quiet those many extraordinary insurrections and rebellions, which do not admit of so long a delay as times of ordinary trial, in times of peace, when the ordinary, legal, and common courts of justice are open and free, will do, when peace and quiet is in the nation, as now it is; and yet for all that, he condemns it for illegal.

(a) "And excellent to this purpose is Lieutenant-Colonel Lilburne's Argument, in his 2d edition of his 'Picture of the Counsel of State,' p. 8, against the erection of extraordinary Courts, which thus followeth: He granting that the Parliament hath power to erect a Court of Justice to administer the law, provided that the Judges consist of persons that are not Members of Parliament; and provided the power they give them be universal, that is to say, to administer the law to all the people of England indefinitely, who are all equally born free alike, and not to two or three particular persons solely; the last of which for them to do is unjust, and altogether out of their power, &c. Which Argument or Reason is most notably illustrated and enlarged in the 2d edition of the 'Legal Fundamental Liberties of England, revived of the 8th of June, 1649,' p. 73." Orig. Edit.

And therefore, Sir, admit my actions in their tendency to be as dangerous and heinous as any of my adversaries can imagine or declare them to be; yet they are but in the ashes, but in the hearth, they are not broke out into visible and violent hostile actions. And therefore I say, if special commissions of Oyer and Terminer, granted in such special and transcendent cases as those in Henry 8's time, were illegal; much more must a special commission of Oyer and Terminer granted to try me barely for words, or at most for pretended writings or books, at such a time when there is no burning flame of insurrections or rebellions in the kingdom, but all in visible peace, and all the ordinary courts of justice open: and I and my friends have often sought to enjoy the benefit of the law in a legal trial, from first to last, but could never enjoy it in the least measure, although many assizes and sessions have passed over my head since my first commitment, now seven months ago; at the first of which, in the county where my pretended crime was committed, I ought by law and justice either to be tried or acquitted. So that, Sir, by what I have already said, you may see the judgment and opinion of the house of commons upon special commissions of Oyer and Terminer, in their first purity, when as a full house, there being constantly 400 or 500 of them sitting in the house, as the deputed and chosen trustees of the people of England, whose opinion was to damn them, and pluck them up by the roots, as unjust and illegal in their original institution, which they have accordingly done, and declared to the whole nation in the act that abolished the Star-Chamber; where that court spoken against by Mr. Hyde, is totally damned and plucked up by the roots. So that now in law I cannot see how special commissions of Oyer and Terminer, can be legal at this present, admit the power never so just from whom it comes; but abundantly much more, seeing there is no actual wars, nor popular insurrections: which, if lately there had been any, and yet were overcome, there is no pretence or ground by the good old laws of England, for any extraordinary proceedings against any man, although he had been in arms against you, but he ought to have the benefit of the ordinary, accustomed, and common trials at the common law, as clearly appears by the express words of the Petition of Right (c). But I was never in any hostile manner against those that are the present governors of the nation, but have been under their command in several battles in the nation, and have hazarded my life for them, and never yet in the least changed my original or first principles; nor never was engaged in the least in any hostility against them, but have always, since I five years ago gave over my command, lived in peace and quietness in mine own house and abode: and was the same day at the house of commons door that their votes passed against me, declaring me in general (which in law signifies nothing) to be a Traitor; and spake with a gentleman that is now a judge amongst yourselves (viz. Mr. Rigby) at the house-door, who, in some Great Ones names, proffered me large matters, if I would do as I should be directed by them. After this, I went home to mine own house in Southwark, where I stayed in peace and quietness, well enough knowing the votes that that day passed against me, without either particular accusation or accuser, or any such thing; where I stayed, whenas I might easily have escaped the hands of mine enemies, and been gone: but having the sweet peace of a good conscience within me, which did assure me that I had done nothing that was against the welfare of the nation of England in general, nor against the welfare of any one particular man in England, but really wished it well, and all its well-wishers:

I say that, notwithstanding my certain knowledge of all that at the house had passed against me; and although I also knew that the further design against me, which was, That the Council of State (as they are called) would take me away thereupon with armed force the next morning; yet notwithstanding all this, I stirred not out of my house, but remained there till about five o'clock the next morning; at which time 200 or 300 armed horse and foot (without so much as one civil or magisterial officer with them) came by force of arms, and hauled me out of bed from my wife and children, not according to the law of England, as is expressly provided in two several statutes, viz. the first of Edw. 6, chap. 12, and the 5th and 6th of Edw. 6, c. 11. By which rules of the law, and no other, they ought to have proceeded against me from first to last; and I am sure they both expressly provide, That if any man be accused of Treason, that he shall be accused first to one of the king's counsel, or to one of the king's justices of assize, or else to one of the king's justices of the peace being of the Quorum, or to two justices of the peace within the shire where the same offence or offences shall happen to be done or committed (d).

But contrary to these and other wholesome and good laws, although there hath been an eight years war in England, pretendedly, for the preservation of the laws and liberties of England, yet, I say, contrary to the express tenor of these laws, as also of the Petition of Right, yea, and also of the express letter of that excellent law that abolished the Star-Chamber this parliament, was I by force of arms, that never fortified my house against the present power, nor ever disputed any of their summons, though sent by the meanest man that ever appertained to them; and who, if they had sent their warrant for me by a child, I would have gone to them, I was fetched out of my bed in terror and affrightment, and to the subversion of the laws and liberties of England, and led through London-streets with hundreds of armed men (like an Alger-captive) to their main-guard at Paul's, where a mighty guard staid for the further conducting me by force of arms to White-hall. Now, Sir, if I had committed treason, I ought not to have been apprehended and proceeded against by armed and mercenary soldiers, but by civil and magisterial officers, and no other; according to those excellent privileges that the parliament themselves in the year 1641, in their own book of Declarations, p. 36, 37, 76, 77. did claim for those six members, viz. the lord Kimbolton, Mr. Pym, Mr. Hollis, Mr. Stroud, sir Arthur Haslerig, and Mr. Hampden: I say and aver, I ought to have had the process of the law of England, due process of law according to the forementioned statutes and precedents; for I never forcibly resisted or contended with the parliament; and therefore ought to have had my warrant served upon me by a constable, or the like civil officer; and upon no pretence whatsoever, ought I to have been forced out of my bed and house by mercenary armed officers and soldiers. But, Sir, coming to White-hall, I was there also kept by armed men, contrary to all law and justice; and by armed men against law. I was by force carried before a company of gentlemen sitting at Derby-House, that looked upon themselves as authorized by the parliament to be a committee or Council of State (who by the law I am sure in any kind had nothing at all to do with me in cases of pretended treasons) where I was brought before Mr. John Bradshaw, sometimes a counsellor for myself before the house of lords, against my unjust Star-Chamber judges; who there in my behalf, Feb. 1645, did urge against the lords of the Star-Chamber, as the highest crime against the liberties of the people that could be, as being illegal, arbitrary and tyrannical, that the lords in Star-Chamber should condemn me to be whipped, pilloried, &c. for no other cause but for refusing to answer their interrogatories against myself. And when I was brought before the said Council of State I saw no accuser, no prosecutor, no accusation, no charge nor indictment; but all the crime that there was laid unto my charge, was Mr. Bradshaw's very seriously examining me to questions against myself: although I am confident he could not forget, that himself and Mr. John Cook were my counsellors in February, 1645, at the bar of the house of lords, when he did most vehemently aggravate, and with detestations condemn the lords of the Star-Chamber's unjust and wicked dealing with English freemen, in censuring them for refusing to answer to questions concerning themselves; and yet notwithstanding walked with his dealing with me in the very steps that formerly he had bitterly condemned in the Star-Chamber-lords; yea, and there for refusing to answer his questions, (for any thing he declared to me to the contrary) committed me to prison for treason in general. And you know very well, better than I do, that by your own law, generals in law signify nothing.

Judge Jermin. Mr. Lilburne, you very much abuse and wrong yourself, for you very well know Mr. Bradshaw is now denominated by another name, namely, Lord President to the Council of State of England; and it would well become you in your condition so to have styled him.

Lilburne. And although no crime in law (which ought to be particularly expressed) was laid unto my charge; yet when I was imprisoned, there were thousands of my friends (well-wishers to the freedoms of England) and to the common cause in which they had been engaged in for these eight years together, both old and young, both masters of families, young men and apprentices, and abundance of others of the feminine sex too, with abundance of cordial honest men in several countries, joined in several rational and fair petitions, and delivered them to the house in the behalf of myself, and my three fellow-prisoners in which they most earnestly intreated that they would not prejudice us before we were heard, and knew our accusers and accu-ations, but rather that they would release us, and take off their prejudging votes against us, which they had caused to be proclaimed in all the public places of the nation against us, and let us have a fair and legal trial, according to the laws of England, and according to the undeniable privileges of the due process of the law from first to last; and they would put in any security, that they would require of them, that we should be forth-coming at all times to answer whatsoever in law could be laid to our charge. Unto all which petitions, which were very many, they could get no manner of satisfying answer, but slights, abuses, and scorns.

But besides this, gentlemen, that you may see that I am rational, and that you may see that I have an innocent and quiet conscience within me, that does not accuse me, nor terrify me; therefore I must acquaint you, that I again and again proffered my chiefest adversaries, and sent often to them, being earnestly desirous to chuse two members of the house of commons, and let them chuse two more, whom they please; and I would with all my heart freely refer all manner of difference betwixt them and me, to the final determination and judgment of four of their fellow-members: but all this would do no good, and yet they would not in the least let me understand what was the thing they desired of me; but, by their power and will, I had my pockets and chamber searched to find out advantages against me; and also locked up close prisoner, with candles night and day set at my door, and denied me access and sight of my wife and children for some certain time; and for about twenty weeks together in the heat of summer, kept close prisoner, and denied the liberty of the prison, and my estate with a strong hand taken away from me, without any pretence, or due process of law, to the value of almost 3,000*l.*, that was legally and justly vested in me, and in my possession. But being I will avoid (at this time especially) provocations as much as I can, I will name no person by whose power and will it hath been done, although he be notoriously known; but the gentleman that took it away by his pleasure, without all rules of law or justice, told my father to this purpose, That I was a traitor, and under the parliament's displeasure: and therefore he would secure it from me, although I were not in the least convicted of any crime, neither in law then, or for many months after had I the least pretence of crime laid unto my charge. And although my own estate by force, against law, was taken from me, yet was I also denied in my close imprisonment that legal allowance that should have kept me alive; for in all this miserable condition I never yet received a penny of my legal allowance, but was positively denied that testimony and legal right that the late king constantly allowed to all the members of the parliament that were committed in the third of his reign, and several other times; unto whom for their diet he allowed 3*s.* 4 and 5*l.* a week, according to their quality, although they had great and large estates peaceably in their possession. And one of them that is now beyond the seas, a colonel, I have forgot his name, (but it was colonel Long) confessed in the lieutenant of the Tower's own chamber, the last year, that the king was so bountiful to him and the rest of his fellow-prisoners, that he let them enjoy the allowance of about 4 or 5*l.* a week for diet; and that while he was prisoner in the Tower, he spent the king about 1,500*l.* for his own particular self in provision. But, notwithstanding I was denied all this, and to fill up the height of the insufferable provocations put upon me, abundance of my own and ancient acquaintance were set upon me to calumniate, bespatter and reproach me; yea, and to endeavour to become instruments to take away my life, some of them confessing they were underhand set on by some parliament-men: all whose base and wicked petitions, papers and books preferred and published against me, were hugged and embraced; although, for my own part, I do not know of any man in this world that can justly tax me with any action, or maintaining any principles or tenets, but what doth become a man that doth believe all that is contained in the law and the gospel, and does believe the resurrection of the dead, and life eternal; nay, that does believe that I myself shall rise and go to the Lord of Glory. Yet notwithstanding all these unparalleled provocations put upon me, especially by divers of my old acquaintance, whom I had upon all occasions faithfully served, but never wronged, injured nor provoked, being instigated, as they themselves confess in some of their own congregations, by parliament-men so to do.

Truly, Sirs, I appeal to your own judgments, and to your consciences, and to all the people that hear me this day, whether all these provocations laid upon a poor man, which is but dust and ashes, as well as other men, be not too insupportable a burden, and too much for the causers of them to take advantage of the fruits produced by them, to destroy me, and take away my life.

And therefore, Sir, in the first place, I shall humbly crave that favour and right, seeing I am brought before you by a piece of parchment that truly I could not read, neither could he do it that shewed me, (I mean the lieutenant of the Tower;) for admit that if I did well understand Latin, as indeed I do not, only some ordinary words, yet it was in such an unusual strange hand that I could not read it. And therefore being I am brought before you implicitly, and not as I conceive an Englishman ought to be, who ought to see and read the authority, by virtue of which he is conveyed before any power. It is true, I know some of you, gentlemen, that I see sit before me, yet not many of you; and truly I have nothing but a piece of unlegible parchment, which cannot satisfy my understanding of the legalness of my convention before you: but being I am not able to dispute that power that compulsively brought me, but here I am; and therefore in order to the declaring of myself to be a true Englishman, I most humbly crave, and that I think is consonant to reason, and I hope to law too, that I may see, and hear read the commission, by virtue of which you sit here this day, and convene my person before you, that so I may compare it to the law; and consider whether or no, that by my pleading before you by virtue of it, I do not betray my liberties. And therefore I humbly crave that you would let me hear your commission read; for this court is no ordinary and common assizes, sessions, or gaol-delivery, the only proper courts for trying me for all criminal faults; yea, and those also ought to sit where the crimes are committed: and I was imprisoned for a pretended crime, pretended to be committed in the county of Surry, where by the common law of England, and express statutes, I ought to be tried therefore, and no where else.

And therefore being brought in an extraordinary manner to such an extraordinary place as this, which is no ordinary assizes or sessions, no nor yet in mine own county; therefore I again humbly desire that you will be pleased to let me see and hear your extraordinary commission, that so I may consider whether the extent or latitude of the commission be consonant, or no, to the Petition of Right, and other the good old laws of England. For those that now sit at Westminster, exercising the supreme power, by two special declarations, the one dated the 9th of February last, and the other the 17th of March last, have positively declared, and called God to witness, That they will maintain, preserve, and defend that most excellent of laws, the Petition of Right, as in the seventh page of the last declaration they call it; and that the people of England shall enjoy all the benefit therein contained, whether to life, liberty, or estate, with all things incident thereunto. And therefore I humbly beg and crave that favour from you, that seeing to me you appear to be sent in an extraordinary manner, not according to the ordinary customs of the laws of England, that you will be pleased to let me hear your commission read, that so I may consider the consonancy thereof to the Petition of Right, and other the good old laws of England: and after the reading of it, I hope I shall return you an answer as doth become a rational and ingenuous man: who though he hath right to all the privileges of the laws of England, and hath read all the declared and plain laws of England, that are to me the fundamentals of all, yet the practice part of the law, which are in other tongues besides the English, I cannot read, know, nor understand. And in the Petition of Right, and other the good old fundamental laws of England, I can find no foundation or bottom for such an extraordinary court, as this before my eyes seems to be: and therefore I again make it my most humble suit to hear your commission read.

Judge Keele. Mr. Lilburne, you are fully heard.

Mr. Prideaux, (Attorney-General). My lord, the prisoner at the bar, nor none else, have cause to complain that he hath wanted your patience in being fully heard. My lord, that which at the beginning of his arraignment you expected from him, which was to hold up his hand, be denied; and upon his denial desired liberty of speech to speak, and he hath enjoyed it. But, my lord, how pertinent his discourse is to what was proposed to him, the court, and all that hear him, will judge. My lord, I am not here to justify the actings of those that here he hath complained against; but they are a court, they are a council, and my thoughts are (and so ought his to be) honourable of them; and what they have done, my lord, towards him, in ordering this court to try him, is but justice. My lord, there is no special commission of Oyer and Terminer, but a general commission: and upon that general commission here is a special presentment of Mr. Lilburne here at the bar: the general commission is according to the law of the land; and upon that special presentment it is expected he may be proceeded against according to law. And for your commission, my lord, that hath been read and published to the court before Mr. Lilburne came to the court, and the court is satisfied with it, that it is in the ordinary way; and I hope the judgment you will give, will declare it to be according to the law, in the ordinary way. And as for the commission itself, in the form of it, it is not a little varied from the ordinary accustomed form. But, my lord, the Petition of Right, Magna Charta, the statutes, and all declarations that have been spoken of, they are all confirmed in this, and all do confirm it; for in that ordinary tract, that hath been practised in this nation for 500 years, is Mr. Lilburne now to be tried, and that by the good old laws of England, Mr. Lilburne's birth-right, and every man's else, he has his trial; the beginning of which hath been Mr. Lilburne's presentment, which is already found by the grand inquest, who are men of integrity, men of ability, men of knowledge. My lord, he is now come to his trial, not in an extraordinary way, but by a jury of good and legal men of the neighbourhood; by men that do know, my lord, and understand what is fact, what is (c) law, and to do justice indifferently between both.

(c). "Mark that well; for Judge Jermya called it a damnable doctrine, when Mr. Lilburne declared the jury were judges of Law as well as of Fact." Orig. Edit.—Blackstone (Com. book 4, c. 27, s. 5) says, "The jury have an unquestionable right of determining upon all the circumstances, and finding a general verdict, if they think proper so to hazard a breach of their oaths." So also in b. 3, c. 23, vol. 3, p. 378, 15th edit.) the jury may, if they think proper, take upon themselves to determine, at their own hazard, the complicated question of fact and law.

And, my lord, I do know, and publish to all that now hear me, that the commission for trial of Mr. Lilburne this day, for those differences that are between the state and Mr. Lilburne, is free in law from all those exceptions that he is pleased to put upon it, and is unquestionably legal, and used for these many hundred years together. And as for Mr. Lilburne's declaring the fact, for which he was originally imprisoned, for to be committed in Surrey, and therefore there in law he ought to be tried, and not here in London, being another county; as for Mr. Lilburne's crimes committed in Surrey, his own conscience best knows what they are: but Mr. Lilburne, at most, can but yet guess at what we intend to try him here for, or lay unto his charge.

But, my lord, if Mr. Lilburne will please to put himself upon his trial according to law, my lord, I hope the court, and all that hears and sees their proceedings, will receive full satisfaction in the legality and fairness of their proceedings against him, and himself the benefit of justice and law.

Lieutenant-colonel Lilburne. Sir, by your favour, in two words, I shall not be tedious, I now perceive who is my accuser and prosecutor, the gentleman that is a very unequal one; for he is one of the creators (being a member of the house) of you that sit here this day to be my judges; and therefore an over-awing and unfit accuser or prosecutor.

Lord Keble. Mr. Lilburne, I pray you hear me a word; for now you speak not rationally nor discreetly: you have had a fair respect and hearing. What you speak of liberties and laws, we come here to maintain them for all, and for you too: and we also come for to vindicate our actions. And as for that you speak of in reference to the commission, I must let you know the commission is warrantable by the laws of England for these 500 years, nay, and before 500 years in substance. The second thing that you speak to, is, that you were apprehended in such an hostile manner, understanding by law you should have been taken in an ordinary way, by an ordinary officer. But, Mr. Lilburne, in all apprehensions of traitors, felons, and murderers, is not the power of the county to be raised, and the sheriff is to call and take what power he pleaseth.

Lilburne. By your favour, Sir, not unless I resist; which I did not. And besides, there was no sheriff, nor no other civil officer, at my apprehension.

Lord Keble. Mr. Lilburne, spare yourself: it is as they are informed of the danger of the man; they may do it before ever they see him. The next thing you are upon, is, the wrong and injustice that you received by the proceedings in the Star-Chamber against you. You see the proceedings there have been questioned, and you justified: if there be any thing else that hath been done by others in the north, or elsewhere acted, there is no man here that will justify them in their evil. But for a private man, as you are, to tell as of them here, and to come and tell us to our faces that we are created and constituted by the attorney-general, we will not suffer it, nor further hear of it. And therefore, Mr. Lilburne, although you have spoken fair words, (and happily more than your friends expected from you) I must tell you that words are but words; and it were well that you would do as well and as rationally as becomes a rational man, as you have declared you will.

Lilburne. With your favour, but one word more.

Judge Jerwin. Mr. Lilburne, pray spare a word, and hear the court: this court sits here by lawful authority, and that is from the parliament, that are the supreme authority of England; so that our power is not derived from those that have no rightful authority to constitute us, but our power is from the public authority of England, which is now by an admirable act of God's providence, lately, but truly revived and settled by God upon them. By that authority this court doth now sit; and you are brought here before them that are most of us judges of the law, and we are sworn to do you and every man justice and right, according as his cause requires, according to law, judgment, equity, and reason. And it was said truly, that which my brother Heath (who now is dead) did say, It is the duty of the judges to be of counsel with the prisoner at the bar before him, and to do that which they are sworn to do: and that you shall have. And accordingly you have received more favour than ever I heard of a prisoner that ever was accused of treason in my life ever had. And as for the commission, I must tell you it is usual to have commissions of Oyer and Terminer, and that even in term-time, for high offences, and such as tend to the destruction of the nation, as Overbury's did, and those that tend to capital treason, whereof you are now accused, by a grand-jury of London, that are freemen of London, citizens, able men, men of religion, men of estate, men of conscience, men of quality: these are your accusers; who have found you, upon their oaths, guilty of treason, and cry out to us the judges for justice against you: and it is they, not we, that proceeded against you. And as for our commission, it is according to the good old laws of the land, founded upon the statute made in Edward the first's time, called Westminster the second. That statute authorized commissions: according to that commission we sit by here this day. And Edward the first was a wise and a good prince, and consented to the people, to let them have such commissions as ours we sit by is, which the people had fought stoutly for in the barons wars in his father's time, and also in his; for he himself was taken prisoner at Lewes, in the county of Sussex. And being a wise prince, he knew, that the love of the people was not more to be got than by wholesome and safe laws, that every man's life, and every man's estate, and every man's liberty, might be preserved by, and not be subject to any arbitrary will or power; but that the sober, and discreet, and wise laws of the kingdoms, which our ancestors won by their swords, might be their protectors. A special one of which was the statute of Westminster the second, made in Edward the first's time: by virtue of which statute is this commission directed to the justices of the one bench and the other; and they be all here this day, but only those that of necessity must attend at Westminster, only to preserve the term. Now you are come to answer to that charge, which hath been the greatest opposition to the settlement of government that can be: I mean the settlement of the supreme authority of the nation in the commons now assembled in parliament, not newly erected, but revived into the right place and hands; for it is the law of England revived, that the supreme authority is in the (f) commons assembled in the parliament of England: for so it was in the Saxons time, and the Romans time, and in all times (g) it hath been as it is now; which will sufficiently justify our present proceedings against you. And therefore, I say, for the commission itself, it is in general for the trial of all treasons whatsoever. But the grand inquest have found out no other traitor, that they may accuse, but master John Lilburne, who is now here at the bar. But it is not a bare accusation, but it is the solemn verdict of almost a double jury that hath appeared upon the roll; and upon their oaths do conceive those crimes of treason that are laid against you, to be of so dangerous consequence against the state and commonwealth, that they do call for justice against you as a traitor already found guilty. And therefore I do require you, as you are an Englishman, and a rational man, that you do conform yourself, and tell us plainly what you will do, as in reference to the putting yourself upon your trial by the law, and hear with patience those offences of treason that are laid to your charge.

Lilburne. May it please you, Sir, by your favour, I shall not now trouble you with many words.

Lord Keble. You go improperly to work.

(f) "But by his favour, never before practised nor used without both King and Lords; a precedent of which he is desired to shew and produce out of any of his law-books." Orig. Edit.

(g) "But there were before the Conquest twelve Inns of court, lawyers, nor term-judges, in England, but only twelve good and legal men, chosen in each hundred, finally to decide all controversies: which lasted till William the Conqueror subdued that excellent constitution, and instead thereof introduced by his will and sword (contrary to his solemn oath, three several times taken) the intolerable bondage of Westminster Hall, or term-judges, and their Norman law-practice in the French tongue; as all the English chronicles truly declare." Orig. Edit.

Lilburne. That gentleman, I do not know his name, (pointing to Judge Jermin :) You were pleased to say, That I have had more favour than ever you have heard of any before ever had, in the like case. But, Sir, by your favour, I shall tell you of some that in the like case have had as much, if not more; and that was Throgmorton, in queen Mary's time, who was impeached of higher Treason than now I am; and that in the days of the commonly accounted bloodiest and cruellest prince that this many hundred of years hath reigned in England: And yet, Sir, I am sure in this very place, and that by special commission of Oyer and Terminer; who was accused for being one of the chiefest confederates with Wyatt, in his Kentish Rebellion; which Wyatt marched with an army against the queen to London: For which actual war or rebellion, Throgmorton was in this place arraigned as a Traitor, and enjoyed as much, if not more favour, than I have now enjoyed, although his then judges and prosecutor were bent to take away his life (h), right or wrong. And therefore, Sir, by your favour, it is no extraordinary favour that you have afforded me; it is but only my right by law and justice, and common equity. But, Sir, I shall be short, and put my business to a plain issue, which is this: I have here at the bar given in many strong arguments against the validity and legality of a special commission of Oyer and Terminer, and supposing that to be such an one by virtue of which you sit, and intend to try me for my life; and therefore I have humbly desired (as in reason and I think in law, I may justly do) to hear your commission read; but you have positively denied me that. And therefore I desire all my friends, and all the people that hear me this day, to bear witness, and take notice, that you, contrary to reason and common equity, denied me to let me hear read your commission, by virtue of which you go about to take away my life; which I cannot chuse but desire them to take notice, I declare to be very hard measure.—But, Sir, to save myself from your forced suares and desired advantage against me, I will come a little closer to the business. You demand I should hold up my hand at the bar; and I know not what it means, neither what a law it signifies. It is true, I have read the most part of the laws that are in English, which I take to be the foundation of all our legal English privileges; and in them I cannot find any thing that doth clearly declare unto me the full signification or meaning of a man's

* See No. 52, vol. 1, p. 869.

(h) "Whose remarkable and excellent Defence you may at large read in Hollingshead's Chronicle, in the Life of Queen Mary, which discourse is excellently well worth the speedily reprinting, especially seeing men are made traitors for words; which cruelty Queen Mary abhorred, as may clearly be read in that excellent statute of her's, made in the first year of her reign, c. 1." Orig. Edit.

holding up his hand at the bar. Therefore, if you please but to explain what the meaning and signification of holding up the hand at the bar is, I shall seriously consider of it, and, I hope, return you a rational and discreet answer: For truly in those laws which are in the English tongue that I have read, although I find mention made of holding up the hand, yet I cannot find much of the full signification of it; only I find it to be of a large extent. And as for those laws, or rather the practice part of the law, that are in French and Latin, I cannot read them, and therefore much less understand them. In which regard, for me to hold up my hand at the bar before I understand the true signification of it in law, (which tells me it is in itself a ticklish thing) were for me to throw away my own life upon a punctilio or nicety that I am ignorant of; and therefore, truly, I think I should be a very fool, in my own ignorance to run that danger. And therefore, Sir, I humbly desire the clear explanation of the meaning of it in law, and after that I shall give you a fair and rational Answer.

Lord Keble. Mr. Lilburne, you shall see we will deal very rationally with you, and not ensnare you in the least manner, if that be all. The holding up of your hand, we will tell you what it means and signifies in law: The calling the party to hold up his hand at the bar, is no more but for the special notice that the party is the man enquired for, or called on; and therefore if you be Mr. John Lilburne, and be the man that we charge, do but say that you are the man, and that you are there, and it shall suffice.

Lilburne. I am John Lilburne, son of Mr. Richard Lilburne.

Lord Keble. Mr. Lilburne, what you have to say we will hear presently; only take notice that we will take your acknowledging of your name to be sufficient, if you will say that you are the man. You are called by your name, you have come and answered to your name, in order to your answering the Charge to be read against you; do but this, and it shall suffice without holding up your hand. Therefore let us have no more discourse as to that.

Judge Jermin. Mr. Lilburne, pray spare me a word; for you have been heard with patience. You have desired to have the right of the law of England; and yet you do question a fundamental thing, that hath been always used in case of criminal offences. By the law of England, that you desire to have the meaning of it, is but just; but you must know that the law of England is the law of God; and if there be any thing in the law of England, but what was by admirable constitution and reason, we would not meddle with it. But I pray know this, that the law of England is no written law: It is the law that hath been maintained by our ancestors, by the tried rules of reason, and the prime laws of nature; for it does not depend upon statutes, or written and declared words or lines (i). And this is our laws, that have been maintained by our ancestors, and is subordinate to the law and will of God: Therefore I say again, the law of England is pure primitive reason, uncorrupted and unpolluted by human humours, or human corruptions, wits, or wills: That is the law of England. There be two reasons why holding up the hand hath been used always: First, for notice that those that are called for capital and criminal offences, that they hold up their hands, is to declare that they are the men. My lord hath given you this one reason already; which, I say, is, that he be notified by holding up the hand to all the beholders, and those that be present, and hear him that he is the man. But besides this, there is more in it; that is thus: A pure innocent hand does set forth a clear unspotted heart; that so the heart and hand together might betoken innocency. And therefore hold up your hand, that thereby you may declare you have a pure innocent heart. If you refuse to do this, you do wilfully deprive yourself of the benefit of one of the main proceedings and customs of the laws of England. Now for this, do what you think fit.

Lilburne. Well, then, Sir, (applying himself to Mr. Keble, as the President of the Court) I take your explanation of it, and lay hold of that.

Lord Keble. You must answer positively, Sir, for you have had advice enough, yea, good advice if you embrace it, it is good advice to you; but the Court doth not expect an Answer from you to what hath been already said to you, but they expect that without any more dispute you apply yourself to answer according to that which you are advised unto. Do it if you will, and if you will but answer to it so as hath been declared unto you, it shall suffice; but so far you must go to this, as to declare whether you be the man or no before you go away. And therefore dispute it no more, lest you deprive yourself of the benefit of the law.

Lilburne. Well then, Sir, according to your

(i) " 'But,' saith Mr. Hyde, in his fore-mentioned Arguments against the Northern Special Commission of Oyer and Terminer, page 411, 'Misera servitus est, ubi jus est vagum aut incognitum;' that is to say It is a miserable servitude where the law is uncertain or unknown. And the very same saith that great oracle of the law, Sir Edw. Coke, in the Proem to the 3d part of his Institutes, and in the 4th part, fol. 332, and in several places besides. But the people may easily see hereby, that these present judges drive to have no other law in being in England, but what is in their own and their masters' breasts; that so, by pretence of law, they may give away all the liberties and properties of the people of the nation, as their brother judges did lately to the King, in the case of Ship-money. And then woe, and woe to the people, to be brought back again to that faith, 'That Ignorance is the mother of Devotion or Obedience.'" Orig. Edit.

own explanation, I say my name is John Lilburne, son to Mr. Richard Lilburne of the county of Durham, a freeman of the city of London, and sometimes lieutenant colonel in the Parliament's Army: And if you will not believe that I am the man, my guardian the Lieutenant of the Tower there, (pointing to him) will aver that I am.

Lord Keble. So then you are the man.

Judge Jermin. Ask him again: Harken, Mr. Lilburne, hearken what he says, and use that moderation, and temper, and discretion that you have promised.

Lilburne. One word more, and I shall have done; and that is by the law of England— [But being interrupted he cried out] With your favour, Sir, I will come to the main thing; I hope you do not go about to circumvent me, therefore hear me, I beseech you.

Lord Keble. Hear the Court, Mr. Lilburne, there shall be nothing of circumvention or interruption: but as you have professed to be a rational and understanding man in words, let your deeds so declare you.

Lilburne. Sir, I beseech you; do not surprise me with punctilios or niceties, which are hard things for me to lose my life upon. I tell you again, my name is John Lilburne, son to Mr. Richard Lilburne.

Lord Keble. Talk not of punctilios with us, nor talk not of judges made by the laws; you shall not want law: but if you talk of punctilios here in this room, we will stop that language.

Lilburne. Truly, Sir, I am upon my life, and shall my ignorance of the formalities of the law, in the practice part thereof, destroy me? God forbid! Therefore give me but leave to speak for my life, or else knock me on the head, and murder me where I stand; which is more righteous and just than to do it by pretence of justice. Sir, I know that Mr. Bradshaw himself, President of the High Court of Justice, as it was called, gave Duke Hamilton (a hostile enemy) leave to speak to the punctilios of the law; yea, and to my knowledge, again and again made an engagement unto him, and the rest tried with him, that the Court nor he would not, by virtue of their ignorance of the niceties or formalities of the law, take advantage against them, to destroy them; but did declare, again and again, that all advantages of formalities should be totally laid aside, and not in the least made use of against them to their prejudice. And I hope you will grant me, that have often been in arms for you, but never against you, as much favour and privilege as was granted to Duke Hamilton, never of your party, but a general of a numerous army against you.

Lord Keble. Take it as you will, we have had patience with you, and you must and shall have patience with us. We will pass over all that is by-past, but take heed, by your surly crossness, you give not advantage in the face of the Court, to pass sentence against you, without any further proceedings, or proof of your actions, but what our own eyes see. The ceremony is for your advantage more than you are aware of; but if you confess yourself to be Mr. John Lilburne, we have done as to that.

Judge Jermin. Mr. Lilburne, at the beginning you talked of moderation, and that you would carry yourself with rationality, which, methinks, in your actions you fall short of; for you have said, that Mr. Attorney-General was a very unequal prosecutor of you, because, you say, he was the (k) creator of your commission. Pray, hear me; I heard you; and do not think to put affronts upon us undeserved. And as for that man that you call Mr. Bradshaw, I tell you again, he is Lord President of the Council of State of the Commonwealth of England; and why you should so much neglect him, doth not so much favour of rationality and moderation, as you pretend yourself to be possessed with.

Lord Keble. Come, will you read the indictment?

Mr. Broughton reads, Hold up your hand, John Lilburne, and hearken to your Charge.— 'Thou standest indicted of High Treason, by the name of John Lilburne, late of London, gent. for that thou, as a false traitor, not having the fear of God before thy eyes, but being stirred up and moved by the instigation of the Devil,' &c. as followeth, verbatim, is the second Day's Proceedings, to which the Reader is referred.

Mr. Broughton. What say'st thou, John Lilburne, art thou guilty of this treason whereof thou standest indicted, or not guilty?

Lilburne. Gentlemen, I require the favour that I may be heard, and I shall desire nothing but that which may stand with reason and justice.

Lord Keble. Mr. Lilburne, we shall deal with you according to reason and justice, and after such a manner as you yourself shall judge rational and right.

Lilburne. Gentlemen, I shall speak but a few words; I beseech you, hear me; for as upon my life.

Lord Keble. You say, you will deal rationally in those ways; that is to be expected from you; the first in reason is to answer, and plead, and before you so do, you cannot be heard.

Lilburne. Give me leave to speak, and I shall not speak six lines; (which with much struggling being granted), Mr. Lilburne went on, and said to this effect: Then, Sir, thus by the Laws of England, I am not to answer to questions against or concerning myself.

(k) "Mr. Lilburne here endeavoured to speak, and shew the Judge his mistake; for he did not say that Mr. Prideaux was the Creator of the Commission, but that he was one of the Creators of all the Judges, and thereby was judge of his judges, and in that regard he was no competent accuser or prosecutor. But they would not suffer him to speak, but cried out, 'Hear the Court!' Which thing also they frequently did afterwards." Orig. Edit.

Lord Keble. You shall not be compelled.

Another Judge. Mr. Lilburne, is this to answer against yourself, to say, you are not guilty? by the Laws of the Land you are to plead to our Charge, and it is no accusing of yourself to say, Guilty, or Not Guilty.

Lilburne. Sir, by your favour—

Judge Keble. To answer, that you are Not Guilty, is no great matter, nor definite in law.

Lilburne. By the Law of England I am to be tried by a Rule; but I do not know, by the Rules of Law, what benefit, in reference to my exception against the illegality of my Indictment, I may deprive myself of, in case I should answer before I except.

Lord Keble. The law is plain, that you are positively to answer, Guilty, or Not Guilty, which you please.

Lilburne. Sir, by the Petition of Right, I am not to answer to any questions concerning myself; therefore I humbly entreat you to afford me the privileges of the Laws of England, and I will return a positive answer to it; if you will but please to allow me but Counsel, that I may consult with them; for I am ignorant of the formalities of law, in the practice part of it, although I here declare, I own the good old Laws of England, and a legal jury of twelve men, yea, and a trial by a jury of legal men. And I do humbly crave, Sir, a copy of the Indictment, or so much of it as I may ground my Plea upon it, and reasonable time to consult with my Counsel, although it be but eight or nine days.

Lord Keble. You speak well; but you must do well; it is that we come for: the reasonableness of it is this, that you should shortly answer to that question, and in a rational, legal way. When you have answered it, you shall have liberty to make your Defence, to maintain that you say; but this, that we now speak of, is a thing in your own breast, in your own knowledge, whether you be guilty of this that is laid to your charge, or no; and if you be clear, you cannot wrong yourself nor your conscience: for in saying, Not Guilty, you know better what you say than any other doth.

Lilburne. Sir, I am ignorant of the formalities of the law, having no books in English wherein I can read them; and as for other tongues, I understand none: and therefore for you to take away my life for my ignorance, when the practice part of the law, or the formalities thereof, is locked up in strange language, that it is impossible for me to read or understand, is extreme hard.—It is true, in those English plain laws which I have read, I find something spoken of it; but must aver, that I find there is a great deal of nicety and danger in locking a man up to single formalities, in answering Guilty or Not Guilty: and therefore I beseech you to assign me counsel, to inform my ignorance, and give me but leave to consult with my counsel, and I will return you an answer according to your desire, without any demar, as soon as it is possible for me to know what grounds I go upon.

Mr. Broughton. John Lilburne, what sayest thou, art thou Guilty of the Treason laid unto thy charge, or art thou Not Guilty?

Lilburne. But under favour thus, for you to come to ensnare and entrap me with unknown niceties and formalities that are locked up in the French and Latin tongue, and cannot be read in English books, they being not expressed in any law of the kingdom, published in our own English tongue: it is not fair play according to the law of England, plainly in English expressed in the Petition of Right, and other the good old statute laws of the land. Therefore I again humbly desire to have counsel assigned to me, to consult with, what these formalities in law signify; so that I may not throw away my life ignorantly upon forms.

Lord Keble. Mr. Lilburne, we cannot grant you that favour, it is not consistent to the law, whatsoever you say to the contrary.

Lilburne. I hope you will not go about to ensnare me, and take away my life for puerilities.

Another Judge. Well then, you will not plead?

Lilburne. Yes, if I may be allowed that which I conceive to be my birth-right and privilege, to consult with counsel: or that you please to make the same engagement to me that Mr. Bradshaw, as the President of the High Court of Justice, made to duke Hamilton; which was, that the court would take no advantage at all of his ignorance in the niceties and formalities of the law in his pleading*: but let me enjoy this engagement from you, and I will plead.

Lord Keble. You shall have that which is according to the law; therefore, Mr. Lilburne, I advise you for to plead, and you shall have fair play, and no advantage taken against you by your ignorance of the formality of the law.

Lilburne. Well then, Sir, upon that engagement, and because I see you are so positive in the thing—this is my Answer: That I am not guilty of any of the treasons in manner and form, as they are there laid down in that Indictment (pointing to it.) And therefore now, Sir, having pleaded, I crave the liberty of England, that you will assign me counsel.

Mr. Broughton. By whom wilt thou be tried?

Lilburne. By the known laws of England, and a legal jury of my equals, constituted according to law.

Mr. Broughton. By whom wilt thou be tried?

Lilburne. By the known laws of England, I mean, by the liberties and privileges of the laws of England, and a jury of my equals legally chosen. And now, Sir, I again desire counsel to be assigned me, to consult with in point of law, that so I may not destroy myself through my ignorance. This is but the same privilege that was granted at Oxford unto me, and the rest of my fellow prisoners arraigned with me.

* This particular does not appear in the report of the Case of the Duke of Hamilton, ante, p. 1155.

One of the Clerks. You must say, By God and your Country; that's the form of the law.

Lilburne. Why must I say so?

Another Judge. This is the form and law of the land: Will you plead, Mr. Lilburne, according to the laws of England?

Lilburne. Truly I never read it, Sir, in the laws of England, what it is to plead in this nature.

Lord Keble. You say you will be tried by the laws of the land, then it is by the country, and so you may plead, and do yourself no harm; for by the country is meant a jury of your equals.

Lilburne. Sir, I am doubtful of my ignorance in the laws, yet I will return you an answer, you making good your already engaged promises, that you will take no advantage against me, if through my ignorance, and your importunity, I plead in any form, that in strictness of acceptation may deprive me of any real benefit the law will afford me.

Judge Thorpe. Mr. Lilburne, you will be tried by the law, and by the rules thereof: when you say so, you do really declare it to be by your country. So that the true signification of being tried by the law, is the same thing in substance with being tried by the rules of the law.

Lilburne. Then I hope my answer is clear and fair, Sir.

Judge Jermin. The formality is shortly this: to be tried by God and your country; no more is meant by it than thus, by God, as God is every where present, yea in all courts of justice, and sits and knows all things that are acted, said, and done: the other part of it, by your country, that is, by your country or neighbourhood; the country is called Patria, because your neighbour and your equals, which you are willing to put yourself upon the trial of. By force of that word, the country, a jury of the neighbourhood for trial of you are summoned. New do what you will.

Lilburne. Sir, under your favour, thus; then in the negative I say God is not locally or corporally here present to try me, or pass upon me; but affirmative, I return this answer, That I desire to be tried in the presence of that God, that by his omnipotent power is present every where, and beholds all the actions that are done upon the earth, and sees and knows whether any of your hearts be possessed with a premeditated malice against me, or whether any of you come with so much forethought of malice against me, as that in your hearts you intend to do the utmost you can, right or wrong, to destroy me: and before this all-seeing God I desire to be tried, and by my country, that is to say, by a jury of my equals, according to the good old laws of the land.

Justice Thorp. You have spoken very well.

Lord Keble. You have done like an Englishman so far as you have gone; and I do assure, that in any formality (as you express or call them) there shall be no advantage against you, if you mistake in them. Now what you have the next to think upon, is your jury of your countrymen, or neighbours of your equals; and I promise you, we will take care of that, that they shall be good and lawful men of England.

Lilburne. I thank you, Sir, but under your favour thus: your indictment is extreme long, and of abundance of particulars, it is impossible that my memory, or any one man's in England, can contain it, or carry it in our heads; and therefore that I may make my defence so as becomes a rational Englishman, I earnestly request you, that now you will be pleased to give me a copy of my indictment, or so much of it, as you expect a plea from me upon, and as answer unto, and counsel assigned me, and time to debate with my counsel, and subpoena for witnesses.

Ld. Keble. For counsel, you need none, Mr. Lilburne: for that Not Guilty which you have pleaded, is that which lies in your own breast, which rests in your own counsel, and you know how it is, and can best plead that yourself: counsel lies in matter of law, not of fact.

Lilburne. Under favour I desire counsel for Matter of Law, and not for Matter of Fact. My indictment I believe in law, is all matter of law, and I have something to say to it in law.

Ld. Keble. If matter of law do arise upon the proof of the fact, you shall know it, and then shall have counsel assigned to you.

Lilburne. I myself have before this been upon some trials, and never before this was denied counsel, no, nor so much as ever disputed whether I should have it or no. I also was at a great part of the earl of Strafford's trial, who was supposed a most notorious traitor; and yet, if my observation and memory do not exceedingly fail me, he had counsel assigned him at his first desire, and they were continually with him, not only at the bar when he was there, but also had continual and free access to him in prison.—Besides, Sir, I being accused of treason in such an extraordinary manner, and being but an ordinary man myself; no eminent experienced lawyer dare well meddle with my business, no, nor so much as bestow a visit upon me, but he runs a hazard of being undone. And truly my estate is in an extraordinary manner taken from me, so that I have not money to send messengers up and down privately to their chambers: and therefore that I may be freely and allowedly able, without danger of ruin to any man that shall advise me, I shall humbly crave as my right by law, and I am sure by common equity and justice, that I may have counsel and solicitors also assigned me.

Ld. Keble. Mr. Lilburne, speak rationally for yourself; when there comes a matter of law, that you are able to say, This is for matter of law, arising from matter of fact, that hath been proved or endeavoured to be proved, when you come beyond that, you shall have it as willingly as you can desire: and withal, this that you say concerning your memory, which you say is not able to carry away, or contain the particulars of this indictment; the indictment, so much as will charge your memory, will be very short: for it is the publishing of those books charged upon you in the indictment, that will be the matter which will stick, and that matter will be very short, which we must prove against you, which is only matter of fact, and not of law. And therefore for fact of treason you can be allowed no counsel, but must plead it yourself.

Lilburne. Sir, under favour, you expect from me impossibilities; for, seeing I have been seven months in prison for nothing, and could not in the least know perfectly what would be laid to my charge, nor after what manner I should be proceeded against, (considering all proceedings against me hitherto have been so absolutely arbitrary, that it was impossible for me in law exactly to come provided :) and therefore seeing I am now here, and you pretend to proceed with me according to the due course of law, and seeing the form of the proceedings in this manner with me is not expressly and exactly declared in print in English, which tongue only I can read and understand; and seeing by the law, which is in English, which I have read, and clearly understand, that there are a great many snares, and a great many niceties in the practice, that are formal proceedings of the law; and seeing I know not certainly, whether if I proceed to matter of proof, before in law I make my exceptions against your indictment, as to matter, time and place, I be not in law deprived of that benefit, which I principally aim at for the preservation of my life; therefore I beseech and most earnestly intreat you, to assign me counsel to consult with, before I be too far insnared: and, if you will not do it, and give me some reasonable time to prepare my plea and defence, then order me to be knocked on the head immediately in the place where I stand, without any further trial, for I must needs be destroyed, if you deny me all the means of my preservation.

Judge Jermin. Mr. Lilburne, it were reasonable to give you satisfaction, if you would receive it. You say you were present at my lord of Strafford's Trial, and you say he had counsel assigned him, not only to stand by him at the bar, but to repair to prison to instruct and advise: but that was not a trial in such a way as this is; it was a trial by way of impeachment before the peers assembled in parliament, and his attainder was made up into an act of parliament; but that is not a trial at the common law per Pares, which is that which yourself have desired, a trial by lawful men, according to the liberties of the laws of England. After your answer to your first question, that is to say, whether you be guilty or not guilty of the things whereof you are accused, no counsel in the world can follow, till the fact be proved, and matter of law do arise thereupon. So that the first thing that must be done, the matter of fact must be proved against you; and then, if it shall appear thereupon to the court, that matter of law doth arise, and you do expect counsel, we must and will perform it; the court are of your counsel so far as to fact. And then in that case, that law arise thereupon, you may, and ought to have other counsel assigned; and do not you doubt but the court will be as careful of you, as you can be of yourself, and allow you more favour, it may be, than your friends do expect.

Lilburne. Under your favour, and by your good liking, I was once arraigned at Oxford for my life, upon the matter of treason, for levying war in Oxfordshire against the king, as their indictment then said; and my arraignment was by virtue of a commission of Oyer and Terminer, that was (and in law I am sure of it) as legal and as just as yours is: and my lord chief justice Heath, the chief commissioner or president, who was in the eye of the law as legal a judge as any of you, and yet he—

Ld. Keble. Mr. Lilburne, we do remember it.

Lilburne. I beseech you give me leave to speak for myself, and to go on, for my life lies upon it.

Ld. Keble. Hear me one word, and you shall have two. This that you did speak but even now, do not think that we have such bad memories, as that we have already forgot it; your life is by law as dear as our lives, and our souls are at stake if we do you any wrong.

Lilburne. I wish you may be sensible of that, Sir.

Judge Jermin. Mr. Lilburne, you need not to say so, our souls are upon it, and we are to stand or fall by justice and righteousness as well as yourself is.

Lilburne. I say, my lord Heath and the court at Oxford proffered me counsel before any one witness was produced to my face, or any matter of fact came to the proof; yea, and gave me liberty to make my exceptions to the insufficiency of the indictment, which was very short in comparison of yours. I crave the same privilege from you (the nation's pretended friends) that I found at Oxford amongst its declared pretended enemies, against whom in several battles I had fought. And I hope you that pretend to be the preservers of the liberties of England, will not be more cruel and unrighteous than the declared destroyers of them. If you will not allow me counsel as I had there, I have no more to say to you, you may murder me if you please.

Judge Jermin. You were pleased to mention some precedents of those that have been accused of High-Treason, that have had counsel assigned to them; and for one you mention that of my lord Strafford, whose trial I told you was parliamentary before the house of peers, upon the impeachment of the commons of England in parliament assembled, and so it went on in a parliamentary way: this proceeding is in an ordinary course of the ordinary quondam court of justice, according to the common law. Now for my lord of Strafford, give me leave to observe this; he had no counsel assigned him until such time as questions of the law did arise, which required counsel, and then he had counsel assigned him, but none before; for that my lord doth not say, that you shall have no counsel, but that you shall have that which the law allows. And as for that which you speak of counsel at Oxford, it could not be. But when, upon the proof of matter of fact, it appears to the court that there is any question or matter of law arising upon the fact; and when it doth so appear unto us, then you shall have counsel for that. But (I beseech you) hear me on: You are now come before us, according to the common law, to be tried by your country; there is now nothing in question, but whether that matter, that thing, those words contained in the indictment read to you, be true, yea or no; that is, whether they be done or no: for we will not give counsel to plead to the matter of fact contained in your own books, which you remember very well.

Lilburne. Those books supposed mine: pray let me have fair play, and not be wound and screwed up into hazards and snares.

Ld. Keble. If they be not yours upon good grounds proved before you, you are in no danger; and if upon the proofs of the words and deeds done, there do appear matter of law, you must and shall have counsel: stay till that be done. In the mean time the court will take care that a jury shall be returned, of honest and sufficient legal men to judge of the proofs.

Lilburne. There was arraigned with me at Oxford colonel Vivers, of Banbury, now alive, and captain Catesby, who is dead: I will bring colonel Vivers to depose here upon his oath, that my lord Heath, and the rest of the Commissioners of Oyer and Terminer, proffered me counsel, and allowed me and him counsel before ever so much as any witnesses were produced, to prove the least matter of fact. And if you will not be so just towards me as the cavaliers were, and allow me counsel as they did, I have no more to say, but resolve upon this score to stand, and here to die upon the principles of an Englishman. If you will not be so just as the cavaliers were, with whom you and the parliament set us together by the ears to fight with, pretendedly for their injustice, let God and all righteous men judge betwixt you and me.

Judge Nichols. If you will not be led by the proceedings of law, it will be worse for you; and you are to know this is not Oxford.

Lilburne. Sir, by what better rules of the law can I be led by, than those that I have before my eyes? I am sure, at Oxford, as my right by law, I was, before any fact was proved, proffered counsel by my judges, which were my lord Heath, and Mr. Gardiner, now sir Thomas Gardiner, who is now in London: if you please, I will produce him to this bar, to justify it upon his oath, That the Lord Chief Justice Heath in his presence proffered me counsel upon my arraignment for treason there, as my right by the Privileges of the laws of England, before the fact came to be proved; yea, and also give me liberty to assign the errors of my indictment. He is now in London, and I will produce him here at this bar, if you please, to justify what I say, if you will give me time, and enable me with ability to summon him in.

Judge Nichols. Mr. Lilburne, whether Mr. Gardiner will justify it or no, it is nothing to us; for we are not to walk by Oxford precedents, but by the rules of the law: and the law will afford you no counsel, but in points of law arising upon proof of the fact (1).

Lilburne. Under favour thus: I conceive the precedents at Oxford, so far as they are righteous, are fit for your imitation; and whether it be a righteous thing for you, when I am tried for treason before you, to be more cruel towards me, who have fought for you, than the cavaliers at Oxford in the like case were, against whom I fought: and I must tell you, I further conceived it the most unequal and unjust thing in the world for me to have to do, upon the trial of my life, with all the judges of the land (who are all engaged men) that have had above six months time to beat their brains together, with the assistance of divers of my adversaries, who are parliament-men, that were the creators of their power, and for one of them to be my prosecutor; and in this so extraordinary case, for me to be denied to consult with counsel; I tell you, Sir, it is most unjust, and the most unrighteous thing, in my apprehension, that I ever heard of, or saw in all my life. O Lord! was there ever such a pack of unjust and unrighteous judges in the world? Sir, in plain English, let me tell you, if I had thought you would have bound me up to a single plea, and not have given me in my plea the just latitude of law, equity, and reason, but hold me thus close to your single formalities, contrary to your promises, I would rather have died in this very court before I would have pleaded one word unto you; for now you go about, by my own ignorance and folly, to make myself guilty of taking away my own life; and therefore unless you will permit me counsel, upon this lock I am resolved to die.

Lord Keble. This is not the rational way you said you would go in.

Lilburne. Sir, my life is before you; you may murder me, and take away my blood, if you please.

Lord Keble. I will not be out-voiced by you; our lives and our souls are upon it, therefore you shall have equity and justice; yea, such as you desire yourself: but you are now going to fly into extravagancies and heats, which will manifest the raucour of the distemper and inveniomedness of spirit which is within you. And besides, if we should enter into it,

(1) "What a lying judge is this Mr. Nichols! whereas he himself, with Mr. John Maynard the lawyer, was assigned by the President, Lord Chief Baron Wylde, to be of the Counsel, with Major Rolfe, upon his desire; and that before ever the Grand Jury found his indictment of Treason, as is fully declared in the next day's following Plea of Mr. Lilburne." Orig. Edit.

we might aggravate your crimes by your own words at the bar. Take heed of it, that you give not advantage against yourself to your own ruin.

Lilburne. Sir, I am in no heats, I am but with earnestness pleading for my life, when you deny me all the just means of my preservation, which is my right and due by your own law.

Judge Thorp. Mr. Lilburne, I desire to correct a mistake of yours in the law: You were pleased to condemn it as unjust, for the attorney-general's speaking with me when your indictment was a reading; you are to know, he is the prosecutor for the state here against you, and he must confer with us upon several occasions, and we with him, and this is law.

Lilburne. Not upon the bench, Sir, by your favour, unless it be openly, audibly and avowedly, and not in any clandestine and whispering way: And by your favour, for all you are a judge, this is law, or else sir Edward Coke, in his (m) 3d part instit. cap. high treason, or petty treason, hath published falsehoods, and the parliament hath licensed them; for their stamp in a special manner is to that book.

Judge Thorp. Sir Edward Coke is law, and he says, The attorney-general, or any other prosecutor may speak with us in open court, to inform us about the business before us in open court.

Lilburne. Not in hugger-mugger, privately or whisperingly.

Judge Thorp. I tell you, Sir, the attorney-general may talk with any in the court, by law, as he did with me.

Lilburne. I tell you, Sir, it is unjust, and not warrantable by law, for him to talk with the court, or any of the judges thereof, in my absence, or in hugger-mugger, or by private whisperings.

Ld. Keble. No, Sir; it is no hugger-mugger for him to do as he did; spare your words, and burst not out into passion; for thereby you will declare yourself to be within the compass of your indictment, without any further proof; Look to it, that you behave yourself according to the bounds of reason and law, and hear me; for we must cause the jury to be returned.

Lilburne. Sir, under favour, I crave but one word more, hear me out. I know very well, and I read it in your own law-books, such a prerogative, as that in cases of treason no counsel shall plead against the king, hath been sometimes challenged to be the king's right by law; but, let me tell you, it was an usurped prerogative of the late king, with all other arbitrary prerogatives and unjust usurpations upon the people's rights and freedoms, which has been pretended to be taken away with him.

(m) "Whose words there, fol. 29, 30, are so plain and express to prove what Mr. Lilburne said to be good law, as nothing in the world can be plainer. See also, to the same purpose, the 2d part Instit. fol. 49, 103, 104." Orig. Edit.

And Sir, can it be just to allow me counsel to help me to plead for my estate, the lesser; and to deny me the help of counsel to enable me to plead for my life, the greater? Nay, Sir, can it be just in you judges, to take up 7 years time in ending some suits of law for a little money or land, and deny me a few days to consider what to plead for my life? Sir, all these pretences of yours were but all the prerogatives of the king's will, to destroy the poor ignorant and harmless people by, which undoubtedly died with him; or else only the name or title is gone with him, but not the power or hurtful tyranny or prerogative in the least. Therefore seeing all such pretended and hurtful prerogatives are pretended to be taken away with the king, by those that took away his life, I earnestly desire I may be assigned counsel to consult with, knowing now especially no pretence why I should be denied that benefit and privilege of the law, of the just and equitable law of England, having put myself upon a trial according to the privileges thereof. And it was declared to me at Oxford, upon the trial of my life there, after I was taken prisoner fighting against the king and his party, even almost to handy-gripes, and to the sword-point, and to the butt-end of our muskets, being in person one of that little number that for many hours together at Brentford fought with the king's whole army, where in the manner, without any articles or composition, I was taken a prisoner, and immediately thereupon arraigned at Oxford; where, notwithstanding all this, it was declared to me by judge Heath to be my right, by the law of England, to have counsel assigned me to help me in point of law, and I had it granted. I confess he is my best authority that I have, and I am sure he was a judge of the law, or else I had never pleaded to him; and he was upon his oath to do justice and right; and he was an able and understanding lawyer, and yet did allow me, an hostile enemy, counsel to help me, as my right by law, before ever any proof to matter of fact was produced: And I beg but the same legal privilege from you, from whom I have more cause to expect it.

Ld. Keble. Were you there indicted for treason?

Lilburne. Yes, that I was, and for the highest of treasons, by the letter of the law, for actual levying war against the king.

Judge Thorp. And yet, for all that you know it was no treason, and so did he too; for you know that you had committed no treason at all in obeying the parliament's command; for what you have done, was done by the parliament's special authority and command; and you had your commission to justify you in your hostile actions; and he knew it well enough your act was no treason, though he did offer you counsel, or else he durst not allow you counsel.

Lilburne. I had nothing to justify me in that act, but the equitable sense of the law, the letter of it being point-blank against me, and on the cavaliers side; by which if they had prevailed, they might have hanged both you and me for levying war against the king, notwithstanding our parliament-commissions: and this I know, Sir, you know to be law in the letter or punctilio's of it.

Judge Thorp. It was no treason in you, and he that assigned you counsel, knew it was no treason; and this arraignment of you was as illegal as his assigning you counsel.

Lilburne. Sir, by your favour, he was a judge of the law by legal authority, being made by the king, in whom by law, that power was invested: and he looked upon himself as a legal judge, and so did I too: and as a legal judge he arraigned me for doing that act, that by the express letter of the law was treason; and as a legal and honest judge, according to his duty in law, he allowed me counsel.

Judge Jermin. For that matter that you talk of, they knew it was no treason, and therefore gave you more privileges than was their right by law, very well knowing, that whatsoever was done to any of you that did fight for the laws, religion and liberties of their country, there might be the like done to others that were prisoners in the parliament's power; and this was the truth of it, and you know it very well; and therefore it is nothing to us, nor in law his willingness.

Lilburne. Upon my letters, after the first day of my trial, that declaration of Lex Talionis was made, as clearly appears by the words and date of it now in print, which the reader may peruse in the first part of the parliament's Declarations, p. 802, 803.

Judge Thorp. I wonder they did not proceed in the prosecution of the indictment, and find you guilty of treason, and so to execution.

Lilburne. Under your favour, thus. I appeared at the bar, I pleaded to my indictment Not Guilty, I made exceptions against my indictment; and myself, and the two other gentlemen arraigned with me, had counsel assigned us as our right by law: and the judges most fairly and rationally further told us, Because we will not surprize you, we will give you a week's time to consider (with what counsel you please in Oxford to chuse to come to you) what to plead for your lives; and whatsoever other privileges you can claim by the liberties of the law of England, you shall enjoy them to the utmost. Upon which promise I spoke in open court to the Judge, shewing him the irons upon my hands, in which I was arraigned, and told him: My lord, by the laws of England, no prisoner for any crime whatsoever, that behaves himself civilly and peaceably in his imprisonment, ought to be put in irons, or to any other pain or torment before he be legally convicted; and therefore I desire, as my right by law, that my irons may be taken off. And I said further, My lord, I am shut up a close prisoner in my chamber, denied the use of pen, ink and paper: which is contrary unto law, especially in the time of my trial. Why, says he, you shall be released from your irons, from your close imprisonment, and have the use of pen, ink and paper: And capt. Lilburne, I tell you, you shall enjoy whatsoever other privilege you can challenge as your right by law; for the law of England is a law of mercy, and I hope we shall appear just Judges of it: And therefore you shall freely have either lawyer, or whom you will in Oxford, to come unto you to help you and advise you. And, says he, because you shall see that law and justice is of the king's side against the parliament, and because they shall have no cause to calumniate us at Westminster, and to say we are unrighteous and unjust Judges, that surprize you, and thereby go about to murder you, the court is freely willing to give you a week's time, to consider with your counsel in the mean time what this day sevensnight to plead for your life. In which time, being freed of my irons, and of my close imprisonment, and enjoying pen, ink, and paper at my pleasure, by special order from the other two gentlemen, I writ a letter to my wife, and in it inclosed another to your Speaker, and another to young sir Henry Vane, then my familiar acquaintance; all which I sent in post-haste away to my wife by the hands of capt. Primrose's wife, which capt. Primrose was prisoner there; and his wife, who brought up the letter to my wife, is now in London. Which letter my wife delivered to the Speaker, &c. and by her importunate solicitation procured the declaration of Lex Talionis; the substance of which, in a letter from Mr. Speaker, my wife brought down to Oxford, and delivered to the lord Heath's own hands upon the Sunday after the first day of our arraignment. And the third day before we were to appear again, my wife arrived at Oxford with the Speaker's letter, which she delivered to Judge Heath himself: Which letter taking notice of our trial, threatened them with Lex Talionis, to do the like to their prisoners that they did to us, or any of us. And they having many of their great eminent men prisoners in the Tower and in Warwick-Castle, and other places, did induce them to stop all further prosecution of colonel Vivers, captain Catesby, and myself. And if it had not been for this threatening letter, in all likelihood we had all three been condemned by a commission of Oyer and Terminer, and executed: For my wife did hear Judge Heath say to some of his associates, at the reading of the letter, that as for all the threatening part of it, as to his particular self, I value it not; but, said he, we must be tender of the lives of the lords and gentlemen that serve the king, and are in the custody of those at Westminster. And that clause of Lex Talionis put a stop to our proceedings, and further trials at law.

Lord Keble. It was well for you, by your story that you do tell, that you had so fair play: You shall have with us, who are upon our lives and oaths, as much as the law will afford you, and so much as our judgments and consciences can lead us to, without doing injustice, and granting more than the laws of England will afford. What was done there, is nothing to us here; for we are not to walk by their precedent, but by our own judgments, according to the rules of the law. And here it is thus far just, that upon the proof of matter of fact, if law do arise, you are to have counsel; if not, you are to have none. By your allegation, you say you had counsel assigned you before any matter of fact came to be proved, when as a judge of the law he could not but do it; but if he did, it is nothing to us, we cannot do it. Yet we have in this place proceeded legally hitherto with you; and when that matter of law doth arise from the fact, as you had counsel there assigned you, so shall you have here; and you shall have fair dealing, and fair play, according to law, which is absolutely as I tell you.

Lilburne. Sir, by your favour, I crave but one word more; and that is this: Here is a gentleman that is a by-stander, a friend of mine, and my solicitor, who by law, as well as any by-stander, may (n) speak for the prisoner at the bar, in case he perceive things urged against him contrary to law; and therefore I desire he may speak two or three words.

[Mr. Sprat beginning to speak,]

Lord Keble. Spare yourself; when your time comes, you shall speak.

Mr. Sprat. He asked leave for me first. And, Sir, it is easy to prove the whole indictment to be matter of law.

Judge Jermin. What impudent fellow is that, that dare be so bold as to speak in the court without being called? Mr. Lilburne, by your own words, you say you were told at Oxford, That by law you were to have counsel; that is as true, that the court is of counsel for the prisoner arraigned at the bar; and so we ought, and shall permit you other counsel, if matter of law, upon the proof of the fact, do arise: but for any other counsel to be assigned you before that appear, is not by law warranted: we shall tread the rules of justice. And we shall do wrong to the whole commonwealth, if we should allow you counsel before matter of law doth arise from the proof of the fact; and to allow counsel in any other case, the court commits injustice.

Lord Keble. And this, Mr. Lilburne, I will promise you, that when there comes matter in law, let it be a lawyer, or yourself, he shall speak in your behalf; but before he cannot.

Lilburne. Sir, the whole indictment, under favour, is matter of law; and the great question that will arise (admit the fact should be true, and admit it should be granted) is, Whether the words be treason in law, yea or no? And also it is matter of law in the indictment, whether the matter in the indictment be rightly alledged as to matter, time, and place. And it is matter of law in the indictment, where there are divers several pretended treasons committed in divers and several counties, put into one and the same indictment, be legal, yea or no?

Lord Keble. Upon proof of the matter of fact, you shall hear and know whether matter of law will arise; and till the words be proved, we cannot say whether that be the law that you suppose.

Lilburne. Truly, Sir, you promised me a fair trial, and that you would not take advantages of my ignorance in the law's formalities: but the Lord deliver me, and all true-hearted Englishmen, from such unjust and unrighteous proceedings as I find at your hands, who go about, I now clearly see, by my ignorance, in holding me to a single and naked plea, which is purely as bad, if not worse, than all the prerogatives; and for the worst and grossest of his prerogatives, in a more rigorous manner than they were used in his life-time, to be thus pressed upon me at this day, after he hath lost his life for pretended tyranny and injustice, liberty and freedom, in public declarations declared to the kingdom: I say, if there be justice and equity in this, I have lost my understanding; and the good Lord God of Heaven deliver me from all such justiciaries!

Lord Keble. Mr. Lilburne, you have been arraigned before us for high-treason, and we bid you forbear those terms of yours long ago; speak that you do rationally, and you shall have fair and Christian answers and replies, as ever any man had at a bar; and go on, you shall have it still, if you will be fair and rational, and not break out into extravagancies and bitterness of spirit.

Lilburne. For my part, Sir, I must look upon myself as a lost and dead man, if I have not counsel to help my ignorance, to pitch upon those things that tend to my preservation. And therefore if you will not assign me counsel to advise and consult with, I am resolved to go no further, though I die for it; and my innocent blood be upon your heads!

Justice Jermin. You have alledged part of the law of England for your own advantage; but every one that says so, does not prove it to be so. You have said, you will be tried by the laws of England; and yet against the laws of England you have utterly refused, in that you would not hold up your hand, which I do not know any Englishman that ever refused so to do, but yourself. You have been told by the court what the law of England is; and yet you will not be satisfied. We are upon our oaths, and therefore will discharge our consciences, and that in a more eminent manner than my brother Heath did, although we do not deny you liberty to speak for yourself. But now you would have counsel assigned before any matter of law doth appear upon the proof of the fact, which we cannot do; for it were to do injustice, and to do against the law, which the court cannot justify.

Lilburne. Sir, under favour, whether or no I have transgressed the law, I will not judge: but I am sure the law, in the equity and intention of it, would have all trials to be equal, and not prejudicial. My prosecutors have had time enough to consult with counsel of all sorts and kinds to destroy me, yea, and with yourselves; and I have not had any time at all, not knowing in the least what you would charge upon me, and therefore could provide no defence for that which I knew not what it would be. And if by the law of England I cannot have counsel, then upon your own grant, which is, That the laws of God are the laws of England, I desire to have the privilege of the law of God, which you yourself said is the law of England; and I am sure the law of God is, That you should 'do as you would be done to.' Now it cannot be according to the law of God, for my adversaries to have the helps of all manner of counsels, by snares, tricks, and provocations, to take away my life, and for me to be denied the benefit to consult with any to preserve my innocent life against potent malice.

Lord Keble. You say well: the law of God is the law of England; and you have heard no law else but what is consonant to the law of reason, which is the best law of God; and here is none else urged against you.

Another Judge. The laws of God, the laws of reason, and the laws of the land, are all joined in the laws that you shall be tried by.

Justice Jermin. The question is but this, Whether the law of God, and the law of reason, and the law of man, may be consonant to each other? And whether the court or John Lilburne shall be judges thereof? That is the question.

Lord Keble. And that which you said, Mr. Attorney hath had so much time against you, and opportunity to consult with all manner of counsel to destroy you; your secret actions, though they are now come to public view, are so heinous, as that they do require time to put them into the most sure way of trial; we have proved the clandestineness of them: you did this in secret; now it is come to the face of the world. Now this being matter of fact, no matter of law can appear till proof pass upon it. You have had times to complot your treasonable venomous books, which shall be proved upon you; and till this be done, there is no matter of law to be looked at. This is the law of God: when a man hath done such treasonable things, he shall answer directly and positively whether he be guilty of them or no; and if he answer, not guilty, and they be not fully proved against him, there needs no more to be said.

Justice Thorp. Mr. Lilburne, there fell some words from you even now, wherein you think you have this hardship put upon you, when you say the judges and your prosecutors have had six months time to meet together, and consult together how to destroy you. First, I would not have you believe, nor the rest that hear it, that it is true that you say; for I speak it for my own particular, that I never saw your indictment till this time that I came here, and yet you say we have had six months together to frame it. These are your words: this was not rightly done of you; for it is not true. I speak in my own particular.

Lilburne. I am sure the substance of it you might see many months ago; and though all you judges have not at one time met about it, yet the greatest part of you have, that commonly carry the domination of the whole; and at Serjeants-Inn, with Mr. Attorney-general, the most of the judges of England have had several meetings, six, five, and four months ago: for I have had friends there that have seen it, and who have enquired into the cause of such solemn meetings, and your own servants have told them it hath been about it and my trial.

Justice Thorp. I speak as for my own particular, that I never was there, and that I never saw your indictment till this time.

Justice Jermin. Why, Mr. Lilburne, might we not have such meetings as those? Your business being a matter of this importance, as this is, through the heinousness of your offence, and that it might be so grounded as the warrant of the law is, the judges did meet: and they ought to meet (o) to consider of it, that nothing should be done against you, or any man else, contrary to the law. But yet, for my part, my dwelling is out of London, I heard not of it so soon as you speak of; but after I came to town, I confess I heard of it, and have been present about some debates about it.

Lilburne. Only this I say, If by your prerogative you will destroy me as Nebuchadnezzar did endeavour to destroy Daniel by his prerogative, I am as willing to die, as he was to be thrown into the lions den: And if you will not allow me counsel, to consult with what plea to make for my life, I have no more to say. Sir, it is but a vain thing to spend any more words.

Lord Keble. These are but words and wishes, Sir, that you are so willing and ready to die, as you declare you are: But if you be,

(o) "But Coke, in his chapter 'of Per Treason,' in 3 par. Inst. fol. 29, expressly said to the end, 'That the trial may be the more indifferent, seeing the safety of the Prisoners consisteth in the indifference of the Court, the Judges ought not to deliver their opinions before-hand of any criminal case that may come before them judicially.' And he there cites Humphrey Stratford's Case, that arch-tyrant in which Hussey, Chief Justice, beset Henry 7th not to demand of them their opinions before-hand. And in 4 par. Inst. of 'High Court of Parliament,' fol. 37, he shews the evil of asking judges' opinions before-hand." Orig. Edit.

is better for you. And also it is well you have not to do with judges that would be austere upon you; for you to terrify us to be men that come hither to destroy you as Nebuchadnezzar went about to do Daniel: You may judge of what is within you; but of us, what is within us, you cannot judge. You shall have justice here in the face of the country, and of all that hear us: These shall be judges of our proceedings towards you. Take heed, Mr. Lilburne, his language is but the sparks of that venomous heat that is within you; and they may burst out to prove you guilty before us, and in our presence, of that you are charged with, without any further proof or proceedings; for you may do it, you may do it where you stand: And therefore be advised, and take heed what you say.

Lilburne. Sir, I have cast up my account, and I know what it can cost me: I bless God I have learned to die, having always carried my life in my hand, ready to lay it down for above this twelve years together, having lived in the favour and bosom of God; and I bless his name, I can as freely die as live.

Lord Keble. You shall not now lay it down, if you do not destroy nor cast away the commonwealth; but if you go about to destroy the commonwealth, the commonwealth will spue you up, and destroy you.

Lilburne. I desire nothing but counsel, and a little time to consult with them, and to produce my witnesses, and a copy of my indictment: If not, I am willing to die as the object of your indignation and malice; do your will and pleasure.

Lord Keble. We are willing to die too.

Mr. Attorney-General. What is agreeable to the law of England, the constant settled practice of trying prisoners, will not be denied Mr. Lilburne: But as for that privilege that was granted him at Oxford, is no tie in law to us; neither was it ever heard of in England, that any that did understand the law, did ever, as Mr. Lilburne now desires, allow counsel to a prisoner for such an act as this is, or had the copy of the indictment. It shall not be denied Mr. Lilburne, which is his right by law, in its due place; but to make new precedents and new laws, which, my lord, when done by such a bench as this is, most of the judges in England being present, runs to all criminal cases whatsoever, whether in treason, murder, or other felonies: It is true Mr. Lilburne is now only concerned in it; but if granted to him, it would be a precedent to all future times; by means of which there would never be an end of trials in criminal cases. And it is a wonderful strange thing to me, that when the prisoner hath pleaded the usual way, you proceed not immediately to trial. It is true Mr. Lilburne hath pleaded his own ignorance, and therefore desires longer time: But, my lord, to make a precedent of this nature, that never was known by the laws of England, is very dangerous, very perilous. My lord, the thing that I press is not in relation to time, but in relation to the public justice; for the same reason it is granted him, it ought not to be denied to any man that asketh it neither for treason or felony. And of what evil consequences it would be, I leave your lordship and the court to judge. —My lords, I do humbly desire that Mr. Lilburne may be dealt with all legal, just, and fair proceedings from the Court. My lord, I do desire accordingly that proceedings may for the commonwealth be so too; and that Mr. Lilburne may be without delay, according to law, proceeded against for his notorious Treasons.

Lilburne. Sir, with your favour, I shall crave but one word: This gentleman declares unto you what an evil precedent it would be to give me a little time to consult with counsel, to frame a plea for my life; and yet that judge was pleased to say the law of England is founded upon the law of God, and the laws of reason unspotted, uncorrupted, or undefiled. I am sure the law of God, and the law of uncorrupted reason, is to do as you would be done to, and not to lay snares for your neighbour's life; I am sure the law of God would have all trials indifferent, and no man's life surprized or taken away by niceties or formalities, though never so notoriously accused. And, Sir, for Mr. Prideaux, and others of you, so often to call me notorious Traitor, as you do; I tell you, Sir, you reproach me: For though I am never so notoriously accused, yet in the eye of the law of England I am an innocent man, yea, as innocent as any of those who call me traitor, till such time as I be legally convicted of the fact or crime laid unto my charge; and therefore, Sir, I beseech you, cease your calumniating of me, for you thereby deal not fairly nor legally with me. And, Sir, I confidently hope I shall appear in the eye of the law, in the eyes of you, and in the eyes of all men that hear me this day, an innocent, a just, and a true Englishman, that really loves the welfare of his native country, if I may have fair play, and the scope of the law. And therefore, Sir, blemish me not in the ears of the auditors, till the law, and a conviction by it, do blemish me: For I tell you I am in the eye of the law as innocent as any of yourselves, till I be justly convicted. And therefore I pray cease the calling of me Traitor in this manner.

Lord Keble. What need we any more when we are of your opinion? We wish you may come as clearly off as you say you hope to do.

Mr. Attorney. My lord, and that it may be so declared, and that the world may know whether Mr. Lilburne be an innocent man, or no, I pray put it to the final issue, and let the law judge.

Lilburne. Under favour, for me to be denied law, which I conceive is done unto me when I am denied counsel, and to put the niceties and formalities of the law upon me, the signification of which are writ in such language and tongues as I cannot read, much less understand; and would you destroy me for the not knowing of that which it is impossible for me to know? Sir, I beseech you be not so extreme towards me. That gentleman saith the law of God is the law of England; and it would have no snares laid to take away a man's life: I pray let me have the benefit of that.

Mr. Attorney. Once you had; and it is but just you should; and I am sure it will be granted unto you.

Lord Keble. Mr. Lilburne, you say well; the prisoner doth not know the law; you do not, and many others do not: But I tell you again, you know so much of the law as is suitable to this plea; you yourself know whether your conscience accuse you guilty of the fact laid unto your charge, or not. For our parts, we say no more than one-and-twenty men upon their oaths have informed us, upon sufficient testimony of witnesses, that what they had said we should further inform ourselves of, before your life be taken away; yea, such is the law of England, the tenderest law in the world of a man's life. I say again, that no such trial for life is to be found in the world, as in England. In any place but in England, a man's life may be taken away upon two or three witnesses; but in England two or three witnesses do not do it: For there are two juries besides, and you have four-and-twenty men returned; you have one-and-twenty men upon their oaths and consciences that have found you guilty: And yet when you have done that, it is not enough by the law of England, but you are also to have twelve rational understanding men of your neighbours to hear all over again, and to pass upon your life. This is not used in any law in the world but in England, which hath the most righteous and most merciful law in the world: and this we sit here to maintain, and let all the world know it, that according to the rules thereof we have proceeded against you.

Judge Michel. Mr. Lilburne, you were speaking of the laws being in other tongues; those that we try you by are in English, and we proceed in English against you; and therefore you have no cause to complain of that.

Lilburne. By your speeches you seem to bind me up to a single plea: Truly I conceive that it is not equitable by the law of God, and the laws of reason. No man's life is to be destroyed by niceties and formalities; yet contrary to your solemn promises, you take all advantage against me by them, and make my ignorance in the ticklish formalities of the law to be the means of my own destruction: although before I pleaded, you engaged unto me you would take no advantage by my ignorance in your formalities, and my mistakes in them should be no disadvantage unto me: and yet now I have pleaded, you seem to hold me close to a single plea. Truly, Sir, I think that is not just nor fair so to break your promises, and by fair words to smooth me on into nets and snares, and to make use of my willingness to be tried by the law of England to drill me on to my own destruction. Truly, Sir, had I ever thought or believed I should have been denied counsel, I would have died before ever I would in any manner have pleaded to your Charge, or have yielded to your smooth insinuations.

Justice Jermin. Those men that know the laws of England, know well that it taketh away no man's life but upon clean proof, and upon manifest contempts of the law. The law is Whosoever shall go such a way in a court as evidently gives affront to the law, that such one takes away his own life. The facts that you are charged with, if they had taken effect, would have taken away the innocent lives of many: Therefore you are now before us charged with the fact; and every man's conscience knows whether he committed the thing charged upon him or no; and yourself do know whether you be guilty of that you are accused of, or no. But the court must not spend any further time; for Mr. Attorney-General hath returned the writ of Venire facias, for the calling or summoning of a jury of life and death.

Lord Keble. Mr. Lilburne, you say you did understand yourself: You knew of your coming, and you knew of the fact that you had committed.

Lilburne. Truly, Sir, six months ago I heard much of my trial; and I longed for it, but could not have it, but was still kept in prison, and abundance of provocations put upon me, to make me cry out of my oppressions; and then to hang me therefore, by a law made after my pretended crime was committed, is not just. And truly, Sir, I heard but by uncertain common fame of my trial now. Some parliament men told my wife and friends that my chiefest crime was corresponding with the prince; and to defend myself against that, I fitted myself, never dreaming that only books should be laid to my charge, and therefore I could not as to that come prepared: and therefore do humbly desire counsel, a copy of my Indictment, and time to bring in my witnesses.

Lord Keble. Hear what is said to you: for your witnesses, you should have brought them with you; we will give you leave to send for them: we will give you time to do, to consider with yourself what to say for yourself, you shall, till to-morrow seven o'clock.

Lilburne. Sir, some of my witnesses live as hundred or eighty miles off; and yet I must bring them to-morrow morning: how is that possible? and therefore I desire time to bring them in, and also subpoenas; for some of them are parliament men, and some of them officers of the army, and they will not come in without compulsion.

Lord Keble. That's the time we will give you longer; you knew of your coming long ago, and therefore ought to have come provided.

Lilburne. Sir, I beseech you give me a convenient time, eight or ten days, that so I may get them together; for how could I be provided before-hand for any thing, but for that which I was at the first imprisoned for, nothing of which is now laid to my charge? Could I divine upon what you would proceed against me? but, Sir, I have that within me, I bless God, that will be a portion of comfort with me, to carry me through all your malice and injustice.

Lord Keble. Never talk of that which is within you; God is in us, as well as in you: Never make a flourish of what is in you; for the fear of God is before our eyes as well as yours; and what we do, we shall have comfort in, in that it is according to the laws of England, the rules of which we are sworn to observe, and every man will do righteous things as well as you.

Lilburne. Pray will you give me but eight days time then?

Lord Keble. We will give you no more; you ought to have brought them with you, you knew of it long ago; and the Court cannot, nor will not wait upon you.

Lilburne. By your favour, Sir, thus; then let me have a little time to consult with counsel.

Lord Keble. I tell you, that if the matter be proved, there needs no counsel.

Lilburne. Sir, I shall not much insist upon that; but the question is, Whether the matter be treason in law or no, and whether in law it be rightly expressed in the Indictment, as to time and place, with other circumstances the reunto belonging? And I question the legality of the Indictment, and that ought in law to be disputed, before the matter of fact come to be spoken to.

Lord Keble. Sir, you said at first, you would speak as a rational and moderate man, and yet you will not be answered. If matter of law do arise out of your fact, that we have told you again and again, you shall have counsel and time.

Lilburne. Sir, by your favour, it may be too late to desire counsel after the fact is proved. And besides, having legal exceptions against the Indictment, why should you run me upon the hazard of my life, by ticklish niceties and formalities; and as my prosecutor Mr. Prideaux saith—[But being interrupted, cried out] Sir, I beseech you, do but bear me.

Lord Keble. Your distemper will break out, your heart is so full of boiling malice and venom, you cannot contain yourself.

Lilburne. Mr. Prideaux is pleased to urge, that the granting of me my desire in reference to counsel, will be so inconvenient a precedent, as will destroy the commonwealth: therefore to avoid the danger of such a destroying precedent, as he is pleased to call it, I desire to have some time assigned to me to get my witnesses together, and then I shall, I doubt not, but convincingly shew you the hazard and destroying mischief of that desperate precedent in denying men liberty to consult with counsel, when they are upon trials for their lives. For my own judgment, my own conscience doth tell me, that it is my undoubted right by the law of England, by the law of God, and the law of reason; and if it be totally denied me, I can but die: and upon that score, by the assistance of God, I am resolved to die.

Lord Keble. You speak great words of your own judgment, your own conscience, your own zeal, and the like: and I tell you, our consciences, and our religion, and our zeal, and our righteousness, I hope shall appear as much as yours: You would make yourself judge in your own cause, which you are not, and so make cyphers of us; but all your high words of conscience and righteousness is but a flourish, to make the people believe or be apprehensive as though we had none, you had all: but you shall know, here we sit with as much tenderness and integrity as you stand there, and to do that uprightly which is according to law and justice.

Lilburne. I shall not in the least make any comparisons, neither do I in that particular; I only speak of my own particular, in reference unto that God in whom I have believed, and in whom I enjoy content, peace and quietness of mind: and yet for my part, I shall rather die than willingly go any further, except I have counsel first.

Lord Keble. Well, Mr. Lilburne, the court is very tender not to take up any of your time; you have heard what was declared to you there, that Mr. Attorney hath made process against you returnable to-morrow at seven of the clock, and therefore to spend more time will be but your loss and damage. The sheriffs of London are to take care to return the jury to-morrow morning, and therefore the court doth adjourn till seven o'clock to-morrow in the morning; and in the mean time they do commit the prisoner at the bar to the lieutenant of the Tower again.

Lilburne. Sir, I did not hear you the first words.

Lord Keble. You shall not be denied to hear it again, the court desires to be good husbands of time for you; we could have sat long enough to have trifled away your time that you may spend in your meditations, and take your friends advice; do not stand upon and destroy yourself by words.

Just. Jermin. Mr. Lilburne, all that are here are to take notice of it, that the prisoner at the bar hath had more favour already, than ever any prisoner in England in the like case ever had: for by the laws of England, in the matter of treason, whereof you are indicted, you ought to have been tried presently, immediately: But because all the world shall know with what candour and justice the court do proceed against you, you have till to-morrow morning; which is the court's extraordinary favour, and the doors are wide open that all the world may know it.

Lilburne. Sir, I can shew one hundred precedents to the contrary in your own books, to disprove what you say.

Lord Keble. Adjourn the court.

Lilburne. I humbly thank you for what favour I have already received.

The Court adjourned till the next morning, and the Prisoner remanded to the Tower.

GUILD-HALL, Oct. 26, 1649, being Friday, at the Trial of lieut. col. JOHN LIL-BURNE, the Second Day.

The Prisoner being brought to the bar, spake as followeth: Sir, I pray hear me a word or two.

Lord Keble. Mr. Lilburne, I am afraid something troubles you; I will have nobody stand there, * let all come out but one man.

Lilburne. Here's none but my brother and my solicitor.

Lord Keble. Sir, your brother shall not stand by you there; I will only have one hold your papers and books, and the rest not to trouble you: wherefore the rest are to come out.

Lilburne. Sir, I beg of you but one word, though I do not know any reason why of myself I should not have the privilege of the law, as well as any man in England; yet besides what yesterday I alledged for myself for to have counsel assigned, yet to-day give me leave to mention an unquestionable precedent for my purpose, and that is Major Rolfe, who being an officer in the army, and being lately indicted for high treason (before the Lord Chief Baron Wilde, that now is at Hampshire assizes) for conspiring to poison and pistol the late King, which by the law was the highest of treasons, did conceive himself, in regard of his ignorance, unable to defend himself singly against his enemies' design, which was to take away his life. Whereupon he becomes an humble suitor to the Lord Chief Baron Wilde, that he might have counsel assigned him; and the Court, before ever the grand jury received any testimony against him to find the bill, assigned him counsel, who, as I understand, were one Mr. Nichols, now a Judge of this Bench, and sitting there; and Mr. Maynard, of the Temple: they were both assigned his counsel, and from Mr. Maynard himself I have it, yea, from his own mouth: who being assigned his counsel, they came into the Court, where the grand jury was called before the Judge. Mr. Maynard, and Mr. Nichols, now a judge here, had liberty there to be in the open court, where the witnesses, before the indictment was found, were called, and in open court were sworn, and in open court gave in their evidence before the grand jury; Major Rolfe's counsel being by in open court, to hear all the evidence that was given against Major Rolfe, who in his indictment was indicted for two matters of fact; the first was, That he had declared, that in such a month, and at such a place, he had an intent to pistol the late King, which, by the letter of the law of 25 Edw. 3, chap. 2, was treason. Then there was another charge, That such a day he had so said or declared to poison him, in the presence of such a one; and they were both put into one indictment. Whereupon Mr. Maynard being assigned by the Lord Chief Baron Wilde, that now is, to be of counsel for Rolfe in the same case (but with abundance of more advantage to him, than I am now in), Mr. Maynard was then of counsel to the prisoner, and had liberty to hear what the witnesses swore against him, and to make his best advantage of it, and that in open court, before the indictment was found by the grand inquest; and although there were two express witnesses against him, yet but one of them swore to one thing, and another to another. Mr. Maynard being one that knew the law better than Major Rolfe did himself, he applied the two statutes of Edw. 6, viz. the 1 Edw. 6, chap. 12, and 5 and 6 Edw. 6, chap. 11, to Rolfe's case: which statutes do expressly declare, That no man ought to be convicted of treason, but by two sufficient witnesses, upon plain and clear evidence to each fact of treason; which evidence, as Sir Edw. Coke says in the third part of his Institutes, ought to be as clear as the sun at noon-day, and not upon one single witness, and upon conjectural presumptions, or inferences, or strains of wit. Now, Sir, I am an Englishman as well as Major Rolfe, and I have been an officer in the parliament army as well as he, and there fought for them as heartily as ever he did in his life, and he was accused for the highest of English treasons. And therefore I humbly crave, that in regard there are many particular errors in the indictment, as to matter, time, and place, that therefore, in reference to the illegality of the indictment, according to this precedent by one of your own fellow-judges, that you would, according to my birth-right, declared in Major Rolfe's case, assign me counsel, as he had, to help my ignorance, that so I may not be destroyed by surprisal, and illegal and unjust prerogatives.

Lord Keble. You see with what a great deal of favour, instead of a few words, we have heard you many. This is a privilege; but this that you say upon it, it may be it was done; but that we do shall be according to that you and we shall find to be according to the laws of the land, and our conscience, and the privilege of the subject. That they did before the grand jury and the witnesses, the witnesses are here sworn in court, in presence of the grand jury, so far as we go with them. That of Mr. Maynard and Mr. Justice Nichols being assigned counsel, for what cause it was then, they best know; it is nothing that doth now concern us, though the treason was against those laws that then were in being; we must come to proof; it may be, he confessed his fact; if you will do so too, it alters the case.

Lilburne. No, Sir, he never confessed it; for if he had, he had been found guilty; but he was saved merely by the skill and honesty of his counsel, Mr. Maynard, and his indictment nulled and evaded before ever the grand jury found it, and that upon this point of law, because, by the two statutes of Edward 6, that ought to be two plain and clear witnesses to every part of treason; and though Rolfe was accused by two witnesses, yet there were two facts, and but one witness to the proof of each of them.

Lord Keble. When you come to trial, if we see there be need of counsel, the court will be instead of counsel to you; nay, the court, if they see any matter of law for counsel, though you do not ask it, they will give you it. And therefore set your heart at rest: for if there be any thing rational in law that we can spy out, as well as your counsel, we will help you in it.

Lilburne. Sweet Sir, I crave but one word more; I am upon my life, and if you deny me what the law affords me, and that which hath been granted to be law by cavalier judges, yea, and by your fellow-judges, who are now in power at this day, the Lord deliver me from standing in need of you to be my counsellors!

Lord Keble. We are upon our lives too, as well as you.

Lilburne. No, by your favour, not in so imminent a manner as I am.

Lord Keble. We are upon our lives and our souls to all eternity.

Lilburne. Sir, I beseech you, hear me one word.

Lord Keble. I will hear no more.

Mr. Pridcaus. My Lord, I desire the Court would proceed, and not prolong time, seeing he has pleaded Not Guilty, and confessed something.

Lilburne. No, Sir; you do me wrong, and abuse me. I never confessed any thing, neither did I plead Not Guilty; for my plea was conditional, grounded upon your promises, not to take any advantage of my ignorance in your formalities.

Lord Keble. Go on; be silent, Mr. Lilburne.

Lilburne. If you take away my life, without affording me the benefit of the law, my innocent blood be upon your heads!

Lord Keble. Sir, these passionate words will do you no good; you had better forbear them.

Lilburne. Pray, hear me then.

Lord Keble. Do you say that we do offer to take away your life, Sir? If we do take it away contrary to law, we are liable to answer for it: but we shall judge what you have done. [The Lieut. Col. pressing to speak, was not suffered, but bid be silent.] Sir, I advise you, Sir, spare yourself with patience, and hear the Court.

Justice Jermin. Be quiet, Sir.

Lilburne. I beseech you, Sir, let me hear but the Grand Jury speak; for I understand from some of themselves, they never found me guilty of Treason, but do conceive themselves wronged by some words yesterday, that passed from some of the Judges; I pray let me hear them speak.

Lord Keble. Mr. Lilburne, you said you would be rational, you would be moderate;

you do break out; you will do yourself more hurt than any here can do you: you must be silent and hear the Court, we can lose no more time to hear you. Cryer call the Jury.

Cryer. The Jury called—[And Mr. Lilburne earnestly pressed to be heard, but could not.] Cryer. Miles Petty, William Wormwell.

Lilburne. Sir, I beseech you let me but see these gentlemen's faces.

Lord Keble. You, master Sprat, you must not talk to the Prisoner; you may stand and hold the books: you did offend yesterday, but you shall not do so to-day, for you shall not not stand near the Prisoner to talk to him.

Lilburne. My lord, the law says, a Standersby may speak in the Prisoner's behalf at the bar, much more whisper to him; but especially if he be his Solicitor.

Cryer. John Sherman, Thomas Dainty, Ralph Ely, Edmund Keyzer, Edward Perkins, Ralph Packinan, Francis Woodall, William Commins, Henry Hanson, Roger Jenkinson, Josias Hamond, Richard Allen, Richard Nevill, John Mayo, Henry Tooley, Arthur Due, Roger Sears.

Clerk. You good men of the city of London, appear. Stephen Ives, John Sherman, Ralph Ely, Roger Jenkinson, Josias Hamond, Richard Allen, Richard Nevill, Roger Sears, John Mayo, Nicholas Murren.

Clerk. You Prisoner at the bar, these good men that are here presented before the Court, are to be of your Jury of life and death; if therefore you will challenge them, or any of them, you must challenge them before they go to be sworn, and then you shall be heard.

Cryer. Every man that can inform my lords the Justices, and the Attorney-General of this Commonwealth, against master John Lilburne prisoner at the bar, of any Treason or Felony committed by him, let them come forth, and they shall be heard, for the Prisoner stands upon his deliverance; and all others bound to give their attendance here upon pain of forfeiture of your recognizance, are to come in.

Lilburne. Sir, I beseech you give me leave to speak.

Lord Keble. You cannot be heard.

Lilburne. Truly, Sir, I must then make my protest against your unjust and bloody proceedings with me, before all this people; and desire them to take notice, that yesterday I pleaded to my bill conditionally, that no advantage should be taken against me for my ignorance in your formalities, and you promised me you would not.

Lord Keble. We give you too much time; you will speak words that will undo you: is this your Reason? You shall talk in your legal time, and take your legal Exceptions, we will hear you till midnight.

Lilburne. Then it will be too late, Sir.

Justice Jermin. You have given a great slander, and that doth not become a man of your profession; you speak very black words.

Lilburne. I beseech you, do but hear me one word; I do not know the faces of two of the men that were read unto me, I hope you will give me time to consider of them.

Lord Keble. No, Sir, you ought not to have it.

Lilburne. Will you let me have some friends by me that are citizens of London, that know them, to give me information of their qualities and conditions? for without this, truly you may as well hang me without a trial, as to bring me here to a trial, and deny me all my legal privileges to save myself by.

Lord Keble. If you be your own judge, you will judge so; go on.

[Mr. Sprat, or col. Robert Lilburne, whispers to the Prisoner to challenge one of the Jury, which the Judge excepted against.]

Lilburne. Sir, by your favour, any man that is a By-stander may help the Prisoner, by the law of England.

Lord Keble. It cannot be granted: and that fellow come out there, with the white cap, pull him out.

Lilburne. You go not according to your own law in dealing thus with me.

Justice Jermin. Your words were never a slander, nor never will be; hold your peace. Cryer, go on.

Cryer. Stephen Blyth, look upon the Prisoner.

Abraham Seal, John King, Nicholas Murren, (Thomas Daniel) [the Prisoner excepted against him] Edward Perkins, Francis Peale.

Justice Jermin. Was he recorded and sworn before he spake, or no?—Cryer. No, my lord.

Justice Jermin. Then let him continue, if he be right recorded.

Cryer. The oath was not given quite out.

Justice Jermin. Then he hath challenged in time; let him have all the lawful favour that may be afforded him by law.

Wm. Commins sworn, Simon Weedon sworn.

Lilburne. He is an honest man, and looks with an honest face, let him go.

Henry Tooley sworn, Arthur Due excepted against.

Lord Keble. Take away Mr. Due, let him stand a little by.

Henry Hanson put by, being sick; one that could not hear, excepted against; John Sherman, Ralph Head, Roger Jenkenson, Josias Hammond, Richard Allen, John Mayo, Roger Sears, Henry Hanson excepted against, Edmond Keyser sworn.

The Jury called.

Clerk. Twelve good men and true, stand together, and hear your Evidence.

Justice Jermin. Cryer of the court, let the Jury stand six of the one side, and six of the other.

Clerk. 1. Miles Petty, 7. Ed. Perkins,
2. Steph. Ives, 8. Ralph Packman
3. John King, 9. Wm. Commins,
4. Nich. Murren, 10. Simon Weedon,
5. Th. Dainty, 11. Henry Tooley,
6. Edm. Keyser, 12. Abr. Smith.

Of the Jury, six live about Smithfield, one in Gosling-street, two in Cheapside, two in Bread-street, and one in Friday-street.

Justice Jermin. It is well done.

Cryer. The lords the Justices do straitly charge and command all manner of persons to keep silence while the Prisoner is in trial.

Mr. Broughton. John Lilburne, hold up thy hand.

Lilburne. As I did yesterday, I acknowledge myself to be John Lilburne, freeman of London, son to Mr. Richard Lilburne, of the county of Durham, and some time lieut. col. in the Parliament-Army.

Justice Jermin. You refuse to hold up your hand; and though you break the law of England, the Court will not break it.

Lilburne. I do what the Court declares is my right and duty to do; I do no more than declare my name be so as it is.

Lord Keble. Read the Indictment.

Mr. Broughton reads. Hold up thy hand, John Lilburne; thou standest here indicted of High Treason by the name of John Lilburne, late of London, gentleman, for that thou, as a false Traitor, not having the fear of God before thine eyes, but being stirred and moved up by the instigation of the Devil, didst endeavour not only to disturb the peace and tranquillity of this nation, but also the government thereof to subvert, now established without king or house of lords, in the way of a Commonwealth, and a free state, and happily established; and the Commons in Parliament assembled, being the Supreme Authority of this nation of England, to disgrace, and into hatred, base esteeme, infamy and scandal, with all the good, true, and honest persons of England, to bring. That is to say, that thou the said John Lilburne, on the 1st day of October, in the year of our Lord 1649, and in divers other days and times, both before and after, in the parish of Mary the Arches, in the ward of Cheap, London, aforesaid, of thy wicked and devilish mind and imagination, falsely, maliciously, advisedly, and traitorously, as a false traitor, by writing and imprinting, and openly declaring, that is to say, by a certain scandalous, poisonous, and traitorous Writing in paper, intitled, 'A Salvæ Libertate'; and by another scandalous, poisonous, and traitorous book, intitled, 'An Impeachment of High Treason against Oliver Cromwell, and his son-in-law Henry Ireton, esqrs. late Members of the late forcibly dissolved House of Commons; presented to public view by Lieut. colonel John Lilburne, close prisoner in the Tower of London, for his real, true, and zealous affection to the Liberties of this nation: And by another scandalous, poisonous, and traitorous Book, imprinted, and intitled, 'An Outcry of the Young-men and Apprentices of London, or an Inquisition after the fundamental Laws and Liberties of England, directed Aug. 29, 1649, in an Epistle to the private Soldiers of the Army, especially all those that signed the solemn Engagement at Newmarket-Heath, the 5th of June, 1647, bet

‘more especially the private Soldiers of the General’s regiment of horse, that helped to plunder and destroy the honest and true-hearted Englishmen, traitorously defeated at Burford, the 15th of May, 1649.’ And also by another scandalous, poisonous, and traitorous Book, intitled, ‘The legal fundamental Liberties of the People of England, revived, asserted, and vindicated,’* didst publish that the government aforesaid is tyrannical, usurped, and unlawful; and that the Commons assembled in Parliament are not the Supreme Authority of this nation. And further that thou the said John Lilburne, as a false Traitor, God before thine eyes not having, but being moved and led by the instigation of the Devil, endeavouring, and maliciously intending to subvert the Government aforesaid, as is aforesaid, well and happily established; thou the said John Lilburne, afterwards (that is to say), the aforesaid 1st day† of

* “Monday 18th June, 1649,” says Clement Walker, “came forth that most useful Book of John Lilburne, called, ‘The legal fundamental Liberties of the People of England revived, &c.’ wherein he excellently well sets forth the new usurped tyranny of that hydra of Nimrod’s now subverting our laws, liberties, and property, consuming us with illegal taxes, excise, free quarter, monopolies, and sharing land, money, goods, and offices amongst themselves, perpetuating an army to enslave us, and overthrow the fundamental government of this nation, in order to which they have complied with, and cheated all interests, broken all their obligations to God and man, violated all the laws of this land, their own protestations, covenants, the oaths of allegiance, supremacy, (which themselves caused the people to take) and their own votes, declarations, &c. The illegality of their late erected high court of justice, and their unjust proceedings therein, the tyranny and usurpation of the council of state and officers of the army. And proveth, that colonel Pride’s new purged, new packed house, is neither a house of commons, nor parliament; their usurped supreme authority to be a mere nullity or fiction, and especially, that this parliament is clearly dissolved and ended, which he proveth by the death of the king, and by many other solid arguments; and therefore all their actings to be void and null, with many other considerable passages, where he ingeniously coniecteth, that being the king’s prisoner at Oxford, with many other of the parliament party, the king did strictly observe the laws of the land in his proceedings against them, which this parliament doth not do in any their most legal proceedings, for all their pretended engagements, declarations, votes, protestations and covenants to maintain and defend the laws and liberties of the people, ergo, the king really, the faction in parliament but pretendedly, fought for our laws and liberties.”

† “Note, that Mr. Lilburne was imprisoned by the Council of State as a Traitor, the 28th of March, 1649, and they there came, and after

October, in the year of our Lord 1649 aforesaid, and divers other days and times, as well before as after, at London aforesaid, that is to say, in the parish and ward aforesaid, at London aforesaid, maliciously, advisedly, and traitorously didst plot, contrive, and endeavour to stir up, and to raise force against the aforesaid Government, and for the subverting and alteration of the said Government; and those wicked, malicious, and traitorous adviseements to put in execution, &c. And thou the said John Lilburne afterwards, that is to say, the aforesaid first day of October, in the year of our Lord 1649 aforesaid, and divers days and times as well before as after, at London aforesaid, that is to say, in the parish and ward aforesaid, of thy depraved mind, and most wicked imagination, in and by the aforesaid scandalous, poisonous, and traitorous Book, intitled, ‘An Impeachment of High Treason against Oliver Cromwell, and his son-in-law, Henry Ireton, esqrs. late Members of the late forcibly dissolved House of Commons; presented to public view by lieutenant colonel John Lilburne, close prisoner in the Tower of London, for his real, true, and zealous affection to the Liberties of his native country:’ falsely, maliciously, advisedly, and traitorously, didst publicly declare, amongst other things in the said Book, these false, scandalous, malicious, and traitorous words following: ‘But, my true friends,’ (meaning the friends of the said John Lilburne) ‘I’ (meaning the aforesaid John Lilburne) ‘shall here take upon me the boldness, considering the great distractions of the present times, to give a little further advice to our friends aforesaid, from whose company or society, or from some of them, hath been begun and issued out the most transcendent, clear, rational and just things, for the people’s liberties and freedoms, that the foresaid John Lilburne had seen or read in this nation, as your notable and excellent Petition of May the 20th, 1647, burnt by the hands of the common hangman, recorded in my Book called “Rash Oaths unwarantable,” pag. 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, with divers Petitions of that nature, and the Petition of the 19th of January, 1648, recorded in the following discourse, pag. 45, 46, 47, 48, and the masculine Petition of the 11th of September, 1648, so much owned by Petitions out of several counties: yea, and by the officers of the army’s large Remonstrance from St. Albans, the 16th of November, 1648, pag. 67, 68, 69. The substance of all which, I’ (thou the foresaid John Lilburne meaning) conceive is contained in the printed sheet of paper, signed by my fellow prisoners, Mr. William Walwin, Mr. Richard Overton, and Mr. Thomas Prince, and myself, dated the 1st of May, 1649, and intitled, “The Agreement of the Free People of England.” Which false, arraign him as a Traitor, for actions done above five months after, waving all the pretended crimes for which they first imprisoned him.”—Orig. Edit.

scandalous, and traitorous Book, called "The Agreement of the People of England," tends to the alteration and subversion of the Government aforesaid. 'The principles of the aforesaid Agreement, I' (meaning yourself the said John Lilburne) 'hope and desire you' (the friends of the aforesaid John Lilburne meaning) 'will make the final centre, and unwavering standard of all your desires, hazards and endeavours, as to the future settlement of the peace and government of this distressed, wasted, and divided nation: the firm establishing of the principles therein contained, being that only which will really and in good earnest marry and knit that interest, whatever it be, that dwells upon them, unto the distressed or oppressed commons of this nation.'

'But the principles of the foresaid Agreement being so detestable and abominable to the present ruling men, as that which they know will put a full end to their tyranny and usurpation, and really ease and free the people from oppression and bondage; that it is something dangerous to those that go about the promotion of it; yet I shall advise and exhort you,' (meaning the friends of him the aforesaid John Lilburne) 'vigorously to lay all fear aside, and to set on foot the promotion of it,' (meaning the said Agreement) 'in the same method we took for the promotion of the foresaid Petition of the 9th of January, 1647, laid down in the following Discourse, pag. 23, 24, 25, and to write to all your friends in all the counties of England, to chuse out from amongst themselves, and send up some agents to you (two at least for each county, with money in their pockets to bear their charges) to consider with your called and chosen agents, of some effectual course speedily to be taken for the settling of the principles thereof' (meaning the aforesaid false Agreement, devised by yourself the aforesaid John Lilburne), 'and to set up the promoting of' (the foresaid feigned Agreement meaning) 'as that only which in an earthly Government can make you' (the aforesaid friends of the said John Lilburne) 'happier; at least, to know one another's minds, in owning and approving the principles of the foresaid false Agreement, that so it may become to you' (meaning the foresaid friends of the foresaid John Lilburne), 'and all your friends, your centre, standard, and banner, to flock together to, in time of those foreign innovations, and domestic insurrections, that are like speedily to bring miseries enough upon this poor distressed nation,' (the aforesaid nation of England again meaning) 'and unanimously resolve and engage one to another, neither to side with, or fight for, the chimeras, fooleries, and pride of the present men in power,' (the aforesaid parliament of England meaning) 'nor for the prince's will, nor any other base interest whatsoever: the which if you' (the aforesaid friends of the said John Lilburne meaning) 'should fight for, it would be but an absolute murder of your brethren and countrymen you knew not wherefore, unless he or they will come up to these just, righteous, and equitable principles therein contained, and give rational and good security for the constant adhering thereto.'

'And upon such terms, I do not see but you may justifiably, before God or man, join with the Prince himself; yea, I am sure, a thousand times more justly, than the present ruling men (upon a large and serious debate) joined with Owen Roe O'Neale, the grand bloody rebel in Ireland; who, if we must have a King, I (meaning the aforesaid John Lilburne) for my part had rather have the Prince (meaning Charles Stuart, son to the late King) than any man in the world, because of his large pretence of right, which if he came not in by conquest, by the hands of foreigners (the bare attempting of which may apparently hazard him the loss of all at once) by gluing together the now divided people, to join as one man against him; but by the hands of Englishmen, by contract upon the premises aforesaid (which is easy to be done) the people will easily, see that presently thereupon they will enjoy this transcendent benefit (he being at peace with all foreign nations, and having no regal pretended competitor) viz. The immediate disbanding of all armies and garrisons, saving the old Cinque Ports; and so those three grand plagues of the people will cease, viz. Free quarters, Taxations, and Excise; by means of which, the people may once again really say, They enjoy something they can in good earnest call their own. Whereas for the present army to set up the pretended false saint Oliver, or any other, as their elected king, there will be nothing thereby, from the beginning of the chapter to the end thereof, but wars, and the cutting of throats, year after year; yea, and the absolute keeping up of a perpetual and everlasting army, under which the people are absolute and perfect slaves and vassals, as by woeful and lamentable experience they now see they perfectly are; which slavery and absolute bondage is like daily to increase, under the present tyrannical and arbitrary new-erected robbing government. And therefore rouse up your spirits before it be too late to a vigorous promotion, and setting of the principles of the foresaid Agreement, as the only absolute and perfect means to carry you off all your maladies and distempers.'

Here Lieut. Colonel Lilburne, in the first day's reading the Indictment, taking notice of the Judge Thorp and Mr. Prideaux to whisper together, cried out, and said to this effect:

Lilburne. Hold a while, hold a while, let there be no discourse but openly; for my adversaries or prosecutors whispering with the Judges, is contrary to the law of England, and extremely foul and dishonest play: and therefore I pray let me have no more of that injustice.

Mr. Attorney. It is nothing concerning you (let me give him satisfaction), it is nothing concerning you, Mr. Lilburne.

Lilburne. By your favour, Mr. Prideaux, that is more than I do know; but whether it be or not, by the express law of England, it ought not to be; therefore I pray let me have no more of it.

Mr. Broughton. And further, than the said John Lilburne standest indicted, for that thou the aforesaid 1st day of October, in the year of our Lord 1649, and divers days and times, as well before as after, in London aforesaid, and in the parish and ward aforesaid, didst maliciously, advisedly and traitorously publish another false, poisonous, traitorous and scandalous book, intitled, "An Outcry of the Young-men and Apprentices of London, or an Inquisition after the lost Fundamental Laws and Liberties of England:" having these traitorous and scandalous words (amongst other things) following; that is to say, 'We,' (meaning the Young-men and Apprentices of London) considering what is before premised, 'are necessitated and compelled to do the utmost we can for our own preservations, and for the preservation of the land of our nativity; and never, by popular Petitions, address ourselves to the men sitting at Westminster any more, or to take any more notice of them, than as of so many Tyrants and Usurpers; and for the time to come to hinder, as much and as far as our poor despised interest will extend to, all other whatsoever from sub-cribing or presenting any more popular Petitions to them; and only now as our last refuge, mightily to cry out to each other, of our intolerable oppressions, in Letters and Remonstrances signed in the behalf and by the appointment of all the rest, by some of the stoutest and stiffest among us, that we hope will never apostatize, but be able by the strength of God to lay down their very lives for the maintaining of that which they set their hands to.' And further, That thou the aforesaid John Lilburne afterwards, that is to say, the aforesaid 1st day of October, in the year of our Lord 1649, and divers other days and times, as well before as after, not being an officer or soldier, or member of the army aforesaid, at London aforesaid, in the parish and ward aforesaid, as a false traitor, did maliciously, advisedly, and traitorously endeavour to stir up a dangerous mutinous and traitorous distemper, mutiny and rebellion in the Army now under the command of Thomas lord Fairfax, and didst endeavour to draw Tho. Lewis, John Skinner, and John Toppe from their obedience to their superior officers, &c. and further, didst deliver unto the three soldiers before-named, the said Book, intitled, "An Out-cry of the Young-men and Apprentices of London:" having these words following contained in them: 'Surely all sense and compunction of conscience is not totally departed from you; hear us therefore in the earnest bowels of love and kindness, we intreat and beseech you, with patience, and do not abuse us for complaining and crying out, for the knife hath been very long at the very throats of our liberties and freedoms; and our burdens are too great and many for us, we are not able to bear them, and contain ourselves; our oppressions are even ready to make us despair (or forthwith to fly to the prime laws of Nature, viz. the next violent remedy at hand, light where it will, or upon whom it will;) they are become as devouring fire in our bosoms, ready to burn us up, rendering us desperate and careless of our lives, prizing those that are already dead above that are yet alive, who are rid of that pain and torment that we do and must endure, by sensible seeing and beholding, not only the dying, but the daily burial of our native liberties and freedoms, that we care not what becomes of us, seeing that we are put into that original state of chaos and confusion, wherein lust is become a law; Envy and malice are become laws, and the strongest sword rules and governs all by will and pleasure: all our ancient boundaries and land-marks are pulled up by the roots, and all the ties and bonds of human society in our English horizon totally destroyed and extirpated. Alas, for pity! we had rather die, than live this life of a languishing death, in which our masters possess nothing, to buy themselves or us bread to keep us alive, that they can call their own; therefore it is no boot to serve out our times, and continue at our drudging and toiling trades, whilst these oppressions, cruelties and inhumanities are upon us, and the rest of the people, exposing thereby the nation, not only to domestic broils, wars, and bloodsheds, (wherein we are sure our bodies must be the principal butts) but to foreign invasions by France, Spain, Denmark, Swethland, &c. as was well observed by an endeared and faithful friend of the forementioned late treacherously defeated party at Burford, in their book of the 20th of August 1649, intitled, "The Levelers vindicated, or the Case of the Twelve Troops truly stated," p. 11 and 12, which we cannot but seriously recommend, with them, to your serious perusal and judgment, and desire to know of you (but especially the private soldiers of the gen. regiment of horse, who we understand had a hand in seizing upon and plundering our true friends at Burford), whether you do own the abominable and palpable treacherous dealings of your general and lieutenant-general Cromwell, and their perfidious officers with them, or no? (that so we may not condemn the innocent with the guilty, and may know our friends from our foes:) As also to tell us, Whether you do approve of the total defection of your army, under which it now lieth, from their faith and fallen engagement made at Newmarket-Heath, the 5th of June 1647, not one of those righteous ends, in behalf of the parliament and people, on which your vow was made, being yet fulfilled or obtained; but on the contrary (as we have before-rehearsed), a whole flood-gate of tyrannies are let in upon us, and overwhelm us; and whether you [the aforesaid private soldiers meaning] justify all those actions done in the name of the army,

‘upon your account, and under the pretence of that engagement, since the engagement itself was broken, and your council of adjutators dissolved? And whether you will hold up your swords to maintain the total dissolution of the people’s choicest interest of freedom, viz. frequent and successive parliaments, by an agreement of the people, or obstruct the annual succession? Whether you do allow of the late shedding the blood of war in time of peace, to the subversion of all our laws and liberties? And whether you do countenance the extirpation of the fundamental freedoms of this common-wealth, as the revocation and nullity of the great Charter of England, the Petition of Right, &c.? And whether you do assent to the erection of arbitrary prerogative courts, that have or shall over-rule or make void our antient way of trials in criminal cases by a jury of twelve men of the neighbourhood: And whether you will assist or join in the forcible obstruction of this martial and tyrannical rule over us? Also whether you will fight against and destroy those our friends that shall endeavour the composure of our differences, together with the procurement of our freedoms, and settlement of our peace (your plenty and prosperity), according as it was offered by the four gentlemen prisoners in the Tower of London, upon the first day of May 1649, as a peace-offering to the nation, by the Agreement of the people. [the aforesaid feigned agreement meaning] Lastly, We [the aforesaid young men and apprentices of London meaning] earnestly beseech you [the aforesaid private soldiers again meaning] to acquaint us, whether from your hands, to your power, we may expect any help or assistance in this our miserable, distressed condition, to the removal of those iron bonds and yokes of oppression [the aforesaid government in way of a Commonwealth and Council of State meaning] that have thus enforced us to complain, and address ourselves thus to your consideration; for we [the aforesaid young men and Apprentices again meaning] cannot chuse but acquaint you [the aforesaid private soldiers again meaning] that we are seriously resolved, through the strength and assistance of God, with all the interest we have in the world, to adhere to the righteous things contained in our treacherously defeated forementioned friends vindication, [the aforesaid traitorous book, intitled, “The Levellers Vindicated, or the Case of the Twelve Troops truly stated,” again meaning.]

And further, thou the said John Lilburne, as a false traitor, by most wicked traitorous conspiracies, designs and endeavours of thine aforesaid, afterwards, that is to say, the aforesaid first-day of October, in A. D. 1649 aforesaid, and divers other days and times, as well before as after, didst in the parish and ward of London aforesaid, in and by the aforesaid scandalous, poisonous and traitorous book, entitled, “An Impeachment of High Treason against Oliver Cromwell, and his son-in-law

Henry Ireton,” &c. most falsely, maliciously and traitorously publish, and openly declare, amongst other things, in the said book, these following scandalous, treacherous, tumultuous, and traitorous clauses and words following; that is to say, ‘But I [meaning thyself the said John Lilburne] and many other persons [meaning the aforesaid friends] intreat you seriously to consider that I cannot advise you to make addresses to him [meaning the aforesaid Thomas lord Fairfax, captain-general] as the general of the nation’s forces [the forces of this nation of England meaning]; for he [the aforesaid captain-general meaning] is no general, but is merely a great tyrant [meaning the aforesaid captain-general] standing by the power of his own will, and a strong sword borne up by his vassals, slaves and creatures [the soldiers of the army aforesaid meaning], having no commission to be general, either from the law or the parliament, nor from the prime laws of nature and reason. For first, when he was made general by both houses of parliament, it was expressly against the letter of the laws. And secondly, when he refused to disband, &c. he hath rebelled against his parliament-commission, and thereby destroyed and annihilated it, &c.’

[The Reader is desired to take notice, That in the Indictment itself there was a great many other things than in this is expressed; as particularly divers passages out of a Book, called Mr. Lilburne’s, entitled, “The Legal Fundamental Liberties of England revived,” &c. as also out of another Book, entitled, “A Preparative to an Hue and Cry after Sir Arthur Haslerig,” &c. as also out of, “The Agreement of the People, of the first of May, 1649,” with several other remarkable things in matter and form, that were more neglected to be taken than the pleadings; because it was not supposed, but the Indictment (being a record) a true copy of it might easily be had; considering that by law all records ought freely to be used by any freeman of England, and copies of them denied to none that desire to take them: But that privilege being in this cause already disputed and denied; in which regard, the Reader must at present accept of the best imperfect notes that the publisher could pick up.] But to go on.

And further, That thou the said John Lilburne, as a false traitor, all and singular the clauses and English words aforesaid, and many other traitorous, poisonous and malicious expressions in and by the aforesaid writings, and by the aforesaid several books, as aforesaid recorded, and by thee the aforesaid John Lilburne published, and openly declared in the several books so as aforesaid printed, and by the aforesaid writings, and by thee the aforesaid John Lilburne, in manner and form aforesaid, published and openly divulged and declared divers other scandalous, malicious, tumultuous and treacherous clauses and words in the said books contained, falsely, maliciously, advisedly and traitorously, hast published and openly declared, to the intent to stir up and raise forces against the government aforesaid, in the way of a commonwealth, and free state as aforesaid established; and for the suppressing and alteration of the said government, and to stir up mutiny in the army aforesaid; and also to withdraw the said John Tooke, Thomas Lewis and John Skiinner, and many other soldiers, from their obedience to their superior officers and commanders, and to set them in mutiny and rebellion against the public peace, and to manifest contempt of the laws of this commonwealth and free state, and against the form of the statutes in this case made and provided.

The Indictment being reading, and the noise of the people in the hall great, the Prisoner said he could not hear, and had some few lines before read over to him.

Lilburne. Pray hold your peace, gentlemen; I beseech you be quiet. [Speaking to the people].

Lord Keble. Quiet yourself, we will quiet them for you.

Broughton. Which country are you? so that you are to find whether he is guilty or no, he having already pleaded, Not Guilty. If you find that he is guilty of any the High Treasons laid to his charge, then you are to enquire what goods, lands or chattels he stood possessed of when he committed the said High Treasons; but if you find Not Guilty, you shall then enquire whether he did not fly for it; and if he did not fly for it, then you are to say so, and no more: therefore hearken to your evidence.

Lilburne. May it please your honour—

Cryer. If any man can give any Evidence to my lords the Justices of Oyer and Terminer, against Mr. John Lilburne, let him come in, and he shall be heard.

Lilburne. I desire to be heard to speak two or three words. I humbly desire the favour to speak two or three words. I humbly desire the favour to be heard two words.

Lord Keble. It is not a fit time; you shall be heard in your due time: but hear what the witnesses say first.

Lilburne. I conceive I am much wronged in saying that I pleaded Not Guilty, for, I pleaded no such plea; I appeal to the Court, and to all that heard me, whether I pleaded any such plea: for before I pleaded, the Court became engaged to me, to take no advantage of my ignorance of the formalities of the law; and promised to give me as much privilege as my lord duke of Hamilton and others enjoyed before the Court of Justice.

Lord Keble. We know all this.

Kilburne. Sir, by your favour, I pleaded conditionally, and now I make my absolute plea to the Indictment, which is this: That I except against the matter and form of it, matter, time and place, and humbly crave counsel to assign and plead to the errors thereof.

VOL. IV.

Lord Keble. You must hear us, we hear you; a word is a great deal; these things we have taken perfect notice of, the Court is not ignorant of them; therefore they need not so suddenly be repeated to us again; you need not repeat these things; for I tell you again, they are all fresh in our memories, and that we have done we must maintain, or we have done nothing.

Lilburne. Truly it is requisite for me to say, that I am wronged, I had no such single plea; I plead a plea at large to the errors of the Indictment; and first now crave liberty of the law of England to have time and counsel assigned me.

Lord Keble. You shall have the laws of England, although you refuse to own them in not holding up your hand; for the holding up of the hand hath been used as a part of the law of England these five hundred years. Go on.

Mr. ———. (the Counsel that was an assistant to Mr. Prideaux).—My lord, the Prisoner at the bar stands indicted as a Traitor, for that he contriving, and maliciously intending not only to disturb the public peace, but also to bring the government of the nation, happily settled in a free state or commonwealth, without a king, or an house of lords, and the commons in parliament assembled to bring in disgrace and contempt amongst all good men; he did the first of this instant October, and divers times before and since in this city, falsely and maliciously, advisedly and traitorously, by writing, printing and openly declaring, in and by one Paper of his, called "A Salva Libertate," and by divers other Papers and Books, whereof one he calls, "An Impeachment of High-Treason against Oliver Cromwell and his son-in-law Henry Ireton;" and another Book of his, entitled, "An Out-cry of the Young Men and Apprentices of London," directed to all the private soldiers of the army, &c. A third, "A Preparative to an Hue and Cry after Sir Arthur Haslerig;" and a fourth, "The Legal Fundamental Liberties of the People of England revived." That he did in these books publish, That the said government is tyrannical, usurped and unlawful; and that the commons in parliament assembled are not the supreme authority of this nation. He stands further indicted, That he, as a false traitor, did maliciously, advisedly and traitorously plot and contrive to raise force against the present government, and for the subversion and alteration of it; and for the fulfilling of his most malicious and traitorous designs, he did, in and by the said traitorous Books, falsely, maliciously and advisedly utter and declare several most false and scandalous, malicious and traitorous words and writings, that in the Indictment are particularly named and expressed. And thirdly, That as a traitor, not being an officer, nor a soldier, or a member of the army under the command of the now lord General Fairfax, he did most maliciously and traitorously endeavour to withdraw certain soldiers of that army from their obedience to their superior officers, which are particularly named in the Indictment: And that for the full accomplishment of his contrivances and endeavours, he did maliciously, advisedly and traitorously publish and deliver the poisonous Book, called "An Impeachment;" and in particular directed by the Title of the Book to all the People of England, being for that end published by him to public view: In which Book are contained most false and scandalous, malicious, mutinous and traitorous expressions, as in the Indictment are set forth. And further, That in the said Book, which he called "An Impeachment," That the present government is tyrannical and usurped; and that the commons of England in parliament assembled are not the supreme authority. And he further stands indicted, and the jury further finds and presents, that by all these and other expressions written by him, and published by him in written papers and printed books, he hath falsely, maliciously and traitorously stirred up strife on purpose, and to the intent, to stir up and raise force against the present government, settled in the way of a commonwealth and free state, without king and lords, on purpose it to subvert and destroy. And further, he hath also most traitorously endeavoured to withdraw the private soldiers from their obedience and subjection to their superior officers: And all this in manifest contempt of the laws of this commonwealth in that behalf made and provided, and to the hazard of the overthrow and utter subversion of the said government.

To this Indictment the gentleman hath pleaded Not Guilty, and hath put himself upon his country; and if we can prove this against his plea, it is at an issue.

Lilburne. I deny that, Sir; I never pleaded any such single plea as Not Guilty: And you gentlemen of the jury, I beseech you take notice he extremely wrongs me in saying so; for my plea was a conditional plea, and as a plea at large.

Mr. Attorney. My lords, and you gentlemen of the jury, you have heard the indictment read unto you, and you have heard it opened unto you; and you have heard what Mr. Lilburne says, That he did not plead Not Guilty: And I hope he is ashamed of his plea, now he hears the indictment opened unto him. My lord, in this indictment there are contained these several grand treasons:

The first is, That he hath advisedly, traitorously and maliciously published, that the government that is now established, by way of a free state or commonwealth, without either king or house of lords, is tyrannical, usurped and unlawful. And further, That the present parliament now assembled, are not the supreme authority of the nation.

The second is, That he hath plotted, contrived and endeavoured to stir up, and raise forces against the present government, and for the subversion and alteration of the same:

The third is this that relates to the army; you have heard what his expressions have been, and they have been read unto you, concerning them and the rest, That he, not being an officer, or soldier, or member of the present army, hath offered to stir up mutiny in the army, and to withdraw the soldiers from their obedience and subjection to their superior officers, and thereby to stir them up to mutiny and discontent.

These are the main parts and substance of what I intend to charge him with in the evidence, to prove that which was contained in the indictment. My lord, you have heard, in what hath been read out of the indictment, what expressions they are; those that are traitorous to the public, and have been so declared, so judged, so executed, these are here Mr. Lilburne's engaged true friends: The parliament, the government, the authority of both parliament and army, they are tyrants, usurpers, mercenaries, janisaries, murderers, traitors, standing by their own power and swords, and over-ruling all by their wills: These are the expressions that he used. My lords, I shall not trouble you with any thing of aggravation; for, my lord, I do conceive, that the reading of the books themselves aggravates every thing against him; and I think there is no Englishman (as Mr. Lilburne so often stiles himself to be) will own such words or acts as these are.

And truly, my lord, if I had read the books, and not known the person, I should not have thought he had been either a Christian, or a gentleman, or a civil man, to have given such base and bitter language; but, my lords, and you of the jury, I shall hold you no longer, the evidence being so plain, and the matter so fool, that it will not admit overmuch, or stand in need of any dispute; and to make it plain and clear to your judgments and consciences, there are witnesses in the court evidently to prove every thing that will stand in need to be proved for the indictment.

My lords, the words are maliciously, advisedly, and traitorously: I shall not catch at words, but, as himself says, what he prints is of mature and deliberate consideration; and such are his books in print, that himself hath either printed, or caused to be published.

The first that he is charged withal, is that which is called "An Outcry." It hath a very dangerous title, and in the direction especially to the soldiers of the army; but especially to the private soldiers of the general's regiment of horse, that helped to plunder the true-hearted Englishmen, traitorously defeated at Burford; so, that the rebels at Burford were Mr. Lilburne's dear friends. My lords, it hath not only a dangerous title, but was published at a dangerous time, yea, and for a dangerous end, which was to stir up the great mutiny that was in the city of Oxford. My lord, for the proof of this we shall offer this, That Mr. Lilburne himself was capt. Jones's associate in the publishing that book: For Mr. Lilburne and this captain Jones brought this book to the press to be printed. We shall offer unto you where he hath published it to soldiers of the army, to engage them in a mutiny and discontent against their superior officers. Therefore in the first place call Thomas Newcombe.

Thomas Newcombe sworn.

Justice Jermin. Before you speak, look upon the prisoner first, whether you know him, or not.

Mr. Attorney. My lord, if you please, he may take the book in his hand, and see whether he printed it, and when he printed it, and who brought it to the press.

Mr. Newcombe. I printed of this book only the last sheet, not knowing where the former part of it was done; which book was brought to me by lieutenant col. Lilburne and captain Jones, which captain Jones did agree with me in the price: I was stopped in the proceedings in it. I say that captain Jones, together with lieutenant col. Lilburne, did bring it to me, and that captain Jones did agree with me in the price; but I was taken before I did perfect it: But captain Jones did indent with me for the price. But this I must say, lieutenant col. Lilburne came alone with the copy; and afterwards at night he came again, and had a proof of it; and that he was present when it was corrected.

Mr. Attorney. And when the first sheet was printed, then they came at night again, and examined the proof with captain Jones and his corrector?

Lord Keble. And he brought the copy of the whole draught of the book unto you?

Lilburne. Sir, by your favour, if Mr. Prideaux have done with the witness, I crave my right by law to ask him some questions. In the first place, I desire he may be asked, Whether I was either reader of the original copy, or the overlooker of the printed proof?

Mr. Newcombe. You had a printed sheet of it, and that was all.

Lilburne. I desire to know whether I was either the reader of that he printed, or the looker upon the written copy?

Mr. Newcombe. You looked upon the sheet that was printed, captain Jones read the manuscript.

Lilburne. Ask him the question thus, Whether was I the corrector of the thing printed, or the looker-on upon the printed copy? And whether, or no, he can swear that printed sheet, that he says I had, was corrected and revised, and was a true and perfect sheet, according to the original?

Mr. Newcombe. It was a copy of the sheet before it was corrected or revised.

Mr. Attorney. And Mr. Jones did read the original, and lieutenant col. Lilburne corrected the copy?

Lilburne. Under favour, you are mistaken: He says, that I cast my eye upon the copy; but doth not in the least say, that I corrected it. And therefore, Sir, you do abuse me, in going about to make him say more than his own conscience tells him is truth.

Ld. Keble. While the examination was, he saith you read the proof.

Lilburne. Sir, he says no such thing, by your favour.

Ld. Keble. Mr. Newcombe, was not Mr. Lilburne there the second time at night, and did he not look upon the copy?

Mr. Newcombe. That he did, my lord; But, my lord, I shall tell you the manner of our trade in this particular. The manner is, That after we have set a form of the letter, we make a proof of it, which proof we have a corrector does read: My corrector he had one, being he corrected it, and captain Jones looked upon the manuscript. And lieutenant col. Lilburne had a copy of the same sheet uncorrected; but he did not correct it, nor read to the corrector. There was two pulled off; the corrector had one, and Mr. Lilburne had the other; and captain Jones looked upon the manuscript, and read it to the corrector.

Lilburne. He has declared unto you, that he was taken printing the thing before it was perfected: I desire to know whether I was at his house to give any further directions at all after it was taken.

Mr. Attorney. That is no thanks neither to you nor him.

Lilburne. I pray let him answer the thing: Let me have fair play above board. Sir, I beseech you let me hold him close to the question. He says he was taken before the sheet was perfected: Truly, I think they are his very words.

Mr. Newcombe. I said in my examination that it was a proof of that printed which you had.

Lilburne. I desire again to know, this of him, Whether before he had printed or perfected that sheet he had doing, he was not taken, and both the forms?

Ld. Keble. Mr. Lilburne, you must desire us to ask him the question; and not you to demand it of yourself.

Lilburne. I shall, Sir.

Mr. Newcombe. It was, before the forms were taken.

Lilburne. I ask you, Whether before the things were compleat and perfect, your forms were not both taken, and your person seized upon?

Mr. Newcombe. There were only some few copies printed, and then I was seized upon, and the forms taken away before I had perfected the sheet. But this, I say, He did not indent with me for the price; neither had I the copy from Mr. Lilburne's hands, but from captain Jones's hands.

Justice Jermin. You say that he had one proof, and Jones another: When was this you speak of? Give us the time as near as you can.

Mr. Newcombe. I cannot justly say the time; but as I remember, it was about seven or eight weeks since.

Mr. Attorney. Stand you aside: and call John Tooke, John Skinner, Thomas Lewis, John Hawkins, and John Merriman, witnesses sworn.

Mr. Attorney. John Tooke, do you declar

now your knowledge. That which I call him for, is to this purpose, that Mr. Tooke being a soldier of the army, one of them mentioned in the indictment, Mr. Lilburne delivered him one of the Outcries, on purpose to draw him from his obedience to his superior officers.

Ld. Keble. Shew him the book.

Mr. Tooke. I have seen the book; but I had not the book in my hand before.

Mr. Attorney. Tell what you know; that is all we ask you.

Mr. Tooke. About seven weeks ago, being at dinner with Thomas Lewis and John Smith, all soldiers, after dinner we met with lieut. col. Lilburne in Ivy-Lane; and Thomas Lewis knowing of him, took acquaintance of him.

Justice Jermin. All soldiers under my lord general Fairfax?

Mr. Tooke. Yes, Sir.

Justice Jermin. Go on.

Mr. Tooke. Mr. Lilburne asked me to go and drink a cup of beer: We did so. And so when we went in, he asked whether we had seen such a book as the Apprentices Outcry? And Mr. Lewis answered, That he had seen it in a man's hand. Then lieut. col. Lilburne said he had one in his pocket, that was given him; and if he pleased to accept of it, he would give it him. So told him he had thought to buy one of them, for he heard they were sold in the city; but he would accept of his. So Mr. Lilburne delivered it to Mr. Lewis.

Mr. Attorney. What did Master Lilburne say farther unto you?

Mr. Tooke. He said, That you soldiers keep us all in slavery.

Lilburne. I beseech you let me ask him one question.

Mr. Tooke. There was some to be sold; but I forgot the place.

Mr. Attorney. Did he name a place and person to you, where you might have some of them?

Mr. Tooke. He did name a place, but I have forgot it, where there were more books to be sold.

Lilburne. Sir, I beseech you let me ask you one question—

Ld. Keble. Mr. Lilburne, for your direction, you must make your question to us, and require us to ask him the question: and then if your question be fair, it shall not be denied you.

Lilburne. Then thus: Whatsoever this gentleman says of meeting him in Ivy-Lane, and desiring him to go to drink with me, yet I desire you to ask him, whether I did take notice or cognizance of any of them first? Or whether they did speak to me before ever I said any thing to them?

Lord Keble. To what end do you ask this?

Lilburne. Because in your indictment I am charged, that I went among the soldiers to seduce them from their obedience to their superior officers; when I have made it my endeavour to shun them as much as I can, and not to come nigh the place where I know they are, if I can avoid it; no, although I meet with them, not to discourse with any of them, unless they begin first.

Lord Keble. I tell you this, which may direct you afterwards: Whatsoever began to discourse first, if you did give them the book afterwards, it is all one.

Lilburne. But, shall please you, I am upon my life; and by law I ought not to be denied to ask the witnesses that swear against me any question that I please, that I myself judge pertinent for my advantage.

Mr. Attorney. Call Thomas Lewis.

Thomas Lewis. And it shall please you, I am upon my oath to speak the truth; and I shall desire by the help of God so to do, and no more. One day, which I conceive to my remembrance was the 6th day of September, last, we being upon a guard at Paul's, went to an house to refresh ourselves; and when I came forth I met with lieut. col. John Lilburne, whom I had formerly known, and sometimes visited in his imprisonment, and whom I was very glad to see, having a little before heard as though some sudden accident or mischance had befallen him; and I did ask him how he did. He said unto me, he was well: And so with that says he, what, are you upon the guard? To my best remembrance, this was his expression; yet see whether it was he, or another that said it. As I take it, these were his words: Says he, I have almost forgotten you. Sir, I was known to you formerly, having sometimes been with you in the Tower. Says he, Will you go drink? If you please, we will: And so upon that we went to a place called the Red-Cross in Newgate-Market. And there we sitting down to drink, having not much discourse for the present, we sitting still, he asked me at length, have you heard of a book called the 'Outcry of the Apprentices'? Sir, said I, I have heard of it, and have a longing desire to buy one of them to read it; and my reason why I said so was, because I did understand it was to be sold at the exchange; there I intended to go and get one of them. Says he, I had one given to me; and if you will, I will give it unto you. So I received the book with thankfulness; and further expressing, which was something mean, it would save me a penny in buying of it. And I further intreated him, if he could direct me where I might buy some more of them. I have a friend, says he, in such a place; if you would go to him, and tell him that I am here, I should think myself beholden to you. Now the place's name was Martin's-Lane, but the man's name, whither I went, I have forgot, and the man too: I never heard of the man before nor since; so I told Mr. Lilburne. Now, he said to me, peradventure where you find that man, you may have some more of the books. Now these were the words, to my best remembrance and knowledge, as I desire to speak with a pure conscience.

Mr. Attorney. Mr. Lilburne gave you one of those books?

Mr. Lewis. Yes, Sir; and I put it into my pocket, and when I had done, Mr. ——— he will deliver him——

Whether there was any books or passages betwixt them? And upon which he told him, Yes; there is a book that Mr. Lewis has, that has such a title.

Mr. Attorney. What did you with the book?

Mr. Lewis. I delivered it to the lieutenant.

Mr. Attorney. The same book that you received from Mr. Lilburne you delivered to the lieutenant?

Mr. Attorney. What did lieutenant colonel Lilburne say to you concerning your pay? Did not he ask you, &c.

Lilburne. I pray, Sir, do not direct him what to say, but leave him to his own conscience and memory, and make him not for fear to swear more than his own conscience freely tells him is true.

Mr. Lewis. The discourse was thus: Says he, you soldiers, to my best remembrance, are the men that keep us all in slavery. Now what to conceive of that expression, I must leave that unto you. And as concerning our pay, he asked us, how is your pay? These were the words, or to that effect. But there was money come for us, and ready to be delivered out unto us.

Mr. Attorney. Call John Skinner: He was one of those that was in company, and can speak to it.

Mr. Skinner. To my best remembrance, and it shall please you, it was the beginning of September, I cannot justly tell what day, that I met with Mr. Lilburne in Ivy-Lane, near unto Paul's; and meeting with him, I was going towards the guard, and so was Mr. Lewis with me, being walking forth of the lane, having been refreshing ourselves. And near the end of the lane we met with lieutenant Lilburne, which lieutenant col. Mr. Lewis very well knew; and knowing of him, asked him how he did, and how it went on with him, in regard he had heard before he was in prison; so I did not take any heed what he said further. Neither do I know whether Mr. Lewis asked Mr. Lilburne to go with him to drink, or Mr. Lilburne asked him; but on the Red-Cross in Newgate-Market we went to drink. And Mr. Lilburne did ask Mr. Lewis, whether or no he had seen the book which was called the Apprentices Outcry. Mr. Lewis answered him, that he had not seen the book, (as I remember) but he had heard of that book that it was forth, and he did intend to buy one of them, in regard they were publicly sold abroad. Says Mr. Lilburne, I have such a book in my pocket, which was given me even now; and I will give you, if you will.

Lilburne. I pray, let me hear two or three names before.

Mr. Skinner. Whereupon you answered, and said, I have the book in my pocket, and it was given me, and I will give it you. And Mr. Lewis received it, and that was all. And presently I went away.

Mr. Prideaux. You hear, gentlemen of the jury, that it is the same book that he received from the hands of lieutenant col. John Lilburne.

Lilburne. My lord, I beseech you hear me before the witnesses go: and he that was sworn before, I desire to ask him this question, whether or no that this is the very book that is mentioned in the indictment? And whether or no they have examined the words of it with the indictment?

Mr. Prideaux. You need not; that shall be proved presently. Mr. Skinner, That book which Mr. Lilburne gave you, what did you with it?

Mr. Skinner. It was delivered unto my lieutenant, who stands there.

Lieut. It was delivered unto my captain upon the guard.

Capt. Merriman took the book into his hand, and said, This individual Book, signed in several places by me, I delivered to Mr. Frost, secretary to the Council of State; and Mr. Frost caused me to sign it in several places, whereby it could not be mistaken; and that is the very individual book.

Mr. Prideaux. My lords, and you gentlemen of the jury, we have thus far gone in the evidence: that Mr. Lilburne brought the last sheet of it to the press the first time he came with capt. Jones; and he came the second time with him to examine it; that is, he had a printed copy, that was then printing, to be printed, and was the corrector for the press, reading the original copy: so far is he privy to the printing of the book. In the next place, three witnesses (soldiers of the army) swear he gave them one of those books, and one of them gave it to his lieutenant, and the lieutenant to the captain; and the captain swears, this individual book is that which master Lilburne gave into the hands of Mr. Lewis. What can be more plain than this? I pray you judge. For here is plain testimony of Mr. Lilburne's delivering this Outcry to the three soldiers, and one of them to his lieutenant, and his lieutenant to his captain, and his captain to Mr. Frost, with marks upon it: so this is by consequence proved unto you, this is the individual book that Mr. Lilburne, prisoner at the bar, gave to the three soldiers; and which is to be made use of when you have occasion upon the evidence, to read it, as now it is in the court with you.

Lilburne. By your favour, I have had no answer to the Question, that I humbly craved an answer to; which is, Whether the soldiers are positively able to swear that this is the individual book which they say they had from my hands? And whether they are able to swear that this individual book is a true and exact copy without addition or subscription, of that original manuscript that the printer saith capt. Jones delivered to his hands, which, he saith, I had an uncorrected sheet of?

Mr. Prideaux. We shall clear that to you when we come to make use of it.

Lilburne. I beseech you, gentlemen of the jury, to take notice of my question, and what I am denied.

Mr. Prideaux. The next thing that is charged upon him is a paper written and entitled, "A Salva et Libertate." My lord, I shall open the thing to you. Being directed (my lord) for the prosecution of Mr. Lilburne, and having things of a very high concernment that are charged against him, I did by word of mouth send to have him come to me; which I understood he did decline, because the lieutenant had no warrant. The lieutenant of the Tower was pleased to acquaint me with it; and I thereupon directed my warrant to the lieutenant to bring him before me. And Mr. Lilburne, &c.

Lilburne. My lord,* and please your honours, thus: if we be upon matter of fact, let us come to it: let us have no introduction to teach the witnesses what to say, what beyond their own consciences dictate unto them.

Mr. Prideaux. I shall go no further in it; let the lieutenant of the Tower speak himself.

The Lieutenant of the Tower sworn.

Mr. Prideaux. Lieutenant of the Tower, you are questioned about the "Salva Libertate" that Mr. Lilburne delivered unto you: have you the original?

Lieut. Tower. Yes, Sir, I have.

Mr. Prideaux. How came you by it?

Lieut. Tower. I shall be short in what I say, because I will not trouble the court.

Lilburne. Let me hear you, then.

Lieut. Tower. Being abroad, there was a message left with my servants, that I should bring up lieutenant-colonel Lilburne to Mr. Attorney's chamber in the Temple; and when I came in, I had notice of it. I did then send to lieutenant-colonel John Lilburne to let him know what command I had received from the Attorney-general, the next day to carry up lieutenant-colonel John Lilburne to the Attorney-general's chamber. But lieutenant-colonel Lilburne not well understanding whether I had a written warrant, or no; but before he came at home he recalled himself, and came back, and desired the sight of my warrant. I told you before I had no warrant, but by word of mouth. Why, says he, do you think I will go upon a verbal warrant? Saith he, I will not go unless you force me. But the next day Mr. Attorney-general was acquainted that he refused to come without a warrant. When the warrant was made, I met with lieutenant-colonel Lilburne about ten of the clock in the Tower, who intreated me to let him see it. I shewed it him, he read it, he desired a copy of it, takes it; which when he had, he went from me; and about two hours after he came to me, about one of the clock, and said,

* This was the first or second time that Mr. Lilburne's tongue slipped the calling him Lord.

I pray receive this from me; for (says he) I do intend not to own the authority and power of that gentleman that sent me the warrant. Whereupon I told him, I would shew the same to the Attorney-general: why, says he, I give you it to that purpose. When the time came, lieut. col. Lilburne did go along with me in an orderly, civil way: I had no body but my man; for I told him, I will take no body but my man, if you will engage yourself to me that you will return peaceably: which he did, and so we went very orderly to Mr. Attorney's chamber; which is all for that I can say.

Mr. Attorney. If you please, that the lieutenant may upon his oath declare, whether that be the true original he had from Mr. Lilburne's own hands, or no?

Lieut. Tower. It was never out of my custody since he gave it me.

Lord Keble. Mr. Lilburne, you do acknowledge it to be your own hand-writing? Shew a him.

Lilburne. I am too old with such simple gins to be caught; I will cast mine eyes upon none of your papers, neither shall I answer to any questions that concern myself: I have learned more law out of the Petition of Right, and Christ pleading before Pilate, than a

Mr. Attorney. Would you had learnt more gospel!

Judge Jermin. You may answer a question, whether it be true or false; and confess, and glorify God.

Lilburne. I have said, Sir; prove it: I am not to be caught with such fooleries.

Lord Keble. You see the man, and the quality of the man; this is the paper that he delivered into his own hand, and that is sufficient, as well as if it was of his own hand-writing.

Lilburne. Good Sir, your verbal bench-law is far short of your written text in your own law-books.

Judge Jermin. Put it into the court.

Lord Keble. Your writing or not writing is nothing; you delivered the book.

Lilburne. Sir, I desire to know in what place, whereabouts in the Tower of London, the lieutenant of the Tower saith he received this paper.

Lord Keble. Let him name the place where it was delivered.

Lieut. Tower. The place was at the steps, at the bottom of the narrow passage at my garden-end, in the cart-way where the carriages come up.

Lilburne. Whether is that place in the liberties of London, or is it part of the county of Middlesex?

Lieut. Tower. The Tower is in London,* some part of it, and some part in Middlesex; but unto which place that part of the Tower belongs, I am not able certainly to say, but it hath commonly been reputed in Middlesex.

* But it is sure that place is in Middlesex, as was resolved in Sir Tho. Overbury's Case. See Coke's 3d part Inst. fol. 130, chap. Indictment.

Mr. Attorney. My lord, you may see the valiantness of this champion for the people's liberties, that will not own his own hand; although I must desire you, gentlemen of the jury, to observe that Mr. Lilburne implicitly confesseth it.

Lilburne. Sir, I deny nothing: and what now can be proved mine, I have a life to lay down for the justification of it, but prove it first.

Mr. Attorney. My lord, the next thing to prove the charge against him is a very high one, it is styled Mr. Lilburne's, and his name is to it: it is intitled, "An Impeachment of High Treason against Oliver Cromwell, and his son-in-law Henry Ireton, esq. late members of the late forcibly dissolved house of commons, presented to public view by lieut. col. John Lilburne, close prisoner in the Tower of London." My lord, I doubt he will not own it; but yet, my lord, he may be asked the question.

Lilburne. I shall deny nothing I do: And yet I have read the Petition of Right, Sir, that teacheth me to answer to no questions against or concerning myself, and I have read of the same to be practised by Christ and his Apostles.

Mr. Attorney. You will not own it, the book you have read?

Lilburne. You may make your advantage of it.

Mr. Attorney. We shall prove it; call Witnesses.

Thomas Daffern, Richard Lander, Marshal, Major Hawksworth, Governor of Warwick Castle; all sworn.

Mr. Attorney. Mr. Daffern, if you please he may be asked where he met Mr. Lilburne, he time when, what book was given him, and to what purpose it was given him.

Mr. Daffern. Why, it was upon the 12th of August last. Having been in Southwark, I met with lieut. col. Lilburne upon the bridge, I went back with him to his house at Winchester House in Southwark: He had leave to visit his family at that time, being very sick, and I told him I was going into Warwickshire the next day; and he having heard that col. Ayres was then removed from Oxford to Warwick Castle, he gave me a book to carry to him, and I delivered it to him at Warwick Castle.

Mr. Attorney. The Book that he gave you, you gave to the governor: Did you see any one of them?

Mr. Daffern. I never saw any of them but at, which was both the first and the last I have seen of them.

Mr. Attorney. Lander the marshal was present at that time, was he not?

Mr. Lander. That I was; and I had it from him, and I delivered the Book to major Hawksworth the governor.

Mr. Attorney. Major Hawksworth, what do you do with the Book

Major Hawksworth. I sent it to col. Purefoy, in a paper sealed with three or four seals.

Mr. Attorney. Call colonel Purefoy.

Col. Purefoy sworn.

Lilburne. I bear not one word: Under favour, but one word, I crave but one word, I have an exception. First, col. Purefoy is one of those that call themselves the Keepers of the Liberties of England; and for committing crimes against them I am indicted, and he is one of them, and therefore a party, and in that respect in law he can be no witness against me. It would have been very hard for the king to have been a witness against that man that was indicted for committing crimes against him; such a thing in all his reign was never known.

Col. Purefoy. I received this Book, sealed in a letter, from the governor of Warwick Castle, major Hawksworth; I know his hand, and I know the day he sent me this very individual Book; and my hand is at it, and the governor who sent it up to me, which I declare to be the very individual Book that I received from him.

Mr. Attorney. Mr. Lilburne, you are mistaken; col. Purefoy is a member of parliament, he is none of the Keepers of the Liberties of England. But why will you put us to all this trouble to prove your Books, seeing your hand is to them? My lord, I had thought the great champion of England would not be ashamed to own his own hand.

Lilburne. I have answered once for all: I am upon Christ's terms, when Pilate asked him whether he was the Son of God, and adjured him to tell him whether he was or no; he replied, 'Thou sayest it.' So say I, Thou Mr. Prideaux sayest it, they are my Books: But prove it; and when that is done, I have a life to lay down to justify whatever can be proved mine.

Judge Jermin. But Christ said afterwards, 'I am the Son of God.' Confess, Mr. Lilburne, and give glory to God.

Lilburne. I thank you, Sir, for your good law, but I can teach myself better.

Mr. Attorney. Here Mr. Lilburne makes a book, which was given to the hands of Mr. Daffern by Mr. Lilburne himself; Mr. Daffern he swears, that the same book he gave to col. Ayres; Mr. Lander the marshal of the garrison of Warwick swears, that the same book Daffern gave to col. Ayres, he had from him, and gave to major Hawksworth the governor; the governor swore, that that book he received from the marshal, he sent sealed up in a letter to Mr. Purefoy; who also swears, that that same book he set his hand to it to know it again by, and that the individual book that is now given into your hands, is the same book that was delivered to him: The Title is, "An Impeachment of High Treason against Oliver Cromwell, esq."

Lilburne. Sir, I wonder you are not ashamed so far to press the testimony beyond that they themselves swear. Mr. Daffern doth not name the book at all that was given to him, neither dath he swear it to be mine; and therefore, Sir, you abuse yourself, the court, the witness, and me too.

Attorney. Master Lilburne, I have done you right in it, and no wrong at all; for col. Purefoy doth name it. The next is a very dangerous book of his, called, "A Preparative to the Hue and Cry after Sir Arthur Haslerig." Mr. Lieutenant of the Tower, you are upon your oath, I pray you speak your knowledge to that.

Lieut. of Tower. My lord, it is true, lieut. col. Lilburne gave me in the Tower such a Book; but I cannot say, whether that be the same book that he delivered to me, or no: I have such a book also at home, but I am not able to say that is the very book he gave me; and whether this be the same book, I know not.

Mr. Prideaux. Call Mr. Nutleigh and Mr. Radney.

Master Nutleigh sworn.

Lilburne. I pray let the Witnesses stand here, the Jury say they cannot hear them.

Edward Radney called and sworn.

Lilburne. I pray you, let me know what these gentlemen are; I do not know them, neither can I remember at present that I ever saw them before.

Lord Keble. You see they look like men of quality.

Mr. Prideaux. They are my servants, Mr. Lilburne.

Mr. Nutleigh. My lord, and please your lordship, the 14th of September last, the prisoner at the bar, lieut. colonel John Lilburne, being before Mr. Attorney-General, and I being by in the chamber, (a) I did see him deliver this book to Mr. Attorney-General, this specific book; and he did own it, and called himself the author of it, save only the erratas of the printer.

Lilburne. The last clause, I beseech you, Sir; the Jury desires to hear the last clause.

Mr. Nutleigh. My lord, he said he was the author of that Book, (b) the erratas of the printer excepted.

Lilburne. Let him be asked this question, Whether in that expression, 'Saving the Erratas of the Printer,' there did not follow these words, 'which are many?' I desire to know whether there were not such words, or not?

Mr. Radney. I was present, my lord, when

(a) "But Mr. Lilburne hath been heard to profess, he saw not these gentlemen in the chamber that he discoursed with Mr. Prideaux in, although he looked divers times about him."

(b) "That is an errant lie; for divers that heard the words, aver them to be thus: 'It is my book, and I will own it;' and so it might be, although he had bought it." Orig. Edit.

the prisoner at the bar presented this book to Mr. Attorney, and owned it, saving the Erratas of the Printer.

Lilburne. Were there no more words?

Mr. Radney. Not to my remembrance.—[And so said they both].

Lieut. of Tower. My lord, I was present at the same time, when lieut. col. Lilburne did present a book to Mr. Attorney-General, with such a Title as this: And truly if I be not much mistaken, there was used by him these words, 'which are many.' Thus it was in the whole: Says he, 'Here is a book which is mine, which I will own, the erratas or errors of the printer excepted, which are many;' and if I mistake not very much, those are the very words Mr. Lilburne said.

Mr. Attorney. My lords, and you gentlemen of the jury, you see that here are three witnesses, and they do all agree in this, that master Lilburne, the prisoner at the bar, did deliver this book to me, owning it as his (c) own: the errors or erratas of the printer only excepted. And as for that clause, 'which are many,' only the lieutenant of the Tower swears to that singly; and therefore I desire a may remain in court, as that individual Book that they saw master Lilburne give me. But, my lord, there is another Book in the Indictment, intitled, "The legal fundamental Liberty of the People of England revived and asserted; Or, An Epistle written the 8th of June, 1649, by lieut. col. John Lilburne, to Mr. William Lenthall, Speaker to the remainder of those few knights, citizens, and burgesses, that col. Thomas Pride, at his late Purge, thought convenient to leave sitting at Westminster." My lords, for this book, it owns master Lilburne, if he will own it, it hath his name to it; But I have my lesson from him; my lord, he will own nothing; he will publish enough, but, my lord, he will not own it when he comes to be questioned for it; that is not the true principle of a true Christian, nor an Englishman, nor a gentleman.

Lilburne. I deny nothing, by your favour.

Mr. Attorney. And confess as little. My lord, for this you have two books in proof before you: The Preparative to the Hue and Cry," and the "Salva Libertate" owns these very individual Books: For the "Preparative to the Hue and Cry," in the marginal note at the second page, owns and avows this book, called, "The Legal Fundamental," &c. to be master Lilburne's. And master Lilburne himself did own "the Preparative to the Hue and Cry" before three witnesses to be his: and therefore the "Salva Libertate," Mr. Lieutenant of the Tower hath sworn that he received it from his own hands. My lords, as for this book the "Salva," which he does not acknowledge, we shall read the words in the indictment, although it had been as ingenious for master Lilburne to have confessed it, as for us to have proved it: And for the proof of it, read the title.

(c) "So is an ox a man buys with his moort, it is his own; and so is a gold ring he finds, after he hath found it, it is his own: And yet it doth not follow, that the owner either began the ox, or made the gold ring." Orig. Edit.

Clerk. The title read: "A Preparative to an Hue and Cry after sir Arthur Haslerig, a late member of the forcibly dissolved house of commons; and now the present wicked, bloody, and tyrannical governor of Newcastle upon Tyne."

Mr. Prideaux. Read the marginal note in page 2.

Clerk. Page 2, in the margin: "That those men that now sit at Westminster are no parliament, either upon the principles of law or reason: See my argument and reasons therefore, in my second edition of my book of the 8th of June 1649, intitled, "The Legal Fundamental Liberties of the People of England, revived and asserted," p. 48, 49, to 63."

Mr. Attorney. This book hath Mr. Lilburne's name to it, and here in this his Hue and Cry he owns it, and the third page in the margin hath it again.

Clerk. Page 3. "Peruse carefully, I intreat you, the quotations in the 6th and 8th pages of my forementioned Impeachment of High Treason against Cromwell: As also of the 12th and 15th pages of the second edition of my forementioned book, dated the 8th of June, 1649, intitled, "The Legal Fundamental Liberties," &c."

Mr. Attorney. Read the fourth in the body of the book.

Clerk. Page 4. "At which trial, by strength of arguments, I forced the judges openly to confess, that generals were nothing in law: See also the second edition of my book of the 8th of June, 1649, intitled, "The Legal Fundamental Liberties of the People of England revived, asserted, and vindicated," pag. 49."

Lilburne. Let him speak whether it be 29 or 49.

Clerk. Forty-nine (but there is not so many pages in the book).

Mr. Attorney. My Lord, here is a "Salva Libertate," which is his own book, though he will not own it. My lord, I had thought the great champion of England for the people's liberties, would never have been so unworthy as not to have owned his own hand: but read in the 24th page of the "Salva" in his own written hand.

Clerk. Page 24. "I have by almost eight years dear-bought experience found the interest of some of my forementioned judges to be too strong for me to grapple with, and the only cause, to my apprehension, that all this while keeps me from my own." And in the Margin he saith; "See also the second edition of my forementioned book, intitled, "The Legal Fundamental Liberties of the People of England revived, &c."

Mr. Attorney. Now, my lord, there is the "Salva Libertate" that was given from his own hand, that owns it; I mean this Book, called, "The Legal Fundamental Liberties," &c.

Mr. Attorney. Read the Title of it.

Clerk. "A Salva Libertate sent to col. Francis West, Lieutenant of the Tower of London, on Friday the 14th of September, 1649, by Lieut. Col. John Lilburne."

Mr. Prideaux. Read where it is marked.

Clerk. "But if you would produce unto me a written Warrant which hath some more face of legal magistracy in it than verbal commands, and according to my right and privilege let me read it; I would go with you either by land or water as you please, because I was in no capacity to resist you: Although I then told you I judged a Paper-Warrant (although in words never so formal) coming from any pretended power or authority in England now visible, to be altogether illegal; because the intruding general Fairfax, and his forces, had broke and annihilated all the formal and legal magistracy of England, yea, the very Parliament itself; and by his will and sword (absolute conqueror like) had most tyrannically erected, set up, and imposed upon the free people of this nation, a Juncto, or mock-power sitting at Westminster, whom he and his associates call a parliament; who, like so many armed thieves and robbers upon the highway, assume a power by their own will, most traitorously to do what they like."

Mr. Attorney. That is not the place, look towards the latter end.

Clerk. Then here it is: "Sure I cannot chuse but acquaint you, that I have long since drawn and published my plea against the present power, in my second edition of my book of the 8th of June 1649, intitled, "The Legal Fundamental Liberties of the People of England revived, asserted, and vindicated;" which you may in an especial manner read in the 43^d, 44th, 45th, to the 49th page: Which by the strength of the Lord God omnipotent, my large experienced help in time of need, I will seal with the last drop of my blood."

Mr. Attorney. My lord, for the book called "The Legal Fundamental Liberties of England," his name is to the book; but I shall not put much weight upon that: But in others of his books, as in his "Preparative to an Hue and Cry," which he owns, and which is proved he owns by three witnesses, in several places of that book he owns this as his book, viz. "The Legal Fundamental Liberties of England revived," &c. he calls it mine, and 'his forementioned Book:' And in his "Salva Libertate" he owns it again, gives it the very date, and the very title that is in this book. My lords, we have done with this. My lords, now I shall go on to make use of it, and to shew (my lord) out of these books his words and language, to make good the charge that hath been read in the indictment against Mr. Lilburne. My lords, if you please, for that I shall begin first in reading to the jury the very act itself, which makes the fact to be treason.

My lord, for that, here is the act that doth declare the commonwealth for the future to become hereafter a free state; and the other declaring that fact to be treason, that shall say it is tyrannical or unlawful. These are general acts which need not to be proved; but if the prisoner does desire it, we shall prove it.

Clerk. Die Luna, 14 May, 1649. Ordered by the commons assembled in parliament.

Lilburne. Hold, Sir! Prove your act first, whether it be an act of parliament.

Mr. Attorney. My lords, I shall not struggle with Mr. Lilburne in plain terms; but I thought when acts were published, the courts of justice were bound in duty to take notice of them: But if it be so he will have it proved, we will; although it be but a slender cavil, for this is one of the published copies.

Lilburne. But under your favour, Mr. Prideaux, as there may be counterfeit money (which we see there is every day), so there may be counterfeit statutes too; and this may be one, for any thing I know; therefore I desire it may be proved to be a true statute or act of parliament.

Mr. Nuttigh. This is a true copy of the act of parliament, which I examined with the record.

Lilburne. The record! Where is that to be found?

Mr. Nuttigh. At Westminster, with the Clerk of the Parliament.

Lilburne. Is this gentleman able to depose it to be a true law in all the parts of it? For by the laws of England, the people are not to take any notice of acts made, but by a parliament; neither are they to take notice of those acts that are not proclaimed. Sir, I beseech you let me know where the record and rolls are, and where he examined this; and whether he is able to swear, whether they have been proclaimed in every hundred and market-town, according to the old, and not yet repealed law of England.

Lord Keble. At Westminster, he tells you.

Lilburne. I beseech you, where at Westminster?

Lord Keble. The clerks of the parliament are known to the city of London here, you know it well enough.

Lilburne. That is no answer to my questions: I pray let me have fair play; for it is a question to me, whether the books of the clerk of the house of commons be a (a) record in law, or no.

Lord Keble. Read, clerk.

Clerk. An Act of the 14th of May 1649, declaring what offences shall be adjudged Treason.

Whereas the Parliament hath abolished the kingly office in England and Ireland, and in the dominions and territories therunto belonging, and hath resolved and declared that the people shall for the future be governed by its own representatives, or national meetings in council, chosen and intrusted by them for that purpose; hath settled that government in the way of a commonwealth and free state, without king or house of lords: Be it therefore enacted by this present parliament, and by the authority of the same, that if any person shall maliciously or advisedly publish, by writing, printing, or openly declaring, That the said government is tyrannical, usurped, or unlawful: or that the Commons in parliament assembled are not the supreme authority of this nation; or shall plot, contrive, or endeavour to stir up or raise force against the present government, or for the subversion or alteration of the same, and shall declare the same by any open deed: that then every such offence shall be taken, deemed, and adjudged by the authority of this present parliament to be High Treason. And whereas the Keepers of the Liberty of England, and the Council of State constituted, and to be from time to time constituted, by authority of parliament, are to be, under the said representatives in parliament, intrusted for the maintenance of the said government with several powers and authorities, limited, given, and appointed unto them by the parliament: Be it likewise enacted by the authority aforesaid, That if any person shall maliciously and advisedly plot, or endeavour the subversion of the said Keepers of the Liberty of England, or the Council of State, and the same shall declare by any open deed; or shall move any person or persons for the doing thereof, or stir up the people to rise against them, or either of them, their or either of their authorities; that then every such offence and offences shall be taken, deemed, and declared to be high treason.

(a) "And well might he: for Mackwel, in his Manner of passing of Statutes," in his preface therunto, saith, That the Commons had no Journals at all before Edward the sixth's time." Orig. Edit.

And whereas the parliament, for their just and lawful defence, have raised and levied the army and forces under the command of Thomas lord Fairfax, and are at present necessitated, by reason of the manifold distractions within this commonwealth, and invasions threatened from abroad, to continue the same; which under God must be the instrumental means of preserving the well-affected people of this nation in peace and safety: Be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That if any person, not being an officer, soldier, or member of the army, shall plot, contrive, or endeavour to stir up any mutiny in the said army, or withdraw any soldiers or officers from their obedience to their superior officers, or from the present government, as aforesaid; or shall procure, invite, aid, or assist, any foreigners or strangers to invade England or Ireland; or shall adhere to any forces raised by the enemies of the Parliament, or Commonwealth, or Keepers of the Liberties of England; or if any person shall counterfeit the Great Seal of England (for the time being) used and appointed by authority of parliament: That

• then every such offence and offences shall be • taken, deemed, and declared by the authority
 • of this parliament, to be high treason; and
 • every such person shall suffer pain of death,
 • and shall forfeit unto the Keepers of the Li• berty of England, to and for the use of the • commonwealth, all and singular his and their
 • lands, tenements and hereditaments, goods
 • and chattels, as in case of high treason hath
 • been used by the laws and statutes of this • land, to be forfeit and lost. Provided always,
 • That no persons shall be indicted and arraign-
 • ed for any of the offences mentioned in this • act, unless such offenders shall be indicted or • prosecuted for the same within one year after
 • the offence committed.'

Mr. Prideaux. Read the other Statute.

Clerk. Tuesday, 17 July 1649. Ordered by the Commons assembled in Parliament, That this Act be forthwith printed and published.
 Hen. Scobell, Cler. Parl.

An Act declaring what Offences shall be adjudged Treason.

• Whereas the Parliament hath abolished the • kingly office in England and Ireland, and in
 • the dominions and territories thereunto be-
 • longing; and having resolved and declared, • that the people shall for the future be govern• ed by its own representatives, or national • meetings in council, chosen and entrusted by
 • them for that purpose, hath settled the govern• ment, by way of a Commonwealth, and Free
 • State, without king or house of lords: Be it • enacted by this present Parliament, and by
 • the authority of the same, That if any person
 • shall maliciously or advisedly publish by writ• ing, printing, or openly declaring, That the
 • said government is tyrannical, usurped or
 • unlawful; or that the commons in parlia• ment assembled are not the supreme autho• rity of this nation; or shall plot, contrive or • endeavour to stir up, or raise force against
 • the present government, or for the subversion
 • or alteration of the same, and shall declare
 • the same by any open deed; that then every
 • such offence shall be taken, deemed, and ad-
 • judged by authority of this parliament, to be • high treason. And whereas the Keepers of the • Liberties of England, and the Council of State,
 • constituted and to be from time to time con• stituted by authority of parliament, are to be,
 • under the said representatives in parliament,
 • entrusted for the maintenance of the said go• vernment with several powers and authorities
 • limited, given and appointed unto them by the • parliament: Be it likewise enacted by the au• thority aforesaid, That if any person shall ma• liciously and advisedly plot or endeavour the
 • subversion of the said Keepers of the Liberties
 • of England, or the Council of State, and the • same shall declare by any open deed, or shall
 • move any person or persons for the doing • thereof, or stir up the people to rise against • them, or either of them, their, or either of
 • their authorities; that then every such offence
 • and offences shall be taken, deemed, and declared to be high treason. And whereas the parliament, for their just and lawful defence, hath raised and levied the army and forces now under the command of Thomas lord Fairfax, and are at present necessitated by reason of the manifold distractions within this commonwealth, and invasions threatened from abroad, to continue the same, which, under God, must be the instrumental means of preserving the well-affected people of this nation in peace and safety: Be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That if any person, not being an officer, soldier, or member of the army, shall plot, contrive or endeavour to stir up any mutiny in the said army, or withdraw any soldiers or officers from their obedience to their superior officers, or from the present government, as aforesaid; or shall procure, invite, aid or assist any foreigners or strangers to invade England, or Ireland, or shall adhere to any forces raised by the enemies of the Parliament, or Commonwealth, or Keepers of the Liberty of England: or if any person shall counterfeit the great seal of England, for the time being, used and appointed by authority of parliament: that then every such offence and offences shall be taken, deemed and declared by authority of this parliament to be high-treason; and every such person shall suffer pains of death, and also forfeit unto the Keepers of the Liberty of England, to and for the use of the commonwealth, all and singular his and their lands, tenements and hereditaments, goods and chattels, as in case of high-treason hath been used by the laws and statutes of this land to be forfeit and lost. Provided always, that no persons shall be indicted and arraigned for any the offences mentioned in this act, unless such offenders shall be indicted and prosecuted for the same within one year after the offence committed.

 And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that if any person shall counterfeit the money of this commonwealth, or shall bring any false money into this land, counterfeit, or other like to the money of this commonwealth, knowing the money to be false, to merchandise or make payment, in deceit of the people of this nation; or if any person shall hereafter falsly forge, and counterfeit any such kind of coin of gold or silver as is not the proper coin of this commonwealth, and is or shall be current within this nation, by consent of the parliament, or such as shall be by them authorized thereunto; or shall bring from the parts beyond the seas into this commonwealth, or into any the dominions of the same, any such false and counterfeit coin of money, being current within the same, as is abovesaid, knowing the same money to be false and counterfeit, to the intent to utter or make payment with the same, within this commonwealth, by merchandise or otherwise; or if any person shall impair, diminish, falsify, clip, wash, round or file, scale or lighten, for wicked lucre or gain-sake, any the proper

'monies or coins of this commonwealth, or the dominions thereof, or of the monies or coins of any other realm allowed and suffered to be current within this commonwealth, or the dominions thereof: that then all and every such offences abovementioned, shall be, and are hereby deemed and adjudged high-treason; and the offenders therein, their counsellors, procurers, aiders and abettors, being convicted according to the laws of this nation of any of the said offences, shall be deemed and adjudged traitors against this commonwealth, and shall suffer and have such pains of death and forfeitures, as in case of high-treason is used and ordained. Provided always, and be it enacted by the authority aforesaid, that this act touching the monies and coins aforesaid, or any thing therein contained, nor any attainder of any person for the same, shall not in any wise extend, or be judged to make any corruption of blood to any the heir or heirs of any such offender, or to make the wife of any such offender to lose or forfeit her dower of or in any lands, tenements or hereditaments, or her title, action or interest in the same.'

Mr. Attorney. My lords, and you Gentlemen of the Jury, you have heard these laws read unto you: the clauses that we are to make out in proof against Mr. Lilburne, are these: That if any person shall maliciously or advisedly publish by writing, printing, or openly declaring, that the said government is tyrannical, usurped or unlawful; or that the commons in parliament assembled are not the supreme authority of this nation, are traitors: these we shall join together with his books. My lord, you are here in court, and have received the proofs against him; and we shall now make it out, that he hath done what this statute forbids, out of his own books that have come from himself, as the author of them. My lord, we shall begin with that charge against him, in declaring the government to be tyrannical, usurped and unlawful; and for that end, see his Impeachment of lieutenant-general Cromwell, &c. p. 8.

Justice Jermin. Mr. Lilburne, doth your paper of the 17th of May agree with that which was read, or no?

Lilburne. No, Sir; I conceive, Sir, you asked me whether this act I have in my hand do agree with that which was read?

Justice Jermin. Yes, Sir, I do.

Lilburne. It does not.

Justice Jermin. Then you will make use of it by and by?

Lilburne. I, Sir, intend so, if you will let me.

Mr. Attorney. My lord, the first is, That Mr. Lilburne hath declared the present government to be tyrannical, usurped, and unlawful: and that 'in ipissimis verbis,' that he hath so declared, in a very high way, in the very words: so his book entitled, "An Impeachment of High Treason against Oliver Cromwell, and his son-in-law Henry Ireton, &c." Read fol. 8.

Clerk. Fol. 8. 'Yea, and the absolute keeping up of a perpetual and everlasting army, under which the people are absolute and perfect slaves and vassals, as by woful and lamentable experience they now see they perfectly are; which slavery and absolute bondage is like daily to increase under the present tyrannical and arbitrary, new erected, robbing government.'

Mr. Attorney. And so, my lord, it is here expressed to be a tyrannical and arbitrary government, which are expressly within the words of the law; for they are 'a tyrannical government.' My lords, we shall not stick here with him, but you shall see the whole course of all his pen's writing hath been to this purpose: that goes very far, my lord; see the title-page of the last book.

Clerk. Title-page. 'Before a legal magistracy, when there shall be one in England, which now in the least there is not.'

Mr. Attorney. See fol. 1.

Clerk. Page 1. 'I have fully, both by law and reason, undeniably and unanswerably proved, that the present Juncto sitting at Westminster are no parliament at all in any sense, either upon the principles of law or reason, but are a company of usurping tyrants and destroyers of your laws, liberties, freedoms and proprieties, sitting by virtue of the power and conquest of the sword.'

Mr. Attorney. Read the Title-page of the same Book.

Clerk. "An Impeachment of High Treason against Oliver Cromwell, and his son-in-law Henry Ireton, esquires, members of the late forcibly dissolved house of commons; presented to public view, by lieutenant-colonel John Lilburne, close prisoner in the Tower of London, for his real, true and zealous affections to the liberties of his native country." In which following discourse or impeachment he engageth, upon his life, either upon the principles of law (by way of indictment, the only and alone legal way of all trials in England) or upon the principles of parliaments antient proceedings, or upon the principles of reason (by pretence of which alone they lately took away the king's life) before a legal magistracy, when there shall be one again in England, which now in the least there is not.

Mr. Attorney. Indeed, my lord, and you of the jury, Mr. Lilburne is a very great rooter, not a leveller, but a roter to root out the laws of England, by the roots.

J—. There is not—

Lilburne. By your favour, Mr. Prideaux, I knew the time when others said it as well of you; and it is not long since you were penned down in a black bill, to my knowledge, as unsavoury salt, with many others, to be thrown out of the House of Commons. I pray, Sir, whether were those rooters that went about to root up that house by force of arms, or Mr. Prideaux and others to give them cause, at least in their apprehensions?

Mr. Attorney. My Lord, a legal magistracy

in England, as now, he saith, in the least there is not : if there be no magistracy, I will conclude, there is no propriety left in this nation ; but Mr. Lilburne saith, there is no magistracy ; and if so, then no propriety.

Lilburne. It would be a very strange argument that you would infer ; I wish you and I were to dispute that in point of law for our lives, that to deny a magistracy legally constituted, according to the formalities of law, does not destroy propriety. For indeed, Sir, propriety is an antecedent to magistracy, and is first in being before it. But, Sir, to end the dispute, he that owns the law of England (as I do) that distinguisheth meum and uum, can never be a destroyer of propriety : I wish your practice were as consonant to propriety as my principles.

Mr. Attorney. Read the second Page at the Mark.

Clerk. 'Now, I say, considering that which is before declared, I cannot upon any terms in the world, either with safety, justice or conscience, as things stand with me at present, give my consent, but hinder, as much as I am able, all addresses from me, or any other that shall own the usurping tyrants as a parliament, especially by petition, which was a course (saith the pretended parliament solicitor against the king, in his Case Stated, page 24.) which God's people did not take with Rehoboam ; for they never petitioned him, although he was their lawful supreme magistrate, but advised him : he refusing their counsel, and hearkening to young and wicked counsellors, they cry out, To thy tents O Israel ! and made quick and short work of it.'

Mr. Prideaux. My lord, here are words again to make good as aforesaid, that the parliament are usurping tyrants. Read also page 28.

Clerk. Read on page 28, in the margin of the said book. 'And if those very things should be judged treason, as they are, and were in the earl of Strafford, I wonder what should become of all our present Juncto at Westminster, and their new thing called a Council of State ? Undoubtedly the most, if not all of them, must go to Tyburn or Towerhill, there by a halter or axe to receive their just deserts. Amen.'

Mr. Attorney. There is an Amen pronounced to us, let him have it that deserves it : But go on. Read the 11th page of his book called, "The Apprentices Out-cry."

Clerk reads page 11. 'We say, considering what is before premised, we are necessitated and compelled to do the utmost we can for our own preservation, and the preservation of the land of our nativity, and never by popular petitions, &c. address ourselves to the men sitting at Westminster any more, or to take any more notice of them, than as of so many tyrants and usurpers ; and for time to come to hinder, as much and as far as our poor despised interest will extend to, all

'others whatsoever from subscribing, or presenting any more popular petitions to them ; and only now as our last paper-refuge, mightily cry out to each other, of our intolerable oppressions, in letters and remonstrances signed in the behalf, and by the appointment of all the rest, by some of the stoutest and stiffest among us, that we hope will never apostatize, but be able, through the strength of God, to lay down their very lives for the maintaining of that which they set their hands to.'

Mr. Attorney. Read page 2.

Clerk reads on page 2, 'But even our parliament, the very marrow and soul of all the people's native rights, put down, and the name and power thereof transmitted to a picked party of your forcible selecting, and such as your officers, our lords and riders, have often and frequently stiled no better than a mock-parliament, a shadow of a parliament, a seeming authority, or the like, pretending the continuance thereof, but till a new and equal representative by mutual agreement of the free people of England, could be elected ; although now for suberviency to their exaltation and kingship, they prorogue and perpetuate the same, in the name, and under colour thereof, introducing a privy council, or, as they call it, a Council of State, of superintendency and suppression to all future parliaments for ever, erecting a martial government, by blood and violence impuled upon us.'

Mr. Attorney. Read page 3, at the mark.

Clerk. Page 3. 'Trade is decayed and fled ; misery, poverty, calamity, confusion, yea, and beggary grown so sore and so extreme upon the people, as the like never was in England, under the most tyrannical of all our kings that were before these in present power, since the days of the Conqueror himself : no captivity, no bondage, no oppression like unto this ; no sorrow and misery like unto ours, of being enslaved, undone and destroyed by our large pretended friends.'

Mr. Attorney. Read page 4.

Clerk. Page 4. 'And yet nothing but the groundless wills and humours of those aforementioned men of blood rageth and ruleth over us : and is this all the return and fruit that people are to expect from your hands ?'

Mr. Attorney. Take this 'Preparative to an Hue-and-Cry after sir Arthur Haslerig,' and read page 2.

Clerk reads on. The 'Preparative to an Hue and Cry after sir Arthur Haslerig,' at page 2, in the margin : 'That those men that now sit at Westminster, are no parliament, either upon the principles of law or reason.'

Mr. Attorney. Read page 3.

Clerk. Page 3. 'They promise to amend, and to proceed according to the form of the law, as fully appears in their last forementioned declaration, and several others ; as parti‘cularly the present declaration of this present juncto against kingship, dated the 17th of March, 1648.’

Clerk. Page 4. ‘But the said sir Arthur Haslerig, &c. more arbitrarily, and more treacherously than Strafford, having no pretence of regal, legal, or parliamentary commissions, or authority, no not so much as from the present nothing, or illegal juncto, or the present illegal thing called the Council of State, Mr. John Jordan now member.’

Mr. Attorney. My lord, he doth declare who he means by juncto; Mr. Jordan, a member of the present juncto, the pretended house of commons. In the third place, for the first proof of this particular, I shall produce his book, entitled, ‘The Legal and Fundamental Liberties of England revived, &c.’ Read page 41.

Clerk reads page 41. ‘But, Sir, I say, no wonder, all the things foregoing rightly considered, they do own you now (as Thomas Pride hath made you) for the supreme authority of the nation; although before they would neither submit to king nor parliament, (when it was a thousand times more unquestionable, both in law and reason, than now you are) but fought against both king and parliament, their setters up, conquered them, repelled them, subdued them, and broke them both; and so pulled up by the roots all the legal and visible magistracy and authority in the nation, and thereby left none but themselves, who stand in parallel to none (as they have managed their business) but to a company of murderers, thieves and robbers, who may justly be dispossessed by the first force that are able to do it; no pretended authority that they of themselves, and by their swords can set up, having in the sight of either God or man, either in law or reason, any more just authority in them, than so many Alger pirates and robbers upon the sea have.’

Lilburne. You read, as I take it, a second edition; whether is that a second edition or no?

Mr. Attorney. No, no, it is not so in the Indictment; it is no second edition, but the first. Read page 56.

Clerk. Page 56. ‘To which I answer; First, That that Company of Men at Westminster, that gave commission to the High Court of Justice to try and behead the king, were no more a Parliament by law, or a Representative of the People, by the rules of justice and reason, than such a company of men are a parliament, or representative of the people, that a company of armed thieves abuse and set apart to try, judge, condemn, hang, or behead any man that they please, or can prevail over by the power of the sword to bring before them by force of arms, to have their lives taken away upon pretence of justice, grounded upon rules merely flowing from their wills and swords.’

Mr. Attorney. Read the title-page.

Clerk. ‘The Legal Fundamental Liberties of the people of England revived, asserted and vindicated: or an Epistle written the 8th of June, 1649, by lieut. col. John Lilburne (arbitrary and aristocratical Prisoner in the Tower of London) to Mr. Wm. Lenthall, Speaker to the Remainder of those few knights, citizens and burgesses, that col. Thomas Pride at his late Purge thought convenient to leave sitting at Westminster, (as most fit for his and his master’s designs, to serve their ambitious and tyrannical ends, to destroy the good old laws, liberties, and customs of England, the badges of our freedom, as the Declaration against the king of the 17th of March, 1648, p. 23, calls them, and by force of arms to rob the people of their lives, estates and properties, and subject them to perfect vassalage and slavery, as he clearly evinceth in his present case, &c. they have done) and who (in truth no otherwise than pretentially) stile themselves the parliament of England.’

Mr. Attorney. Read page 2.

Clerk. ‘Sir, for distinction-sake, I will yet stile you Mr. Speaker, although it be but col. Pride’s juncto, or parliament sitting at Westminster (not the nation’s, for they never gave him authority to issue out writs to elect or constitute a parliament for them); and a little below, in the same second page, I accused Oliver Cromwell for a wilful murderer, and desire you there to acquaint your house therewith (who then had some little head of a parliament-stamp upon it).’

Mr. Attorney. Read page 28.

Clerk. Page 28. ‘The like of which tyranny the king never did in his reign; and yet by St. Oliver’s means lost his head for a tyrant. But the thing that I principally dwell at here, is to declare that Oliver and his parliament, now at Westminster, (for the nation’s it is not) having plucked up the house of lords by the roots,’

Page 44. ‘So that if it be Treason to call this a Mock-Parliament, yea, and to say, &c. And if this be true, (for true it is), then there is neither legal justice, nor justice of peace in England.’

Mr. Attorney. Read page 37.

Clerk. Page 37. ‘For if ever they had intended an Agreement, why do they let their own lie dormant in the pretended parliament ever since they presented it? seeing it is obvious to every knowing eye, that from the day they presented it, to this hour, they had as much power over their own parliament, now sitting, as any school-master in England had over his boys.’

Clerk. Page 45. ‘For your interest and the king’s, both being interests of trust, and your declarations do plentifully and plainly declare; but especially your present Juncto late declaration against the late beheaded king, and kingly government.’

Mr. Attorney. Read page 58.

Clerk. Page 58. ‘And let the present 'generation of swaying men, that under pretence of good, kindness, and friendship; have destroyed and trod under foot all the liberties of the nation, and will not let us have a new parliament; but set up by the sword their own insufferable, insupportable, tyrannical tyranny.'

Lilburne. I pray, Sir, are all these quotations in the Indictment verbatim? I do not remember that I heard them there.

Mr. Attorney. No, we do not offer any Book but what is charged in the Indictment: For we do say, That he published those things among other clauses and things in those books. So that we bring in no book that is not contained in the Indictment. Read p. 64.

Clerk. Page 64. 'That so they might rule, direct, and counsel their Mock-Parliament.'

Mr. Attorney. Read page 68.

Clerk. Page 68. 'That the High Court of Justice was altogether unlawful, in case those that had set it up had been an unquestionable representative of the people, or a legal parliament: neither of which they are not in the least; but, as they have managed their business in opposing all their primitive declared ends, are a pack of traitorous, self-seeking, tyrannical men, usurpers of the name and power of parliament.'

Mr. Attorney. Read page 72.

Clerk. Page 72. 'Then with much more confidence, say I, This that now sits is no parliament; and so by consequence the High Court of Justice no court of justice at all.'

Mr. Attorney. My lord, that which we shall offer you next, is the "Salva Libertate," which he Lieutenant of the Tower had from Mr. Lilburne himself. Read at the mark.

Clerk. "A Salva Libertate:" 'Although I then told you I judged a paper warrant, (although in words never so formal) coming from any pretended power or authority in England, now visible, to be altogether illegal; because the intruding general Fairfax and his forces had broke and annihilated all the formal and legal magistracy of England, yea the very parliament itself; and by his will and sword (absolute conqueror like) had most tyrannically erected, and set up, and imposed upon the free people of this nation a Juncto or Mock-Power, sitting at Westminster, whom he and his associates call a Parliament; who, like so many armed thieves and robbers upon the highway, assume a power, by their own wills, most traitorously to do what they like, yea, and to fill the land with their mock and pretended magistrates, amongst the number of which is the pretended Attorney-General; in perfect opposition of whom, to the utmost of my might, power, and strength, I am resolved by God's gracious assistance, to spend my blood, and all that in this world is dear unto me, supposing him not really and substantially worthy the name of an English freeman, that in some measure, in this particular, is not of my mind.'

Mr. Attorney. My lord, in the case of this charge, what Mr. Lilburne is pleased to say concerning me, I shall say no more but only this; I shall not do so by him; I shall not spend my blood against him. You see what he saith, That the present government is tyrannical, usurped, and unlawful; that the commons of England in parliament assembled are not the supreme authority, but a juncto, a mock power, a mock parliament, a company of traitors, that rule merely by the dictates of their own will. I could alledge more of his books unto you, which have words in them very notorious, and very public. He doth in express words say, That the government is arbitrary, tyrannical, and a new-erected, ruining, enslaving, robbing government: to stile them tyrants, usurpers, traitors, parallel to none but murderers, robbers, thieves: No parliament at all, but Thomas Pride's Juncto, and school-boys, destroyers of the laws and liberties of the nation, the present Juncto (chimeras, fooleries, and the like): All these expressions, and many more, which I am sorry I have occasion to repeat to you; that so much dirt should be thrown into the face of any magistrates of England: My lords, these are now the best which do rule. My lords, I hope you and the gentlemen of the jury will take notice of it, as to be very clear, pregnant, evident proof, that Mr. Lilburne hath thus published, and thus said. And besides this, you see what he does go to. He denies magistracy (a). So that now we are all alike, a chaos, a confusion; and this he hath brought us to, or would have endeavoured to. My lords, I shall not aggravate; and if I did say no more, it were enough. But I come to the second general head of the charge; which is, That he hath plotted and contrived to levy or raise forces to subvert and overthrow the present established government, in the way of a free state or commonwealth. My lords, if I should say nothing more to the jury, this that hath been already read is evident proof of that: For certainly those that shall say that the governors be tyrants, that the parliament is tyrannical, that they are men of blood, destroyers of laws and liberties; this cannot be of any other use but to raise force against them, for subverting and destroying of them, as he himself saith, as so many weasels or polecats (b); especially if you consider to whom these words were declared, to the army

(a) "That's false: he doth no such thing; but at most saith, The army hath destroyed all the legal magistracy of the nation; and they are the men that thereby are the real Levellers and Rooters."—Orig. Ed.

(b) "In calling tyrants weasels and polecats, he hath said no more but what he hath learned out of St. John's own Argument of Law against the earl of Strafford: at which you have no cause to be angry, because they are the words of one of your own brother lawyers."—Note to Original Edition. See what Lilburne refers to, ante, vol. 3, pp. 1509, 1510:

in general, especially to the general's regiment of horse, that helped to plunder and destroy Mr. Lilburne's true friends, defeated at Burford; and some of which were most justly, as traitors, executed.

My lords, If I would say nothing more to the Jury but this, there is full and pregnant proof already: But yet, my lord, further to shew the malice of Mr. Lilburne's heart, and that he did intend to raise force, to incite and invite them to help him to subvert and destroy the parliament: And for the proof of this, read the fifth page of his "Impeachment of High-Treason against Oliver Cromwell."

Clerk reads page 5. 'But, my true friends, I shall here take upon me the boldness (in regard of the great distractions of the present times) to give a little further advice to you, from whose company or society (or from some of them) hath begun and issued out the most transcendent, clear, rational, and just things for the people's liberties and freedoms, that I have seen or read in this nation, as your notable Petition of May 20, 1647, burnt by the hands of the common hangman, recorded in my book, called, "Rash Oaths unwarrantable," page 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, with divers other Petitions of that nature; and the Petition of the 19th of Jan. 1647, recorded in the following discourse, page 45, 46, 47, 48, &c. and the masculine Petition of the 11th of Sept. 1648, so much owned by Petitions out of several counties, yea, and by the officers of the army's large Remonstrance, from St. Albans, of the 16th of November, 1648, page 67, 68, 69. The substance of all which, I conceive, is contained in the printed sheet of paper signed by my fellow prisoners, Mr. William Walwyn, Mr. Thomas Prince, and Mr. Richard Overton, and myself, dated the 1st of May, 1649, and intitled, "An Agreement of the Free People of England," &c. The principles of which I hope and desire you will make the final centre and unwavering standard of all your desires, hazards, and endeavours, as to the future settlement of the peace and government of this distracted, wasted, and divided nation; the firm establishing of the principles therein contained, being that only which will really and in good earnest marry and knit that interest, whatever it be, that dwells upon them, unto the distressed and oppressed commons or people of this nation. Yea, the settling of which principles is, that that will thereby make it evident and apparent unto all understanding people in the world, that the real and hearty good and welfare of this nation hath cordially, and in good earnest, been that that their souls have hunted for, and thirsted after, in all the late bloody civil wars and contests; all the contests of the king's party, for his will and prerogative, being merely selfish, and so none of the people's interest; and the contest of the Prebyterians, for their make-bate, dividing, hypocritical Covenant, no better in the least; and the present contest of the present dissembling interest of Independents, for the people's liberties in general (read the following discourse, page 27, 28, 29,) merely no more but self: the highest, and to set up the false saint, and most desperate apostate, murderer, and traitor, Oliver Cromwell, by a pretended election of his mercenary soldiers, under the false name of the godly interest, to be king of England, &c. (that being now too apparently all the intended liberties of the people that ever he sought for in his life); that so he might rule and govern them by his will and pleasure, and so destroy and evassalize their lives and properties to his lusts: Which is the highest treason that ever was committed or acted in this nation in any sense or kind; either, 1. In the eye of the law: or, 2. In the eye of the ancient (but yet too much arbitrary) proceedings of parliament: or, 3. In the eye of their own late declared principles of reason (by pretence of which, and by no rules of law in the least, they took away the late king's head): Which, if there were any law or justice in England to be had, or any magistrates left to execute it (as in the least there is not), &c.

Mr. Attorney. Read page 7.

Clerk, page 7. 'But the principles of the foresaid Agreement being so detestable and abominable to the present ruling men, as that which they know will put a full end to their tyranny and usurpation, and really ease and free the people from oppression and bondage, that it is something dangerous to those that go about the promotion of it; yet I shall advise and exhort you vigorously to lay all fear aside, and to set on foot the promotion of it, in the same method we took for the promotion of the foresaid Petition of January 19, 1649, laid down in the following discourse, page 23, 24, 25, and write to your friends in every county of England, to chuse out from among themselves, and send up some agents to you (two at least from each county, with money in their pockets to bear their charges), to consider with your culled and chosen agents of some effectual course, speedily to be taken, for the settling the principles thereof (as that only which in an earthly government can make you happy, or at least to know one another's minds in owning and approving the principles thereof): That so it may become to you and your friends your centre, standard, and banner, to flock together to, in the time of these foreign invasions and domestic insurrections, that are like speedily to bring misery enough upon this poor and distressed nation; and unanimously resolve and engage one to another, neither to side with, or fight for the chimeras, fooleries, and pride of the present men in power, nor for the prince's will, or any other base interest whatsoever (the which if you should fight for, it would be an absolute murdering of your brethren and countrymen, you know wherefore), unless he or they will come up to those just, righteous, and equitable principles therein contained, and give rational and good security for the constant adhering thereto.

'And upon such terms, I do not see but you may justifiably, before God or man, join with the Prince himself; yea, I am sure a thousand times more justly than the present ruling men (upon a large and serious debate) joined with Owen Roe O'Neale, the grand bloody rebel in Ireland: who, if we must have a king, I, for my part, had rather have the Prince than any man in the world, because of his large pretence of right; which, if he come not in by conquest, by the hand of foreigners (the bare attempting of which may apparently hazard him the loss of all at once, by gluing together the now divided people, to join as one man against him) but by the hands of Englishmen, by contract upon the principles aforesaid, which is easy to be done; the people will easily see, that presently thereupon they will enjoy this transcendent benefit, he being at peace with all foreign nations, and having no regal pretended competitor, viz. the immediate disbanding all armies and garrisons, saving the Old Cinque Ports; and so those three grand plagues of the people will cease, viz. Free Quarter, Taxations, and Excise: by means of which the people may once again really say, they enjoy something they can in good earnest call their own. Whereas, for the present army to set up the false pretended Saint Oliver, or any other, as their elected king, there will be nothing thereby, from the beginning of the chapter to the end thereof, but wars and the cutting of throats year after year, yea, and the absolute keeping up of a perpetual and everlasting army, under which the people are absolute and perfect slaves and vassals, as by woful experience they now see they perfectly are: which slavery and absolute bondage is daily like to increase under the present tyrannical and arbitrary new-erected robbing government.'

Mr. Attorney. He hath blown the trumpet, for all that will come in: he hath set up his centre; he would have it to be a standard for all his friends to flock to him. And to make them the more quick in betaking them to their arms, he hath falsely and maliciously there said, That the Parliament had joined with Owen Roe O'Neale; which I can assure all that hear me this day, the Parliament always detested, abominated, disavowed, and declared against, and never had any thoughts that way. My Lord, the false imputations of his laid upon the Parliament, are almost numberless. But, in the second place, I come to that pretty bauble, that's of his own making, the Agreement of the People, dated at the Tower, the 1st of May, 1649, and shall desire your lordships to judge whether this Agreement of the People, which he made, and his friends then in the Tower, and intitled, "The Agreement of the People," as signed by them, for they called it "An Agreement of the free People of England;" strikes not at the very root of all government.

Lilburne. Pray, Sir, look whether it be licensed, or no, according to the law of the nation; and if it be licensed by public authority, how comes it to be treason? That's very strange!

Mr. Attorney. It is so.

Lilburne. Pray, Sir, go and question the licenser, then.

Mr. Attorney. We must question the author; the licenser will not excuse it. Read page 2.

Clerk reads page 2. 'This Agreement being the ultimate end and full scope of our desires and intentions concerning the government of this nation.' And a little below: 'After the long and tedious prosecution of a most unnatural, cruel, home-bred war, occasioned by divisions and distempers amongst ourselves; and those distempers arising from the uncertainty of our government, and the exercise of an unlimited or arbitrary power by such as have been trusted with supreme and subordinate authority, whereby multitudes of grievances and intolerable oppressions have been brought upon us: and finding, after eight years experience and expectation, all endeavours hitherto used, or remedies hitherto applied, to have increased, rather than diminished our distractions; and that if not speedily prevented, our falling again into factions and divisions will not only deprive us of the benefit of all those wonderful victories God hath vouchsafed against such as sought our bondage, but expose us first to poverty and misery, and then to be destroyed by foreign enemies.'

Mr. Attorney. Read page 3.

Clerk. Page 3. 'Agree to ascertain our government, to abolish all arbitrary power, and set bounds and limits both to our supreme and all subordinate authority, and remove all known grievances; and accordingly do declare and publish to all the world, that we are agreed as followeth' Page ibid. 'That the supreme authority of England, and the territories therewith incorporate, shall be and reside henceforward in a representative of the people, consisting of 400 persons, but no more.'

Mr. Attorney. The manner of the choice of whom, &c. they leave to this parliament. Read a little below.

Clerk. 'All things concerning the distribution of the said 400 members proportionable to the respective parts of the nation, the several places for election, the manner of giving and taking of voices, with all circumstances of like nature, tending to the compleating and equal proceedings in elections, as also their salary, is referred to be settled by this present parliament, in such sort as the next representative may be in a certain capacity to meet with safety at the time herein expressed; and such circumstances to be made more perfect by future representatives.—We agree that this present parliament shall end the first Wednesday in August next, 1649, thenceforward to be of no power or authority; and in the mean time shall order and direct the election of a new and equal representative, according to the intent of this our Agreement; and so as the next representative may meet and sit in power and authority, as an effectual representative, upon the day following, namely, the first Thursday of the same August, 1649.

Page ibid. 'We agree, if the present Parliament shall omit to order such election or meeting of a new representative, or shall by any means be hindered from performance of that trust, that in such case we shall for the next representative proceed in electing thereof in those places, and according to that manner and number formerly accustomed in the choice of knights and burgesses; observing only the exceptions of such persons from being electors or elected, as are mentioned before in the first, third, and fourth heads of this Agreement: it being most unreasonable, that we should either be kept from new frequent and successive representatives, or that the supreme authority should fall into the hands of such as have manifested disaffection to our common freedom, and endeavoured the bondage of the nation. And for preserving the supreme authority from falling into the hands of any whom the people have not or shall not chuse, we are resolved and agreed, God willing, that a new representative shall meet upon the first Thursday in August next aforesaid: the ordering and disposing of themselves, as to the choice of a Speaker, and the like circumstances, is hereby left to their discretion; but are in the extent and exercise of power, to follow the direction and rules of this Agreement; and are hereby authorized and required, according to their best judgments, to set rules for future equal distribution and election of members, as is herein intended and enjoined to be done, by the present parliament.'

Mr. Attorney. Read page 8.

Clerk. Page 8. 'And all laws made, or that shall be made, contrary to any part of this Agreement, are hereby made null and void.'

Mr. Attorney. My Lords, here by this "Agreement of the People," that Mr. Lilburne hath published to the world, in which, my lord, he hath designed how many the Supreme Authority shall consist of, the time when the parliament shall dissolve, as also the time when his own parliament shall meet; this parliament to be dissolved the first Wednesday in August 1649, all laws contrary to this to be null and void: and in it you shall find some expressions of treason in the height, that whosoever shall do contrary to it, shall be most severely punished. In the next Book before this, it is desired by him, that this "Agreement of the People" may be the centre, the banner, and standard of all his friends, and that they go on vigorously with it; which is, my lord, to dissolve this parliament, and to put on this new one of Mr. Lilburne's appointing. This, we conceive, which is of Mr. Lilburne's appointing, would, if effected, be an absolute subversion of this in being; and this is High Treason. My Lord, we shall go on with more yet, and that is with his Outcry. My lord, if you please to see the title, and see to whom it is directed, what was intended to be done with it: it is intitled, "An Outcry of the Young Men and Apprentices of London, directed Aug. 29, 1649, in an Epistle to the private soldiery of the army, especially all those that signed the 'Solemn Engagement' at Newmarket-heath, the 5th of June, 1647, but more especially to the private soldiery of the general's regiment of horse, that helped to plunder and destroy the honest and true-hearted Englishmen, traitorously defeated at Burford, the 15th of May, 1649." A good encouragement! they were traitorously defeated at Burford; but we are rebels and traitors, and our army murderers and butchers, for giving some of those declared traitors their due deserts. But that you may see his tendency by this Book, read page 11.

Clerk. Page 11. 'We say, considering what is before premised, we are necessitated and compelled to do the utmost we can for our own preservation, and for the preservation of the land of our nativity, and never, by popular petitions, address ourselves to the men sitting at Westminster any more, or to take any more notice of them than of so many tyrants and usurpers, and for time to come to hinder, as much and as far as our poor despised interest will extend to all others whatsoever from subscribing or presenting any more popular petitions to them. And only now, as our last paper-refuge, mightily cry out to each other of our intolerable oppressions, in letters and remonstrances, signed in the behalf, and by the appointment of all the rest, by some of the stoutest and stiffest amongst us, that we hope will never apostatize, but be able through the strength of God to lay down their lives for the maintaining of that which they set their hands to. You our fellow-countrymen, the private soldiers of the army, alone being the instrumental authors of your own slavery and ours; therefore, as there is any bowels of men in you, any love to your native country, kindred, friends or relations, any spark of conscience in you, any hopes of glory or immortality in you, or any pity, mercy or compassion, to an enslaved, undone, perishing, and dying people! O help! help! save and redeem us from total vassalage and slavery, and be no more like brute-beasts, to fight against us or our friends, your loving and dear brethren after the flesh, to your own vassalage as well as ours! And as an assured pledge of your future cordialness to us, (and the true and real liberties of the land of your nativity) we beseech and beg of you (but especially those amongst you that subscribed the solemn Engagement at Newmarket-Heath, the 5th of June, 1647,) speedily to chuse out amongst yourselves two of the ablest and constantest faithful men amongst you in each troop and company, now at last, by corresponding each with other, and with your honest friends in the nation, to consider of some effectual course, beyond all pre-

‘tences and cheats, to accomplish the real end ‘of all your engagements and fightings, viz. the ‘settling of the liberties and freedom of the ‘people; which can never permanently be ‘done, but upon the sure foundation of a po‘pular agreement who (viz. the people) in jus‘tice, gratitude, and common equity, cannot ‘chuse but voluntarily and largely make better ‘provision for your future subsistence, by the ‘payment of your arrears, than ever your offi‘cers or this pretended parliament intends, or ‘you can rationally expect from them: witness ‘their cutting off three parts of your arrears in ‘four, for free-quarter; and then necessitating ‘abundance of your fellow-soldiers (now ‘cashiered, &c.) to sell their debentures at ‘2s. 6d., 3s., and at most 4s. per lib.’

Mr. Attorney. See, my lord, here we are ‘styled tyrants, usurpers, introducing govern‘ment-oppressions of the people; and Mr. Lil‘burne is resolved with his friends to join to‘gether, and to lay down their very lives for this.
‘This, I think, is a trumpet blown aloud for all ‘the discontented people in the nation to flock ‘together, to root up and destroy this parliament, ‘and so the present government. But read also
‘the same book, pag. 9.

Clerk. Page 9. ‘For the effectual pro‘motion of which said Agreement, we are ‘necessitously compelled to resolve in close ‘union to join ourselves, our commissioners ‘(chosen for that end) in council, with our ‘foresaid Burford friends, or their commis‘sioners; and to resolve to run all hazards to me-‘thodize all our honest fellow-prentices, in all ‘the wards of London, and the out-parishes, ‘to chuse out their agents to join with us or ‘ours, to write exhortative epistles to all the ‘honest-hearted freemen of England, in all ‘the particular counties thereof, to erect sever‘al councils amongst themselves; out of ‘which we shall desire, and exhort them to ‘chuse agents or commissioners, impowered
‘and intrusted by them, speedily to meet us
‘and the agents of all our (and the Agreement ‘of the People) adherents at London, resolutely ‘to consider of a speedy and effectual method ‘and way how to promote the election of a ‘new and equal representative, or parliament,

Mr. Attorney. My lord, this is a loud one!
Whom does he join us withal, but only with those very men that justly suffered death, many of them, for it? My lord, now it is resolved that these men shall be closely joined with them; and what to do? Still to promote The Agreement of the People, that which Mr. Lilburne hath hatched, and that must be the baby that those declared open traitors and rebels, that Mr. Lilburne will join with, must nourish up. My lord, we shall go on further to shew, what Mr. Lilburne drives at; which is not much differing from us, for he would have a free state: but, my lord, this that is now in being, it doth not go in Mr. Lilburne’s way, and therefore it must be overgrown by force and arms, that so way may be made for his new commonwealth. (a) We shall go further on, my lord, and in the next place quote his book, intitled, “The Legal Fundamental Liberties of the People of England revived, asserted, and vindicated, &c.” Read page 57.

Clerk reads page 57. ‘And the present
‘setters up of this tyrannical new common‘wealth, considering their many oaths, cove‘nants, promises, declarations, and remon‘strances to the contrary, (with the highest ‘promises and pretences of good for the ‘people and their declared liberties, that ever ‘was made by men) are the most perjured, ‘perfidious, false, faith and trust-breakers, and ‘tyrants, that ever lived in the world; and ‘ought by all rational and honest men to be ‘the most detested and abhorred of all men
‘that ever breathed, by how much the more ‘under pretence of friendship and brotherly-‘kindness they have done all the mischief they ‘have done, in destroying our laws and liber‘ties.’

Mr. Attorney. My lord, and you gentlemen of the jury, you see Mr. Lilburne hath been pleased very often to give the name of tyrants to the parliament: I would give no other instance, nor shew no other example but Mr.
Lilburne himself, to disprove himself; and with much confidence affirm it, that never state had before, (neither king nor state) since the foundations of it, so much enmity, nor have endured with so much patience any man whatsoever, as they have done Mr. Lilburne:
who notwithstanding all his traitorous provocations and traitorous designs undertaken against them, is yet alive at this day, and now hath fair play to plead for his

(a) “And yet a few days before his Trial, several principal leading members of the House and Council of State told his wife, and several others of his friends, that Mr. Lilburne was turned Cavalier, and had joined with the Prince, and they had several letters under his own hand to prove it.”—Orig. Edit.

life. I would take him for his own confurter, and see by all that has been done by him, and see if he could make good his actings, and make good the parliament's dealing with him therefore, can be demonstrated by him to prove them tyrants. My lord, I can hardly forbear, to see and hear his dangerous and desperate expressions, to invite all people for to take up arms against the parliament, to cut their throats like pole-cats and weasels. My lords, here to stile them the most perfidious, perjured, false, faith and trust-breakers and tyrants that ever lived in the world; and to be the most abhorred and detested of all the people, above all men that ever breathed: O insufferable, and the highest of treasons.

Lilburne. Sir, all the wit of all the lawyers in England could never bring it within the compass of High-Treason, by the old and just laws of this nation, that abhors to oppress men contrary to law; and then if they seem but to cry out of their oppressions, to make them traitors for words.

Mr. Attorney. I am confident the least lawyer in England would have brought this within the statute of Treason of the 25 Ed. 3, chap. 2. My lords, you shall see there is none escaped; the parliament with him are tyrants, traitors, and usurpers; and therefore he stirs up the people to destroy them. But in the third place, you shall see what titles he gives to my lord general Fairfax, and his chief officers; that, my lord, he that reads the books, and doth not know the persons, he would think that they were monsters, and not men, although they are so famous and glorious, that all the world hath rung of them to their praise. But, saith he, never was there more glorious declarations made by men than by them, and yet never performed any of them. Nay, he doth not only call them also covenant and engagement-breakers, but he calls the lord general, tyrant, murderer, and what not; and the officers, perfidious officers. My lords, what I observed in the last clause of the act, is, That whosoever goes about to draw the soldiers from their obedience to their superior officers, or from their obedience to the present government, that is High-Treason: and this likewise we shall find him guilty of in his "Legal Fundamental Liberties of England asserted and vindicated;" it is in the first side of the Epistle that in the first place I pitch upon: read it.

Clerk. Page 1 of the Epistle. 'I positively accuse Mr. Oliver Cromwell for a wilful murderer, (and desire you to acquaint your house therewith) for murdering Mr. Richard Arnold near Ware.'

Mr. Attorney. Which man, my lord, was condemned for a mutineer by a council of war, where the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland was but one member; and the Parliament gave him and the rest of that council thanks, for shooting that mutinous soldier to death: and yet Mr. Lilburne calls him murderer therefore, and this is laid to my Lord Lieutenant's charge for his part.

Lilburne. Doth not the Petition of Right absolutely condemn all such acts in time of peace, when the courts of justice are open? And the Judgment of the earl of Strafford doth abundantly condemn it, who lost his life for a traitor, for doing the very same in kind and likeness, at that time, when he in the eye of the law was as legal a general, as the general was that condemned that man.

Mr. Attorney. My lords—

Lilburne. I pray, Sir, hear me out, and sure I am, the declarations of all the powers extant in England ever since, have been to maintain the Petition of Right inviolably; yea, even those that are now in present power: and if the Petition of Right be true, to shoot soldiers, as Arnold was, is absolute murder. Nay, further, if the judgment of the parliament upon the earl of Strafford for such an act be legal, then all those that had a hand in shooting that soldier are traitors, and ought to die for it, as well as Strafford.

Clerk reads on the second side of the Epistle. 'Of all which crimes and charges, and all your others against the king, contained in your foresaid declaration, I know not three of them but Cromwell and his confederates, in your pretended house and army, are as guilty of the like in kind, though under a new name and notion, as the king was of the fore-mentioned, if not more guilty.'

Mr. Attorney. Read page 35.

Clerk. Page 35. 'But alas, poor fools! we were merely cheated and cozened, it being the principal unhappiness to some of us, as to the flesh, to have our eyes wide open, to see things long before most honest men come to have their eyes open. And this is that which turns to our smart and reproach, and that which we Commissioners feared at the first, viz. That no tie, promises, nor engagements were strong enough to the grand jugglers and leaders of the army, was now made clearly manifest; for when it came to the council, there came the general, Cromwell, and the whole gang of creature-colonels, and other officers, and spent many days in taking it all in pieces, and there Iretton shewed himself an absolute king, if not an emperor; against whose will no man must dispute. And then Shuttlecock, Roe their scout, Okey, and major Barton (where sir Hardress Waller sat president), begun in their open counsel to quarrel with us, by giving some of us base and unworthy language; which procured them from me a sharp retortment of their own baseness and unworthiness into their teeth, and a challenge from myself into the field. Besides, seeing they were like to fight with us in the room in their own garrison, which when sir Hardress Waller in my ear reproved me for it, I justified it, and gave him again, for suffering us to be so affronted. And within a little time after, I took my leave of them for a pack of dissembling, juggling knaves, amongst whom in consultation ever thereafter I should scorn to come (as I told

‘some of them); for there was neither faith, truth, nor common honesty among them. And so away I went to those that chose and entrusted me, and gave publicly and effectually (at a set meeting appointed on purpose) to divers of them, an exact account how they had dealt with us, and cozened and deceived us; and so absolutely discharged myself from meddling or making any more with so perfidious a generation of men, as the Great Ones of the army were; but especially the cunningest of Machiavelians, commissary Henry Ireton.’

Mr. Attorney. Read page 37, at the mark.

Clerk. Page 37. ‘Which the general and his council knew well enough: and I dare safely say it upon my conscience, that an Agreement of the People, upon foundations of just freedom, gone through with, is a thing the general, and the chiefest of his council, as much hate, as they do honesty, justice, and righteousness (which they long since abandoned); against which, in their own spirits, they are absolutely resolved, I do verily believe, to spend their heart-blood, and not to leave a man breathing in English air, (if possibly they can) that thoroughly and resolutely prosecutes it; a new and just parliament being more dreadful to them, than the great day of judgment, so much spoken of in Scripture. And although they have beheaded the king, yet I am confidently persuaded, their enmity is such at the people’s liberties, that they would sooner run the hazard of setting the prince in, to reign in his father’s stead, than further really a just Agreement, or endeavour a new Parliament rightly constituted.’

Mr. Attorney. Read page 38.

Clerk. Page 38. ‘Whenas, alas! it is as visible as the sun when it shineth in its glory and splendor, that Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, of old, were never such rebels against authority, as the general and his council are; nor the Anabaptists at Munster, with John of Leyden, and Buperdullion, were never more contemners of authority; nor Jack Straw, nor Wat Tyler; nor all those famous men, mentioned with a black pen in our histories, and called rebels and traitors, can never be put in any scale of equal balance, for all manner of rebellions and treasons against all sorts and kinds of magistracy, with the general and his council.’

Mr. Attorney. See, my lord, and you gentlemen of the jury, you see Mr. Lilburne gives the general and his officers as bad titles, as he can give the worst of rebels and traitors, or the worst of men. But we go on to his “Outcry;” read the title of it.

Clerk. “An Outcry of the Young-men and Apprentices of London,” page 8. where it is thus: “Sure all sense and compunction of conscience is not totally departed from you.”

Mr. Attorney. If it please you, my lord, because the jury may observe it, the book is directed to the soldiers of the army, and that is an “Outcry, &c.” Now read page 8.

Clerk. Page 8. ‘Sure all sense and compunction of conscience is not totally departed from you: hear us therefore, in the yearning bowels of love and kindness, we entreat and beseech you, with patience, and do not abuse us for complaining and crying out; for the knife hath been very long at the throats of our liberties and freedoms, and our burdens are too great and too many for us; we are not able to bear them, and contain ourselves; our oppressions are even ready to make us despair, or forthwith to fly to the prime laws of nature, viz. the next violent remedy at hand, light where it will, or upon whom it will. They are become as devouring fire to our bones, ready to burn us up, rendering us desperate and careless of our lives, prizing those that are already dead above those that are yet living, who are rid of that pain and torment that we do and must endure, by sensibly seeing and beholding not only the dying, but the daily burial of our native liberties and freedoms; that we care not what becomes of us, seeing that we are put into that original state, or chaos of confusion, wherein lust is become a law, envy and malice are become laws, and the strongest sword rules and governs all by will and pleasure; all our ancient boundaries and landmarks are pulled up by the roots, and all the ties and bonds of human society in our English horizon totally destroyed and extirpated. Alas, for pity! we had rather die, than live in this life of languishing death, in which our masters possess nothing (to buy themselves or us bread, to keep us alive) that they can call their own. Therefore it is no boot for us to serve out our times, and continue at our drudging trades, while these oppressions, cruelties, and inhumanities are upon us, and the rest of the people; exposing thereby not only the nation to domestic broils, wars and bloodsheds, (wherein we are sure our bodies must be the principal butts) but to foreign invasions, by France, Spain, Denmark, Swedeland, &c. as was well observed by our endeared and faithful friends, of the forementioned late treacherously defeated party at Burford, in their book of the 20th of August, 1649. entitled “The Levellers vindicated, or, the Case of their twelve Troops truly stated,” pages 11, 12, which we cannot but seriously recommend (with them) to your serious perusal and judgment; and desire to know of you (but especially the private soldiers of the general’s regiment of horse, which we understand had a hand in seizing upon and plundering our true friends at Burford), whether you do own the abominable and treacherous dealings of your general and lieutenant-general Cromwell, and their perfidious officers with them, or no, that so we may not condemn the innocent with the guilty, &c.’

Mr. Attorney. Read page 11.

Clerk. Page 11. ‘You our fellow-countrymen (the private soldiers of the army) alone, being the instrumental authors of your own slavery and ours; therefore as there is ‘any bowels of men in you, any love to your native country, kindred, friends, or relations, any sparks of conscience in you, any hopes of glory or immortality in you, or any pity, mercy or compassion to an enslaved, undone, dying, perishing people: O help, help, save and redeem us from total vassalage and slavery, and be no more like brute beasts, to fight against us or our friends, &c.—And as an assured pledge of your future cordialness to us, (and the true and real liberties of the land of your nativity) we beseech and beg of you, (but especially those amongst you that subscribed the solemn engagement at Newmarket, the 5th of June 1647,) speedily to chuse out from amongst yourselves two of the ablest and constantest faithful men amongst you, in each troop and company, now at last (by corresponding each with other, and with your honest friends in the nation) to consider of some effectual course (beyond all pretences and cheats) to accomplish the real end of all your engagements and fightings, viz. the settling the liberties and freedoms of the people; which can never be permanently done, but upon the sure foundation of a popular agreement: who (viz. the people) in justice, gratitude, and common equity, cannot chuse but voluntarily and largely make better provision for your future subsistence, than ever your officers, or this pretended parliament intends, &c.’

Mr. Attorney. Read the Title of his “Impeachment.”

Clerk. “An Impeachment of High Treason against Oliver Cromwell, &c.”

Mr. Attorney. Read page 2.

Clerk. Page 2. ‘But I shall rather desire and advise you, by letter, like yourselves to address yourselves to the lord Fairfax, by the sword of whom and his soldiers I am now in prison for my honesty and innocency, and nothing else, and demand my liberty of him. If he refuse, print it, and do as God and reason shall direct you; for it was his and his soldiers force, that fetched me out of my bed the 28th of March 1649, without all shadow of law or justice, and against the tenour of all their own declarations, the particular pages of which you may read in the following letter to Mr. Holland, page 5, and by force of arms carried me to Whitehall, and then to Derby-house, before a company of men that in law had no more power to commit my body to prison, than so many thieves and robbers upon Shuters-Hill have: who by the rules of their own wills (as in the second edition of the Picture of them I have fully declared) sent me by force of arms to the Tower, for all my short eternity in this world.—But I intreat you seriously to consider, that I cannot advise you to make address to him as the general of the nation’s forces; for he is no such thing, but is merely a great tyrant, standing by the power of his own will, and a strong sword, borne by his vassals, slaves, and creatures; having no commission to be ‘general, either from law, the parliament, or from the prime laws of nature and reason.’

Mr. Attorney. Read “An Outcry of the Young Men and Apprentices,” page 3.

Clerk. Page 3. ‘Your heart seems to us as obdurate as the flinty rock; as savage and inhuman, as if the flesh and blood, the bones and marrow of the people were become your meat.’

Mr. Attorney. Stay, Mr. Broughton: the Jury will take notice, that this is directed to the soldiers of the General’s regiment; this speaks to them.

Clerk reads on. Directed Aug. 29, 1649, in an “Epistle to the private Soldiers of the Army, especially all those that signed the solemn Engagement at Newmarket-Heath, the fifth of June, 1649, but more especially to the private soldiers of the general’s regiment of horse.”

Mr. Attorney. Now read page 3.

Clerk. page 3. ‘Your hearts seem to us as obdurate as the flinty rock; as savage and inhuman, as if the flesh and blood, the bones and marrow of the people were become your meat, as already it is in effect; and instead of encouragement and support to our true friends and real believers, (at least in faithful desire and endeavour) as shall stand in the gap betwixt our destroyers and us, all ways and means are used to impoverish, destroy, and suppress them; and in them to break and vassalage the spirits of all the English, which in all ages have had the preheminencies of other nations, that there may not be so much of gallantry or courage left amongst the people, that one amongst them shall dare to assert or maintain their freedom.’ And a little below, ‘If any do but murmur and complain, presently their houses, as with furies, are beset with armed mercenary janizaries, guards, and centinels set upon their doors and passages.’

Mr. Attorney. My lord, and you gentlemen of the jury, you hear what stuff this of Mr. Lilburne’s is; yea, such stuff as that it would make any man loath to hear it. The last clause of the act is, ‘If any person set being an officer, soldier, or member of the army, shall plot, contrive or endeavour to stir up any mutinies in the army, or to withdraw any officers or soldiers from their obedience to their superior officers, or to the present government; it is high treason.’ You have here the several books read to you, and the calumniation laid upon the chiefest of them, to stir the rest up to mutinies against them; but they are very well known, and therefore nothing that Mr. Lilburne can say will stick upon them, to their prejudice. But, my lord, you see here, and you of the jury, how he appeals from the officers to the soldiers, interrogates to know what they could do, and whether they will acknowledge they will owe them, and not fight against them, and what aid and assistance they will give to him and his friends against their own general, and the rest of their superior officers. You see also what he calls that noble general, that all the world doth honour, and his fame rings through the world; and yet he calls him a grand tyrant, standing by the power of his own will, and a strong sword, a destroyer of the parliament, of the laws and liberties of England. You see what he calls the common soldiers; furies and mercenary janizaries, which none but Turks have. You have heard the several charges proved unto you; for my part, I think it as clear as noon-day. We have not raised any advantage upon any slipping words that have slipped from him, which we might have done; and I could have urged some more witnesses, to have proved his books published by him to public view, though when he comes in the face of the public court of justice he will not own them, which shews his design to be the more dangerous. He will write, print, publish, bespatter, and reproach; yea, and raise tumults and rebellion in a clandestine way: but if we chance to question him therefore, he will not own it; you see we have been fain to fetch it out of the fire; and yet this is one of England's and its liberties valiant champions.

Lilburne. You have done no more to me, than the Scribes and Pharisees did to Jesus Christ; and in my dealing with you, I have but walked in the steps of my Lord and Master Jesus Christ and his apostles. For I am sure of it, Jesus Christ, in his pilgrimage on earth, freely, openly, and publicly taught and declared himself to be the Son of God, the Messiah or Saviour of the world that was prophesied of; and yet when he came amongst the Scribes and Pharisees, and Pilate the Roman governor, who by questions went about to insnare him, he confesseth nothing, but saith, I spake openly to the world, I ever taught in the Synagogues and in the Temple, whither the Jews always resort, and in secret have I said nothing; why askest thou me? Ask them which heard me what I have said unto them: behold, they know what I have said. And when Pilate adjured him to answer him, whether he was such a one or no, well, saith he, thou sayest it: so say I, Thou, Mr. Prideaux, sayest it; they are my books, but prove it.

Mr. Attorney. But I think here are enough, and too many: and therefore, gentlemen of the jury, if you respect the government of the parliament, the honour of the Council of State, the honour of the nation, or of the army, or the preservation of the law of the nation, you cannot say but that the prisoner is guilty of such crimes and treasons as he is now accused of, and accordingly find him so: for it cannot be supposed that you will lay him in a single balance against the honour of all the powers in the nation, and also the peace thereof.

Foreman. We desire the Act of Treasons to make use of.

Lilburne. I beseech you hear me a few words: they desire to have it along with them. Sir, with your favour, I shall humbly crave liberty to speak a few words: I shall keep me close to that which is my right and my duty, and that is to the matter of law in my indictment. There are many things put into the indictment by the testimonies of witnesses now sworn, that are pretended to be acted in several counties. Whether that be according to law, or no, I do not know whether you will judge it so, or no; but sure I am, if either those express statutes that I have already cited to the Jury, or the third part of Coke's Institutes, be law, I ought not to be tried for treason but by a Jury of the next neighbourhood, in the self-same county the fact is pretended to be committed in. And therefore it is very questionable to me, whether my indictment be legal, for that it chargeth me with facts of treason committed in three several counties; and that being matter of law, I desire counsel to argue that point, in the first place. There are also a great many other exceptions I have to make against the illegality of the indictment; and having particularized one, I humbly crave that which is my right by law, that I may have counsel assigned unto me. You have said, you will do what shall become ingenuous and understanding men and just judges in it; and therefore I crave leave, according to my undoubted right, to have counsel assigned to plead in matter of law to the insufficiency of the indictment, and particularly to that point I have nominated. There are also a great many things arise out of the matter of fact that will be points of law likewise, and some of them appear to be so. There were never two clear and positive witnesses to one fact sworn against me; but to most of the particular treasons there is but one a-piece; and I cannot yield that to be legal, but questionable in law, which I desire counsel to dispute. I know not of any of all the books fixed upon me, but the "Outcry," that hath two plain witnesses to it; and yet it is not sworn that I am the author of it. The state of the first is this: that I was at the printer's before the copy was taken away; and that I gave one of those books to a soldier. To sum up the notes of the matter of fact that thereon hath been enuicavoured to be proved, is too hard a task to be done by me immediately; and therefore I conceive it but just for you to assign me counsel, to agree with the counsel against me what are the points of fact upon the proof, from which the points of law are to be deducted. And whatever you, that call yourselves my judges, may think of this, yet I hope and verily believe that these my honest fellow-citizens, that are the gentlemen of my jury, who have (thereby), as men, the issues of my life and death in their hands, will think it but a just and rational motion and request; and therefore, before them again, I desire to have counsel assigned, to plead in law to the errors of the indictment, and also to the law arising upon the fact. This, with a larger privilege, was granted by one of your own brother judges to major Rolfe last year, as his right by law; and I do again appeal to Mr. justice Nichols, then one of Rolfe's counsel, for the truth of this. I pray speak,

Sir ; is it not true ? [But the Judge sitting as if he had neither life nor soul, Mr. Lilburne further said :] I hope, Sir, it doth not enter into your thoughts presently to put me to an undigested extemporary answer to so large an indictment as that is that hath been read against me, that it is impossible for any man's brain, if it were as big as the biggest magazine in London, to carry it in his head : and, Sir, I hope you do not conceive that my memory is of a greater largeness than the greatest magazine in this city. You engaged unto me, when I pleaded first to my indictment, that you would not take exceptions or advantage against me for my ignorance in the formalities of the law : I desire you to make good your promise now unto me, and assign me counsel to help my ignorance, that so the counsel against me and my counsel may agree, as I have seen it done heretofore in the case of duke Hamilton, upon the points of fact, from which law is to be deducted. And if you please to grant me this legal and equitable favour, I shall think myself very much obliged unto you : without which justice, I cannot conceive upon what ground it can be comprehended I can go on ; for my time and strength now it is so far spent, that I conceive you cannot think my body is made of steel to stand here four or five hours together, spending my spirits, to answer so many as I have to deal with, and be able, after all this, to stand to return an answer to above five hours charge, and that upon life, when it seems you will suffer me to mend no blots. I hope you do not lie upon the catch, to weary and tire me out, by putting more upon me than a horse is able to endure ; and then go about to hang me, because I, through tiredness, want bodily strength and abilities to make and pronounce my defence.— Sir, to my apprehension, there does arise upon the matter of fact divers disputes in law : I beseech you therefore allow me my right in law, by assigning me counsel to help me where I am ignorant, and you shall see I shall do that which shall become an ingenuous and rational man, and I will put myself clearly upon the trial of the country, or my jury, according to the law.

Lord Keble. Lilburne, this that you have heard, and that we have patiently sat to near, and prepared a stool for you to have sat upon, to have given you that liberty that nobody should interrupt you more than us ; you have heard the fair course that hath been taken in it. The books, the charges upon the matter, they are but three, they are not hard for your memory. The particulars of those, we do not expect that the jury should remember them. The books are here ; they have of them : but amongst them there are many more. But free yourself from the matter of fact, if you can, and these books : and when you have freed yourself from the matter of fact charged upon you, and then make it appear that from the matter of fact law arises ; and then, if you can, when the matter of fact is clear, and law doth arise, you shall have counsel, and you shall have no defect in us to interrupt you, but to help you in what we may properly know as our right to do. But if you do not first clear and make out this, which is the issue upon the point, to answer the matter of fact, we cannot allow you any counsel. The thing that is to be disputed cannot possibly be much on your side ; it will be but very short : for it is not possible, I say, to be much in time, or confusion of your memory, to give an answer to this particular matter of fact : the first is the publishing of those books, and the owning of them ; and the next is the books of themselves. But this must be first cleared, before you can have any counsel assigned you at all.

Lilburne. I must confess it is very hard task for me to contest with the present power, whose agents have free liberty to say against me what they please ; and I am denied, and that upon my life, all the privileges of an Englishman, and with your insinuations and great words drawn on by my ignorance to ensnare myself : and notwithstanding all your promises to take no advantage against me for my ignorance in the formalities of the law, yet are the punctilios and niceties thereof more urged against me, than they have been against hostile enemies. And yet for my part, no man can tax me for being in hostility at any time against them in present power : and yet upon my life I am denied that which I had from those, as my right by law, against whom I have been in arms, and fought against in the field : yea, and that which, in a higher nature than I desire, hath been acknowledged just and legal by some of your own brother judges but the last year, which they have granted to some of my own countrymen, freemen of England, but this last year, in a higher nature by many degrees than I plead for. There is judge Nichols, that I understand was one of major Rolfe's counsel : And I understand from Mr. Maynard's own mouth, that he and Mr. Maynard were, by baron Wyld, assigned of Rolfe's counsel, in case of the highest treason that the law of England ever knew, and that before the grand inquest found the indictment ; and that Mr. Maynard, &c. had liberty, as major Rolfe's counsel, by baron Wyld's order, to stand in the court, not only to hear the witnesses sworn, but also to hear the words of their testimony, then caused by the judge to be given in open court. And there being but two witnesses to two facts contained in the indictment, Mr. Maynard, upon the allegation of the two statutes of Edward the 6th, that requires two witnesses to the proof of every fact of treason, and that to be plain and clear, overthrew Rolfe's indictment in law, that it was never found ; and so saved the poor man's life, who in likelihood had perished, had it not been for the ability and integrity of his counsel. And all this Mr. Justice Nichols knows is very true, and that I have told you nothing about it but what is just. It is true, I have read part of the plain law of England, that is in English (but I am ignorant of that part of your law, which is three times so much as that which is in English; and that law, or the practic part of the law is in French and Latin, which I have truly told you I can neither read nor understand): Therefore I humbly crave my privilege and undoubted right by the law of England, (which in a higher nature was granted to major Rolfe, as his unquestionable right) to have counsel assigned me, to help me in those things I am ignorant of, I mean the formalities and bottom of the law. I beseech you, Sirs, do not put me upon extremities, and upon extraordinary things, but consider among yourselves that righteous rule of Jesus Christ, and of the Scripture, 'To do as you would be done to;' and do not put impossibilities upon me, by over-ruling by your power all my just claims and pleas in law, and require more of me than I am capable to perform. And therefore I beseech you, as you would approve yourselves to be as righteous judges before the eye of that God that sees your heart, and knows whether malicious and fore-thoughts of malice harbours therein against me his faithful servant; do not cunningly and designedly destroy me for my ignorance in the essential or circumstantial matter or form of that huge indictment, that has so much matter of law in it as it hath, and to take away life by denying me that which is the unquestionable legal right of the freemen of England; the which if you will but allow me, I do not doubt but to come off clearly and freely.

Lord Keble. Mr. Lilburne, you are now at a full point, and this you have said now, you have said often, and we have heard it: and that which you say now, we have answered before.

Lilburne. Sir, it is your own law; Sir Edward Coke declares I ought to—

Lord Keble. Mr. Lilburne, I shall add this more to it, That you at this time have here such a court, which never any of your condition ever had in England, so many grave judges of the law.

Lilburne. Truly I had rather have had an ordinary one; Sir, I mean a legal and ordinary assize or sessions.

Lord Keble. But this you have, and this is to take off, or prevent that which you would do now, if there had been one judge, and no more; and if you had not had this great presence of the court, you would have been malapert, and have out-talked them; but you cannot do so here.

Lilburne. Truly, Sir, I am not daunted at the multitude of my judges, neither at the glittering of your scarlet robes, nor the majesty of your presence, and harsh austere deportment towards me, I bless my good God for it, who gives me courage and boldness.

Lord Keble. That your Trial is so public as your offence, is for this end, that all men may take notice, that you have fair play; and therefore according to law, you ought to make your case, in matter of fact, clear; for that I must tell you again, and once is as good as if I had told you a thousand times over, unless you can clearly do that, you say nothing to it. If you will take that for clear proof that hath been alledged against you, you may shorten yourself; but otherwise make that defence that you judge most sufficient to disprove the fact; for till that time, you are clear gone in law, and no counsel must or can be assigned you.

Lilburne. I have been a great while yesterday pleading my right by law for counsel, and now I have stood many hours to hear your proofs to the indictment. I hope you will not be so cruel to put me to a present answer, when bodily strength is spent.

Lord Keble. We know it as well as yourself you were here, and stood divers hours yesterday, and to-day you have done the like; but we came before you, and stand after you.

Lilburne. Sir, will you put a man to more than a horse is put to, or is able to go through with? The righteous man is merciful, even to a very beast.

Lord Keble. We have been as long as you have.

Lilburne. But, under favour, you have sat.

Lord Keble. You had that liberty too; dispute no more, we must go on.

Lilburne. I desire but a week's time to return you an answer to your large Indictment; and if not so long, then give me leave but till to-morrow morning to consider of my answer. I am upon my life.

Lord Keble. No, you must dispatch it now.

Lilburne. Then give me leave but to withdraw into any private room for an hour to recollect my thoughts, peruse my notes, and refresh my spirits. [And hereabouts Judge Jermin did whisper the lord Keble in the ear; and presently said Judge Jermin, It's against the law to allow you any more time; the Jury stand here charged, the evidence is given, you must immediately go on, or yield that for truth which hath been proved against you.]

Lilburne. Well, then, if it must be so, that you will have my blood, right or wrong; and if I shall not have one hour's time to refresh me, after my strength is spent, and to consider that which hath been alledged against me, then I appeal [which he uttered with a mighty voice] to the righteous God of heaven and earth against you, where I am sure I shall be heard, and find access; and the Lord God Omnipotent, and a mighty judge betwixt you and me, require and requite my blood upon the heads of you and your posterity, to the third and fourth generation! [Immediately after the uttering of which the scaffold fell down which was on the left hand, which occasioned a great noise and some confusion, by reason of the people's tumbling; but silence being made, the prisoner was busy at his papers and books, being invited by sheriff Pack to come out of the bar, for fear he should have fallen with the rest, and so he might have lost his prisoner.]

Lord Keble. How came the prisoner there?

Lilburne. I went not thither of my own accord, but by Mr. Sheriff's invitation; and if I am in a place where I ought not to be, blame Mr. Sheriff, and not me.

Lord Keble. Dispatch, Sir.

Lilburne. Sir, if you will be so cruel as not to give me leave to withdraw to ease and refresh my body, I pray you let me do it in the Court. Officer, I entreat you to help me to a chamber-pot. [Whilst it was fetching, Mr. Lilburne followeth his papers and books close; and when the pot came, he made water, and gave it to the foreman.]

Lord Keble. Proceed, Mr. Lilburne. [But he pressed for a little respite, which was granted him with much ado, as also a chair to sit down upon; but within a very little space the lord Keble said,]

Lord Keble. The Court cannot stay for you, proceed on to answer.

Lilburne. Good Sir, would you have me to answer to impossibilities? Will you not give me breath? If you thirst after my blood, and nothing else will satisfy you, take it presently, without any more to do. [But the prisoner struggled out a little respite.]

Lord Keble. The Court can stay no longer; take away his chair, for I cannot see the bar, and plead what you have to say, for it grows very late.

Lilburne. Well, seeing I must to it, the will of God be done!—[But his brother being next to him, was heard to press him to pause a little more:] No, brother, saith he, my work is done; I will warrant you, by the help of God, I will knock the nail upon the head. [And so he went into the bar, and set the chair before him, and laid his law books open upon them, in order, as he intended, to use them;] and being ready, said, Sir, I humbly crave the favour, since it is my hard lot and fortune, at least in my own apprehension, to have so much hard measure and injustice as I have, to know whether or no you will permit me, after that I have pleaded to a matter of fact, according to the law of England, that has been allowed to the highest traitors, in all the books that I have read of, that I may speak in my own behalf unto the jury, my countrymen, upon whose consciences, integrity and honesty, my life, and the lives and liberties of the honest men of this nation, now lies; who are in law judges of law as well as fact, and you only the pronouncers of their sentence, will and mind: I say, I desire to know, when I have pleaded to matter of fact, whether you will be pleased to give me leave to speak to them a few words besides.

Lord Keble. Master Lilburne, quietly express yourself, and you do well; the jury are judges of matter of fact altogether, and judge Coke says so: But I tell you the opinion of the Court, they are not judges of matter of law.

Lilburne. The jury by law are not only judges of fact, but of law also: and you that call yourselves judges of the law, are no more but Norman intruders; and in deed and in truth, if the jury please, are no more but cyphers,* to pronounce their verdict.

Judge Jermin. Was there ever such a damnable blasphemous heresy as this is, to call the judges of the law, cyphers?

Lilburne. Sir, I entreat you give me leave to read the words of the law, then; for to the jury I apply, as my judges, both in the law and fact.

Lord Keble. We will not deny a tittle of the law.

Judge Jermin. Let all the hearers know, the jury ought to take notice of it, That the judges that are sworn, that are twelve in number, they have ever been the judges of the law, from the first time that ever we can read or hear that the law was truly expressed in England; and the jury are only judges, whether such a thing were done or no; they are only judges of matter of fact.

Lilburne. I deny it; here's your own law to disprove you; and therefore let me but read it. It is a hard case when a man is upon the trial of his life, that you will not suffer him to read the law to the jury, for his own defence; I am sure you have caused to be read at large those laws that make against me.

Lord Keble. But I shall pronounce to clear the righteousness of that law, whatsoever others will pretend against it that know it not.

Lilburne. Sir, under favour, I shall not trouble myself with any thing, but what is pertinent to my present purpose. Here is the first part of Coke's Institutes; it is owned by all the lawyers that I know, or ever heard of in England, for good law.

Lord Keble. If you can convince us, that matter of law does concern the jury, you say something.

Lilburne. Sir, I have been shuffled too much out of my liberties already, give me leave to read but the law to the jury; I will make use of nothing now to them, but your own words; and when I have done, I will leave myself to them, and the guidance of God upon their conscience. [And having the book open in his hand, he said,] In the first part of Coke's Institutes, sect. 366, fol. 226, 227, 228, in his exposition of Plowden, he hath these words—

Lord Keble. Have we dealt so fairly with you all this while? Pray be confident, those that are quotations there, are not for your purpose; but I thought how good a lawyer you were, for to set Coke's Commentaries upon Plowden, when there is no such book or commentary. Go to your matter of fact, which is clear; but for this, let it fall down, and spare yourself, and trouble yourself no more with Coke; he has no Commentary upon Plowden. [But master Lilburne pressed to speak.]

Judge Jermin. Hold, Sir.

Lilburne. What, will not you allow me liberty to read your law? O unrighteous and bloody judges!

Judge Jermin. By the fancy of your own mind, you would puzzle the jury; we know the book a little better than you do: there is no such book as Coke's Commentary upon Plowden.

* See something like this in Fox v. Horne Tooke, A. D. 1799.

Lord Keble. Sir, you shall not read it.

Judge Jermin. You cannot be suffered to read the law; you have broached an erroneous opinion. That the jury are the judges of the law, which is enough to destroy all the law in the land; there was never such damnable heresy broached in this nation before.*

The Crier cries out, Hear the Court.

Lilburne. Do your pleasure, then here I'll die: Jury, take notice of their injustice; but seeing they will not hear me, I will appeal to you, and say, It is an easy matter for an abler man than I am, in so many interruptions as I meet with, to mistake Plowden for Littleton, I am sure here are Coke's Commentaries upon Littleton, (366.) and these be his words: 'In this case the recognitors of the assize may say and render to the justices their verdict at large upon the whole matter.' Which I am sure is good law, forasmuch as we see it continually done in all actions of trespass or assault, where the jury doth not only judge of the validity of the proof of the fact, but also of the law, by assigning what damages they think is just.

Lord Keble. I am sure you are in an error, in a gross one, as possibly a man can be in; this is so gross, that I thought it could not have come from Master Lilburne, that professeth himself to be a rational and knowing man.

Lilburne. And in another place he saith, 'For as well as the jurors may have cognizance of the lease, they also may have cognizance of the condition.' And further there Coke saith, 'Here it is to be observed, That a special verdict; or at large, may be given in any action, and upon any issue, be the issue general or special.' And in section 368, Littleton hath these words: 'Also in such case, where the inquest may give their verdict at large, if they will take upon them the knowledge of the law, upon the matter they may give their verdict generally.' Coke's words upon it are fully to the same purpose, who saith, 'Although the Jury, if they will take upon them, (as Littleton here saith) the knowledge of the law, may give a general verdict.' I am sure this is pertinent to my purpose, and now I have done, Sir.

Lord Keble. You have spent a little time, but you have done yourself no good; I thought you had understood the law better than I see you do.

Lilburne. Now, Sir, as to matter of fact, according to your own desire, seeing you have broke your promise, and will allow me no counsel, but lye at catch with me, I shall come to it without any preamble. The statute of 1 Edw. 6, c. 12. (I desire the Jury may take notice of the statutes) and the 5th and 6th Edw. 6, c. 11, here is the Statute-Book, which doth expressly declare, That no man shall be condemned for Treason, Petty-Treason, or any such like crime, but by the Evidence and clear Proof of two legal and sufficient Witnesses. Sir Edward Coke in his third part of Institutes, chap. of High-Treason, is absolutely of the same opinion, fol. 12, 'In this branch,' says he, 'four things are to be observed. First, this word (probablement) provably; that is, upon direct and manifest proof, not upon conjectural presumptions, or inferences, or strains of wit, but upon good and sufficient proof of two witnesses.' And this is fol. 12. And herein the adverb 'probablement,' provably, hath great force, and signifieth a direct and plain Proof. 'And, secondly, this word (attaint) necessarily implieth, That he be proceeded with, and attainted, according to the due course and proceedings of law, and not by absolute power, or by other means, as in former times it hath been used.'—Aud fol. 24, chap. Petty-Treason, he saith, 'It hath been holden, That upon the Trial of Mispri-son of Treason, there must be two lawful witnesses, as well upon the trial as the indictment;' as it was resolved by the justices in the lord Lumley's Case, Hill. 14 Eliz. reported by the lord Dyer under his own hand; and in the margin he hath this note upon it, 'That this is the last Resolution of the Judges upon it.' And a little below, in the same fol. and fol. 25, he saith, 'Therefore upon the Indictment, which is in manner of an Accusation, by the statutes of 1 Ed. 6, cap. 12, and 5 and 6 Edw. 6, cap. 11, two lawful witnesses are requisite.' And in fol. 240, he hath the same, his words are these: 'Attainders of Treason, &c. ought to be upon plain and direct evidence, (as before is said); for if the party be executed, restitution may be had of his lands, but never can be had of his life.' Now I have done, Sir.

Lord Keble. I hope the Jury hath seen the Evidence so plain and so fully, that it doth confirm them to do their duty, and to find the Prisoner guilty of what is charged upon him.

Judge Jermin. This that you have said, makes much for the Jury.

Lilburne. We shall see that by and by; but I shall proceed on to answer your Proof to the Indictment, and that in the same method that your Witnesses swore. And therefore, Sir, in the first place, to the first, which is Thomas Newcombe the printer; he swears in these words: That I was present with captain Jones, from whose hands he says he received the last sheet of the book, called "The Outcry of the Young Men and Apprentices of London." But he says, Captain Jones agreed with him for the printing of it, and not I; for in that particular he doth not in the least accuse me, neither doth he in the least accuse me in any manner in the world of being the author of it; and that I did any more at his house, but take away a single sheet of it before it was corrected; which, says he, I brought away with me. In answer to whose testimony I return this;

* Yes, but there was at Reading, when colonel Martin, after they were sworn, caused all the jury before the judges sitting upon the bench, to put on their hats, as their right; being they were then the chief judges in the Court, and the other inferior to them. Orig. Edit.

and I earnestly entreat you, gentlemen of the jury, to observe it well; and therefore, in the first place, he is but a single testimony to this. But, secondly, I answer, That he confesses moreover, that before he had compleated that sheet that he received from captain Jones, he was taken; and not only he, but his forms also were taken from him. So that by his own confession, that copy that was brought by captain Jones, when I was present with him, proved abortive, it was never wrought; for he says, it was taken before he had perfected it; and to my knowledge they had it in their possession. So that it clearly appears, it was never perfectly wrought off, and therefore the books were never perfected: therefore I hope that it will not be Treason in me, being a freeman of England, to walk the streets with my friend, and to go into a house with him where he hath business to do; admit it to be a printing-house, where he intends to have a sheet of paper printed: his affairs, business, or actions are nothing to me, neither are they now in the least laid to my charge; and if they were, as they are not, yet that sheet miscarried, and was taken before it was perfected. So that truly, Sir, you may go seek the printer of it; for you see that miscarried that captain Jones delivered to the printer in my company; and that sheet which he saith I had away, was an uncorrected one, which could serve me for no other use, but waste paper, and cannot be adjudged to be a true copy of that which was contained in the Indictment; neither doth he or any other swear, that at the printer's they see, or know where was done the title of that "Outcry" contained in the Indictment. So that for any thing the Jury knows, the first part of that book hath no dependance upon the sheet that was spoiled, and not brought to maturity in Master Newcombe's hands, as he himself upon his oath declares. So that truly, Sir, in law Master Newcombe's testimony proves nothing all against me, as to that book mentioned and contained in the Indictment: And therefore, you gentlemen of the jury, my life is in your hands, I beseech you take notice, That in all his testimony there was not one word that he declared, to accuse me to be the author of that book, or that my name was to it; for you shall find the names of ten that own it; so that I think his testimony is gone, and is not worth a straw.

In the next place, there were three soldiers, viz. John Tooke, Thomas Lewis, and John Skinner, that swear against me: The substance of all their testimonies centers in one; and John Tooke in the first place saith, about seven weeks ago he met with lieut. col. John Lilburne in Ivy-Lane, where Lewis knowing of him, gave him a salute; and they being glad to see him that he was well in health, and the like, out of friendship went to drink a cup of beer together at the Red-Cross in Newgate-market, where he saw a book called "The Apprentices Outcry," given unto master Lewis: and he heard these words uttered by lieut.

col. Lilburne, 'You soldiers are those that keep us in slavery.' The second Witness, being Thomas Lewis, saith, That the 6th of December or September, for so was his words, he met me in Ivy-Lane, and took acquaintance of me, asked me how I did, and I thanked him: and he further declares, that he was very much refreshed to see me, that I was well, and in health, and was glad to see that those things that were given out of me by common fame, that I was killed or dead, that they were not true. Therefore he being my old acquaintance, as he saith, we went to drink a cup of beer together; and says he, remembers, lieut. col. Lilburne asked him if he had seen a book called "The Apprentices Outcry," and he said no, he had not seen it, but he had heard of it, and was thinking to go and buy one of them, for that he longed to read it, and heard it was publicly sold: and says he, lieut. col. Lilburne says he had one which was given him, and if he pleased he would give it me, which he thankfully received; and afterwards we staid a little time to drink a cup of beer, and had some discourse. But he doth fix no evil upon me that fell from me in that discourse; neither doth he say, that I did stir him up to mutiny, or to make division in the army; only he saith, I told him, that if he went to such a man, whose name he hath forgot, it is possible he might buy some more of them, for they were publicly sold all over the city. So that you gentlemen of the jury may take notice, that he declares the things by common fame were publicly sold, and one of them he says was given to me, and I gave it to him. Truly, I hope the Jury hath more conscience in them, than to go about to take away my life for giving away a single sheet and a half of paper, that no man swears I was the author of, or the causer of it to be printed and published: but the most that can be fixed upon me, is, that I had one of them given me and I gave it to a soldier, my familiar friend, who had a great desire to see it, and was going to buy one of them, being public up and down London, at that time, which is all that he doth charge upon me; only he says further, that there was a little discourse: but his testimony doth not reach to accuse me of any evil or malicious counsel given them, or any aggravations of spirit, as though I did incense him or them against their officers or fellow-soldiers, thereby to stir them up to mutiny and rebellion. For truly I have made it my work, for to be as sparing of my discourse as I could be, in the company of any belonging to the army; yea, and to shun coming nigh the place, if I can avoid it, where they are. And he saith, I had no aggravating spirit within me, nor uttered any provocations to make them rise in mutiny against their officers; and there is none of them all that does in the least fix that book upon me, to be mine, as the author of it.

Only he saith further, That upon his declaring he longed to see the book, that lieutenant Col. Lilburne told him that such a man, whose name he hath forgot, might possibly sell them some of them, if they had a mind to them, or to get some of them : and truly I do not believe that treason.

Further he says, all the worst discourse I had with them, was, that I asked them a question, which was, when they had any pay ? and they told me, they had not had any pay in five weeks : and that was the worst of all. There proceeded from me no aggravating expressions upon it, or mutinous provocations. But truly that this discourse should come within the compass of treason, to ~~as~~ my old acquaintance a question, that had oftentimes visited me when I was the Lords prisoner in the Tower, or to drink a cup of beer with him, or to give a sheet and a half of paper that was publicly sold ; truly, I hope there will be no righteous jury in the world that will give a judgment against me for treason therefore ; no, I hope for more righteous justice from a jury of citizens of London whom I hope to find men of consciences and judgment, yea, of such righteous judgment, as that they will abhor to go about to take away my life, and my blood and lay the blemish and stain of treason upon me and my posterity for ever, upon such a thing as this is. And this is all, and the utmost of all, that the evidence doth witness against me.

Then in the third place there was John Skinner, who was the third ; and he says the same in effect, and no more ; and therefore I need not go upon that any further, but shall leave it, I hope, to the enlivened consciences of my jury, my fellow-citizens of London.

In the next place, the second thing laid to my charge is the "Salva Libertate," delivered to the lieutenant of the Tower, as he says. Now truly, the lieutenant of the Tower is but a single witness to this, and the law saith positively, there shall be two legal witnesses, to prove every fact of treason, whose testimony or evidence ought to be as clear and evident as the Sun at noon-day, without any conjectural presumptions or inferences, or strains of wit : and truly the lieutenant is but a single witness at most. I should be loth to reproach or bespatter the man ; yet I must say this, being upon my life, that he is not only a single witness, but a gentleman in whose custody I was prisoner, contrary to law ; who kept me prisoner in times by-past, above twelve months together, at the House of Lords illegal command, contrary unto law and justice : for which, above a year since, I did, commence at the common law an action of four or five thousand pound against him, as I did also against col. Tichburn, that I have seen upon this bench, sitting as one of my judges : which I think is not equal, nor just, nor legal, that he with whom I have a suit of four or five thousand pound depending, when thereby my professed adversary, should be one of my judges : and therefore I desire he may be commanded off the bench, and withdraw, as being my professed adversary, and therefore in law incapable to be my judge. And truly having the same action depending still against the present lieutenant of the tower, before the judges of the King's bench, for his detaining me in prison above a year together, contrary to law ; he is thereby in the eye of the law my professed adversary, and therefore in law cannot be admitted as a competent witness against me, upon my life. Yet the lieutenant of the Tower doth not in the least swear that the hand is mine, or that he did see me write it ; but only he saith that I did deliver such a paper to him : but he is but a single witness, and so I say by the law of the land not valid or good ; but his testimony is clearly gone and wiped off, as also all things that do depend thereupon. There are besides five or six witnesses produced to several charges ; but the law expressly saith, that there must be two plain and clear witnesses to every particular charge, or fact of treason, that must take away my life, and this is your own law : and therefore he is but a single one, and therefore invalid, and altogether not satisfactory or binding. And then beside, which is considerable, truly I think the Tower of London, in the place where he saith I gave him those papers, is not within the jurisdiction of the city of London ; and how I should come to be arraigned by a jury of my fellow-citizens here in London, therefore, against whom I must confess that for my part I have nothing for their honesty and integrity to object, I know not : for I know not the faces of any two of them, and therefore impossible for me to say any thing against them. I say, I know not how by a London jury I can be tried for a fact fixed upon me to be committed in Middlesex. I beseech you, gentlemen of the jury, mistake me not ; for I have nothing to accuse you of ; and I hope you will be so conscientious and tender in the trial of me for my life, that you will put your case as my case, and do by me as you would be done unto by me, if you were in my case and condition ; and the righteous God of Heaven and Earth direct you so to do ! And therefore the lieutenant of the Tower being but a single witness at most, and in law not a competent one neither, being my professed adversary, that hath most illegally kept me in prison, for which I have commenced long since my action at law for my legal reparations against him ; I say, therefore in the eye of the law his testimony sticks not, and I hope, in the righteous opinion of the jury, can do me no harm : and if so his testimony be invalid, then the "Salva Libertate" cannot reach me, to do me any hurt ; but it and all those my pretended books called by my name, are all washed away and gone, and my adversaries must go seek new authors for them, or at least procure new and better testimony to prove them mine ; for that which they have produced hitherto is worth nothing.

Then the next is Thomas Daffern ; and he says, that the Twelfth of August, 1649, he met with lieut. col. Lilburne upon the bridge, as he was going home to visit his sick and distressed family, and he went back with him to his house in Southwark, at Winchester-house, which I am sure is not in London; and therefore at Guildhall in London, by a London jury, in law cannot be tryed: for he positively saith, That at Winchester-house in Southwark, which is in the county of Surry, lieutenant col. John Lilburne gave him a book to carry to col. Ayres, a prisoner at Warwick-Castle; but he does give in no testimony at all that it is mine, or that that book was lieut. col. Lilburne's book, of his making or penning; but a book he gave him, and that is all he says: which is no more but that he received a book at Winchester-House in Southwark, from the hands of lieut. col. Lilburne, to carry to col. Ayres, now a prisoner at Warwick-Castle. Now, truly, he is but a single testimony, and he swears nothing particularly as to me; and besides, what he swears is to a fact done in another county, and therefore his testimony is not worth a straw; it is gone, it is invalid in law, it signifies nothing, it is not so good as a spider's web. By virtue of which, the marshal's testimony, and the governor's of Warwick-Castle, as also col. Purefoy's, need no other answer from me, but to pity them for the long journey they have made to no purpose.

The next thing charged upon me, is the "Preparative to an Hue and Cry after sir Arthur Haslerig;" to which the lieut. of the Tower says, that lieut. col. John Lilburne gave him one of those books in the Tower, which truly I am confident is in Middlesex: and truly I conceive, under favour, it will be a point disputable in law, that I should be tried for my life in this place, admit there were a thousand witnesses to make it good that the lieut. of the Tower had one of them from me, either in the place he formerly named, or at his own house; for that fact was done in the Tower, that is out of the county of London, and so not triable by a jury of citizens of London. But he further saith, Whether the book that he now has, be the same that he received from the hands of lieut. col. Lilburne, that he is not able to depose.

Then the rest of the Witnesses that do depose against me in relation to the "Hue and Cry," are James Nutleigh and Edward Radney, both of them Mr. Prideaux's servants; and the most that they say is, that when I was before their master, upon the 24th of September, 1649, at his chamber in the Temple, to be examined by him, they say they saw me deliver, "A Preparative to an Hue and Cry after sir Arthur Haslerig," to their master's hands, and tell him that was mine, and I would own it, saving the printer's erratas; which, says the lieutenant of the Tower upon his oath, I expressed to be many.

In answer to which, I say, I do not know whether the Temple be within the liberties of London or no; and if it be not, I know no ground in law, wherefore a London jury should try me here. But more fully I say, for any thing the jury knows, or for any thing the witnesses swear, the printer's erratas, which are many, are all and every of those clauses that offence or exceptions are taken against; for not one of those clauses which you except against, are not proved not to be the printer's erratas: and therefore there is no validity or weight in those testimonies also, for they do not prove in the least that any six lines of the book is mine; all of them say that I owned no more of the book than was free from the printer's erratas. And the lieutenant of the tower swears that the clause was added, "which age many." And therefore you, the gentlemen of the jury, I appeal to your consciences, and to your judgments, and the Lord set it home to your understandings, that you may not be guilty of the blood of an innocent man, by partiality, fear, or affrightment of spirit; for in law, equity, and justice, all their three testimonies put together have no validity, no strength, nor force in them: and so much for that.

The next thing fixed upon me, is "The Legal Fundamental Liberties of the people of England revived, asserted, and vindicated;" and truly all that is brought to prove "The Legal Fundamental Liberties of England" to be mine, is but merely the relations that are in the forementioned books: for I do not remember, nay, I am sure of it, that there is so much as a single testimony that does give in any evidence against me that it is mine; and therefore I can answer to that nothing more than what I have said already: The testimonies all being invalid, at least in the eye of the law; and therefore that's gone too, and blown away as chaff before the wind.

Lastly, for the "Agreement of the People," truly that is dated the first of May 1649. And truly, for aught I know, and I am sure of it too, it is before the date of any of those acts upon which I am indicted for my life; and therefore not within the compass of it. For Paul, that great apostle said; and he that spoke by the spirit of God that dwelt within him, and to whom it was given in an extraordinary manner, that so he might thereby be enabled to write the infallible truths of God, said, 'Where there is no law, there can be no transgression.' But that agreement was in being, and publicly abroad with a legal imprimatur to it, before any of the acts, upon which I am arraigned, had a being; And therefore, admit it should be granted to be mine, yet it can be no transgression for any thing prejudicial in the eye of the law unto me. But besides, there is not any testimony at all, that so much as lays it to my charge to be mine; and therefore it pinches me not, nor does any of all the rest of your charges. And besides all that I have already said in my own behalf, to shew in law the invalidity and insufficiency of all the testimony you have produced against me, I add this by way of addition to it, That there hath not been so much as one single witness or testimony to prove that the Books laid to my charge are rightly and truly dated, and not post-dated; which if any of them, or all of them should be, admit the proofs were sufficient in law; yet unless the days of them be firmly proved to be exactly according to the original copies, and not post-dated, for any thing the Jury knows, they might be made and writ before ever the acts, they are said to transgress, had a being. And therefore if there were so many testimonies in law to prove the Books mine, (which there is not in the least) yet, I say, admit there had been a thousand witnesses to the proof of every one of those Books; yet notwithstanding in the eye of the law, I leave it to the consciences of my Jury, whether I be not free in that particular, seeing there is none swears punctually and positively to the dates of them. But to put all out of danger, as I deny nothing, so in that particular I do not own a jot, a line, a word, a syllable of any one of them. Now, Sir, having done so far as I have, and clearly discovered to the Jury, and all that hear me this day, that all the proofs alledged against me do not stick, in the least, any guilt upon me, truly I have clearly answered and invalidated all the verbal proofs, according to the clear letter and true intention of the law. I have no more to say to all the evidences that have been read in Books against me. I leave it to the consciences of my Jury, believing them to be a generation of men that believe in God the Father, and believe they shall have a portion in the resurrection of the dead, and stand before the tribunal of the Lord Almighty, to give an account unto him, the Lord of Life and Glory, and the Judge of all the Earth, of all their actions done in the flesh: I leave it to their judgments and consciences, to judge righteously between me and my adversaries; and the Lord of Life and Glory, to judge right between me and you, that in all those things in your long scrawl you pretend me guilty of, I hope I have so clearly and fully answered all and every of your proofs, that not any one thing sticks. And to their consciences I cast it; hoping that they do look upon themselves as standing in the presence of him that sees their hearts, and knows now whether there be any malice in them towards me, or no; which, for my part, I do not believe there is; for I profess, I know no wrong I have particularly done them as men, or generally as Englishmen. My conscience is free and clear as in the sight of God, and, I hope, of all unbiassed men. And, to my knowledge, I never saw the faces of any two of them before this day; and therefore, entirely as an Englishman, that loves and honours the good old laws of England, and earnestly desires, and endeavours, and struggles, for the preservation of justice and just magistracy, which I wish with all my soul may be preserved; and therefore having suffered much for the preservation of the common and just liberties of England, to their consciences and to their judgments I leave both this matter, and the constant series of all my actions in this my pilgrimage and vale of tears here below.

Lord Keble. Mr. Lilburne!

Lilburne. Your pleasure, Sir.

Lord Keble. Nothing, Sir, but this: Our consciences are before God, as well as yours; and therefore you need not speak thus.

Lilburne. Sir, I have only two or three words more, which I have spoken to you: but these men, that are my jury and judges, in whose hands only are the issues of my life, have not as yet heard them. I pray you, give me liberty, according to your promise, to go on without interruption. You Gentlemen of the Jury, I have many material things to produce witnesses unto for my justification; but no time in the least will be allowed me, as you see, to produce them, which I ought by law to have had; especially considering I have been locked up so long close prisoner, and have nothing for which I was first imprisoned laid unto my charge, and have so high, potent, and mighty adversaries as I have; and truly every man is shy of me, for fear he may come into trouble for coming near me. And therefore, I have but two or three words more to speak to the Jury; I beseech you, let me freely go on.

Lord Keble. Make them thirty to your Defence, and you may speak them.

Lilburne. I shall, by God's assistance; I shall keep close to my defence. Now, Gentlemen of the Jury, I think I have sufficiently pleaded for myself at this present; and that to clear up fully unto your judgments, and to your understandings, that by the law of England there is not so much as any one fact proved against me; for the law is express, that to every particular fact of treason there must be two sufficient witnesses, not by constructions, or the like: Upon which score and plea that gentleman, master Nichols, that sits there as a Judge, and master John Maynard, saved major Rolfe's life, being to be arraigned for the highest of English treason before baron Wyld. Now, gentlemen, if, notwithstanding what I have said, any thing shall yet stick upon your spirits, I shall intreat you to consider the intention of the law of England: It is repeated several times in sir Edward Coke's Institutes; it is a maxim in the law, I have it here in the third part of his Institutes, fol. 6. 'Et actus non facit reum, nisi mens sit rea.' Sir, if you please to do me the favour but to English it, and explain it for the Jury? For though I understand the substance of it, yet I am not exactly able to English the Latin, but only to understand the sense of it. I conceive the sense of it is this: It is not the act, but the intention of the mind, that declares the guilt. But therefore as in reference unto that, I shall say no more but only this to them, That the constant series of all my actions, from my youth hitherto, have manifested, that I have, with an affectionate and compassionate English spirit within me, that hath put me forth for many years together really to endeavour the prosperity and good of the land of my nativity, and not its mischief and destruction; and that hithertoward, in all my contests, I have had the law, and the declared public justice of the nation to my side, having never done any mischief to my country, unless it be a mischief to oppose great men's wills. I have now been seven months in prison, I know not wherefore, although originally I was committed to prison pretendedly for treason: and both the Acts upon which now I am indicted, have been made long since my first commitment. There is not any one syllable of all those things for which I originally in general, without accuser or prosecutor, was voted a traitor by the present power; and for which I was proclaimed a traitor throughout all the market and great towns in England six months ago. There is not now, I say, any one of those things laid to my charge. But truly I have been laid into prison for nothing, as by this day's work clearly appears, by the men in present power: unto divers of whom I have often sent, to know what it is they require at my hands; and have also from time to time declared my ready willingness to compose and end all differences that concern me, having proffered again and again to refer myself unto the final determination of four of their own members, finally to end and determine all differences betwixt them and me; whereof I was willing that Judge Rigby should be one of them: a Gentleman, though now a Judge, I have found very honest and faithful, and to whom I have been much obliged for many hearty favours I have from time to time received from him. I say I have sent to him and col. Martin, and abundance of members besides, from time to time; to some of whom I have written, with some of whom I have spoken. I say, I have sent many messages with the earnestest desire in the world, that if I had offended any man in the house, that if he would be pleased fairly and friendly to refer it to the final judgment and determination of four members of their own house, I would stand to it. And let all the world judge whether, or no, this proposition was not suitable to a Christian, and suitable to an honest man; yea, to a man that judged himself in the strictest scrutiny of his own conscience to be free and innocent in his own soul, and in his own conscience, from all guilt, crimes, or treasons; or else, if I had not, I would not have put myself upon the judgment of those that were engaged in interest and self-preservation against me: and yet for the things that they imprisoned me for as a traitor in general, which I hear nothing of this day, which is wonderful strange law and proceedings, to my understanding. But besides, Sir, under favour, I have not only done this, but I have yet thousands of my friends, I will undertake I could produce 10,000 of old and young, males and females, citizens and countrymen, men of honesty and integrity, that have in the common cause always adhered to the freedoms of the nation, that have petitioned the parliament several times, yea, from time to time, with abundance of rational and fair petitions, and truly stated my case to them, and acquainted them with my condition, and with the rest of my fellow-prisoners; and earnestly begged and intreated of them, that they would not be hasty in condemning and destroying me before they had heard me, and afforded me a legal trial, from first to last, according to the due forms and process of the law of England. And yet for all this, till I came before you, I never saw accuser or prosecutor, nor indictment or charge, nor nothing in all the earth, legally to demonstrate me so much as a supposed offender. And yet for all this, no satisfaction in the world would be received; notwithstanding in one petition they desiring that they would be pleased, seeing they were incensed against us, and that they had taken indignation against us, they did not desire to justify us in any thing we had done; but in regard, to their own knowledge, we had been all four faithful, zealous, and serviceable instruments in the common cause of the nation: In which to the hazard of my life an hundred times over, I have engaged for them, with my sword in my hand, with as much resolution, and as much faithfulness, as any man on earth ever served a generation of men; having never betrayed my trust, or ever given any suspicion in the least, that I would; or ever so much as staggered in my principles, nor ever so much as disputed any commands, though never so desperate. that were laid upon me; no, nor ever turned my back in the field of their enemies in any of their services, so long as it was possible for a man that had any brains left him to stand; but was one of those 700 men at Brentford, (myself being there a volunteer, without any particular command) that with dint of sword stood it out against the whole body of the king's numerous army for many hours together, and never stirred off the ground till both horse and foot had, as it were, encompassed us round, and till we came to a readiness to beat out one another's brains with the butt-end of our musquets: where I was taken a prisoner, and led captive in a most barbarous and disgraceful manner to Oxford, where I suffered abundance of unexpressible hardships, and underwent the shock, and rid the storm, as stoutly as any man there, although I believe I was as much courted by messages from the king himself, as any or all the parliament-men that were there my fellow-prisoners: for there I have had no less than four earls and lords in one day sent unto me by him, to draw me over to them: but I bless God, that kept me upright and entire unto my integrity and principles, and suffered me not to turn my back upon them. But, Sir, notwithstanding all this, (I say) our friends desired of the parliament that they would be pleased to take sufficient security, according to the law, for our forthcoming at all times, to answer such things as should be laid to our charge: but their petitions were contemned, themselves slighted and abuse, and by no means could get any satisfactory answers to them. Sir, I speak here to you, and to my fellow-citizens the jury, as in the sight and presence of God, that knows I lye not. and if you find me to be in a lye, in the least, in what I have said, then never credit man of my profession again for my sake. Truly, Sir, I say, they desired them that we might be released from our imprisonment, putting in security to answer whatsoever legally could be charged upon us; only they craved we might have the same legal privileges that they demanded at the hands of the king, when he impeached the lord Kimbolton and the five members of high treason; which privileges are easily and plainly to be read in their own first "Primitive Declarations," p. 38, 39, and 76, 77. Now abundance of the free people of this nation, in my behalf having craved the same privileges that were demanded for the lord Kimbolton, and in the behalf of the five members, and the like; all that they desired was no more but the same privileges that they craved for them; which was, that I might have the due process of the law, from first to last; and I and my accusers come face to face at the beginning before an ordinary magistrate; and if they had any thing to lay to my charge, that they would legally according to law, proceed with me. But, I say, none of these would be granted, although themselves in several of their declarations have declared all these things to be the common right of all or any of the people of England, as well as parliament men. Yet notwithstanding all this, they continued in their incensed condition against me, and would come to no legal nor fair issue with me; nor let me in the least know what was the end or thing they required of me, or what was the thing that would satisfy for the extenuation of their indignation against me; but contrariwise dealt harder and harder with me; in laying new and fresh insupportable burthens and provocations upon me: for after all this, they caused me to be locked up close prisoner in the heat of summer, set sentinels night and day at my door, denied me the access of my wife and little babes; for a certain season neither wife nor child could so much as set their feet within the gates of the Tower to see me, or comfort me in my distress.

Lord Keble. Mr. Lilburne, is this your Defence?

Lilburne. I beseech you, as either the law, or fear of God, conscience or common honesty dwell within you, let me have a little fair play to go on to speak for my life without interruption; I shall not trouble you long, for I have almost done.

Lord Keble. When your matter of fact is to defend yourself, and to answer the proof upon that; and that is it we are to hear, and not to hear you tell the story of all your life; and then if we should reply to these particular things, they will be such as most of them will vanish, and do you no service, but take up a great deal of time. Do not tell us a story, but go on to finish the matter of fact.

Lilburne. It has been your favour to give me leave to tell it over to you, I pray give me leave to declare it to my jury, who have not heard it before; and it is very material to my preservation, and my life lies upon it: therefore do not deal with me as proctors, and engaged men, with those that thirst for my blood; and laying aside that evenness of hand betwixt both parties, that ought to be in all just and righteous judges.

Lord Keble. It is nothing to this; if it be any thing in the world to do you good, in the way of your course of defence, you should have it

Lilburne. Well, if you will let me go on no further to make my defence, I cannot over-rule you, though you over-rule me; my blood be upon your heads, and the Lord God of heaven and earth reward you for all your blood-thirsty cruelty towards me his innocent servant this day! And so I have done with it; and what I have said, I have done with it, and leave it to the jury, earnestly begging and intreating them to take notice of your cruel and unjust dealing with me, in denying me all the privileges of an Englishman, when I am upon my life.

Lord Keble. What is material, you shall not be debarred in it.

Lilburne. O Lord, Sir! What strange judges are you, that you will neither allow me counsel to help me to plead, nor suffer me myself to speak for my own life! Is this your law and justice, Sir? I have no more to say but this, seeing you straiten me; although you said you would hear me till midnight. I hope I have made it evident to all rational men, that all or any part of the testimony given in against me, does not in the exact eye of the law in the least touch me, although I have been most unjustly imprisoned, and most barbarously used, and tyrannized over; yea, and my estate by will and power taken from me; that should have kept me and mine alive, and the legal and customary allowance of the Tower denied me to this day. And although I have used all Christian and fair means to compose my differences with my adversaries, yet nothing would serve their turns, but I must have oppression upon oppression laid upon me, enough to break the back of a horse; and then if I cry out of my oppressions in any kind, I must have new treason-snares made to catch me, many months after their oppressions were first laid upon me, that if I so much as whimper or speak in the least of their unjust dealing with me, I must die therefore as a Traitor. O miserable servitude! and miserable bondage, in the first year of England's freedom! I have now no more to say unto you, but only this. Your own law tells me, sir Edward Coke speaks it three or four times over in his 3d part of Institutes; That it is the law of England, that any by-stander may speak in the prisoner's behalf, if he see any thing urged against him contrary to law, or do apprehend he falls short of urging any material thing that may serve for his defence and preservation. Here is your own law for it, Sir; Coke is full and pregnant to this purpose in his 3d part of Institutes, fol. 29, 34, 37. But this hath several times been denied me in the case of Mr. Sprat, my solicitor; and now I demand it again, as my right by law, that he may speak a few words for me, according to his often desire, both to me and the court. I have almost done, Sir; only once again I claim that as my right which you have promised. That I should have counsel to matter of law; and if you give me but your own promise, which is my undoubted right by your own law, I fear not my life; But if you again shall deny both these legal privileges, I shall desire my jury to take notice, that I aver you rob me of the benefit of the law, and go about to murder me, without and against law: and therefore as a free-born Englishman, and as a true Christian that now stands in the sight and presence of God, with an upright heart and conscience, and with a cheerful countenance, cast my life, and the lives of all the honest freemen of England, into the hands of God, and his gracious protection, and into the care and conscience of my honest jury and fellow-citizens; who I again declare by the law of England, are the conservators and sole judges of my life, having inherent in them alone the judicial power of the law, as well as fact: you judges that sit there being no more, if they please, but cyphers to pronounce the sentence, or their clerks to say Amen to them: being at the best in your original, but the Norman Conqueror's intruders. And therefore, you Gentlemen of the Jury are my sole judges, the keepers of my life, at whose hands the Lord will require my blood, in case you leave any part of my Indictment to the cruel and bloody men. And therefore I desire you to know your power, and consider your duty both to God, to me, to your own selves, and to your country: And the gracious assisting Spirit and Presence of the Lord God Omnipotent, the Governor of heaven and earth, and all things therein contained, go along with you, give counsel and direct you, to do that which is just, and for his glory!

[The People with a loud voice cried, Amen, Amen, and gave an extraordinary great hum; which made the Judges look something untowardly about them, and caused major-general Skippon to send for three more fresh companies of foot-soldiers.]

Mr. Attorney. Gentlemen of the Jury, you have heard the Evidence in behalf of the state; you have heard the insinuations of the Prisoner upon them, as calling you his fellow-citizens, and the like: He hath said, and spoken; we have proved, and it is in your consciences to believe proof, before saying. The Prisoner began to cite you two acts of parliament; the one in the 1st of Edward 6th, and the other 5th and 6th of Edward 6th; and by those two acts he would signify to you, that you should have two plain and evident witnesses to every particular fact: yet he did forget to cite another statute made in the first and second years of Philip and Mary, that overthrows and annihilates those two statutes that would have two plain witnesses to every fact of Treason; and in all cases of Treason will have them freed, according to the common course of law, the common law for the trial of them. If that must be material, or if that stick with you, that you cannot determine it, my lords the judges will direct you in it, and in all other points of law. But certainly that exception was a little vain too; for we did not insist with one particular witness in nothing at all: for that of Newcomb, the Prisoner did not repeat fully what he said; for I remember he said this, That Mr. Lilburne and captain Jones came together, and brought the copy of the last sheet that was to be printed: if one come with him, and the other delivered it to the printer, they are both equally guilty alike. They came again the same day at night; and when the first sheet was printed, to be sure it was true and right Mr. Lilburne did take the pains to take one of the copies into his hand, and corrected it.

Lilburne. By your favour, Sir, be urged no such thing: by your favour, Sir, they are the express words of the testimony, to the quite contrary; and I wonder, Mr. Prideaux, you are not ashamed to aver such notorious falsehoods, as you do, in the open face of the court, before thousands of witnesses; for Newcomb said no such thing, as you falsely affirm; neither is there any such statute in queen Mary's time that doth abolish those two statutes of Edward 6th, that I insist upon for two witnesses: name your statute if you can; here is the statute-book, let the Jury hear it read; do not abuse them with your impudent falsehoods.

Mr. Attorney. Well, Sir, I leave it to the judgment of the Jury, Sir. My lord, as for all the rest, and particularly for that of the "Salva Libertate," it is true, there is but one witness, which is sufficient enough by the fore-mentioned act of queen Mary: but, my lord, it is under Mr. Lilburne's own hand, he will not deny it.

Lilburne. By your favour, there is no man so swears, in the least, that it is my hand: Jesus Christ denied none of his accusation; yet when they went about to ensnare him by questions, he answered Pilate, &c. 'Thou sayest so: go to those that heard me, they know what I said; why ask you me?' Sir, I beseech you produce your act of parliament in queen Mary's time, to prove, in cases of Treason, there ought to be but a single witness.

Mr. Attorney. Do not interrupt me, Mr. Lilburne.

Lilburne. I pray you then do not urge that which is not right nor true, but notoriously false; for if you persevere in it, I will interrupt you, and tell you of it to the purpose.

Justice Jermin. Though you do recite many things, yet I must tell you, the law of the land saith, The Counsel for the Commonwealth must be heard.

Lilburne. I beseech you, then, let there be no more added to the testimony, than right and truth; for my life lies upon it, and I must and will declare the baseness and the falseness of it.

Mr. Attorney. I would not do the tenth part of the hair of your head wrong; but being entrusted, I shall do my duty, and discharge my conscience in my place, which is fully and plainly to open that unto them which in my conscience I think is right and just.

Lilburne. I do repeat it thus, as in my conscience, that he did say, when the copy was first brought, captain Jones gave him the copy, and captain Jones did agree with him for the printing of it; and captain Jones did read the original to his corrector, which corrector amended the printer's faults, and that I had an uncorrected sheet away; and that his forms were taken before he had perfected that.

Mr. Attorney. And Mr. Lilburne came the second time.

Lilburne. Will you spend all day in vain repetitions? You would not give one leave to breathe, nor freely to speak truth, without interruption, although you were laying load upon me for five hours together: I pray, Sir, do not now go about to tire the jury with tedious repetitions, nor to sophisticate or adulterate their understandings with your falsehoods and untruths.

Justice Jermin. Mr. Lilburne, the law of the land is, that the counsel for the state must speak last.

Lilburne. Sir, your law is according to the law of God, you said; and that law, I am sure, will have no man to bear false witness: why doth Mr. Prideaux tell the jury such falsehoods as he doth, and take up six times more time to take away my life, than you or he will allow me to defend it?

Mr. Attorney. For the "Salva," that it was delivered in the Tower, which is not in London, I hear not one witness to prove that.

Lilburne. That is a disputable point in law, whether it be in London or Middlesex.

Mr. Attorney. And then, my lord, as for the "Agreement of the People," Mr. Lilburne says, it was dated 1st May, 1649, and it was before the act was made that is dated May 1649, and it is before the law was made in July, 1649. We do not question him for that; but when he comes to show in those books in August last, then he does new publish that "Agreement of the People:" he incites them to set it up as their centre, standard and banner.

Lilburne. Let me not thus be abused; that book was never fixed upon me, I was never taxed to be the author of it, or so much as the disperser of one of them; what baseness is this in you, Mr. Prideaux, thus falsely to use me?

Lord Keble. He does you no wrong, but all the fair play that can be; he doth fix that "Agreement" no otherwise upon you, than by your books it is.

Mr. Attorney. I do acknowledge the "Agreement of the People" that you are charged with, is dated the 1st of May, 1649, and that the evidence may allow this; as also, that the "Agreement of the People" that was then published, and which you in your books did own, was and is signed by Mr. Walwin, Mr. Prince, and Mr. Overton, your fellow-prisoners, as well as yourself.

Lilburne. There is no book yet proved mine; and if that "Agreement" were mine, yet it is dated before both your acts, and was in print before they had a being; and therefore in the eye of your own law, can be no transgression; and you yourself do not so much as accuse me for publishing or dispersing one of them, since your acts were publicly declared.

Mr. Attorney. That which you owned and signed, Mr. Lilburne.

Lilburne. By your favour, Sir, I never owned or signed any book that is proved against me yet; and no book in the eye of the law can be accounted mine, until it be legally proved mine, or voluntarily confessed to be mine by myself.

Mr. Attorney. My lord, that is owned to be so printed. When he must come and incite the people, and stir them up from those particulars therein contained, to insist with particulars, as the dissolving of the parliament, the having of a new, and such other particulars therein contained; and that this "Agreement" shall be the center, the banner, and the waved standard, unto which they shall flock, and to send agents into several countries to put this into execution. Now, my lords, for this book, it is not doubted but that there are two witnesses that the "Preparative to the Hue and Cry" was owned by Mr. Lilburne to be his own, the erratas of the printer only excepted; and that the lieutenant of the Tower likewise joins in it. My lords, I think there was not a clause read to you out of it, but what is full and home to the purpose: and as for the "Out-cry," the printer's testimony is complete. And "The legal fundamentall Liberties" is owned by him in his "Impeachment of High-Treason against lieut. gen. Cromwell, and his son-in-law commissary Ireton;" and he doth there also sufficiently own the "Agreement" of the first of May: and, my lords, do not know there was any thing that was offered here in that book, but was first proved, in the court. We do not offer any thing of error that was past, to take Mr. Lilburne upon any speeches that fell from him unawares, although he hath sufficiently done it: but in much speaking there wants not offence: it falls out here in this. Mr. Lilburne hath been very free in his writing, in his speaking, in his printing, and it now riseth in judgment against him, and the law must now give him his due; which you, my lords, are sole judges of, and from whom the jury and the prisoner both must receive it, for all that which Mr. Lilburne hath said to the contrary. And the jury answers to the matter of fact, and they are upon their oaths sworn to do the things that are just and right. My lords, I shall leave the evidence to them, with this note or observation upon it : that notwithstanding all Mr. Lilburne hath flourished and said, I will not say as he hath done, and seek by glossing speeches or insinuations to wind into the affections of the jury, as he cunningly and smoothly hath done, by calling them his fellow citizens, and the like. You Gentlemen of the Jury, you are to answer now according to your own consciences, betwixt God and you ; your oath is, that you are not to respect favour or affection, nor to meddle with him upon any respect, than in justice, and as it is already clearly witnessed and proved before you. My lords, you have heard the several charges he is accused upon, you have heard a great deal of foul matter and dirt, that is fit for nothing but to be cast upon the ground, and returns to Mr. Lilburne again ; for truly when he casts it upon the purest marble or brass, it falls off again : God be thanked that it returns to Mr. Lilburne, the right owner ! The prisoner hath cast these accusations and these blemishes upon others, but now they are upon the ground they will fall off, and do retort and return upon his own face : he hath taken a great deal of pains to dig deep for mistakes, nay, for notorious and gross calumniation ; had he the ingenuity to remember the words of the Scripture, ‘ That the pit he hath digged for others, he is fallen into himself,’ he would have some remorse of conscience in him : but all the mischiefs and all the evils that can be thought upon, which he imagined to heap upon others, is now most justly fallen upon himself. It is said of those flies whose matter is corruption, they always light upon sore places, upon galled backs, upon carrion ; other birds, when they fly upon fair meadows, will not touch these. Certainly the parliament of England, the army, all the officers of it (whose fame, both as parliament and army, all men know, in an extraordinary manner), are now put in a balance against Mr. Lilburne : but for the army and the officers of it, no man can say but they have been faithful and true to their trust, gallant and courageous, and extreme successful to the peace and happiness of this nation ; and God is pleased at this instant to own them, and bless them in a miraculous manner.

Lilburne. And yet notwithstanding, did not you help to vote them traitors once ? I am sure I was in a chamber in Whitehall last year, when their commissioners (now members of your house) put your name down in their black bill for a malignant : but it seems you have recanted your errors, and engaged to be a good acquiescing creature, or else you had not been here this day in the condition you are in. But for all their faithfulness, &c. have they not rebelled twice against their creators, lords and masters ?

Mr. Attorney. Never army hath done greater things, and yet they have not escaped Mr. Lilburne’s tongue and pen ; they have not escaped it, my lords, but he hath lashed them to the purpose. I shall be as good as my word, not to aggravate the offences, for they are so vile, they aggravate themselves enough ; and therefore I leave it thus, the naked truth, and the worth of it, as the books themselves have offered themselves. But I shall say thus much more : The honour of the parliament of England, all the magistracy therein, the honour of the government, the honour and renown of the army, that hath done such great and wonderful things, is now at stake against Mr. Lilburne ; and there being a law published, that did give warning, and Mr. Lilburne had been tried for his life sooner, upon my knowledge ; I say, Mr. Lilburne had been sooner tried, and sooner condemned and executed, if the law had been sooner made and published. But as he saith right well, ‘ Where there is no law, there is no transgression ;’ and therefore there being a law against which he hath offended, he must smart for it.

Lilburne. I am sure I was imprisoned most unjustly, without any the least shadow or colour in law, many months before your acts were made, and extremely oppressed ; and now you go about to hang me as a traitor, for at most but crying out of your oppression. O unrighteous men ! The Lord in mercy look upon me, and deliver me and every honest man from you, the vilest of men !

Mr. Attorney. And that law was published and proclaimed in this city, by means of which, Mr. Lilburne and others had timely notice that they should not do such things as are there forbidden ; it is also told them the penalties of it, which are those that are due for the highest high-treason : and yet notwithstanding you see with what boldness, with what conscience, in despite of all law and authority, these books have been made and published by Mr. Lilburne. And whereas he is pleased to say many times, that many men have petitioned for him to the parliament, he will not affirm to you that ever he petitioned himself ; but in all his discourse here, he calls them “ the present Men in Power, the gentlemen at Westminster,” nay, my lord, he hath not so much as owned the power of the court since he came before you, but hath often called you cyphers, and the like.

Lilburne. That is no Treason, Sir : they intitle themselves “ the present power ;” and would you hang me for not giving them a better style, than they themselves give to themselves ? I think the style of “ present power or present government,” is a very fit style for them.

Mr. Attorney. My lord, I have told you long, it is the Jury that are judges upon the fact ; and to you I must appeal for law, if you do believe the evidence is plain and full against him, for which he stands indicted ; and so God direct all your judgments ! I have done.

Lilburne. Sir, by your favour, I shall desire to address myself in one word to you ; which is, to desire that the jury may read the first chapter of queen Mary, in the statute-book, and the last clause of the chapter of the 13th.

of Elizabeth; where they shall clearly see, especially in the statute of queen Mary, that they abhorred and detested the making of words or writing to be treason; which is such a bondage and snare, that no man knows how to say or do, or behave himself, as is excellently declared by the statute of Hen. 4. v. 2. I have done, Sir.

Lord Keble. Gentlemen, you of the Jury, you are sworn; you are men of conscience, gravity and understanding: To tell you of the duties of your place, that have gone through it so often, is a vain thing. The sacredness of an oath, which a man must not transgress in the least, not to save the world: you have gone so often through it, and understand it, that I need say no more. The Charge you have heard, and the Proofs; but for proof single, or double or treble, as some of them do amount unto a witness in this, yea, that doth double another man's witness; if I swear this thing, and another swear the same, a third the same, that is doubled upon all their testimonies. Mr. Lilburne hath cited two statutes of Edward the 6th, to prove there must be two witnesses*; but I must tell him, were there but one to each fact, it were enough in law; for as for that which was cited of king Edward the 6th, you have had it fully answered by a latter law of queen Mary, which doth over-rule that, and also enacts that the common law of England shall be the rule by which all treasons shall be tried; which reacheth to this case too, that there need no more but one witness, and this is law; and therefore, gentlemen of the jury, that must not stick with you. That which you have heard, to concern you of the truth of the matters, is this: You are not bound affirmatively to have two witnesses, but if that one witness with the circumstances concurs, that is sufficient: That which should prevail with you, is to consider the strength of the accusation, which rests in the books, and doth consist of three heads, which are laid down in the books themselves; which doth in the first place so firmly express, and so far vilify the parliament and state, as it is now established in England; the second doth look unto the counsels and incitations of him for the stirring up of tumults, commotions, and wars in this nation; and the third, are the things cited in his books to that end and purpose, to divide the army, and then the other will take the better effect. These are the three main charges, and these the books that come from him do so plainly testify: that the books are proved to be his, you are fit judges of; but it clearly appears by those his books, that these things were in his intention.—For that he says, it is Mens that does make a man guilty, the mind, that is intended as it is expressed: 'Actus non facit reum, nisi Mens sit rea.' Now that mind is rea, when there is faith published; but I tell you this, these books being admitted true, I say that never man that acted the highest of treasons, as he hath done, hath had so much liberty as he hath had: and as I said before, never man of his condition, nor any condition in England, that was indicted in such a case, ever had a trial in such a court, in such an auditory, such a presence, as he had.

Lilburne. The more's my sorrow.

Lord Keble. The more's your sorrow, indeed! You have good cause to be sorrowful indeed for this act of yours thus declared: if your intentions had taken effect, your plot was the greatest that ever England saw, for it struck at no less than the subversion of this Commonwealth, of this state, to have laid and put us all in blood; your plot was such, that never such was seen in the world before to proceed from a private man as you are; therefore it must needs be heavy upon your conscience. Therefore, my masters of the jury, look into your conscience, and see what that saith unto you, which he stands so much upon: The Witnesses testimonies are now plain and good in law, in this cause they are multiplied; I do not know in one particular that there is a testimony single, but it is aggravated with many circumstances: therefore let not that trouble you, you are the proper judges of the matter of fact, being of the country; and if you have fully apprehended the dangerous things plotted in those books of Mr. Lilburne's, you will clearly find that never was the like treason hatched in England. And so in God's name, as the prisoner doth lead to your consciences, so go and do.

Lilburne. I desire your favour, that there may be a course taken, that neither my prosecutors, nor any belonging to them, may have access unto the Jury till they have done.

Justice Jermin. You Gentlemen of the Jury, I did expect it, it was expected by the Court, that some matter of law, or some question of law, might arise upon the evidence; which if it had, it was the duty of the Court to have cleared it; but there does not appear, and therefore there is an end, as to the dispute of the law.

Foreman. We are no lawyers indeed, my lord.

Lilburne. I have begged it, and you have promised it, that I should have liberty to plead.

in law to the illegalities of the Indictment; but you have denied me that legal right: yea, you will not permit my Solicitor to speak a few words for me. I dare undertake there was never such a Trial upon English ground as this hath been; where a man hath been denied all the legal rights of an Englishman, as I have been. You Gentlemen of the Jury, who now are my sole judges, I pray you take notice of it.

Justice Jermin. There never was any such kind of abuse offered to a Court as you have given, nor never was such language used to any Court of Justice before, that I did hear of, as you have given: and certainly the behaviour at the bar doth set forth what the humours and character of the man is; for in this case, if any such dangerous thing of acting of commotion or mutiny in the army or in the nation should have followed, it had been too late then to have thought of the remedy. Therefore the wisdom of the parliament hath declared, That whosoever shall by writing, printing, or by openly declaring, publish that the present government of England is usurped or tyrannical, it is treason. There is the fact, upon which all the evidence does depend; and you are to judge, whether in all those books there be not by Mr. Lilburne a traitorous fact committed; and how clearly this does appear unto you, with all circumstances thereunto belonging, I leave you to judge: and how short his pretended replies are to be seen, or invalidate the strength of the witnesses, I also leave you to judge. I say, I might easily shew you, how short his pretended answers are of real satisfaction, but I leave it to your judgments.

Lilburne. Sir, my Answers are real Answers, not pretended ones, as you are pleased to call them.

Justice Jermin. But in this business the evidences are sufficient to make a man guilty of treason; for here was not simply a passionate act, or inconsiderate speech, but what he hath done, he hath done deliberately and advisedly, which is sufficient to make him, or any man that so doth, guilty of treason. All this that was published was in August, the act is in July preceding. Now it is very true, and I will English it for Mr. Lilburne, 'Actus non facit reum, nisi Mens rea.' The act of a man does not make him guilty, unless his mind be guilty. But I pray, how shall any man know the guilt of a man's mind, but by those polluting and poisonous words that come out of his mouth? That's the mind. What I hear a man say, I may lawfully say he thinks: and it is a rule in law, that the outward acts do shew forth inward intentions: that very rule I will not speak it in Latin, because I speak to one that does say he does not understand Latin, otherwise I could speak more Latin. Now here is the matter, whether or no, upon the whole evidence that you have heard, there does not appear sufficient matter to make this prisoner guilty, not of rash, but of advised and deliberate treason; and as plainly of plotting and contriving to raise mutiny and sedition in the army, thereby totally to subvert and destroy the present government: and truly, I have not heard more of skill has been used, and more attempts made, than I think you have heard, and do remember. I doubt not, but as you will take care of the life of a man, that you must not take away the life of an innocent; so will you be as careful of your own souls, and the public safety, and that's all that I desire, and I pray God to direct you for the best.

Lilburne. If you will not let me have counsel, let my solicitor speak matter of law for me.

Justice Jermin. Mr. Attorney, you must take some care to suppress this, he will not be answered by us. I pray demand justice of the Court against him.

Lilburne. Well, Sir, then I have done.

[The Foreman desires the Act for Treason, and one of the Jury desired to drink a cup of sack, for they had sat long, and how much longer the debate of the business might last, he knew not; and therefore desired, that they might have amongst them a quart of sack to refresh them.]

Justice Jermin. Gentlemen of the Jury, I know, for my part, in ordinary juries that they have been permitted to drink before they went from the bar; but in case of Felony or Treason, I never so much as heard it so, or so much as asked for; and therefore you cannot have it.

[But one of the Judges moved they might have it.]

Justice Jermin. I may not give leave to have my conscience to err; I dare not. And thus if the rest of the Judges be of opinion, you shall have a light if you please, the fellow that keeps you shall help you to it; but for sack, you can have none, and therefore withdraw about your work.

Lilburne. Sir, I understand, the officer that is to keep their door hath declared something of bitterness of spirit against me; I desire therefore he may have some indifferent man joined with him, to see I have fair play; which was granted, and he sworn.

The Jury go forth about five o'clock, the Court adjourned till six o'clock, and the Court commands the Lieutenant of the Tower and the Sheriffs to carry the Prisoner into the Irish Chamber, which they did. The Prisoner stays about three quarters of an hour, and the Jury being come into the Court again, the Prisoner was sent for; and after the Crier had caused silence, the Jury's names were called, viz.

| 1. Miles Petty, | 7. Edmond Keyser, |
| 2. Stephen Iles, | 8. Edward Perkins, |
| 3. Abraham Smith, | 9. Ralph Packman, |
| 4. John King, | 10. Wm. Commens, |
| 5. Nicholas Murren, | 11. Simon Weldon, |
| 6. Thomas Dainty, | 12. Henry Tooley, |

Clerk. Are you agreed of your Verdict?

Jury. Yes.

Clerk. Who shall speak for you?

Jury. Our Foreman.

Crier. John Lilburne, hold up thy hand.

What say you, (look upon the Prisoner) is he guilty of the Treasons charged upon him, or any of them, or Not Guilty?

Foreman. Not Guilty of all of them.

Clerk. Nor of all the Treasons, or any of them that are laid to his Charge.

Foreman. Not of all, nor of any one of them.

Clerk. Did he fly for the same?

Foreman. No.

[Which No being pronounced with a loud voice, immediately the whole multitude of people in the Hall, for joy of the Prisoner's acquittal, gave such a loud and unanimous shout, as is believed was never heard in Guildhall, which lasted for about half an hour without intermission; which made the Judges for fear turn pale, and hang down their heads; but the Prisoner stood silent at the bar, rather more sad in his countenance than he was before. But silence being made:]

Clerk. Then hearken to your Verdict, the Court hath heard it: You say, that John Lilburne is Not Guilty of all the Treasons laid unto his charge, nor of any one of them; and so you say all, and that he did not fly for it?

Jury. Yes, we do so.

Clerk. Gentlemen of the Grand Inquest, the Court doth discharge you. And you gentlemen of life and death, the Court doth discharge you also. Lieutenant of the Tower, you are to carry your Prisoner to the Tower again, and major general Skippon is to guard you: and all whom you desire, are to assist you.

The Prisoner withdraws, and the Court adjourned till Wednesday following.

Extraordinary were the acclamations for the Prisoner's deliverance, as the like hath not been seen in England; which acclamations and loud rejoicing expressions went quite through the streets with him to the very gates of the Tower, and for joy the people caused that night abundance of bonfires to be made all up and down the streets. And yet for all his acquittal by the law, his adversaries kept him afterwards so long in prison, that the people wondered, and began to grumble that he was not discharged; and divers of his friends went to the Judges, the Parliament, and Council of State, by whose importunities, by the seasonable help of the lord Gray of Grooby, colonel Ludlow, Mr. Robinson, and colonel Martin, his Discharge was procured, a Copy of which thus followeth:

“Whereas Lieut. Colonel John Lilburne hath been committed Prisoner to the Tower, upon suspicion of High Treason, in order to his Trial at law; which Trial he hath received, and is thereby acquitted: These are therefore to will and require you, upon sight hereof, to discharge and set at liberty the said Lieutenant Colonel John Lilburne from his imprisonment; for which this shall be your sufficient Warrant. Given at the Council of State, at Whitehall, this 8th day of November, 1649.—Signed in the Name and by the Order of the Council of State, appointed by Authority of Parliament.

JOHN BRADSHAW, President.†

To the Lieutenant of the Tower of London, or to his Deputy.’

† The following passages relative to this Case, are extracted from the second part of Clement Walker's “History of Independency.”

“About this time John Lilburne and his company, set forth a book called “The Picture of the Council of State,” &c. wherein they set forth the illegal and violent proceedings of the said Council against them in seizing upon them with armed bands of soldiers, and interrogating them against themselves, &c. where they have these words, ‘The faction of a traitorous party of officers of the army hath twice rebelled against the Parliament, and broke them in pieces, and by force of arms culled out whom they pleased, and imprisoned divers of them, and laid nothing to their charge; and have left only in a manner a few men (besides eleven of themselves, viz. the general Cromwell; Ireton, Harrison, Fleetwood, Rich, Inglosby, Haslerig, Constable, Fennick, Walton, and Allen, treasurer,) of their own faction behind them, that will, like spaniel dogs, serve their lusts and wills; yea, some of the chiefest of them, viz. Ireton, Harrison, &c. yea, Mr. Holland himself styled them a Mock-Parliament, a Mock-Power at Windsor; yea, it is yet their expressions at London.’”

“April 2, 1649. A Petition subscribed by divers persons in behalf of John Lilburne and his company, was presented to the Commons, wherein, amongst other things, are contained these three just demands:

“1. That no man be censured, condemned, or molested, but for the breach of some law first made and published to the people, whereby is avoided that uncertainty and hourly hazard that otherwise every man is subject to, both in respect of his estate, liberty and life.

“2. That every crime have not only its penalty annexed, but together therewith the manner and method of proceedings ascertained.

“3. That the execution of laws be referred to ordinary magistrates and officers by law deputed thereto, and that the military power be not used, but where the civil is so resisted, as that of its own strength it is deficient to enforce obedience.”

“About this time Mr. Robert Lockier, and five or six other troopers of captain Savage's troop, were condemned for a supposed mutiny; in behalf of whom lieut. col. John Lilburne writ this letter following to the General, dated April 27, 1649.

“May it please your Excellency: We have not yet forgot your solemn engagement of June 5, 1647, whereby the army's continuance as an army was in no wise by the will of the state, but by their own mutual Agreement: And if their standing were removed from one

'foundation to another, as is undeniable, then 'with the same they removed from one author-
'rity to another; and the ligaments and bonds
'of the first were dissolved, and gave place to 'the second; and under, and from the head 'of their first station, viz. By the will of the 'state, the army derived their government by 'martial law: which in judgment and reason
'could be no longer binding than the authority '(which gave being thereto) was binding to the 'army: For the denial of the authority, is an 'abrogation and nullment of all acts, orders or 'ordinaunces by that authority as to them:
'And upon this account your Excellency with
'the army, long proceeded upon the constitu'tion of a new council and government, con'trary to all martial law and discipline, by 'whom only the army engaged to be ordered 'in their prosecution of the ends; to wit, Their 'several rights, both as soldiers and com-
'moners, for which they associated; declaring,
'agreeing, and promising each other, not to 'disband, divide, or suffer themselves to be dis'banded or divided, without satisfaction and 'security in relation to their grievances and de'sires in behalf of themselves and the common'wealth, as should be agreed unto by their 'council of agitators: And by virtue and under 'colour of this establishment, all the extraordi'nary actions by your Excellency, your officers 'and the army have past: Your refusal to dis-
'band, disputing the orders of parliament:
'Impeachment and ejection of Eleven Mem'bers; your first and second march up to Lon'don; your late violent exclusion of the major 'part of members out of the house, and their 'imprisonment without cause, &c. which can 'no way be justified from the guilt of the 'highest Treason, but in the accomplishment 'of a righteous end, viz. the enjoyment of the 'benefit of our laws and liberties which we 'hoped long ere this to have enjoyed from 'your hands: Yet when we consider, and here'with compare many of your late carriages
'both towards the soldiery and other free peo'ple, and principally your cruel exercise of 'martial law, even to the sentence and execu'tion of death upon such of your soldiers as 'stand for the rights of that Engagement, &c.
'And not only so, but against others not of the 'army; we cannot but look upon your defec'tion and apostacy in such dealings, as of most 'dangerous consequence to all the laws and 'freedoms of the people.

" 'And therefore, although there had never 'been any such solemn Engagement by the 'army, as that of June 5, 1647, which with 'your Excellency in point of duty ought not to 'be of the meanest obligation. We do protest 'against your exercise of martial law, against 'any whomsoever, in times of peace; where 'all courts of justice are open, as the greatest
'encroachment upon our laws and liberties
'that can be acted against us, and particularly 'against the trial of the soldiers of captain Sa'vage's troop yesterday, by a court martial,
'upon the Articles of War, and sentencing of 'two of them to death, and for no other end,

'as we understand, but for some dispute about
'their pay: And the reason of this our Protes-'tation is from the Petition of Right, made in 'the third year of the late king, which declareth,
'That no person ought to be judged by law
'martial, except in times of war; and that 'all commissions given to execute martial law
'in time of peace, are contrary to the laws
'and statutes of the land.' And it was the 'Parliament's complaint; That martial law
'was then commanded to be executed upon 'soldiers for robbery, mutiny, or murder.
'Which Petition of Right this present parlia'ment in their late Declarations of the 9th of 'February, and the 17th of March, 1648, com'mend as the most excellentest law in Eng'land, and their promise to preserve inviolably
'it, and all other the fundamental laws and li'berties, concerning the preservation of the 'lives, properties, and liberties of the people, 'with all things incident thereunto. And the 'exercise of martial law in Ireland, in time of 'peace, was one of the chiefest articles for 'which the earl of Strafford lost his head: the 'same by this present parliament being judged
'High Treason. And the Parliament itself,
'neither by act nor ordinance, can justly or
'warrantably destroy the fundamental liberties
'and principles of the common law of Eng'land: It being a maxim in law and reason
'both, that all such acts or ordinances are ipso
'facto, null and void in law, and binds not all,
'but ought to be resisted and stood against to
'the death. And if the supreme authority
'may not presume to do this, much less may 'you, or your officers presume thereupon; For 'where remedy may be had by an ordinary 'course in law, the party grieved shall never 'have his recourse to extraordinaries. Whence
'it is evident, That it is the undoubted right
'of every Englishman, soldier or other, that he 'should be punishable only in the ordinary 'courts of justice, according to the laws and 'statutes of the realm in the times of peace, as 'now it is; and the extraordinary way by 'courts martial in no wise to be used.

'Yea, the parliament's oracle, Sir Edward
'Coke declares in the third part of his Institutes,
'chap. of Murder, That for a general or other 'officers of an army, in time of peace, to put any 'man although a Soldier, to death, by colour of 'Martial law, it is absolute murder in that gen'eral, &c. Therefore erecting of martial law now
'when all courts of justice are open, and stop'ping the free current of law, which sufficiently 'provides for the punishment of soldiers as well
'as others, as appears by 18 H. 2, c. 19. 2 & 3
'E. 6, c. 2. 4 and 5 P. and M. c. 3, and 5 El.
'and 5 Jam. 25, is an absolute destroying of our 'fundamental liberties, and the raising of the 'foundation of the common law of England;
'the which out of duty and conscience to the 'rights and freedoms of the nation (which we 'value above our lives), and to leave you and 'your council without all excuse, we were mo'ved to represent unto your excellency, cannot ly pressing you well to consider what you do, before you proceed to the taking away the lives of those men by martial law; lest the blood of the innocent (and so palpable subversion of the laws and liberties of England), bring the reward of just vengeance after it upon you, as it did upon the earl of Strafford: For innocent blood God will not pardon: and what the people may do (in case of such violent subversion of their rights) we shall leave to your excellency to judge; and remain, Sir, Your Excellency's humble Servants, ‘JOHN LILBURNE, RICH. OVERTON.

From our causeless, and unjust and ‘tyrannical Captivity in the Tower
‘of London, April 27, 1649.’

“Notwithstanding which letter, and much ther meaus made, the said Lockier was shot to death in Saint Paul's Church-yard the same day, to strike a terror and slavish fear into such their soldiers as shall dare to take notice of their approaching slavery; but his Christian and gallant deportment at his death, with the honourable funeral pomp accompanying him to his grave, turned all the terror of his tragedy into hatred and contempt of the authors thereof.”—(Walker, part ii, p. 161—4.)

“About this time some thousands of well-affected women of London, Westminster, Southwark, and the Hamlets, stormed the house of commons with two Petitions in behalf of John Lilburne and his company: They complain of the Council of State's violent and illegal proceedings against them, in seizing them in the night by soldiers; of Lockier's being shot to death by martial Law; of their arbitrary government, taxes, excise, monopolies, &c. That there was a design to fetch Lilburne and his fellow prisoners out of the Tower at midnight to White-hall, and there murder them; that the house by declaring the abettors of the book laid to those prisoners charge, Traitors, have laid a snare for people; when as hardly any discourse can be touching the affairs of the present times but falls within the compass of that book; so that all liberty of discourse is hereby utterly taken away, than which there can be no greater slavery.

“They received not so good answers to these petitions as they were wont to receive, when they had money, plate, rings, bodkins, and humbles to sacrifice to these legislative idols, they were bid ‘Go home and wash their dishes;’ to which some replied, ‘They had neither dishes nor meat left.’

“Note that the commons have returned answer to some petitioners, that Lilburne shall be equally tried by laws preceding the fact; and yet by their Order, 11 April, 1649, it is ordered, That the attorney general be required to take speedy course for prosecution of lieutenant John Lilburne, &c. in the Upper Bench this term, upon the declaration of this house, touching the book, entitled, “The second part of England's new chains discovered.” If this order be not a law, and preceding the fact too, then our supreme saints have told a legislative lie.”—(Ibid, p. 165, 166.)

“May 6, 1649. The honest Levellers of the Army (for that is the nick-name which Cromwell falsely and unchristianly hath christened them withal) enemies to arbitrary government, tyranny and oppression, whether they find it in the government of one or many? whether in a council of officers, a council of state, or a fag end of a house of commons? whether it vail itself with the title of a supreme authority, or a legislative power?) drew together to a rendezvous about Banbury in Oxfordshire, to the number of 4,000 or 5,000, others resorting to them daily from other parts. This gave an alarm to our grandees, fearing the downfall of their domination. Cromwell (not knowing what party to draw out against them, that would be stedfast to him) shunned the danger, and put his property the general upon it to oppose the rendezvous, and (looking as wan as the gulls of a sick turkey-cock) marched forth himself Westward, to intercept such as drew to the rendezvous. In the mean time the said Levellers printed and published this ensuing Paper, entitled,

ENGLAND'S STANDARD ADVANCED:

Or, A Declaration from Mr. William Thomson, and the oppressed People of this Nation, now under his conduct in Oxfordshire.
Dated at their Rendezvous, May 6, 1649.

“Whereas it is notorious to the whole world, that neither the faith of the parliament, nor yet the faith of the army formerly made to the people of this nation in behalf of their common right, freedom, and safety, hath been at all observed, or made good, but both absolutely declined and broken, and the people only served with bare words and fair promising papers, and left utterly destitute of all help or delivery: and that this hath principally been by the prevalency and treachery of some eminent persons, now domineering over the people, is most evident. The solemn Engagement of the army at New-market and Triplo-heaths by them destroyed, the Council of Agitators dissolved, the blood of war shed in time of peace, petitioners for common freedom suppressed by force of arms, and petitioners abused and terrified, the lawful trial by 12 sworn men of the neighbourhood subverted and denied, bloody and tyrannical courts, called an High Court of Justice, and a Council of State, erected, the power of the sword advanced and set in the seat of the magistrates, the civil laws stopt and subverted, and the military introduced, even to the hostile seizure, imprisonment, trial, sentence, and execution of death, upon divers of the free people of this nation; leaving no visible authority, devolving all into a factious Juncto and Council of State, usurping and assuming the name, stamp, and authority of Parliament, to oppress, torment and vex the people, whereby all the lives, liberties and estates, are all subdued to the wills of those men, no law, no justice, no right or freedom, no ease of grievances, no removal of unjust barbarous taxes, no regard to the cries and groans of the poor to be had, while utter beggary and famine, like a mighty torrent, hath broken in upon us, and already seized upon several parts of the nation.

"Wherefore through an unavoidable necessity, no other means left under heaven, we are enforced to betake ourselves to the law of nature, to defend and preserve ourselves and native rights, and therefore are resolved as one man (even to the hazard and expence of our lives and fortunes) to endeavour the redemption of the magistracy of England, from under the force of the sword, to vindicate the Petition of Right, to set the unjustly imprisoned free, to relieve the poor, and settle this commonwealth, upon the grounds of common right, freedom, and safety.

"Be it therefore known to all the free people of England, and to the whole world, that (chusing rather to die for freedom, than live as slaves) we are gathered and associated together upon the bare account of Englishmen, with our swords in our hands to redeem ourselves and the land of our nativity, from slavery and oppression, to avenge the blood of war shed in the time of peace, to have justice for the blood of Mr. Arnold, shot to death at Ware, and for the blood of Mr. Robert Lockier, and divers others who of late by martial law were murdered at London.

"And upon this our engagement in behalf of the commonwealth, we do solemnly agree and protest, that we will faithfully, laying all self-respects aside, endeavour the actual relief and settlement of this distressed nation.

"And that all the world may know particularly what we intend, and wherein particularly to centre and acquiesce for ever, not to recede or exceed the least punctilio. We do declare from the integrity of our hearts, that by the help and might of God we will endeavour the absolute settlement of this distracted nation, upon that form and method by way of an Agreement of the People, tendered as a peace-offering by lieut. col. John Lilburne, Mr. William Walwyn, Mr. Tho. Prince, and Mr. Richard Overton, bearing date May 1, 1649, the which we have annexed to this our Declaration as the standard of our engagement, thereby owning every part and particular of the premises of the Agreement, promising and resolving to the utmost hazard of our lives and abilities to pursue the speedy and full accomplishment thereof, and to our power, to protect and defend all such as shall assent or adhere thereunto; and particularly, for the preservation and deliverance of lieut. col. John Lilburne, Mr. William Walwyn, Mr. Tho. Prince, Mr. Richard Overton, capt. Bray, and Mr. William Sawyer, from their barbarous and illegal imprisonments: And we declare, that if a hair of their heads perish in the hands of those tyrants that restrain them, that if God shall enable us, we will avenge it seventy times seven-fold upon the heads of the tyrants themselves, and their creatures.

"And that till such time as by God's assistance we have procured to this nation the declared purpose of this our engagement, we will not divide nor disband, nor suffer ourselves to be divided or disbanded, resolving with sobriety and civility to behave ourselves to the country, to wrong or abuse no man, to protect all to our power from violence and oppression in all places where we come; resolving to stop the payment of all taxes or assessments whatsoever, as of excise, tythes, and the tax of 90,000*l. per annum*.

"And having once obtained a new representative, according to the said Agreement, upon such terms and limitations therein expressed: we shall then freely lay down our arms, and return to our several habitations and callings.

"And concerning the equity, necessity, and justice of our undertaking, we appeal to the judgment of the oppressed betwixt their destroyers and us; whether by the law of God, of nature, and nations, it be not equally justifiable in us to engage for the safety and deliverance of this nation, as it was with the Netherlanders, and other people for theirs, and upon the same principles that the army engaged at Newmarket and Triploe-heaths; both parliament and army declaring, That it is no resistance of magistracy to side with just principles, and law of nature and nations: and that the soldiery may lawfully hold the hands of that general who will turn his cannon against his army, on purpose to destroy them; the seamen the hands of that pilot, who wilfully runs his ship upon a rock. And therefore (the condition of this commonwealth considered) we cannot see how it can be otherwise esteemed in us. And upon that account we declare, that we do own, and are resolved to own all such persons, either of the army or countries, that have already, or shall hereafter rise up and stand for the liberties of England, according to the said Agreement of the People: and in particular, we do own and avow the late proceedings in col. Scroop's, col. Harrison's, and major gen. Skippon's regiments, declared in their Resolutions published in print; as one man, resolving to live and die with them, in their and our just and mutual defence.

"And we do implore and invite all such as have any sense of the bonds and miseries upon the people; any bowels of compassion in them, any piety, justice, honour, or courage in their breasts, any affections to the freedoms of England, any love to his neighbour or native country, to rise up, and come in to help a distressed miserable nation, to break the bonds of cruelty, tyranny and oppression, and set the people free.

"In which service, trusting to the undoubted goodness of a just and righteous cause, we shall faithfully discharge the utmost of our endeavours; not sparing the venture of all hart ships and hazards whatsoever, and leave the success to God.

"Signed by me WILLIAM THOMPSON, at our Rendezvous in Oxfordshire near Banbury, in behalf of myself, and the rest engaged with me, May 6, 1649, for a new parliament; by the Agreement of the People."

"John Lilburne being ordered a close prisoner in the Tower by the commons, without pen, ink, or paper (which was tyranny under king Charles, but not under king Oliver) a Petition was presented to the commons by many well-affected, that John might have the allowance usually and legally due to prisoners in the like case for his support; which was rejected, inasmuch that John was kept three whole days with one half meal's meat; this is to condemn men unheard to be murdered by famine in their private slaughter-houses, when they cannot, or dare not murder them in their pretended courts of judicature, or public shambles: yet afterwards, when the drawing together of the Levellers and Discontents of Newcastle affrighted the commons, they voted him the short allowance of 20s. a week.

"John Lilburne being a close prisoner in the Tower, as hath been said, Hugh Peters, chaplain in ordinary to two great potentates, Lucifer and Oliver, came about dinner-time (May 25, 1649,) to visit him; and though admittance be denied to other men, yet to him the gates flew open: as sure as St. Peter keeps the keys of heaven, Hugh Peters keeps the keys of our hell and our grandees consciences, and openeth and shutteth at pleasure: he is confessor at Tyburn, and hath a great power over damned spirits, or rather over such spirits, as not submitting basely to the tyranny of our State-Mountebanks, incur their condemnation in this world, by God's permission, in order to their salvation in the next world; the tyranny of these usurpers implying at once, their cruelties over our bodies, and God's mercy to our souls. Hugh's first salute was, That he came merely to give John a visit, without any design (his guilty conscience prompting him to a voluntary apology.) John answered, I know you well enough, you are one of the setting dogs of the great men of the army, with fair and plausible pretences to insinuate into men, when they have done them wrong, and to work out their designs when they are in a strait, and cover over the blots that they have made. Then John complained of the *illegal and violent seizing upon him by soldiers, and carrying him

* Compare this act of the king's, with the violent act of those traitors and tyrants, Fairfax and his council of war, in imprisoning and secluding above 200 members at once without cause shewn, and leaving only 40 or 50 of their cheating faction in the house to carry on their bloody anarchical designs; some of which secured members with barbarous usage were almost brought to death, and their murder since attempted by soldiers.

before that new erected thing, called "A Council of State," who committed him without any accuser, accusation, prosecutor or witness, or any due process of law; and yet when the king impeached the five members, and preferred a charge of high-treason against them; (Recorded 1 Par. Book of Decl. p. 35,) and only failed in a single punctilio of due process of law, they cried out, it was an invasion of the people's liberties; so that four or five recantations from him, recorded in their own declarations, would not serve his turn. Peters, half out of countenance, if so prostituted a villain that practises impudence amongst common whores, and whose pulpit is more shameful than another man's pillory, can be out of countenance, takes up one of Coke's Institutions, and professed Lilburne was merely gulled in reading or trusting to those books, for there were no laws in England. John answered, he did believe him, for that his great masters, Cromwell, Fairfax, &c. had destroyed them all. Nay, quoth Hugh, there never were any in England; with that John shewed him the Petition of Right, asking him, whether that were law? which Peters had the impudence to deny, asking, what law was? John replied *out of the parliament's own declarations, The law is that which puts a difference between good and evil; just and unjust: If you take away the law, all things will fall into confusion, every man will become a law unto himself, which in the depraved condition of human nature must needs produce great enormities; Lust will become a law, envy a law, covetousness and ambition will become laws; and what dictates, what decisions such laws will produce may easily be discerned. This, Mr. Peters, is a definition of law by the parliament in the days of their primitive purity, before they had corrupted themselves with the commonwealth's money. And elsewhere the law is called, The safeguard, the custody of all private interests, your honours, lives, liberties, and estates, are all in the keeping of the law, without this every man hath a like right to any thing; It is the best birth-right the subject hath; it is a miserable servitude or bondage where the law is uncertain, or unknown. To this the comic priest replied, I tell you, for all this, there is no law in this nation but the sword, and what it gives; neither was there any law or government in the world, but what the sword gave.† To this the honest lieutenant colonel answered, Mr. Peters, you are one of the guides of the army, used by the chief leaders to trumpet their principles and tenets; and if your reasoning be good, then if six thieves meet three or four honest men and rob them, that act is righteous, because they are the stronger party. And if any power be a just power that is uppermost, I wonder how the army and parliament can acquit themselves of being rebels and traitors before God and man, in resisting and fighting against a just power in the king, who was a power up and visible, fenced about with abundance of laws, so reputed in the common acceptance of men: by the express letter of which all those that fought against him are, ipso facto, traitors; and if it were not for the preservation of our laws, and liberties, why did the parliament fight against him, a present power in being? and if there be no laws in England, nor never was, then you and your great masters, Cromwell, Fairfax, and the parliament, are a pack of bloody rogues and villains, to set the people to murder one another, in fighting for preservation of their laws, in which their liberties were included, which was the principal declared cause of the war from the beginning to the end. I thought (quoth the lieutenant colonel) I had been safe when I made the known laws the rules of my actions, which you have all sworn and declared to defend and make as the standard and touchstone between you and the people. I but (replied Hugh) I will shew that your safety lies not therein, their minds may change, and then where are you? I but (quoth the lieutenant colonel) I cannot take notice of what is in their minds to obey that; but the constant declaration of their minds, never contradicted in any of their declarations, as, that they will maintain the Petition of Right, and laws of the land, &c. This was the substance of their discourse, saying that John pinched upon his great masters large fingering of the common-wealth's money, calling it, theft and state-robbery, and saying, That Cromwell and Ireton pissed both in one quill, though they seem sometime to go one against another, yet it is but that they may the more easily carry on their main design, to enslave the people." (Ibid. p. 179—183.)

* The law is now taken away, and all things in confusion by turning out monarchy, without our consent, into a Free-State of slaves governed by tyrants.

† This doctrine of devils, that it is lawful to submit to any present power that is strongest, is broached in a pamphlet by old Rowse the illiterate Jew of Eton college. And by John Goodwin the sophistical divine; which is fully confuted in "A Religious Demurrer concerning Submission to the present Power;" an excellent piece.

This relation is certainly curious, and may serve to illustrate the characters of Lilburne, Peters, and Walker himself, though it would be rash to vouch for the entire exact authenticity of it. It may be observed, that Hume, in quoting Walker as authority for the incredible and absurd computation,* 'that the Parliament had in the first five years of the civil war levied on the people of England † the amount of forty millions;' (which computation however seems, Mr. Hume admits, much too large,) 'yet were loaded with debts and imbrances,' says (ch. 49, note l.) that "Walker is an author of spirit and ingenuity, and being a zealous parliamentarian, his authority is good." But in truth Walker is a most passionate party writer, on whom but very little reliance can be safely placed. Mr. Hume omits to mention that when he wrote he had been secloded, and was become violently disgusted and exasperated against the parliament. That he would publish an assertion, which was not only false, but notoriously false, and the disproof of which was upon record, may be seen in the account of the treatment of king Charles during the interval between sentence and execution, ante.—In respect of candour, perhaps the best commendation which can be given of him, is that his extravagant vehemence and gross scurrility present sufficient warning to every impartial reader, against trusting to his representations.

Lord Clarendon, speaking of Cromwell and his first Parliament, says, that "A considerable part of the members utterly refused to sign the engagement," [of Fidelity to the Protector and against proposing or consenting to any alteration of the government,] "and called it a violation of the privilege of parliament, and an absolute depriving them of that freedom which was essential to it. So they were excluded, and restrained from entering into the house: and they who did subscribe it, and had thereupon liberty to sit there, were yet so refractory to any proposition that might settle him in the government in the manner he desired it, that, after the five months near spent in wrangling, and useless discourses (during which he was not to attempt the dissolution of them, by his instrument of government) he took the first opportunity to dissolve them; and upon the 22nd of January, with some reproaches, he let them know he could do the business without them; and so dismissed them with much evidence of his displeasure: and they again retired to their habitations, resolved to wait another opportunity of revenge, and in the mean time to give no evidence of their submitting to his usurpation, by undertaking any employment or office under his authority, he as carefully endeavouring and watching to find such an advantage against them, as might make them liable to the penalty of the laws. Yet even his weakness and impotency upon such a notorious advantage, appeared in two very notable instances, which happened about that time, in the case of two persons, whose names were then much taken notice of upon the stage of affairs, John Wildman, and John Lilburne.

"The former had been bred a scholar in the university of Cambridge; and being young, and of a pregnant wit, in the beginning of the rebellion meant to make his fortune in the war; and chose to depend upon Cromwell's countenance and advice, when he was not above the degree of a captain of a troop of horse himself, and was much esteemed and valued by him, and made an officer; and was so active in coun-

triving and fomenting jealousies and discontents, and so dextrous in composing, or improving any disgusts, and so inspired with the spirit of praying and preaching, when those gifts came into request, and became thriving arts, that about the time when the king was taken from Holmby, and it was necessary that the army should enter into contests with the parliament, John Wildman grew to be one of the principal agitators, and was most relied upon by Cromwell to infuse those things into the minds of the soldiers, and to conduct them in the managery of their discontents, as might most advance those designs he then had; and quickly got the reputation of a man of parts; and having a smooth pen, drew many of the papers which first kindled the fire between the parliament and the army, that was not afterwards extinguished but in the ruin of both. His reputation in those faculties made him quit the army; where he was become a major; and where he kept still a great interest, and betook himself to civil affairs, in the solicitation of suits depending in the parliament, or before committees; where he had much credit with those who had most power to do right or wrong, and so made himself necessary to those who had need of such protection from the tyranny of the time. By these arts he thrived, and got much more than he could have done in the army, and kept, and increased his credit there, by the interest he had in other places. When Cromwell declined the ways of establishing the commonwealth, Wildman, amongst the rest, forsook him; and entered, warily, into any counsels which were like to destroy him: and upon the dissolution of this last parliament, having less of phlegm, and so less patience than other men, to expect another opportunity, and in the mean time to leave him to establish his greatness, he did believe he should be able to make such a schism in the army, as would give an opportunity to other enraged persons to take vengeance upon him.

"Cromwell knew the man, and his undermining faculties; knew he had some design in hand, but could not make any such discovery as might warrant a public prosecution; but appointed some trusty spies (of which he had plenty) to watch him very narrowly, and, by being often with him, to find his papers; the spreading whereof, he knew, would be the preamble to any conspiracy of his. Shortly after the dissolution of that parliament, these instruments of Cromwell's surprised him in a room, where he thought he had been safe enough, as he was writing a declaration; and seized upon the papers; the title whereof was, 'a Declaration, containing the reasons and motives which oblige us to take up arms against Oliver Cromwell;' and though it was not finished, yet in that that was done, there was all venom imaginable expressed against him, and a large and bitter narration of all his foul breach of trust, and perjuries, enough to have exposed any man to the severest judgment of that time; and as much as he could wish to discover against him, or any man whom he most desired to destroy. The issue was, the man was straightly imprisoned, and preparations made for his trial, and towards his execution, which all men expected. But, whether Cromwell found that there were more engaged with him than could be brought to justice, or were fit to be discovered (as many men believed) or that Wildman obliged himself for the time to come not only to be quiet, but to be a spy for him upon others (as others at that time suspected, and had reason for it afterwards) after a short time of imprisonment, the man was restored to his liberty; and resorted, with the same success and reputation, to his former course of life; in which he thrived very notably.

"The case of John Lilburne was much more wonderful, and administered more occasion of discourse and observation. This man, before the troubles, was a poor book-binder; and for procuring some seditious pamphlets against the church and state to be printed and dispersed, had been severely censured in the Star-Chamber, and received a sharp castigation, which made him more obstinate and malicious against them; and, as he afterwards confessed, in the melancholy of his imprisonment, and by reading the book of Martyrs, he raised in himself a marvellous inclination and appetite to suffer in the defence or for the vindication of any oppressed truth; and found himself very much confirmed in that spirit; and in that time diligently collected, and read all those libels and books, which had anciently, as well as lately, been written against the church: from whence, with the venom, he had likewise contracted the impudence and bitterness of their style; and by practice, brought himself to the faculty of writing like them: and so, when that licence broke in of printing all that malice and wit could suggest, he published some pamphlets in his own name, full of that confidence and virulency, which might asperse the government most to the sense of the people, and to their humour. When the war begun, he put himself into the army; and was taken prisoner by the king's forces in that engagement at Brentford, shortly after the battle of Edge-hill; and being then a man much known, and talked of for his qualities abovementioned, he was not so well treated in prison as was like to reconcile him; and being brought before the chief justice, to be tried for treason by a commission of Oyer and Terminer (in which method the king intended then to have proceeded against the rebels which should be taken) he behaved himself with so great impudence, in extolling the power of the parliament, that it was manifest he had an ambition to have been made a martyr for that cause. But as he was liberally supplied from his friends at London (and the parliament in express terms declared, 'that they would inflict punishment upon the prisoners they had of the king's party, in the same manner as Lilburne and the rest should suffer at Oxford') so he did find means to corrupt the marshal who had the custody of him; and made his escape into the parliament quarters; where he was received with public joy, as a champion that had defied the king in his own court.

"From this time he was entertained by Cromwell with great familiarity, and, in his contests with the parliament, was of much use to him, and privacy with him. But he begun then to find him of so restless and unruly a spirit, and to make those advances in religion against the Presbyterians before he thought it seasonable, that he dispensed with his presence in the army, where he was an officer of name, and made him reside in London, where he wished that temper should be improved. And when the parliament was so much offended with his seditious humour, and the pamphlets he published every day in religion, with reflections upon their proceedings, that they resolved to prosecute him with great rigour (towards which the assembly of divines, which he had likewise provoked, contributed their desire, and demand) Cromwell writ a very passionate letter to the parliament, 'that they would not so much discourage their army, that was fighting for them, as to censure an officer of it for his opinion in point of conscience; for the liberty whereof, and to free themselves from the shackles in which the bishops would enslave them, that army had been principally raised.' Upon which, all farther prosecution against Lilburne was declined at that time, though he declined not the farther provocation; and continued to make the proceedings of the parliament as odious as he could. But from the time that Cromwell had dispersed that parliament, and was in effect in possession of the sovereign power, Lilburne withdrew his favour for him; and thought him now an enemy worthy of his displeasure; and, both in discourses and writings, in pamphlets and invectives, loaded him with all the aspersions of hypocrisy, lying, and tyranny, and all other imputations and reproaches which either he deserved, or the malice or bitterness of the other's nature could suggest to him, to make him the most universally odious that a faithless perjured person could be.

"Cromwell could bear ill language and reproaches with less disturbance, and concernment, than any person in authority had ever done: yet the prosecution this man exercised him with, made him plainly discern that it would be impossible to preserve his dignity, or to have any security in the government, whilst his licence continued; and therefore, after he had set spies upon him to observe his actions, and collect his words, and upon advice with the council at law of the state, was confidently informed, 'that, as well by the old established laws, as by new ordinances, Lilburne was guilty of high treason, and had forfeited his life, if he were prosecuted in any court of justice,' he caused him to be sent to Newgate, and at the next sessions to be indicted of high treason: all the judges being present, and the council at law to enforce the evidence, and all care being taken for the return of such a jury as might be fit for the importance of the case, Lilburne appeared undaunted, and with the confidence of a man that was to play a prize before the people for their own liberty; he pleaded Not-guilty, and heard all the charge and evidence against him with patience enough, save that, by interrupting the lawyers, sometimes, who prosecuted him, and by sharp answers to some questions of the judges, he shewed that he had no reverence for their persons, nor any submission to their authority. The whole day was spent in his trial; and when he came to make his defence, he mingled so much law in his discourse to invalidate their authority, and to make it appear so tyrannical, that neither their lives, liberties, nor estates were in any degree secure, whilst that usurpation was exercised; and answered all the matters objected against him with such an assurance, making them 'to contain nothing of high treason, and that to be a government against which high treason could not be committed;' and telling them 'that all true born Englishmen were obliged to oppose this tyranny, as he had done purely for their sakes, and that he had done it only for their sakes, and to preserve them from being slaves, contrary to his own profit and worldly interest:' he told them 'how much he had been in Cromwell's friendship: that he might have received any benefit, or preferment from him, if he would have sat still, and seen his country enslaved; which because he would not do, he was brought hither to have his life taken from him by their judgment; which he apprehended not:' he defended himself with that vigour, and charmed the jury so powerfully, that, against all the direction and charge the judges could give them (who assured them 'that the words and actions fully proved against the prisoner, were high treason by the law; and that they were bound, by all the obligation of conscience, to find him guilty') after no long consultation between themselves, they returned with their verdict, 'that he was Not-guilty:' nor could they be persuaded by the judges to change or recede from their verdict: which infinitely enraged and perplexed Cromwell; who looked upon it as a greater defeat than the loss of a battle would have been. And though Lilburne was thus acquitted in the year 1653, yet Cromwell would never suffer him to be set at liberty, as by the law he ought to have been, but sent him from prison to prison, and kept him enclosed there till he himself died. The two instances of persons not otherwise considerable, are thought pertinent to be inserted, as an evidence of the temper of the nation; and how far the spirits of that time were from paying a submission to that power, when no body had the courage to lift up their hands against it."

To the printed Account of the above Trial, published [with this Certificate: 'At the earnest desire of the Printer, I have read this following Discourse, and cannot say but that I do verily believe, the penman of it hath done it with a very indifferent hand betwixt the Court, and myself the Prisoner: And so far as in me lies, I am for my part willing the world should see it. JOHN LILBURNE. Southwark, this 28th of November, 1649.] almost immediately after the Trial, was added the following APPENDIX, containing a relation of some things which had passed just before the Trial came on.

THE INNOCENT MAN'S FIRST PROFFER;

OR,

the Proposition of Lt. Col. JOHN LILBURNE, Prerogative Prisoner in the Tower of London, made unto his present Adversaries, and to the whole Nation of England, October 20, 1649.

For WILLIAM HEVENINGHAM, Esq. of Heveningham, in Suffolk, these present;

Honoured Sir; Having sometimes the opportunity to discourse with you, there appeared that in you unto me, that gives me encouragement to pick you out above all men that now remain sitting in your House, to write a few lines unto, in as moderate a way, as my condition and provocations will permit me; I have now within very few days been seven months a prisoner, the legality or illegality of which I shall not now discourse, having already of late said so much in my own Defence* grounded upon the law, your own Declarations, and the Army's; which with other things, it seems, hath occasioned your house to pass a special Commission of Oyer and Terminer, to try me, which whether such a Special Commission, made by never so unquestionable authority, be not contrary to the Petition of Right (which you have so often sworn, and particularly declared to maintain inviolably) I shall for brevity sake not now dispute; only give me leave (and I hope without any offence) to put you in mind of that excellent and printed Argument (in "Speeches and Passages of Parliament, 1640-41," p. 409, 410, 411, to 417) of Mr. Hyde's, your quondam fellow member, before the Lords in Parliament, is the then mouth of the Commons House, in April 1641, upon the Special Commission of Oyer and Terminer, that was exercised in the five Northern counties at York, in which Argument, besides many excellent and observable Passages about the midst of it, he interrogates and saith: 'What hath the good Northern people done, that they only must be disfranchised of all their privileges by Magna Charta and the Petition of Right; for to what purpose serve these Statutes, if they may be fined and imprisoned without law, according to the 'discretion of the said Commissioners of Special Oyer and Terminer; what have they done, that they and they alone, of all the people of this (then) happy island, must be disinherited of their birthright, of their inheritance?'—I shall at present make no application for myself, only I shall add a few more of his lines towards the conclusion of his Argument, in page 415, which I hope cannot be offensive, being spoken by him that was so eminently authorized thereunto, where he saith to the lords: 'Truly, my Lords, these vexed, worn people of the North, are not suitors to your lordships, to regulate this Court (of Oyer and Terminer) or to reform the Judges of it, but for extirpating these Judges, and utterly abolishing this Court: They are of Cato's mind, who would not submit to Caesar for his life, saying, he would not be beholden to a Tyrant for injustice; for it was injustice in him to take upon him to save a man's life, over whom he had no power:' which Court of special Oyer and Terminer, was absolutely and totally abolished, by that excellent Act that abolished the Star Chamber, being the 17th of the late king, A. D. 1641.

But, Sir, if it shall be objected against me, that you are necessitated to take such an extraordinary course with me, as a Special Commission of Oyer and Terminer is, because I will not own your authority; yes, and if you so continue to deal with me as you dealt with the late king; unto which at present I answer, first, the King's Case and mine is different; for he refused to answer to his Charge, principally out of this consideration, because he had inherited in him an old received principle (as appears in his Answer to the Petition of Right, anno 1627, and in many of his Declarations made since the beginning of the late Wars, and by his Speeches at his death; by virtue of which, he judged himself as not liable or capable of being judged by any power on earth, but only by God alone, and as being in any sense not in the least for any action he did, (though in itself never so vile) subject to the punishing part of the law.

Now for my part, I do not in the least refuse to be tried out of that consideration, for I acknowledge myself but a bare Englishman, subject to the laws thereof, as well in the penal, as in the directive part of them; unto the ordinary rule of which, with all my heart, I am willing to stoop, and I wish my adversaries would do the same, and then I believe the controversy would not long last betwixt us.—But seeing, betwixt my adversaries and myself, there is a difference about the legality and justness of Power, which in some late printed Papers and popular Discourses, is made use of against me, as though I had a self conviction in mine own conscience, of my own guilt, and therefore do avoid, as much as in me lies, a trial.

To take off which, and to lay myself and my adversaries nakedly, and fully open to the judgment and censure of all ingenuous and rational men in England, I do hereby under my hand and seal (for that end it may be shewed to your House) proffer you, beside what I lately proffered Mr. Prideaux, which is contained in the 18th and 19th pages of the substance of that Discourse now in print, and here inclosed, that I am willing and ready, if they please, to chuse one of your own twelve Judges, that sit in one of the three Public Courts at Westminster, and all or any of my adversaries shall chuse which of the eleven remaining they please, and I will freely and voluntarily oblige and bind myself under my hand and seal, before Witnesses, to stand to their final and absolute determination, (upon the principles of law,) for all differences betwixt them, or any of them and me, although it reach to banishment, loss of estate, limb or life; so my adversaries will do the like.

Provided the hearing may be open, public, and free, indifferently for both parties, and that the Judges give their Judgment in writing under their hands, with their reasons for their so doing, to every point of their Judgment. And provided I may for my own benefit, use, or advantage, choose two friends freely to take, as well as their pens will enable them, all that passeth pro and con, without danger to their persons, liberties or estates; or without hazard of having their Papers (by force or authority) taken from them, and this I think is as fair as any rational man under heaven can desire, and which I cannot believe, you can judge to the contrary; especially considering it is so consonant, to that righteous rule of the Son of God, Jesus Christ, contained in the Scripture, (the Volume of Truth) viz. 'to do as you would be done to,' which is the sum of both the law and gospel, and of all righteousness amongst men.

And I hope this is as fair, that those that most thirst after my blood, cannot, nor will not, refuse it; but to make it more fair, if they judge it inconvenient to fix upon two of your own Judges, who in interest are positively engaged against me, I will be content they shall chuse one Scholar, commonly called a Clergyman, and I will chuse another; or a Citizen or a Country-man, which they please, and I will do the like.

So with my humble service presented to you, craving pardon for my boldness in troubling you, with whom I have had so little face to face acquaintance, earnestly intreating your utmost interest, speedily in acquainting your house herewith, in the most public manner you can: I commend you to the Lord my God, my Protector and Preserver, and rest yours (desirous particularly to be engaged yours to serve you)

The POSTSCRIPT to the Reader.

Since I sent the foregoing Epistle, I understand that Wednesday next, being the 24th of

Oct. 1649, is positively resolved by my Adversaries to be the day of my Trial; and therefore I cannot choose but publish this in print; and because a late Pamphlet-scribbler, and pretended Vindicator of sir Arthur Haslerig, said to be Mr. Thomas May the Council of State's pensioner, renders me in his late take and lying book to be an Atheist, a denier of God and the Scripture, and given up to licentiousness, and an absolute confederate with Prince Charles, to set up his absolute will and prerogative in this nation: And therefore not knowing whether my life will be mine so long till I am able to publish a Vindication at large, against his base calumniation, I shall desire you to take this at present, and if I die before more come, let the constant series of my Actions and Writings be my future testators, That if to believe constantly all that is contained in the Law and the Gospel, and to have confident hope of the Resurrection of the Dead, and the Life to Come, and particularly of my own, and to live conscientiously in all good conscience, as in the sight of that God that searcheth and knoweth the hearts of all the sons of men, both before God and men, be sufficient cause to be judged an Atheist, then I am one; and if to oppose with all my might and strength all interests whatsoever that would set up a single man or more, to rule and govern by will and pleasure, without bounds, limits, check or controul, be sufficient cause to be judged a Cavalier, and for Prince Charles, then must I ingenuously confess I am such a Cavalier, and I hope so to die; for which I bless God, I am ready and fitted, let it be by what butcherly hands it will.

JOHN LILBURNE.

The second thing in order, is his Brother's and his Wife's Petition; the Copy of which thus followeth:

To the right honourable the Supreme Authority of this Nation, the Commons of England in Parliament assembled: The humble PETITION of Col. Robert Lilburne, and Elizabeth Lilburne, in the behalf of lieut. col. John Lilburne, Prisoner in the Tower of London.

Sheweth: That although lieut. col. John Lilburne, your Petitioner's Brother and Husband, by his late actions hath incurred the displeasure of this honourable house; yet since God hath so ordered human affairs, that it is incident to his people, though of real integrity, and of hearty desires of good to the nation, to differ about the means, times, and seasons requisite for the accomplishing thereof, we hope your wisdoms will put the most favourable interpretations to such differences, and not to attribute them to any evil intention or design, but an over-earnest longing for such a perfect settlement of this commonwealth, which time only, and further opportunity can afford us.

We humbly conceive, he hath formerly given sufficient proof of his faith and fidelity to his country, by his former sufferings, both before this Parliament, when he bore testimony against

Regal and Episcopal tyranny, and since also, in the frequent exposing his life to the utmost of dangers in your service, in all which, he did manifest, that the temptations of this world were not able to shake his integrity, and that for the enjoyment of any outward emoluments, he would not forsake the dictates of his own conscience; and though we could heartily wish he had forborn those things which have drawn upon him his late sufferings, yet are we well assured, and that upon the nearest and strictest scrutiny we can make into his heart, that no indirect ends or worldly allurements, have engaged him therein; a manifest argument whereof, we humbly conceive to be, for that neither the urgency of his necessities, which have been very great, and which are usually very persuasive to men not guided by conscience; nor yet the importunity of dear friends, which have not been wanting, and yet not any whit restrained heretofore; and therefore we hope this honourable house will distinguish betwixt weakness and design, and think of some way of moderation towards such, as instigation of conscience and error of judgment, have brought into your displeasure.

And though the obligation of our particular relations, cannot but move us to this Address on his behalf; yet we humbly conceive, it will not only occasion much sadness to many of your friends, but much more joy to the common enemy to see his ruin: Yet considering his principles are a burthen to this state,

We do therefore most humbly present our assurance and confidence of his purpose, to withdraw himself into some foreign country, desiring he may have his money, which is necessary to his and his family's subsistence in their transplantation, and convenient time to prepare himself to go, and he will wholly betake himself to his particular duty and calling, and that those of his judgment who are free to go along with him, and have arrears due to them from the Parliament, may have their arrears paid unto them, and be permitted accordingly to transplant themselves, humbly imploring this honourable House to take the premises into speedy and serious consideration, and laying all his former merits, faithful services, persecutions, stripes, bonds and imprisonments, with hazard of life, and loss of estate, in opposition to Regal and Episcopal Tyranny in balance to his late miscarriages, to do therein (out of your wonted mercy and clemency) as may be most for the glory of God, frustrating the longing desires of the common enemy to see his ruin, rejoicing and satisfying the spirits of many of your friends; and for answering the humble and most earnest request of your Petitioners, whereby they shall be for ever engaged to pray, &c.

ROB. LILBURNE.
ELIZ. LILBURNE.

This was delivered October 22, 1649, but was altogether fruitless; the next thing in order thus followeth:

VOL. IV.

THE INNOCENT MAN'S SECOND PROFFER :

Made unto his present adversaries, Oct. 22, 1649, and communicated unto them, by his loving brother col. Robert Lilburne.

Brother; In answer to your late Letter, I can make no other proposition, besides what is in my letter to Mr. Heveningham of the 20th present, than this; That seeing myself, and the principles I profess, are a burthen to the men in present power, therefore (for peace and quietness sake only), I will engage (enjoying my money and my immediate liberty), that I will within 6 months time transplant myself into some part of the West Indies; provided, that all those that are free and willing to go along with me of what quality soever, may have free liberty at their pleasure to go, and provided, seeing many of those I know willing to undertake the journey, are made very poor by reason of their sufferings in the present distractions, may have all such monies justly paid unto them, as is owing them, either upon arrears, for faithful service already done, or for monies lent to the public, that so they may be the better enabled for their journey, they engaged thereupon to go; and provided, that other that are willing to go, and are so very poor, that they cannot transplant themselves, may have from the public some reasonable allowance for that end, this being the land of their nativity, where by the law of nature, they may challenge a subsistence; and therefore it is but just, seeing their company and principles are a burthen and trouble to the men in present power, that they should make their willingness (for peace-sake), able to transport themselves into a desert, where, with industry, and the blessing of God thereupon, they may expect a livelihood, and this, with the engagement of the present power, for a peaceable protection while we stay here in England, and for their assistance for a reasonable convoy in some part of our journey, I will engage in security, I will not act against their power, during my stay in England, directly or indirectly; but for me to engage singly to go alone, seeing I know no plantation already planted; but I would sooner chuse, to be cut in pieces in England, than engage to go to it: therefore particularly I shall not engage, without terms abovesaid, come life, come death, to which I shall stand: witness my hand, Tower, Oct. 22, 1649. JOHN LILBURNE.

This was sent to col. Rob. Lilburne, who shewed it to several Parliament men, but all in vain, for nothing would serve their turn but his blood. The next in order, is that notable Petition of his whalebone friends, already in print; the copy of which, for its worth, I judge fit here to insert, which thus followeth:

To the Commons of England, assembled in Parliament: The humble Petition of the Well-affected, in and about the city of London, Westminster, and parts adjacent; Presenters, and Approvers of the late Petition of the 11th of September, &c.

Sheweth; That as the wisdom and goodness of God is the best example to all authorities in the world; so those in authority can in nothing more resemble God, than in their readiness to hear and receive the complaints and petitions of any that apply themselves unto them: And who in cases of dissatisfaction willingly condescend to a reasoning out of all doubts and differences, for so his godliness deigned to 'commune with his servant Abraham,' and even to a sinful and gainsaying people he saith, 'Come let us reason together.'

And surely if ever here were need of such a goodness, now is the time, when not only complaints and distractions abound in all places, but multitudes of cordial friends to the parliament are exceedingly grieved and saddened in their spirits, as not seeing the Common-wealth in a condition of freedom, or exemption from grievances and burthens (in any measure), answerable to the many promises of the parliament, to the affections of those that have assisted them, or to the endeavours, engagements, intentions, and desires of the Army.

Every one believing, That in a very short time after the expulsion of the greater number of the members of this honourable house (as betrayers of their trust) A new Representative should immediately have been ordered, according to that model of an Agreement of the People, tendered by the Council of the Army, or in some other way. And that because that honourable Council in their Declaration of December last, declared, 'That they should not look on the remaining part as a former standing power to be continued; but in order unto, and until the introducing of a more full and formal power in a just representative to be speedily endeavoured, by an Agreement of the People.'

And we were the more confident hereof, because they had formerly declared also, 'That where the Supreme Authority was fixt in the same persons during their own pleasure, it rendered that government no better than a Tyranny, and the people subject thereunto, no better than vassals: That by frequent elections men come to taste of subjection as well as rule,' (and are thereby obliged for their own sakes to be tender of the good of the people), so that considering those expressions, and those extraordinary things done (declaredly) for a speedy new elected Parliament; how it should come not only to be wholly deferred, but to be matter of blame for us, or any of our friends earnestly to desire what is so evidently just and necessary in itself, and so essential to the liberties of the nation, perplexeth us above measure; and we intreat some satisfaction therein.

And truly when you had voted the People under God to be the original of all just Power, and the chosen representatives of the People, the Supreme Authority, we conceived that you did it to convey those righteous principles (which we and our friends long laboured for); to the next full and formal representative, and not that you intended to have exercised the supreme law making Power. Much less, that such ensnaring laws should ever have issued from a House of Commons, so often and so exceedingly purged, (intentionally by the Army) for the freedom of the Common-wealth, as is your Act against Treason, wherein contrary to the course of former Parliaments, and to Magna Charta, so many things are made Treason, that it is almost impossible for any to discourse with any affection for performance of promises and engagements, or for the liberties of the nation, but he is in danger of his life, if Judges and Juries should take it for good Law, which God forbid.

Also your Act for continuance and receipt of Excise (which every one hoped upon the prevailing of the Army, would have had a final end), to trade more oppressive than all the Patents, Projects, and Ship-money put together.

Also your Act for continuance and strict receipt of Customs was exceeding cross to expectation; that and the other for Excise, being esteemed most destructive to all kind of Commerce, Shipping and Navigation, and are so chargeable in the receipt, as that if what is disbursed to officers and collectors were raised in an ordinary way of subsidies, it would go very far towards the public charge, which it was hoped you would have seriously laid to heart, and have prepared a way to have eased the nation of both, and to have raised all public moneys by way of Subsidies.

It was hoped also, That you would have done something towards easing the People of the long complained burthen of Tythes, rather than to have enforced the same upon treble damages.

It was also expected upon the prevailing of the Army, and the redoucement of this honourable House, That the Printing-presses should have been fully opened and set at free liberty, for the clear information of the People, the stopping of them having been complained of as a great oppression in the bishops times, and in the time of the late unpurged Parliament, rather than such an Act against all unlicensed Printing, Writing or Publishing, as for strictness and severity was never before seen in England, and is extremely dissatisfactory to most People.

And truly when you had declared so highly and resolvedly for the maintenance of the law of the Land, as to the defence of every man's Liberty and Property according to that excellent Law of the Petition of Right, you may soon conceive what heart-breaking and torment of spirit was occasioned by your seizing in an hostile manner such constant cordial promoters of those excellent maxims forementioned, by the commitment of them in an extrajudicial manner to an arbitrary Prison, where they have been long time prisoners, and most of that time close prisoners, their chambers and pockets searched more than once, to find matter against them (things altogether unparliamentary) yea, denied a legal trial, no legal crime being laid to their charge, nor Accuser or Witness ever seen by them face to face, as law requires; and this to the ruin of themselves and families, as to temporal subsistence : We profess we are not able to express the grief and amazement that seized on us thereupon, and which is daily renewed upon us, in that, now after extreme provocations, you seem resolved to take away the life of our dear friend Mr. Lilburne, and others, not by any ordinary way of Trial at the usual Assizes, but by a special commission of Oyer and Terminer, the Judges being composed of such as whose interest he hath long opposed ; a way much complained of in the corrupt times before this Parliament, and which we hoped we should have heard no more of in this Nation.

And although this is too too lamentable, yet would this were all ; but if we understand the Petition of Right truly, the putting of soldiers to death, or to other reproachful and painful punishments, by martial-law, in time of peace, is not agreeable thereunto, and if we are deceived therein, the express words of that law have deceived us.

But that such as have ventured their lives for you, and thought nothing too dear to be spent in defence of a just Parliamentary Authority, should yet be imprisoned (as some such there are) in remote castles, and used more barbarously than Mr. Burton, Mr. Prynne, and Dr. Bastwick,* in the Bishops' time, and how soon intended to be proceeded against, by special Commission of Oyer and Terminer, (we cannot but fear :) this makes our very hearts to bleed, and our bowels to yearn within us ; insomuch as if no reason, conscience, fear of God, or sense of religion will put a speedy stop to these proceedings, but our most dear friends (because ever faithful to their country) must thus be ruined and slaughtered, under pretence of trials ; we shall not desire to breathe longer in this world, as seeing nothing but misery and slavery like to follow after them.

What a sad thing, we beseech you, is it, that it should be thus in this nation, in the first year of England's Liberty (as you would have it esteemed) which in our apprehension exceeds in misery and thralldom, the worst of England's bondage. For besides what hath been mentioned, what is more frequent than to examine men against themselves, to imprison men by votes of Committees, to seize upon men's persons by pursuivants and messengers, to swear men against themselves ; Taxes and Impositions never so high, and soldiers (not civil officers) set to gather them, to the terror of the people ; and upon the least denial, either violence or an imprisonment certainly ensueth : lawyers in effect are said to rule all, the laws are trod under foot by them, and wrested to what sense they please, and law suits extended beyond all reason, in respect of time and charge, then (as is verily supposed) having maddened the clear intentions of this house, and perverted the just intentions of the army, poor impotent prisoners for debt, and small offences abound, and starve in prisons, through poverty and the cruelty of lawyers and gaolers, and the poor abroad even perish for want of employment, and through the excessive price of food, and few or none lay these things to heart : and if any do, and become passionately affected therewith, and but speak their minds freely thereof, or (as hath been usual and commendable) endeavour to get people together in meetings, and propose Petitions for redress, the Puritans were never more reproached in the bishops' times, nor the Independents and Anabaptists in the late defection of Parliament than now all such are, with more odious titles (or the same in a more odious form, as Atheists, Levellers, Libertines, Introducers of Monarchy, Anarchy, and Confusion ; which are poisoned arrows shot principally at us and our friends, though most unjustly, none hating or abhorring either the principles or the practice more than we or our relations.

To our understandings, this is truly our miserable condition, and the sad condition of the Commonwealth, and which is the more grievous, because in a time when upon promise made in the presence of God and with appeals to his most righteous judgments, we justly expected the clearest and largest freedoms, with even a total redress of all grievances, and which is no small addition to our sorrow, that we are wounded thus sorely, by the hands whence we expected our most perfect cure.

So that what to say or do, either to help ourselves or our friends that are both in misery and danger, and the Commonwealth that lieth in no small degree of thralldom, we are exceedingly to seek, and therefore as in fit condition for his help only, that is a present help in time of trouble, and who maketh man's extremity his opportunity, we most humbly and ardently beseech his divine goodness to vouchsafe you a true Christianlike spirit of condescension, whereby you may be inclined to appoint some impartial persons to inform our understandings aright, of many things here complained of, that if we be, we may appear to have been mistaken, professing from our consciences, that as yet we are confirmed in these our apprehensions of things, not only from our own reasons, but from the Declarations, Promises, and Engagements of Parliaments ; and we trust, this way of reasoning out of differences will appear more like unto the ways of God, than by force or threats to stop our mouths, or suppress our understandings.

Also that he will both testify and mollify your hearts, that you may instantly look back from whence you are fallen, to the just ends, for which the Army reserved you together, and then not despairing, but the hand that wounded may heal (it being God's way) we would beseech you to render up unto the people their long detained right of new elections, and a new elected parliament.

To fulfil your promises concerning Magna Charta, and the Petition of Right, to unbind every burthen, and to break every yoke ; to give bread to the hungry, when you see the naked to cover him ; and not to hide yourselves from those of your own flesh (your present humble petitioners) though never so much scandalized and reproached: to deliver the captive and set the oppressed free, and if for a testimony of your real intentions herein you shall release unto us ours and the nation's true friends, though pointed unto death or continuance in bonds, we shall rejoice above measure at so blessed an alteration, and then shall your light break forth as the morning; you shall finish your course with joy, all we have shall be ever ready to preserve you; and we shall ever pray that the Lord our God may be your exceeding great reward.

Reader. This foregoing Petition was (Oct. 23, 1649,) offered unto the House, with most earnest and importunate solicitation to have it received, but such a face of denial and opposition appeared amongst them, that neither the Sergeant at Arms, nor any member would so much as touch it, telling the Petitioners that the House would not receive any Petition in lieut. col. Lilburne's behalf; notwithstanding they have declared, That it is the Right of the People of England to petition, and their duty to receive Petitions, though against laws established, part book Declar. p. 720. The first and last of which in order is his Brother's single Petition, the copy of which thus followeth:

To the Right Honourable the Supreme Authority of this Nation, the Commons of England, in Parliament assembled: the humble Petition of Col Robert Lilburne,

Humbly sheweth, That although of late presenting a humble Petition to this honourable house, in my own and my Sister's name, in behalf of my dear Brother, I had not the happiness to have the same considered; yet so strong are my affections towards him, not only as a brother, but as confident of his integrity, and that he hath been very serviceable formerly in his generation, though possibly accompanied with human frailties, but also exceedingly afflicted with the long continual sufferings of his faithful, dear, and now almost distracted wife. Hereupon, and for that it grieves me above measure, that he, whom all former powers sought to destroy for his affliction to the present members of this honourable house (which powers you have abolished) and out of whose hands he (as it were) miraculously escaped, should come to receive his sad doom under your authority, when as I verily believe, that upon good grounded assurance, that could I but obtain so much favour of this honourable house, as to suspend all proceedings against him for some reasonable time, I should be able to convince him of the evil, of any thing that is really evil of itself, and whereby, possibly upon a mistaken conscience, he may unwillingly have incurred your displeasure; or if I should fail thereof, yet then that I should prevail with him to betake himself to some foreign habitation, and whilst he shall remain under your government, or elsewhere, for my engagement sake, not in the least measure to disturb you in any your proceedings. And therefore, as a humble servant and faithful soldier of yours, for whose safety and preservation I have often readily adventured my life, I have taken the boldness again to presume upon your serious affairs, and most humbly and earnestly to entreat, as the only favour that ever you intend towards me, that you would be pleased to vouchsafe upon this my humble suit, that my said dear brother's Trial may for some reasonable time be yet suspended: in which time I do hereby become bound unto this honorable house, upon all the ties and bonds of Christianity and sincerity, to prevail with him to do what shall be, in one respect or other, to the full content, satisfaction and honour of this honourable house, and cannot but be full of hope that you will yet incline unto and grant this my humble Petition; whereby I shall ever be more strongly obliged to pray for your eternal peace and prosperity.

ROBERT LILBURNE.

This was delivered the 23d of Oct. 1649.

Upon the delivery of all which, Mrs. Lilburne, perceiving that nothing would serve their turn, but absolutely her husband's life, and being extremely abused by the reviles and threats of several of the members, but especially old Mr. Valentine, that used her most unworthily and basely, in a distempered and half-distracted condition she came home to the Tower to her husband, and with much importunity, in the bitterness of her spirit, besought her husband to stoop as low as possibly he could for the safety of his life, in the preservation of which hers was locked up; who, upon her bitter mourning and crying, and the beholding the anguish of spirit of her that had been so faithful and hazardous a yoke-fellow to him in his above seven years sorrow, wrung from him, with much ado, the copy of these lines following:

To the Honourable Wil. Lenthall, Esq. Speaker to the Knights, Citizens, and Burgeses, assembled in Parliament, to be communicated to the House.

Honoured Sir: As a man being somewhat at present confounded in myself, through a strong confidence of my own innocency (having suffered above measure, but intentionally done injury to none) and pressed under with the importunity of friends, especially with the heart-breaking sighs of my dear, but even half-distracted wife, as when my late children lay in a most disconsolate condition (which ended their lives) your house did me the favour to grant me my liberty to visit them, which I think was the saving of her life. So now greater importunities lying upon me from divers, and her that is dearer to me than many lives, I as earnestly entreat you to move your house, in the most effectual manner you can, that my Trial (so suddenly intended) may for some reasonable time be suspended, that so I may have time to hear and consider what many of them say they have to offer by way of reason and argument, to persuade me to what at present my conscience is not convinced of. And I should likewise be desirous, if your house should judge convenient, that some competent number of gentlemen of our house might be permitted to debate with those particulars, wherein I have appeared most to differ with other men's judgments: whereby possibly rational arguments may be strongly urged, as peradventure may give each satisfaction as may tend to the reconciling many differences and distractions; upon the knowledge of the acceptance of which, during all that time of suspension of trial. I do hereby faithfully promise not in the least to disturb those that shall grant me this favour, being not so apt to make disturbance as is conceived. And herein you will exceedingly oblige,

Sir, yours to serve you,

JOHN LILBURNE.

From the Tower of London,
this 24th of Oct. 1649.

Which yet availed nothing at all, but added to her sorrow, which being very great, he got his friends to intice her into the city, under pretence to go look after his Jury, and there to keep her, till his intended bitter portion were over; but although many have said, he used foul play towards his Jury, which was of his adversary's own calling, viz. Colonel or Sheriff Wilson, who is both a member of the House, and also of the Council of State, and who had not a dram of affection or compassion towards him in the least, in the panneling either of his Jurie, whose affection to his life may easily be discerned, by his panneling the Grand Inquest, a copy of whose names, by an extraordinary strange providence, is within these few hours come to my hands, after all the ordinary ways were despair'd of, as being impregnable by the forcible engines of gold or silver; which Inquest are most of them, if not all, engaged persons, the names of which, as they are come to my hands, thus follows:

- | | |
|---------------------|---------------------------------------|
| 1. Robt. Manwaring | 12. John Brett |
| 2. Alex. Bormington | 13. Robert Swete |
| 3. Simon Greehill | 14. Jesper Clayton |
| 4. Thomas Landal | 15. Francis Ashhurst |
| 5. John Stone | 16. Philip Meads |
| 6. John Allen | 17. Thomas Smith |
| 7. Anthony Webster | 18. Matth. White |
| 8. Francis Woolly | 19. Wm. Rowel |
| 9. John Hinde | 20. Sam. Ravenscraft |
| 10. Rob. Kendish | 21. Rich. Gibbs, brother to Al. Gibbs |
| 11. Rich. Young | |

A very little time will produce notable things about some of the principal engaged men of the aforesaid Grand Inquest, that may be very fit for public view, as also about Mr. Prideaux, the Attorney-General's carriage towards them in the business, which may prove good foundations for able and faithful lawyers, to draw their results in law against them, as the foundation of good and sound actions in law for Mr. Lilburne to render good damages against them, for their illegal, unjust, malicious, and blood-thirsty prosecuting him for his life.

And also there is more than bare hopes of the publishing an exact copy of the Lord Keble's Charge to the Grand Inquest, which, I understand just now, is complete in short-hand, and hath as many remarkable things in it as in either of the two days' passages that followed it; all which, rightly considered, might make ingenuous men blush by force to take them, and by force yet to detain Mr. Lilburne's estate from him, as he avowedly yet saith, Sir Arthur Hazlerig hath done and yet doth, considering so much injustice and malice hath been used towards him as hath been done; the detention of which can be upon no other grounds, being his all, but to necessitate the honest man again to cry out of his oppressions, by means of which Sir Arthur, &c. might, either by a Council of War, or a pretended legislative bill of attainder, take away his life without any more trials by a jury, and so accomplish that which many letters out of the North declare was Sir Arthur's avowed and declared end of his last journey from Newcastle: and if this were not still the design against Mr. Lilburne, without doubt Sir Arthur would not suffer a day to pass over his head before he had put Mr. Lilburne in the full possession of his money, as by law and equity he ought to do, without any more outcries from him, or any of his friends for him.

'Nec lex est justior ulla,

'Quem nunc artificem arte perire sua.'

'Tis just he should be 'tangled in the snare,
'Which for another man he did prepare.'

November, 1649.

In 1650 was published the following Answer to the above Account of Lilburne's Trial:

A LETTER of due Censure and Redargution, to Lieut. Col. JOHN LILBURNE: touching his Trial at Gundhall, London, in October last, 1649:

WHEREIN

If there be contenpered some corrosive ingredients, it is not to be imputed unto Malice: the intent is, to eat away the Patient's proud dead flesh, not to destroy any sincere, sound part.

2 Samuel, xvi. 5, 6, 7, 8, 11.

"And when king David came to Bahurim, behold, thence came out a man of the family of the house of Saul, whose name was Shimei, the son of Gerah: he came forth, and cursed still as he came.

"And he cast stones at David, and at all the servants of king David: and all the people, and all the mighty men were on his right hand, and on his left.

"And thus said Shimei when he cursed, Come out, come out thou bloody man, and thou man of Belial:

"The Lord hath returned upon thee all the blood of the house of Saul: and behold, thou art taken in thy mischief, because thou art a bloody man.

"And David said to Abishai, and to all his servants, &c. Let him alone, and let him curse, &c. It may be that the Lord will look on mine affliction, and that the Lord will requite good for his cursing this day."

London: Printed by Fr. Neile, 1650.

You Benjamites which envy Judah's crown,
Cursing weak Princes, when their heads hang down:
Which limit God by your intails, and spight Scepters transported by his sovereign right:
Which scorn the son of noble Jouathan,
As a desponding, poor, unhearted man,
Because he can behold without regret
His father's flowers in David's garland set:
Expect black-mouthed Shimei's tardy fate,
The sword of Heaven trenches deep, though late.

SIX; God's strict injunction obliges us all to reprove sin, wheresoever we find it: and as far as reproof has any vigor in it, to endeavour the redcement into the right way of all such as wander from it through ignorance. I being therefore to direct this my reprehension and censure to you, desire you to accept of it, as enjoined by God himself: For I have read the relation of your Arraignment in October last, (the same as is verified, and avowed under your own hand) and my conscience tells me, I should deal unfaithfully with you, and neglect God's command, if I should not strive to convince you, of the great scandal that has been given by it to all good and wise men. If I myself err, or transgress my bounds in this censorious, redargutory address of mine: I desire the like freedom from you; well knowing that in many things, we offend all: and therefore, God forbid, but I should be as ready to ask pardon, where I give offence, as to grant pardon where I receive any. Nay I am not more forward in begging your pardon when I know I have offended, than I am in challenging your censure, wherein I have offended, when I know not the same myself. Alas, it is a woeful obstinacy in some men that they will not hear, and it is as woeful a timidity in others, that they will not give just and due reprehensions. I doubt you are hardened in your errors, because so few declare against you: yet, I hope, this will easily sink into you, that other men's silence, when you are really become a public scandal, will neither be able to acquit you before God, nor disoblige them. This man pretends you are a stranger to him, that man intimates you are below his reprehension: a third objects, that you are mordacious, and so wilful, that you are beyond the benefit of any ingenuous reprehension: but sure, God's command of an office so just and charitable, as Christian oburgation is, is not so to be superseded or eluded. Your sin becomes mine, upon my silence, because I endeavour not to cure you: and my sinful silence adds to your trespasses, because it renders you the more incurable. For, first, all English Protestants are to regard you as a brother within God's command, and not as a stranger without it, for our common mother the State of England, and our common mother the Church of England, has a share in you: and necessarily must suffer loss by the losing of you, or gain by the reduction of you: and so in both these respects, or consanguinous relations (religious and politic) you are to be tendered as a brother, though perhaps your face be strange to us. Nay, God's command of reprehension is so large, that be that may be made my brother by it, though he be not so as yet, is capable of, and may require at my hands all faithful brotherly offers from me. 2dly, If you were bred a man of trade, and not of letters: no man, how learned soever, can therefore alledge, that it is too inglorious a task for him, to contest with you. Your want of literature at the last day will not make you uncapable of charity, or absolve them, who fail in the offices of charity towards you; the duty of reproof was not imposed on us by God, that we might gain victory to ourselves, but that we might recover souls to him: wherefore if any man make use of reproof only for trial of his wit, and affect therein a garland above truth: that man setting himself on work is to receive wages from himself: he remains still a debtor unto God, but it is not to be expected that God should be made a debtor unto him. 3rdly, Others testify not against you for fear of your maledicency and inflexibility: but neither are these so to be acquitted before God. For God does not call all men in the forenoon, nor in the third, nor fourth hour of the afternoon: it belongs to us, early and late to admonish, and advertise, and with patience to expect God's time, and good pleasure, whether he will prosper our first, or our latter endeavours. Besides if God's call has preceded, yet we still must wait with patience, for his call does not always work a sensible change in the first moment, especially in men of rugged dispositions, and in those things which are most congenial to the ruggedness of their dispositions. Lastly, if a sensible, apparent change has been wrought by God's call, yet still more patience is required of us, forasmuch as there is so much instability, and lubricity in the best men, that none of us are absolutely free from temporary relapses, and strange defections at some times. These things therefore will charge justly all of want of charity, or pusillanimous despondence, who see other men's deviations, yet seek not to reclaim them, and receive scandals often times, yet use no endeavours to amend them.

But I hasten to the principal scope of this Letter, and to the particular heads of those things, for which you are liable to reproof.

1. The first thing, which in reading the manner of your trial gave me scandal, was: your prolix urging, and repeating of very many impertinent things, and yet complaining withal, that a just, and due freedom of speech was taken from you; it is most evident, (though you were not satisfied with your own vain loquacity) that a multitude of frivolous things fell from you, too unworthy to detain the meanest and idlest of your auditor, much more unworthy to entangle a bench of such honourable, and sage commissioners.

2. The second was: your laying hold of livers shifting cavils, and shuffling exceptions in law, which were only fit to waste time, and procure trouble to the court, (they were far from making any defence for you at all) and yet complaining at the same time, that the law was forced, and violence to your destruction.

3. The third which convinced me of your ignorance, if not of your impudence, was the utmost strength of your most formal pleas, and reasons in law: for in my mind even those, though you demeaned yourself strangely presumptuous upon the justice of your cause, and upon your knowledge of the law, were exceeding defective, and insufficient.

4. The 4th thing which gave me deep offence, and left you totally inexcusable in my judgment, was your bitter railings against the judges, nay your most filthy reproachings against all law, and authority, I might almost say against humanity, and divinity too; and yet still whilst you treated your judges as the most despicable creatures in the world, your complaint was, that you were most villainously treated yourself.

5. The 5th thing which deserves a keen reproof from all honest men, was your assailing the sincerity of your jurors so diversely, it was very plain that by the insidious clamours of your disciples, you attempted them one way, and by other subtil blandishments you seemed to wind yourself into their favours another way. For though you had the hap to amuse your 12 men, there is scarce any honest man in England, that is not moved to a great deal of disdain at the gross attempts which you made to debauch them both ways.

Of these in this order:

1. In your Arraignment's first entrance, being called upon to hold up your hand according to the old custom and law of England, by way of anticipation you demand freedom of speech: a thing you could not doubt of, provided you would not extend the bounds of your freedom too far. But it should seem your demand was for freedom of speech void of all bounds, and that your Judges might put no difference betwixt matters alledged proper for the time, place, and trial in hand, and matters utterly improper: you must have it as free for you to waste time away, and to abuse the court's patience by trifling, as to defend yourself by opening the true state of your cause, and giving judicial answers to to your indictment. You begin therefore with long harangues of what had passed at Westminster, and Oxford, at some Arraignments of yours before the house of peers, and judge Heath: and then making no just use thereof: you descend as causelessly to speak against clandestine Trials, and upon that occasion you inform the court, what had once been debated betwixt Mr. Miles Corbet and yourself at a committee for Examinations. From thence you slide to the great exploits that were done at Brentford against the king's army by yourself, and some few others. From thence you digress to some conference betwixt the lieutenant of the Tower, and yourself, wherein is laid open what faith you had given him to be his true Prisoner. You next rove further from thence, and inform the Court what the lord President Bradshaw, and Mr. Cook had pleaded for you in 1641, against the rigorous urging of oaths by the Lords of Star-Chamber: likewise, what your City friends formerly had suggested for you in their Petition: what estate of yours had been seized upon by some ministers of the parliament: what incivility the soldiers had shewed in apprehending you: what colt Walter Long had spent the king during his imprisonment in the Tower: what you had read in the Law-books against the special Commissions of Oyer and Terminer: how requisite it was that your Judges should expose their commission to your exception, that their power of judging you might so be submitted to your power of judging them.

To conclude, (though you concluded not so) after much more obstreperous contestation about so many several impertinences, you vouchsafe at last to arrive at your trial's introduction, to wit, the first ceremony of holding up your hand to the court, and even that ceremony also must afford you a larger field for your eloquence to expatiate in. This was your preludium in the forenoon of your first day: and to trace you further through all your extravagancies, for two entire days would be endless: but by this preludium any man may easily discern what lessons were played afterwards, when your pipes were once thoroughly tuned. You will perhaps say, though these and some other passages, by you repeated more than once, were foreign to the main issue of Guilty, or Not Guilty, yet inasmuch as they did some way tend to move commiseration in the people, they were not altogether unseasonable, or improper. But this supposes that you were brought to the bar as well to work upon the multitude, and catch the affections of the injudicious, as to satisfy your sworn judges and jurors in matter of law, or fact: which is a thing not at all to be supposed. For you must needs grant, that it belongs not to the common people that are admitted to see and hear, to pass any judgment at all: that it belongs not to the judges to see or hear, as the common people do: that public persons are to divest themselves of private affections: that if your Judges might not look upon you with private eyes, or acquit you of present guilt in regard of past merits, or former sufferings (which is not allowed to them) yet they are not to be swayed at all with your bare averments of your own merits and sufferings without sufficient testimony, and examination of others. You know the old theorems of law: Judges are to proceed, and pass sentence, not secundum allegata, but secundum allegata et probata: and therefore in all courts of justice, things not made apparent, are in the same predicament, as things not existing. It appears, therefore, that all these discourses of yours, wherein so many hours were consumed, were improper, and extrajudicial; and this appearing so clearly, with what front could you pretend, and clamour as you did, that freedom of discourse was taken away from you, and that all that was due to an Englishman was denied you? Is it possible, is it reconcilable to sense, that you could be abridged of just liberty in pleading things pertinent, and yet at the same time range abroad so wildly, and profusely lavish away your oratory in things so impertinent? Two entire days were spent in your trial, and yet it is most evident by the short issue you were put upon, (viz. whether you were the author or no of such, and such pamphlets) that as much business of other men's uses commonly to be dispatched in a quarter of the space, as was dispatched then of yours. Your own narrative also, set forth by your own approbation (if not order and direction) shews, and ocularily demonstrates, that in your long trial, neither the commissioners on the bench, nor the counsel at bar took up half so much time in speaking, as you yourself did. There can be no error in this, if we will but number your leaves, and lines of your own panegyric, ostentatious, relation. Besides, not only the prolixity, but also the acrimony of your language testifies against you: for men that are restrained from speaking, are much more restrained from speaking insolently, maliciously, and abusively: and the same authority that checks modest language, will serve to choke up, and obstruct all immodest expressions. Sure, you were not well advised, when you suffered this book of your trial to pass the press: for it either contradicts you, or itself; inasmuch as in some places it contains very passionate complaints of yours against the court, as if it triumphed over you, and debarr'd you of a free defence: yet the whole tenor of it from one end to the other declares amply, and pregnantly, that your judges were by you treated as the most abject captives in the world, and, as it were, dragged up and down before the vulgar, only to grace your chariot wheels. In due place I shall instance to you, and give in particulars how insulting you were, how the ears of your judges were always deafened almost with their own reproaches, and all other mens mouths stopped with your hyperbolical boastings. Such odious shameless things were scarce ever vented by any brawler whatsoever, in any place whatsoever, much less did ever any prisoner at the bar presume to spit such things in the face of justice itself. But my order leads me next after your mere impertinencies to your frivolous cavillations.

2. I shall here only recite, with much brevity, some of your principal subterfuges, and demurring pretences, and then let the world judge, whether ever any tribunal before would suffer justice to be so baffled: or any prisoner before ever thought it worth while to lay hold of such poor advantages. The ceremony of your hand's erection must first be explained to you; and when by its explanation it appears harmless, and of a reasonable signification, you will agree to do something equivalent and tantamount, but the ceremony itself, and its ancient authority, you will not submit to. For your judges commission, you must first be advised whether it be general or special: and when you are advised that it is not special: yet you must have leave a great while to shew your learning and reading against special commissions. When you are to plead to your Indictment of Treason (Guilty, or Not Guilty:) you must first spend time in pleading against such pleading: and when that will not prevail, you give a conditional, delusory plea, such as you think is good enough for the trial to proceed upon whilst you please, but may be revoked at your pleasure. When your Indictment is read, you must have a copy of it, you must have space for eight or nine days to put in exceptions against it: you must have counsel assigned you to prepare those exceptions: and if these things be granted, (which you know were never granted in England or elsewhere) you will vouchsafe to make an absolute, binding plea. When the question is put, by whom you will be tried: you will not say by God and your country, because that is a form anciently prescribed, but after some time wrangled away, you will yield to the same in substance: that is, you will be tried in the presence of God by a jury of your equals, according to law. When you see your sophisms are not able to blind your judges, you carp at the very honour of your trial: you repine at the bench for being adorned with so much learning, and for being filled with so great a number of judges, aldermen, knights, esquires, &c. no less than forty in all: nay, neither your judges, nor the grand jury (though they were choice men also) could escape the brands of suborned persons, and conspirators against your life. When the judges, to pacify your impetuous noise for counsel, promise you shall have it, as soon as matter of law arises out of matter of fact, and in the mean time assure you they (according to their duty) will be faithful counsel to you, you answer, that your Indictment is nothing else but matter of law. When a second day is granted you to produce witnesses (a favour not expected by other delinquents, who at their perils are to be always ready with their witnesses to purge themselves of any crime) instead of bringing witnesses, you begin that second day with a disavowing of your plea. When you have used all art yourself in consuming, and dallying away time, you demand leave for your solicitor that he may come in upon the court, as a fresh reserve of yours. When the Petit Jury appears to be sworn, you are not contented to except against them yourself upon your own discretion; you desire your friends may be admitted also to except against them, because perhaps some of your friends may know some of them better than you do. When witnesses appear to prove you the author of such a book.

you prescribe them to swear to this individual book, viz. that this identical book was delivered to the printer, and this identical book is intimated in the Indictment. When a single witness appears against you, though he be seconded with never so many pregnant circumstances, and strong presumptions, yea, though others contest also to the same thing, only not acted in the same place, and at the same time: you then wave the municipal law of England, and prefer the civil law before it: It is in vain for your judges to cite statutes against you: for either you are wiser than the statutes of England, or you are a wiser interpreter of the statutes of England, than your judges. When three competent witnesses depose against you as to the same seditious book, you say those books were not without erratas, and it is possible that the same book had had no seditious passages in it, had it not been for those erratas of the printer. When some of the books carried the signature of your own hand upon them, you put the Attorney General to his proofs that that was your hand: and if that be proved by the Attorney, you tell him plainly, he gains nothing by it, for except the book be proved your's otherwise, the signature of your hand proves it not so. When the printer's erratas will not help you, you say the book perhaps might be mis-dated, for if the book was made and dated before the Act of Parliament (which condemned such books as seditious) it was not seditious. When the Act of Parliament is proved precedent to the date, you say, perhaps the Act was not duly proclaimed, or else the copy of the Act read now, was not examined duly by the clerk's book at Westminster, or else the clerk's book at Westminster was no true parliament record. Let it be supposed also that you are proved the author of such books, and the same to be treasonable; yet still you defend yourself with this, that in those treasonable books, you had no treasonable intent, and then you are still upon this guard: 'Mens, non Actus facit reum.' The law condemns none for a treasonable act, except his intent be proved treasonable. Alas, what is there, that can escape your exception? From the judges, and the laws, and the witnesses, and the informers, and the jurors, you proceed at last to except against the door-keeper of the jurors. You pretend, forsooth, that the very door-keeper has exprest something of bitterness against you: and therefore you move that the door of the room where the jurors are to agree of a verdict, may be kept by some other man more impartial towards you. Who ever heard of such dallying captrioes before in any court of justice? who ever heard of any judges hands bound up before by the like nugatory cavillations of any prisoner whatsoever? You think your life a strange prey, that all the world should be such greedy hunters of it: but I think your soul a strange purgatory rather, that so many jealous, uncharitable thoughts, like Zim, and Ohim, should be disquieting haunters of it. The Parliament is partial and conjured against you, because some members of it have been provoked by, and put at a distance with you by some enmity of yours: The Attorney General is no competent Prosecutor against you, because he is a Burgess of parliament: The Judges are excepted against, because they are created by the Parliament: and all the rest of the bench are to be suspected, because, forsooth, they may be misled, and over-borne by these creatures of the Parliament. Thus to you justice can never be administered, till the world be new moulded, nay nor yet so, except you have the new moulding of it. But I pray tell me, do all these objections and prolongations of yours savour of a dejected, oppressed spirit, or could they proceed from an imprisoned, over-awed tongue? Judicet Orbis. Surely you did direct these futile, empty umbrages of reason either to sway wiser judgments, or only to infect and trump the ruder multitude: if the first, you render yourself a very delirious man notwithstanding all your reading of the law, which you vaunt so much of: if the second, you merit the brand of a frontless impostor, and seem to prefer Mahomet's politics before Machiavel's.

3. I come now from your impertinencies and cavils, to the more rational and formal part of your defence: but what true strength there was in your best arguments and pleas; let the world judge and decide.

You begin with the Commission by which the Court sits upon you, and is qualified to absolve or condemn you. You argue stiffly that you ought to hear it read, and pass your censures of it; may you pretend all other Commissions, besides those ordinary ones whereby the country assizes and quarterly sessions are held, are against law.

By this it should seem, the Judges come upon the bench to be judged of by Prisoners at the bar, as well as Prisoners at the bar come to be judged by the Bench. For if the party arraigned may freely question and dispute the authority before which he is arraigned, there must be some other court to determine betwixt him and his judges, or else he and his judges being both clothed with equality of jurisdiction, must depart upon equal terms, without any judgment passed on either side. And if so, what issue, what effect can justice have? I do not deny that a prisoner may be wrongfully condemned, I do not deny that a prisoner so wronged is remediable: I only deny the prisoner to be a competent judge of such wrongs. Upon this reason it stands, that a prisoner may appeal to a higher judge from the lower, but his right of appeal derives to him no right of judgment: nor can appeals lie but only from inferior courts. For if there were a freedom of judging due to prisoners, as well as of appealing, all impeachments and criminal charges would be endless, and utterly incapable of determination. Commissions hereupon are directed to the judges, not to prisoners, and bearing warrants for the judges to proceed upon, and to justify their sentences, not rules or laws by which prisoners are to stand or fall, they ought to be read and examined by the judges, but not so by prisoners. Besides, though it may be proper for a prisoner in some cases to appeal at last from his judges, where they have not rightly pursued their Commission: yet he cannot plead at first to the virtue of the Commission, forasmuch as in so doing he appeals not to, but from the supreme authority: nor can he plead want of legal form in the commission, forasmuch as that pertains to the danger, or indemnity of his judges, not of him: and if he were as much concerned in it as his judges, which he cannot be, yet it were absurd that his judgment should be made equal or superior to the judgment of his commissioners. It is by you taken for granted, that the special commissions of Oyer and Terminer in the north (which were first granted by Hen. 8. and after continued by all his successors) were illegal and informal: if we should grant this too, as we do not, you may conclude, that the commissioners which acted thereupon, were answerable for acting without a sufficient warrant: but you cannot conclude notwithstanding, that any delinquent, or defendant suffered unjustly thereby, or was condemned contrary to law thereupon. Moreover, it is high arrogance in you to condemn all extraordinary commissions of Oyer and Terminer; and to say that the stat. of Westm. the 2nd (where the supreme power of the nation, king, peers and commons, was present, and did co-operate) by which such extraordinary commissions were established, was an irrational innovation. You may as justifiably say, that Edw. 3rd, and all the kings and parliaments since to this day have deserved your correction, and subjected themselves to your vile exprobration, for that they also have confirmed and kept in force the same irrational innovation. What an unlimited liberty do you take to yourself? such things are irrational innovations, because you affirm they are contrary to Magna Charta: and yet you know well the power and majesty of England, the same as created Magna Charta itself, by several statutes and by a continual confirmation of practice for the space of above 300 years, have declared them neither to be innovations, nor contrariant to Magna Charta. Wherefore since your judgment cannot bow to any, nor can pay a reverent submission to the authority of so many parliaments, or to the prudence of so many ages, what satisfaction are you capable of? You will say this parliament in 1641, when it consisted of four or five hundred members, and when it was an undebased council, condemned, and abolished the northern court. Let it be so: that particular court had declined from its primitive institution, and so was thought to be dissolved: but you know after much debate about the abuses of extraordinary commissions in general, and after a full poizing of all that could be urged on both sides, nothing was concluded further against them; and so the Parliament's resolution at last makes as much against you, as its debate at first makes for you, 'Excerptis in non excerptis firmat regulam.' More was delivered at your trial by the Attorney General, and the Judges touching this subject: and that this commission by which you were to be judged, was not special but general: I shall not therefore add any more at present upon the subject, but refer you to your own memory. I shall only supply this advertisement, that whatsoever illegality can be objected against special commissions, it more befits and imports the commissioners, than their prisoners arraigned before them, to dispute the same. And whereas you appeal (as it were) from this present devirginated Parliament, to that which sat in 1641, which acted so gallantly, as you say, for universal liberty; and not for self-interest: you must be reminded, that none but parliaments ought to judge of parliaments: and that parliaments become no parliaments when they are liable to the censures of private persons. You may be also further reminded, that the parliament of 1641 which was so pure, yet in 1642 afforded a great number of reviling members to the King: such as you yourself then judged revolvers. Nay the same parliament in 1647, afforded yet many more revolvers in your construction, for your first quarrel against the Parliament was, that it did not then purge itself of the degenerate members that assembled with Mr. H. Pelham. This is therefore a contradictious humour in you to decry the parliament in 1649, that you may extol the parliament in 1641, when according to your own former judgment, the parliament of 1649, is only the unrevolving remainder of the parliament in 1641.

The next thing you complain of, is: that you are not arraigned in your county at the assizes, and that you were not apprehended by the civil officer, although the nation be now in peace, and you one that neither sought to fly, nor make resistance. Here you suppose that you are an ordinary person, that there are ordinary times, that the crime you are indicted for is an ordinary crime, and so you inter, that this apprehension, and arraignment of yours being extraordinary is against the common right and freedom of the nation. But, 1. for your person, you are not a common malefactor; you are presumed, upon no light grounds, to be the head, or one of the heads of a dangerous, and desperate faction; a faction that has already been in arms, and is still watching new opportunities of rising again in arms; a faction that has used all endeavours to disband, divide, and debauch the army, and to effect the same is willing to combine with royalists, or any foreign invaders whatsoever: the crime charged upon you is as heinous as can be, it is vigorously attempting by all manner of practices, and correspondencies, especially by seditious pamphlets, to imbroil this nation in a third civil war, and so to subvert the settled form of government. The former wars have been exceeding bloody, and long it was before the nation's wounds could be stanch'd, whence another tearing open of the same wounds, would in probability make them more mortal, and more hard to be healed, than they were before. 3. For the times they are not so calm, and secure, as your party, together with the royalists, would fain make us to believe they are, to the end that you might the better incense the people against taxes and excise, and so wrest our arms out of our hands: We have not indeed ensigns flourished against ensigns in the field, nor weapons openly drawn against weapons, but every summer almost we have new insurrections, and even now we keep our colours unfurled, that we may keep yours furled: and our swords remain unsheathed to daunt you from unsheathing yours. 'Non recurrendum est ad extraordinaria in iis quæ feripossunt per ordinaria:' we grant you so much; but you must then as freely grant to us; that where ordinary remedies are not so safe, and available, we must have resort to such, as are extraordinary. Judge Jenkins never read this maxim of the law to you, that a private mischief is rather to be chosen, than a public inconvenience. For certainly neither he, nor you, would so confound perpetually all persons, cases, and times, and be so oblivious of all necessity, and reason of state, as to put a private man's liberty in balance against public safety, and to value some formalities in practice equal with the highest of all laws, if ever you had seriously studied this incontrollable, unerring maxim. Besides, were that law by which you challenge an ordinary trial at the assizes in Surrey, every way equivalent to the empress of all statutes, customs, and formalities, salus populi: yet neither so would your challenge hold: forasmuch as your Treason, if proved against you, was committed not only in Surrey where perhaps your books were written; but in London also where your books were printed, yea in every county of the land where they were published, and dispersed amongst the people. There is not a parish in England, or Wales, but may appear to prosecute you for a general disturber of peace, and mover of sedition, and one that has most desperately conjured against his whole country, and every part of it.

The 3rd thing you argue against is the plea of Guilty, or Not Guilty: it is against the Petition of Right, you say, that any man should be compelled to answer interrogatories against himself: that the Star-Chamber court was abolished for forcing such interrogatories upon us: lastly, that the practice of Christ himself, and his apostles, discharges us from answering to such interrogatories. You run here into a gross mistake, for that you distinguish not betwixt the abusive framing, and enforcing of some special interrogatories upon oath, where the crime is not of public concernment, and where other proof is failing, and where they extend further than to the point in issue; and demanding an affirmative, or negative without oath to the direct point in issue, where according to valid evidence a legal charge of public concernment is preferred. If these things were distinguished, you would not find any thing in the Petition of Right repugnant to the old interrogatory of Guilty, or not Guilty. For since the 3rd of king Charles, Delinquents have been tried, and held to this old plea, as well as before in all ages, and none of our judges ever yet sprung any such new interpretation, as you now spring, contrary to the custom of all times, and all nations. The odium that now lays upon some interrogatories has been contracted either by the fraud of the party interrogating, or obstinacy of the party interrogated; whereupon the sweet-tempered law of England, to prevent the mischief that might arise from either of these parties, that neither the one might strain questions too high, nor the other decline them too far, finds out a channel in the midst of the stream, neither totally abandoning them, nor giving too wild a license to them. The civil law is very rigorous, and in many places uses racks to extort evidence from ordinary delinquents, where there is but moderate presumption against them: and yet doubtless this rigor is more salubrious, then such a fondness as you now contend for, when you would reject all examinations in all cases whatsoever. The Star-Chamber was grown to a great abuse of interrogatories in private suits and differences, and was therefore wisely abolished; but this proves not, that the first institution of the same court, yea and its long continuation after under so many wise parliaments, was unpolemic. For in times of reformation it often happens, that even good things, when they have been far debauched, are prudently laid aside, and sometimes justly burnt, yea ground to powder, and made subjects of our detestation. Well therefore might the Lord President, whom, I shall always mention with as much honour, as you with contempt, say whom your contempt confirms to me to be the more honourable, well might he detestate Star-Chamber Examinations, as they had been abused in the late king's days, and yet not declare himself now an absolute enemy to all examinations whatsoever. The obstinate silence of delinquents, when they will not confess, nor deny their guilt, is ever taken for a confession not only by the laws of England, but by the laws of all other nations; and it was more favour to you than you could challenge from your judges, that your plea, which you would not allow to be negative, was not taken for affirmative against you. It is true, if it were sin in a prisoner to confess his guilt, it would be sin in a magistrate to press him to such a confession; but since it is rather a service to the God of truth, to affirm a truth in the midst of danger, I mean such a truth, as is of more advantage to justice, and to the safety of a state, than it is of disadvantage to the party confessing, what rigor is in the law, or in the judge, that requires such a plea from the prisoner? For the objection, that evil minded men will deny guilt contrary to truth, of which untrue denial the magistrate by this means becomes the occasion; it is answered easily, in as much as he which is no proper cause, though he be an occasion of offence, offends not therein: in as much also as the magistrate is not to prevent an uncertain offence by declining a certain duty; nor will the law presume all men false, because many are not true. As for our Saviour's example, who you say being examined before Pilate, would not by his own confession, or asserting of a truth, make himself obnoxious to judgment; It shews you as pseudodox in divinity, as you are in law. I shall by and by make it appear, that our Saviour, who neither had any guilt to confess, nor did refuse to give answer to any pertinent, judicial questions of the magistrate, nor had any hope of escaping condemnation by being silent, is very much blasphemed by you.

A fourth thing, for which you conceive your arguments are valid and concludent, is allowance of counsel, as also time for eight or nine days to consult with them, before you answer your indictment. Your reason is, because you know not the formalities of law, as neither having Latin nor French, to read the books; and you say, it is a great deal of nicety and danger for an ignorant man to be locked up to single formalities. The judges tell you, that when matter of law arises out of matter of fact, you shall have counsel assigned you; that till such matter arise, they are your sworn counsel, and are bound to be indifferent betwixt the state and you; and they will take care that no niceties nor single formalities shall overthrow you. You do as good as reply, that because you are void of Latin and French, you must have counsel, and because they are partial, and you dare neither trust their offices nor oaths, you must have counsel such as you dare trust. The sum is this: because you are ignorant of the practice of law, you may rail at your judges, and because you may rail at your judges, you may claim time, and other counsel besides them, of your own choosing. If you were not as unskilled in the theory, as you are in the practice of the law, you would not, upon all occasions, so often insist upon inconveniences likely to ensue to yourself, and take no notice of public mischiefs; you would then be satisfied that your judges ought rather to admit of a mischief to you, than of an inconvenience to the state, although you perpetually urge them to admit of mischief to the state, rather than inconveniences unto you. You pretend, in the next place, that your indictment is long, and consists wholly of matter of law, and therefore time and counsel ought to be assigned you. Your judges answer you again, that though the indictment be long, yet you need not charge your memory with every part of it; the main matter of it is very brief, and no other but matter of fact, viz. Whether, or no, you were the author of the several books therein nominated? Now no study of law in England, neither that which is published in English, nor that which is locked up from the vulgar in Latin and French, can avail you in this matter. You may perfectly inform your counsel, whether you composed those books, or no; but your counsel can inform you nothing at all therein. You still alledge, that after proof of the fact, it may be too late for counsel to assist you; and you are not able now to give answer without counsel, because you knew not before what would be the matter of your indictment. I wish you would at last remember, that the judges are not to consider only what is most behooful for you, but what is most behooful for you and the state; but still you continue your error in this, that you suppose your indictment to be mere matter of law, when as you might as well have pretended that it was all mathematics or metaphysics, as all law; for is there any impossibility at present for you to answer without counsel, whether these were your books, or no, because you knew not before what you were to answer to? When you say, your counsel may come too late after confession of the fact, your meaning is plain; it is insinuated thereby, that when you have disowned or owned a thing, they cannot procure you a new liberty to own or disown it the second time, and so not being able to nullify your answer, they cannot procure you new counsel, or new respite for eight or nine days more, to give in a new answer; but when you say, it is impossible for you, upon the sudden, and without advice of counsel, to own or disown books, you seem very dark to me; I cannot dive into your meaning. You come now to precedents, and say, first, that judge Heath, at Oxford, allowed you counsel before pleading. The judges' answers might give you full satisfaction herein: for, 1st, Heath well enough understood that your charge was not Treason; 2dly, if it were treason, he understood as well that the parliament had more prisoners of the king's, than the king had of the parliament's, and so the retaliation would turn to the disadvantage of the king. 3dly, The proceedings at Oxford are no fit rules for our courts at Westminster, nor is it congruous that you, who then fought against Heath and his confederates, for subverting law, should now cite his practice at Oxford for law, and bring us to rely upon him as a main pillar of justice. For another precedent, you cite the parliament in the earl of Strafford's Case, who, you say, had counsel assigned him before pleading; but this is contradicted by Justice Jermyn, and he better informs you, that the earl of Strafford, before pleading, had no counsel granted him, and if he had, the parliament was not so subject to the common rules of law, as inferior courts are. Your third precedent alledges, that major Rolph had counsel allowed him by the Lord Chief Baron Wilde, in a charge of treason, before the grand jury had passed upon him. But the Answers of your judges clearly avoid the force of this allegation; for, first, it is no more evident to this court what was done by the Lord Chief Baron in Rolph's case, than upon what reason it was so done. If counsel was allowed, it may be, Rolph confessed the charge, or there might be some other difference in the case, and so the allowance of counsel might be legal; but, 2dly, suppose it to be illegal, and then it has no obliging force upon this court. That court which is engaged to administer justice according to the form of the common law of England, may not so safely follow one example varying from the old usage, as they may a thousand keeping more close to the same.

In the fifth place, you strive to invalidate the state's witnesses, saying, there are none but single witnesses now produced against you; and the validity of single witnesses is taken away by two statutes of Edw. 6. To this the judges answer, that the statutes of Edw. 6 are over-ruled by a later statute of 1 and 2 of P. and Mary. That also, by the common law of England, where treasons are triable thereby, one witness is sufficient, especially when there are several facts of a treasonable nature, and several testimonies given in to each respective fact. But if single witnesses be not sufficient, yet still in this case of yours, besides a concurrence of circumstances, and a triplication of witnesses to several facts of the same nature, and other strong presumptions, there wants not the complete number of two or three witnesses to one and the same matter, and such as lie under no just or reasonable exception.

In the 6th place, therefore, supposing the books proved to be yours, yet you say, there might be erratas either in the dating or printing of them; and you are not to suffer for other men's errors. Here is a great weight hanged upon a small thread: you must not be admitted to be the author of such and such treasons, because there is a possibility, a very remote possibility, that you were not the author of them. You strike and wound a man that dies immediately, and have nothing to plead for yourself, but a mere distant possibility that the man might have some other mortal inward disease, of which he would have fallen down dead at the same instant, though your hand had not been upon him. This plea will not hold good; you are here the affirmant, and the proof lies on your side; you must make it appear by surgeons and physicians, that your blow was not mortal, and that there was indeed some other mortal cause, or else your mere alledged possibility will advantage you nothing at all. And if one possibility in that case will not acquit you, how should you be acquitted in this indictment, where many seditious passages in many several books are charged against you, and you have nothing to ward them all, but possibility upon possibility, that all those seditious passages might be caused by so many several mistakes of the printers, you having no proofs, nor colourable presumptions to offer, that there were indeed any such mistakes? He that affirms (whether he be plaintiff or defendant, if the matter affirmed be very important) must prove so far as he affirms, this is a rule in law and logic not to be dispensed with. And thereupon the defendant, if by good speciality it has been proved by the plaintiff, that money was lent, shall not avoid the action, by pleading payment, and satisfaction given, unless he prove and make the same evident. Away then with these toys of your printers' possible erratas! Away likewise with the possible misdating of your books! For the act of July last did not so much make as declare your books treasonable; and you know in my lord Strafford's case, when he insisted upon this, that where there was no law, there was no transgression, it was soon returned to him for answer, That endeavours to subvert settled government was against an internal law, if there were none written against it, being malum in se, not quia prohibitum; and for that reason every man in such transgressions, without written law, is a law to himself. It was also further pressed to him, that after the statute of the 25 Edw. 3, wherein treasons were specially enumerated, the parliament nevertheless had attainted divers delinquents, whose treasons were not enumerated in that statute; and it was no relief to the offenders to plead, that they had offended without warning, and were made the first examples of public severity. There is nothing more notorious than this, that the people's safety is supreme to all judicial laws, as well in order of time, as in order of nature; and that as it was the prime judicial law engraven on our breasts at the creation, so it ought to be the most fundamental law enrolled in our public treasuries.

The 7th prop of your cause is, that you are only accused and impeached for words, and by several statutes, you say, of Hen. 4, queen Mary, and queen Eliz. it is manifested, that they in those days detested the making of words or writing to be Treason. He that rightly distinguishes, rightly delivers, and teaches truth: but you relying upon a contrary art, an art of confounding things, not of distinguishing, render yourself justly suspected, that your aim is subtilly to infuse and inspire falsehoods into your disciples, not to hold forth or teach truths. You cannot but know there is sometimes a wide difference in words, yea in the same words; that some words signify more than others, and at some times sound forth greater matters than at others. For example, words in writing are more permanent, than words spoken: and words written are of a more transient nature than words printed, forasmuch as they intimate less of purpose and premeditation: and the same words spoken, written, or printed by a discontented man, or at the point of death, or directed unto persons aggrieved, carry much more weight in them, and use to make deeper impression, than they would if they had been uttered by another person, upon another occasion, unto men of another condition. Therefore the prophet, who regards some men's words no more than the crackling of thorns under a pot, or croaking of frogs in a puddle: yet likens other men's words to sharp arrows and poisoned darts, yea, and other men's counsels to the venom of asps and to the eggs of cockatrices. Adonijah had a request to present to his brother Solomon, and for the more reverence sake he would use the mediation of Solomon's mother therein: the matter also of his request was only for a wife, for a wife of ordinary parentage, who in law could have no pretension to the crown: Howsoever Solomon, who found a great danger wrapped up in this plausible supplication, distinguishes further nevertheless, and by the sentence of his oracular breast, that same design which deserved death, and was treasonable in his brother supplicating, was simple, and altogether inoffensive in his mother interceding. Achitophel was only of counsel with Absalom, we find not that he furnished horses and arms, or raised men with his manifestoes, yet doubtless his words were more pernicious to David at such a time, than the swords of ten thousand other revolvers; and David was more earnest with God to disappoint the inductions of Achitophel's tongue, than to rout and defeat all the other brigades and stratagems of his son Absalom. Tarquin, when his son consulted with him about the destruction of a neighbour state, conveyed his fatal, subversive plots by signs and dumb gestures: for even by doing execution with his staff upon the highest grown and fairest lillies in the garden, he sufficiently taught and instructed a young Traitor, to despoil a commonwealth of its most potent and most politic grandees. What Tarquin did without words or writings against a foreign enemy, may be practised nearer at home by an intestine conspirator, to the ruin of his own country, and shall we say that no law ought to take hold of such a conspirator, because his treasons did not amount to do so much as words or writings? Good Sir, study the superior laws more, and the inferior less, at leastwise when you have attained skill enough to render to every private man what is his due in chattells real and personal, make a further progress, and strive to satisfy yourself in that which is the due of the whole state, and concerns our general preservation. Monsieur Du Bartas, as he is Englished, advertises well (you may find law in verse sometimes, as well as in Littleton):

- ‘ Treasons are like the Cockatrice's eye,
- If they foresee they kill, foreseen they die.’

The story of the basilisk perhaps is not to be credited in physics, yet it affords us this wholesome mythology in politics, that when we come within any near distance of Traitors (where their designs like poisonous beams of the eye may possibly reach us,) we must expect to surprise, or be surprized, to anticipate, or be anticipated. Away then with all your niceties in law, whereby you retard justice, if our safety cannot be provided for without some incommodity of yours, nor the absolute empress of all laws be served and obeyed, without infringing some privilege of yours: you must give us leave to prefer the being of England, before the well-being of any Englishman: nay the well being of England before the being of any Englishman whatsoever. Two whole days are now consumed in one issue of yours, (whether such 'books' were yours or no) and two whole months had been consumed, if all your arguments of dilation and respite had been hearkened unto: but if such a privilege be indulged to every prisoner in cases of Treason: what unprofitable, ineffectual things will justice and judgment become in England? How will treasons like hydra's heads spring forth? whilst one delinquent is upon his trial, ten more will start up in his place: and either there will not be good judges enough, or the judges will not find time enough to arraign any considerable part of them. If words could not amount to treason, Achitophel and Adonijah would as easily purge themselves as you can, and so will a thousand other delinquents: but if you will grant that Adonijah might coach treason in an humble petition for a wife, and Achitophel do the like in his advices to his master's sons, grant also that the laws of England may be as severe against such traitors, as the laws of the Jews were. And for all your other subterfuges, except you think yourself a better pleader than that Gilonite was, you may well think his would have been as legal as your's are: grant him such a trial as you claim, and as much prolongation of time, and he will make his case as fair as your's: nay leave him to be his own judge, as you in effect challenge to be, and he will justify Absalom's defeated army, and prove them as holy martyrs, as you do your Burford brethren. Consider also, that there is now more law against you for seditious books, than there was against Adonijah for petitioning his brother: and consider withal that the laws of England now, are not therein more rigid than they were in former times. You profess yourself exact in all the body of our English law (except only in the practical formalities of it) therefore I question not, you have read Burton's Case in the 10th of Hen. 7, the *duke of Norfolk's Case in the 13th of Eliz. together with Owen's Case† in the 13th of King James: and you know these (with divers others cited against the earl of Strafford, since the beginning of this Parliament) do inform you sufficiently, that many have suffered for merely traitorous words, even when no further traitorous act or intent was proved against them. Correct therefore at last your own impudent arrogance, by taking notice that there is nothing due to you, but what is due to every man in England: and that if every man in England shall baffle law as you do, and therefore accuse the present government, of tyranny and usurpation, because it refuses to be baffled: there remains nothing but that we all dissolve into our first chaos of confusion.

Your 8th help, or strength upon which you rest, is the power of your 12 Jurors. For you first pull down the Judges from their Tribunal as mere cyphers, and as clerks that have nothing

o do, but to cry, Amen : and then into their ents you promote your 12 men, whereupon ou grow confident, that this gratification of ours, together with your condescending to be heir city brother, will bring them to your devotion, and cause them to employ their new given jurisdiction only to the advantage of the iver. We perceive hereby plainly the substance of your levelling philosophy to be briefly his : The Judges, because they understand Law, re to be degraded, and made servants to the Jurors : but the Jurors, because they understand no Law, are to be mounted aloft, where hey are to administer justice to the whole kingdom. The Judges, because they are commonly gentlemen by birth, and have had honourable education, are to be exposed to scorn :
 but the Jurors, because they be commonly mechanics, bred up illiterately to handy crafts, are to be placed at the helm. And consequently earning and gentle extraction, because they ave been in esteem with all nations from the beginning of the world till now, must be deba-sed ; but ignorance, and sordid birth must ascend the chair, and be lifted up to the most eminent offices, and places of power. Coblers must practise physic instead of doctors ; tradesmen must get into pulpits instead of di-vines, and plowmen must ride to the sessions instead of Justices of the peace. The pretence of levelling is to put all men upon an equal floor, by adding to the inferior so much as may match him with his superior, and taking from the superior so much as may match him with his inferior : and this is sufficiently heretical in policy. But the intention of our Levellers, we see, is more diametrically opposite to the order of Nature, for it leaves an inequality amongst men as great as ever ; It does not partially alter, but totally cross divine Providence, whilst it elevates that which was depressed, and depresses that which was elevated : and so makes that the head which was the foot ; and that the foot, which was the head. The turbulent Kentish spirits that followed Cade, and Tyler, as they intended the ruin of all men generously born, and qualified, so they professed their intention, and upon all occasions fell foul upon any, whom they found guilty of inkhorns and pens : but our modern perturbators intend one thing, but profess another ; their mystery is to destroy law under pretext of liberty ; and to supplant liberty under pretext of law. You, which sometimes would appear the grand patron of Law, yet at other times deride the whole profession of lawyers, revile all the benches of Justice at Westminster, spurn at statutes more than 500 years old, set at nought the wisest of our kings, and parliaments, yea and the most salubrious acts that ever our kings and parliaments passed. If any law crosses you, you break through it as great flies use to do through cobwebs : it is sufficient for you to say it was a part of the Norman yoke, or an irrational innovation : nay some of our ancient customs, such as holding up of hands at the bar, are so beyond all exception, that no man can see why they should be unsuitable to your fancy, but only because they are ancient, and bear the stamp of authority. You, a prisoner, judge and condemn your Judges for going against law : and yet nothing can be more against law, than for Judges to be so judged, and condemned by prisoners ; especially when the sense of the law also is manifestly distorted by such prisoners for upholding things illegal, and opposing things most legal. The like may be said of Liberty, that also as well as Law finds you a propugner in shew, but an impugner indeed ; you bear a buckler in one hand to defend it seemingly, but a sword in the other hand to wound it really.

 You had the breeding of an apprentice to inable you for trade, and want Latin and French to inable you for Law, or for the true understanding of its terms : yet you nevertheless must interpret Law to the Judges, and by your interpretation make them mere cyphers ; and this is your birth-right due to you, as an Englishman : when as the Judges notwithstanding, because perhaps you deny them to be Englishmen, or to have any share in your birthright, have nothing to do but to submit to your magisterial interpretation ; by your doctrine the flower of the nation must be subjected to the bran, or else Liberty cannot prosper :
 the gentleman must be ordered at the peasant's discretion, the Judge must do the mean office of a clerk, and cry Amen to the jurymen, (which all hitherto have judged villainous, and servile), or else villainous servility is introduced amongst us. But if Liberty be a public, common benefit, does it not appertain to the gentleman, as well as to the peasant, and to the Judge as well as to the Juror ? nay does it not extend to the securing, and preserving (as far as is possible), of every man in every due right ? or is there not something that is the proper interest of a gentleman quatenus a gentleman ? and of a Judge quatenus a Judge, as well as there is of a peasant quatenus a peasant, and of a Juror, quatenus a Juror ? That most excellent, harmonious eutaxy in Heaven which God himself settled from the beginning amongst the Angels, is a thing more perfect than that which we call political liberty on earth ; yet even amongst the Angels there are different thrones and pre-eminences, and though all oppression be excluded, all subordination is not. How Levelling therefore should stand with Liberty amongst men, when it stands not with that more perfect order which is amongst Angels, I cannot see : and yet Levelling itself is far more tolerable, than that extreme ataxy which our levellers seek to introduce under that more plausible name. But you bring authorities for what you say, concerning the jurisdiction of your 12 men, and cite Littleton and Coke for that purpose. All that is affirmed by Littleton and Coke is this, That in some cases the inquest may render a verdict at large upon the whole matter : that they may have cognizance of the condition of a lease, where they have cognizance of the lease itself ; that a special verdict may be given in any action, whether the issue be special, or general; that where the inquest may give a verdict at large, if they will take upon them the knowledge of the Law, they may give their verdict generally. In the application of these authorities, you rush hastily upon three gross errors. For first you strain these your authorities, to all cases and questions of law, whether easy or uneasy whatsoever, and this cannot be done without manifest violence to the words of your authors. 2dly. You strain these authorities to all Jurors whatsoever, whether they have knowledge of the law, or not: and yet the words themselves cry out against such a torture. For both Littleton and Coke are express in this, that the Jurors must be such, as take upon them the knowledge of the law. Now we know well that some cases are so plain in law, that the meanest men may understand them: and that Jurors at some times have been so chosen, that they might well take upon them the knowledge of the law in matters of greater difficulty. But he that shall conclude from hence, that all Jurors in all cases understand law, or that their verdicts ought to sway, though they understand not law, shall shew himself strangely ridiculous. For we all know, that of common tradesmen, and husbandmen, such as ordinarily use to be impanneled, there is not one of a thousand that understands law in a point of any intricacy: and we know as well that scarce any thing in the world could be more mischievous in a state, than to leave differences, and suits in law to Judges utterly ignorant, and unlearned. I make no doubt, but if our Levellers could obtrude this imposture upon the world, and procure any favourable reception for it, it would advance their cause much, and exceedingly hasten that general confusion and disorder, which they aim at, I know nothing more conducing to their ends. 3dly. You strain the word Verdict here beyond Littleton or Coke, for they only say they may give their judgment upon the whole matter; but you infer, therefore the judges are mere cyphers, therefore the judges have no right or power to deliver their judgments, therefore the determination of the judges is no way forcible or obliging. This is a Non sequitur. For though the verdict be given in upon the whole matter, and so inclose law as well as fact, yet the binding force of the verdict, as to matter of law, may be derived from the sanction, and ratification of the Judges, not from the jurisdiction of the inquest. And it may well be supposed, that the Jurors may err in matter of law, in which case the Judges must alter the erroneous verdict by a contrary judgment; and that judgment questionless shall nullify the erroneous verdict, not the erroneous verdict the judgment. Whereby it plainly appears, that in a verdict upon the whole matter there is no new jurisdiction acquired by the Jurors in matter of law, nor lost to the Judges, forasmuch as the judgment stands good, and obliges not as it is rendered by the Jurors, but as it is confirmed by the Judges.

But in case all your forces should be routed, you have yet another place of strength to retreat to; you say, 'Mens non Actus facit reum;' if the books be found yours, if the matter of the books be found treasonable, yet you having never had any treasonable intention in those books, ought to be judged according to your guiltless intention, not according to your guilty books. This rule of yours cannot be denied to hold in cases where the intention is as manifest as the Act; but in other dubious cases, where the delinquent hath no evidence for his guiltless intention, besides his own avowment, judges and juries observe it not. God therefore, before whose all-piercing eye nothing is obscure, to whom the inward intention is as visible as the outward act, judges of the act by the intention: but in human courts it is otherwise, for man cannot judge the secret intention, but by the overt act; and so where any doubt is of the intention, he leaves that, and safely passes his judgment upon the act, which proof has put out of all doubt. And therefore by God's own law, in cases of Chance Medley, where one neighbour unwittingly and unwillingly had slain another by the fall of an axe, &c. the casual delinquent was absolutely free before God's unerring tribunal above, but not so before his earthly, deceivable judges here below, for if he made not haste to exile himself from his own habitation, he remained obnoxious to the sword of the marshal. Wherefore if the innocency of the mind did no further absolve in contingent transgressions, where no testimony but the act itself came in against the transgressor: you have little reason to expect absolution in such studied, premeditated crimes as you are arraigned for, when no testimony of innocency but your own comes in for you. I have now done with all your more plausible, and specious justifications, and if I have proved most of them to be nugatory, sinewless cavillations, having only the shadow of reason, but nothing of the substance in them, blame me not for handling them under both notions. I come now to your scurrilous, opprobrious, unchristian language, wherein the detestable eruptions of your mouth (being but the envenomed, imbruted ejections of your proud heart) have violated heaven, as well as earth, conspurcated laws, as well as magistrates, and denigrated the actions of our forefathers, as well as ours of modern times. A man would think, that the abyss of hell itself had been ransacked, and rummaged for the making up of some railing, that issue almost daily from your mouth, and of some seditious passages that flow almost weekly from your pen: howsoever I will not say, as Peter said to Magus, you are in the gall of bitterness, I will only say (as I may safely) the gall of bitterness is in you. He that was the recorder of your story, as if you had been too short in your incivilities, has made his margin a supplement to help out what was wanting, and therefore to confute Mr. Nutley's testimony against you, he adds, This is an arrant lie, p. 81. And to confute judge Nicolls, he adds, What a lying judge is this Mr. Nicolls? p. 34. Also to cast an odium upon our laws, he calls our term judges, the intolerable bondage of Westminster Hall; and all proceedings in law there, Outlandish, the mere introductions of the Norman tyrant, p. 20. But you were not the penman, you only approved of this story thus being penned, and set your hand as a license for its publication. You say well, you need not to be loaded with more than what you must needs avow to be your own. Some that were absent, as the lord president, p. 12, some that were dead, as the king, p. 36, did not escape your lashes: nay, the whole army, p. 145, though not appearing at all in this business, escaped not without this brand from you, that they had twice rebelled against their creators, lords and masters. But I hasten to those that were present in court, or that were interested in the Court's proceedings. The Attorney General, though a member of the parliament, and a servitor to the state, in place and trust very eminent, is more than ten times abusively treated by you. You ask him, p. 143, What baseness is this in you to use me thus falsely? p. 114, you say he used you, as the Scribes and Pharisees did our Saviour? p. 60, You call him your prosecutor, and that in an extreme foul and dishonest way. Upon divers occasions you tax him of notorious, gross, impudent untruths. See p. 145, 142, 141, 99, 52, 17, &c. The Lord Commissioner Keble told you no prisoner had ever such favour as you put to which you answered immediately, that to disprove what he said, you could shew an hundred precedents to the contrary, p. 49, the margin has this taunt also: "Take notice the Judge stood up, and spoke out an appeal to the people." Moreover, p. 121, when he told you the Commissioners could not bear any further delays from you, you returned presently, "Will you not give me breath? if you thirst after my blood, and nothing else will satisfy you, take it presently." Your unreverence to the whole bench is incredible, sometimes you single out the Judges, as the principal members, and sometimes you discharge your rancour against the whole array of your Commissioners. P. 34, You say it is the unjustest thing in the world, that you for your life should have to do with all the Judges (who are all engaged men) that have had above six months time, with the assistance of divers parliament men your enemies, to beat their brains together against you. P. 35, "O Lord, was there ever such a pack of unjust and unrighteous judges in the world? My life is before you, you may take my blood if you please." Page 40, You make the judges greater tyrants than the king, and pray God to deliver you again and again from all such justiciaries. P. 44, "I am willing to die the object of your indignation and malice." P. 40, "Contrary to your solemn promise you make my ignorance in the formalities of law, to be the means of my destruction." You divers times call them faith-breakers, cruel, bloody men, Norman intruders; and wish your innocent blood may be charged upon them, may and upon their posterity for divers generations. You frequently tax them of surprising, circumventing, insnaring, murdering you with niceties, and panctilios. I could cite more than 20 more passages to this purpose. As for the whole court, you handle them also no less rudely. P. 146, "you oppress me first, and then go about to hang me as a traitor, for crying out of your oppression: the Lord deliver me, and every honest man from you the vilest of men." P. 148, "There was never such a trial upon English ground as this, where all the legal rights of an Englishman have been denied." P. 31, "All the proceedings hitherto have been so absolutely arbitrary, that it was impossible for me to come provided." P. 63, You make your protest against their unjust and bloody proceedings, and in other places you sometimes appeal from them to the jury, sometimes to your auditors, sometimes to all mankind, sometimes to God. Many quotations might be to this effect. Next after the court, your spiteful, exulcerated mind breaks forth extremely against the parliament, the supreme power of England. P. 146, you say you were imprisoned most unjustly by their power, without any the least shadow, or colour in law many months before their acts were made. P. 117, "It is very hard for me to contest with the present power, whose agents have free liberty to say any thing against me, whilst I am denied all the privileges of an Englishman." P. 86, when the parliament's act of treason was pressed against you, you say, as there may be counter-seit money, so there may be statutes too, and for ought you know this may be one too; and then you desire proof that these are true acts of parliament. P. 79, you except against the testimony of col. Porfroy, because a parliament-man, and so a party against you. P. 47, "Imprisonment, and many provocations were long since put upon me, to make me cry out of oppression; but to hang me therefore by a law made after the pretended crime, is not just." P. 34, "You and the parliament set us long since together by the ears with the cavaliers, to fight prettendently against their injustice." P. 31, "I have been imprisoned 7 months for nothing." P. 14, "All my enemies base, wicked petitions, papers, and books preferred against me were hugg'd, and embraced by the parliament; but my friends," p. 13, "could get no answer to their petitions, but received slights, abuses, and scorn." P. 11, "Contrary to the Petition of Right, and other wholesome laws, though there hath been 8 years' wars in England, pretendingly for preservation of law, and liberty, was I by force of arms apprehended, and proceeded against." Thus rash and harsh you are against this present parliament; and yet not only against this present parliament, for former parliaments also, as often as they side not with you, find you the same man. Ex. gratia, all the parliaments that settled, or established term judges, and commissions of Oyer and Terminer, you charge of bringing in upon us intolerable burthens, and insatiable innovations. And thus in taking upon you a censorian, and pretorian power over all laws, and law-makers, you raise yourself above all that is called God upon earth; and in so raising yourself, you affect a tyranny over us not so truly unchristian as Antichristian. Give me leave now hereupon freely to expostulate with you, and lay aside all partiality. 1. Why will you, being a private person, rise up so fiercely against the government of a state, when you see you must either perish in the design, or compass the same with so vast an effusion of other men's blood? By God's law, every soul is to be subject to the higher powers, and whosoever refuses to stand to the final sentence of the highest power, is punishable by death. Upon this account the magistrate is owned by God, as his anointed vicegerent; and the good king of Judah giving a charge to his judges before they went forth to execute his special commission of Oyer and Terminer, therefore presses them to integrity, because they were to judge for God, and not man. Our law directs you also to be tried by God and your country, but you except against that direction purposely, because you conceive God is not in the court present to pass upon you, but has only an ordinary presence there, such as he has every where. But if the judgment-seat be God's, and not man's, and if the sentence which the judges speak upon that seat be God's, and not man's, (as we must needs believe it is, if we will believe the express words of God's book) how can you deny God to have an extraordinary judicial presence in the court? a presence to try and pass upon you? for this is most plain, if God were not judicially, and extraordinarily in the court, the judges then should be said to determine for man, and not for God, to give sentence in their own names, and not as God's ministers. You will answer, that the men in present authority now at Westminster, which granted this commission, are usurpers, and we are not to look upon usurpers, or imagine that they so represent God, and do God's business, as other legal magistrates that are rightly invested by God himself. Henceunto I shall reply, that judgment in this case (whether the present parliament be rightly the supreme authority of England, or no), belongs not to you being a private person, more than it does to me, or any other man in England. You know also, that when such judgment belongs not to one private person more than to another, and the judgments of all private persons are so apparently divided, as now they are, that no one can decide without endangering the peace of all; that private person can never discharge himself of sedition, and treason, which breaks the common peace out of a fond preference of his own fancy before other men's. In England there are now some that hold the supreme authority to be in the last king's heir absolutely, and their endeavours are to bring him in upon his own terms: you and your party, hold it lawful to join with him, upon your terms, but till you join with him, and he submit to your terms, the supreme authority is not in him: We, and our side, which is now prevalent, after a long dispute in arms, hold this to be a true Parliament, and that the true Parliament is ever the supreme authority of England; and we have not only the decision of the sword (which in such like dubious cases after the last appeal hath been made to it, is as contemptible plea) but also the strongest reason, and majority of suffrages of all the people throughout the land on our side. It is your manifest regret that your party, and the royalists, though they correspond, and conspire together, cannot both counterpoise the third greater, and better party, that stands for the majesty of parliaments. You, and the royalists, have divers times endeavoured to persuade the people, that they are generally against the parliament, and by several acts, and attempts against the parliament, you have put it to the trial, whether the people would adhere to you, or the parliament; yet still the major and better part of the people have declared against you, and continued their loyalty to the parliament. The city of London, if it had been so adverse to the parliament (as was presumed by you, and the royalists both), was strong enough to master the army, (the only advantage of the parliament's you cry out upon) yet when it came to proof, would not draw a sword against the parliament: if these demonstrations will not satisfy you, but you will still plot new contentions, and study to engage the people in new bloody broils, you show yourselves to be thieves of human blood, and all your endless cavilling pretensions will not absolve you before God. Jehoiadab the priest of the royal line, and a public person, affords us an excellent example; his part was to subvert a manifest usurper, and idolatrous, and to reenthroned a true prince, of whose title there was not one man in the whole nation that could make any doubt, yet to avoid bloodshed, and the mischiefs of a dubious, open war, he divers years concealed the rightful title, and submitted to the yoke of a heathenish murderous Tyranny, making no insurrection at all, till he was able to do right to the young King, without causing any destruction of the people. How unlike are your actions to Jehoiadab's, who being no public person, nor interested extraordinarily in the present difference above any other man, will needs hazard the peace of the land against a lawful authority, when you have little hopes of effecting what you strive for, without a vast expence of blood? But in the next place, suppose the power of the parliament were indubitably usurped, as you can never prove it, (for it is still but the nation's power, and what nation ever usurped over itself?) yet by what law of God, or man; is it lawful for such a common person as you are to machinate against it? Herod had usurped over the Jews, the Romans had usurped over Herod, Caesar had usurped over the Romans, yet our Saviour shows himself submissive upon all occasions to all these powers. When he is brought before Ananias he comforts himself humbly, and acknowledges prisoner when he is laid to Caiaphas, and presented before the Jewish Counsel, he yields to be examined, and makes there such answers as he knew would be adjudged blasphemous, and capital. When he was turned over to the tribunal of Pilate the Roman Deputy, and transmitted from thence to Herod the Deputy in Galilee, he still made reverent dutiful confessions upon all legal interrogatories, though to the eminent forfeiture of his own life. Yet no man will suppose all these had a proper jurisdiction over our Saviour, or such power as was free from all force, and usurpation. All the apostles also walked in our Saviour's steps, for we read that they though innocent were examined, scourged, imprisoned, and did suffer martyrdom by magistrates in all nations under Heaven, and we read not that any one of them at any one time unreverently treated, or declined any court, or council, except it were by appeal from the inferior to the superior Judge: yet we may safely believe that some of all the states, and potentates before whom they were convened, might be liable to this exception of yours. You will say, all men in justice ought to be enemies to usurpers, and friends to such as are unduly depressed. I reply on the contrary, that private men, let the case be what it will, of their own heads, or upon their own conducts, are not to rise against a settled usurper, or enterprize any thing that may disturb the common peace: nay even public persons are to prefer the safety of the people, before any lower interest, or right, or law whatsoever. The story of Jehoiadah justifies this, during so many years as he suffered Athaliah; and the story of David also, who by right, and law, was to proceed against Jonab for murder; but the superior right, and law of common safety bound his hands many years from doing justice: and yet we cannot say therein, that the not doing of justice was the doing of injustice, inasmuch as he obeyed the superior law rather than the inferior, and chose to spare one guilty murderer, rather than to expose thousands of innocent men to the chance of war. But in the 2nd place, if you will needs suppose you have a right to pronounce this government usurped, and so justly liable to your opposition; yet why do you not then circumscribe yourself within the bounds of this government? how is it, that you assume to yourself as great a prerogative of censuring the acts of other parliaments, as you do of this, and the ordinances of our ancestors as imperiously as you do ours? If you did seem wiser in the laws of England than all the judges, and lawyers of the land, you did arrogate too much to yourself; but when you will pretend to be wiser than the laws themselves, when you will with opprobrious terms revile the legislative power of this nation, and say, that for 600 years together our ancestors, assembled in parliament, were the introducers, or continuers of foolish and slavish acts; you arrogate more to yourself, than any man till this day ever arrogated. In this you challenge the obedience due to some great, new-raised prophet, such as Mahomet pretended to be amongst the brutish Arabians; or that Vice-God at Rome, who amongst a more dementated, obdurate generation changed times, and customs at his pleasure. In the 3rd place also if you will believe that you have a dictatorial power over all times, and laws past, and present, and so may justify all that you act against them: yet why do you not act against them without such detestable cursings, odious railings, and unsavoury derisions, as your mouth is perpetually defiled with? Michael the Archangel when he was in the lists engaged against God's most rebellious enemy, broke not out into any dis-tempered expressions, nor thought it unbecoming his holy cause to pass the bounds of just reproof. It is likely Satan which found no matter in Michael worthy of reproof, was diverted by his malice into blasphemous provocations, but Michael, notwithstanding all the bitter provocations and all that matter of scandal, which abounded in his traitorous adversary, restrained himself from foul retortions. So our Saviour in the gospel died praying for his murderers, that they might obtain remission, even for that desperately flagitious cruelty, which made the earth tremble, and the sun contract his beams. Stephen also, the first disciple of our Saviour that exposed himself to martyrdom, yet in the very agony of death recommended his sanguinary persecutors to mercy. Wherefore if the Son of God, if angels, if all the apostles use blessing instead of cursing, and if all holy men still pray for their most merciless executioners instead of railing where guilt is never so evident: what is it for you to imprecate heavy judgments upon God's judges sitting on his bench to speak his sentence? And from what kind of spirit do your filthy upbraidings, and sarcasms proceed, when you pour them not only upon magistrates, but upon righteous magistrates, such as offer you no wrong, but suffer much at your hands? Certainly if these things proceed from a right Christian spirit, we must believe that the mild white dove which descended upon our Saviour in the river of Jordan, has now changed wings with the black, carnivorous raven. Paul once out of a sudden passion, and incogitancy, called an high priest "painted wall" (a term not undue to the man, though ill applied to the ruler) but being presently returned to himself, he recovered his wonted meek and patient temper; and though he had suffered a most unparalleled piece of injustice from a wicked man, he was not ashamed after to retract, and check himself publicly for deriding a wicked ruler. Tell me then seriously, is this contumelious spirit that rages in you the same that possessed Christ and his disciples? Can you imagine, that you who not only defy God's ministers of justice, in the place of judicature, and speak villifingly of the highest of powers, but also harden yourself therein, and trumpet it forth to the world, as if you had achieved thereby some glorious conquest, are of the same spirit, as those which went like sheep to the slaughter, and never opened their mouths before their sheersers? St. Paul condemns in himself an unwitting, precipitated taunt against a judge very impious and scandalous, but you think you may justly pride yourself in blaspheming many righteous judges, and this you do at such a time, in such a place, and before such an auditory, that your blasphemy must needs reach God mediately, though it strike his anointed viceregents immediately. I can say no more but this, the same thing which in your own practice makes you boast, makes me, being practised by another, tremble. Lastly, if you must have a license to oppose authority; to oppose all manner of authority, ancient as well as modern; and further, if you must be licensed to join all manner of reproaches, execrations and blasphemies to your opposition: yet what means this, that you upbraid other men most of that, which you are most apparently guilty of yourself; and for the most part asperse and calumniate those whom you take for enemies with such things, as all men know to be most apparently false? When you have insolently tyrannised over our most ancient laws, and customs, and the powers from whence they were derived; when you have pursued our high court of parliament with bitter exprobrations; when you have entertained the whole bench of your judges with such language as is only due to the basest, and worst of men; when you have obstructed the proceedings against you with the most trifling niceties, and scruples in law that ever were invented; when you have spent your strength, and tired your lungs (as yourself complains) not by pleading, but by seeking an exemption from pleading, and therefore have scarce allowed any freedom to the Court to answer you; you nevertheless complain, that all law and right has been denied to you: that it is the sworn design of the parliament to compass your life by indirect means; that your judges have insolently over-awed you; that you have been ensnared with mere punctilios, and formalities of law; that freedom of pleading hath been taken from you. Never was case more clear in the world than yours is: if there were no court to judge your books seditious, nor no testimony to prove the books yours, yet I am persuaded there is scarce a man in England that doubts of either; that very jury that pronounced you not guilty of composing those books after proof by witnesses, I am most confident did in their hearts believe you unquestionably the author of them, before they heard any witness speak at all. Violent presumptions heretofore were held ever sufficient convictions, and as good as legal testimonies, and yet though all men's consciences in your case are satisfied with violent presumptions, and violent presumptions are now seconded with competent, pregnant, abundant testimonies, that you are the author of these books: and though you yourself think not fit to deny them, yet you are not ashamed to inveigh against them, that judge you to be the composer of them. I cannot indeed imagine that thing of which you are ashamed: if you are ashamed of any thing, it is the absolute denial of your books, for which you are indicted; but I am persuaded it is some other respect, and not shame, that makes you abstain from that denial. You seem frontless enough, when you cry out upon your envy, contemned judges for intrapping; and oppressing you: but when you cry out upon their snares, and oppressions at the same time that you call them shadows, and non-entities, upbraid them as Norman intruders, denounce against them as wilful, perjured murderers, and in very deed make yourself a judge at the bar, and arraign them as your prisoners on the bench; you seem more impudent than impudence itself: your want of blushing is enough to make not only friends, but even strangers, and opposites, to blush for you. But you that acknowledge no law, unless it be consonant to your own humour, and unless it receive its obliging force from your sanction, how can you offend? And you that cannot offend, why should your face be stained with that ordinary tincture of modesty that blushes other men? Human rules and precedents are all liable to your condemnation: if you say they are irrational, or savour of innovation, that is sufficient to over-rule them: and as for Divine Authorities, it is in your breast to interpret them, and no man's else, whereupon they are made Lesbian rules to you, and they must not conform, but must be conformed to your judgment, ex. gra. The four Evangelists testify, that our Saviour being presented in judgment before divers tribunals, made such pleas, and confessions as drew on upon himself a capital sentence, and were the only evidence, that either the Jews had to condemn him of blasphemy, or the Romans of sedition. You nevertheless say, that our Saviour by silence avoided the danger of his examiners, and left you a warrant thereby to conceal your guilt from the judges, and to evade that danger of condemnation which the prescription of our laws would else entangle you in. When the States Attorney General presses you for an answer to his proofs, and not mere allegations, which make you the author of seditious books: you more than once aver, that our Saviour shook off his interrogatories with an eluding answer; and therefore in imitation of Christ you say, 'Thou Mr. Prideaux affirmest, I am the author of seditious books, but prove it if thou canst.' This is rough handling of human magistrates, and laws, but this is worse handling of inspired writers, and worst of all is the false gloss you set upon our Saviour's actions. Our Saviour being demanded by Caiaphas, in the counsel of the Jews. Whether he were the Son of God, or no, according to Matthew and Luke, returned answer, 'Thou sayest it'; and Mark repeating the same answer, makes it a pure affirmation, or an assent affirming what the high priest said; for Mark's relation, which must be the same as the other evangelists' was, answers positively and fully to the question, 'I am the Son of God.' Secondly, All these evangelists record this further of our Saviour, that immediately after his answer to the high priest, he proceeded to tell the council, that they themselves should one day see him sitting on God's right hand, and so be convinced of that now they would not believe. 3dly, The council understood our Saviour's answer to be affirmative and positive; for upon that answer, according to all the evangelists, he was instantly condemned of blasphemy, from the confession of his own mouth. Neither did our Saviour, being examined before Pilate concerning his regal interest, give an evading answer. Pilate's question was, 'Art thou a king?' Our Saviour's answer was, 'Thou sayest it.' But to shew that this was a positive affirmation of the thing questioned, our Saviour added immediately, 'To this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness unto the truth.' And we find that Pilate doubted not of our Saviour's meaning, whether it were affirmative or elusive. This is therefore an high violation of divine authority, that you shall call those answers and pleas of our Saviour dilatory and fallacious, which the evangelist makes to be so plain, and the Jewish and Roman magistrates both entertained as so positive; and that you should flatly say, our Saviour patronized obstinate silence in all delinquents, and therefore would not reveal truth, when he says directly of himself, that he was born, and sent into this world to bear witness to the truth. 4thly, How can you imagine that our Saviour's silence to some impertinent questions was any justification of your not pleading, when our Saviour had not the same reasons of silence, as you and other delinquents have and pretend for? For, first, our Saviour was guilty of nothing which, in justice, could take away his life, or expose him to any other the least lash of the law. If you will believe the Roman judge, before whom he was tried, he was convicted, and thrice laboured to save him, knowing that the Jews, of envy, prosecuted against him; and being driven to wash his hands of so foul and murderous a sentence, argued with the Jews, that he had not only examined him himself, and found no capital delinquency in him, but had also sent him to Herod, and by Herod he was also sent back acquitted. This makes our Saviour's case very different from yours. 2dly, Our Saviour knew his doom was unavoidable, and so he could not make use of silence upon the same grounds as you do. 3dly, Our Saviour's silence was not obstinate, against any clear law, as yours is. 4thly, It was not general or continual. When he was questioned, either about his divinity or regality (things questionable in law) he gave direct answers; and even when he was questioned extravagantly about his disciples, or the nature of truth, or his doctrine, after some space of modest silence, he gave reasons for his silence; he told them, they were resolved before hand not to believe him, and that he had always taught openly, and not in corners, so that the testimony of his auditors and spectators would be more proper in matters of that nature than his own. Hereupon Pilate received satisfaction, as also Herod, though all their impertinent questions were not presently answered. And when Pilate washed his hands before the people, in token of his innocency, and pleaded earnestly for his enlargement more than once or twice, he told the people plainly, that Herod, to whom he had sent him to be examined, had sent him back again, being of his judgment, and finding nothing worthy of death in him. Lastly, If our Saviour had refused to answer Caiphas, Herod, and Pilate, who had not due jurisdictions over him, this affords no plea nor patronage for your peremptory silence: forasmuch as our Saviour was a king de jure, though he would not take upon him the office of a king de facto; and it may be believed, that in some acts of his he did transcend the capacity and condition of a mere private person, in which he is not imitable by you. I shall infer, therefore, that you, when you cite our Saviour's example and practice, to justify your opposing judges and laws, and to smother treason and frustrate judgment, contrary to that which is asserted by all the evangelists, you do blasphemously and impudently make God the countenancer of sin, that you may make man the apter to sin against God.

The 5th and last matter of scandal in your book, is, your double dealings with the Jury; for though your 12 men are most religiously obliged to bring in a verdict without favour or fear, you nevertheless endeavour both ways to force them from their religious obligations as well by terror, as by arts of embracery. On one side, you are their brother, citizen, a great honourer doubtless of your city matriculation: some of them you know to be honest men, as you are a profound metaphysicist, there are lineaments of honesty drawn in their very faces, and the whole array of them has this proferment from you, that they were the only supreme dispensers of justice in England, and that the judges that sit aloft in scarlet robes, are but clerks to say Amen to their verdicts: and this you pronounce as a more profound jurist. On the other side, lest these gentle stroakings should not sufficiently win upon them, you place some hundreds of your myrmidons behind in ambuscado, who are ready to break forth with mighty hums, and acclamations, at the closing of your Defence, and before the attorney general enters upon his Reply. You did conjecture, doubtless that your 12 jurors, half of them being congregated out of Chick Lane, Picket-lane, and the other suburbs of Smithfield, without one butcher amongst them all, would be apt to shrink at such a new, unexampled impression. Forcetimes would have looked strangely upon such attempts, and such divers assaults made upon a jury: but in you all, frauds and riots are pious and plausible, so they may achieve to you a conquest over your opposites; nay in all your surprisals and oppressions of other men, you must have leave to complain, that you are surprized, oppressed, and cut off from all right by a state of conspirators.

Sir, I could now let the reins of my discourse looser, and take occasion to range further, (for since the writing, and printing, of this letter, I have seen some other additions, and supplements of yours, or your friends, about your trial, and I may perhaps hereafter animadvert upon them: But I will not at present pursue you too far; I will rather choose to give myself a sudden stop.

The angels that fell from Heaven had nothing to seduce them unto so desperate a revolt besides their own excellent natures; there was not in heaven any other object that could tempt, or pervert them. Had they dutifully and piously limited their contemplations to the transcendent blessedness, and infinite perfection of their Creator, they had not so fondly enamoured themselves, upon themselves, nor dazzled their own eyes with their own created beauty: but when their eyes were once dazzled with objects less amiable, their devotions were easily alienated from objects more amiable, and that alienation in them was most ungracious, and damnable. Neither did excessive, doating self-love only exile the angels out of Heaven, but also, men out of paradise; for Adam likewise, judging himself nearest to himself, and so thereupon confining all his passions, or the supreme sway of his affections, to himself, erroneously thought himself worthy of an equality with his Maker: and so not laying to heart the greatness and goodness of God, but blinding himself with an undue zeal to his own person, he most unnaturally made himself God's rival, as if he himself were capable of divine knowledge, or God deducible to human imbecility. It is not worth inquiry, whether Adam's will first darkened: his understanding, or his understanding first captivated his will: we know Adam had the principle of knowing, and the principle of affecting good in an eminent degree: and that he sinned against both those principles when he valued a finite, derivative, obliged excellency in himself above infinite, original, obliging excellency in his God. For in the conception, and birth of sons, it often happens, that at the same time the understanding contracts darkness from the fictitious vehemence of the will: and the will contracts obstinacy from obscurity in the understanding. And I think, we may safely believe that Adam's understanding was too inactive, and remiss at the same instant, for that it did not further improve, and feed the will by sublime, restless contemplations: and at the same instant that his will, having already received so much light from the understanding, was too cold and unaspiring, for that it did not will out of solid solids from objects more glorious, and to that end recollect eagerly the understanding for profounder illuminations. Such was the origination, and semination of sin in Adam, and such is still the tradition and propagation of sin in Adam's posterity: there is no difference but this: we are not guilty of our own sins only which we daily commit ourselves, as we naturally partake of Adam's frailties, and are left obnoxious to a thousand new temptations thereby; but also of his first transgression, as we were morally engaged in the same covenant, and so left obnoxious to the same punishment. We remain therefore all far more apt now, than he was, to adore ourselves, and to circumscribe our own blind affections within the circle of our own excellencies: and this is so eminent in some men, that ignorance no sooner begets arrogance in them, than arrogance begets impudence: and impudence begets wilfulness, and an outrageous hardness in malice. Sir, if you who know yourself to be of Adam's race, would deal strictly with yourself, and impartially enquire into the cause that makes you so far to postpone all powers, laws, professions of men to yourself, and most immodestly to boast of those things in yourself, which you would disdain in other men, and which other men think as disdainable in you: you would soon discover your self-love had quite put out your eyes, and then betrayed you into the ambuscadoes of all those daring sins that use to fight under the banners of violent insolence, and of uncontrolled impudence. The main canker that festers inwardly, and infects your most retired thoughts, is this, that you see other men promoted in the commonwealth to places of honour and power before you, whereas you in worth, and value, promote yourself far before them, nay, and all others whatsoever: and this gross error does not only swell you into disdain, and malice implacable against other men, but also inflames you towards yourself with arrogance intolerable, and arms you with immodesty most unmanageable. You ought here to consider, that as to other men you are no competent judge of their parts and deportments, more than every other private man in England is: and when you see so many other men in England give a contrary judgment to yours, you ought to suspect your own judgment rather than to despise theirs. It is well known who those men are, that are most obnoxious to your emulation: and let but their enemies judge, let their most conjured foes give sentence in this cause, whether they deserve your emulation, or no: and even they will contradict you herein, and tell you that they fear, and admire, what you deride, and rail upon. Then as to yourself, whom you adore, and court as the most exquisite piece of mankind, and upon that account censure whole professions, whole states, nay and whole ages not complying with your fancy: you ought to consider, that of all men, you are the most incompetent judge in your own case. Omit those whom you repute now your diametrical enemies, though they are the major, and etter part of the nation, and ask the royal-its, (whom you look upon as your late adopted riends) or any others unconcerned, if you conceive there are any such: ask them what value hey set upon you, and doubtless they will be old to tell you, that you are an incendiary and novator; as far short of Perkin Warbeck, as ou are beyond Wat. Tyler. I know there is a arty of your adherents, that seek to foment hese prodigious high conceits in you: and hey perhaps may amount to some ten, or wenty thousand heads in all: but if my intel-igence fails not exceedingly, the greatest part f them consists of women, boys, mechanics, and the most sordid sediment of our plebeians, and only some few are royalists, or turbulent evellers, who rather make use of your fury, han admire your policy; and employ you as an nstrument, rather than follow you as a head.

 But if you think men, whether friends, enemies, or neutrals, are apt to deceive, and as apt to be deceived, and therefore unfit witnesses, or informers in this case, fix your thoughts more studiously upon things: consider your own ways, and positions, as I have here more nakedly presented them to your view. You see your main endeavour is, to open a way, and maintain, that any private, single person may dispute, nay damn any command, law, custom, or power whatsoever, and lawfully frame parties to abet him in his disturbance of the common peace by any means whatsoever:
 that the diffusive, or rather confusive body of the people may be appealed unto, by malcontents in any common cause, although it be so vast a body that it is scarce to be congregated, or rightly ordered, or consulted with in any one place, or at any one time, when some one fundamental point is to be assented unto, or dissented: and much less is it fit for the ordinary administration, and exercise of rule in ordinary cases, as often as private men shall find themselves aggrieved: that all study of law and policy is mischievous, and therefore the judgment of all difficulties, and difference ought to be expected from unlettered mechanics, plebeians, not from such as are nobly descended, such as have been versed in state-business all their days, and such as have made law their study from their youth: that the nation ought not to have any one common place of resort for justice, such as Westminster-Hall is: but for the better cantonizing of the commonwealth, and dissecting it into several independent (and by consequence repugnant) bodies, in each county there ought to be a several tribunal: in which tribunal the most ignorant and meaner faces of the multitude ought to possess the highest chair: that popular liberty ought to be enlarged beyond all rational political bounds, so that no private subject ought to pay any tax for defraying the public charge, unless it stand with his own liking: nor ought any felon, or traitor, be examined, or he'd to any form of trial, further than it shall please his own humour. These are the crude traditions which your levelling sect abides by: now let not only those which have been bred under English laws, but let all other nations that imbrace the Roman civil Institutes embodied by Justinian, nay let Heathens, Turks, Jews, let all men of former ages, as well as of this present, declare, if any thing can be invented more destructive to society, and the congregative-disposition of mankind, than these traditions are. No more need be said, if you profess the subversion of your country, and a general enmity to the kind of man, your philosophy must be beld impious, though not stolid: but if you propose these things for the good of your country, and your kind, you will be held, as stolid, as impious:

 but what shall I say? in case self-love has wholly dementated you, all that I can press will be to no purpose, neither can the various testimonies of men, nor the irrefragable evidence that shines out of common maxims, nor the experience of all ages, convince you, that you are to credit any thing besides yourself.
 What your present temper is therefore, whether flexible by counsel, or inflexible, I cannot tell:
 but I must needs tell you this: for a close of all.
 Since you have acted your part so outrageously, it leaves an offence, and a regret too upon me: that your commissioners should act so tenderly: that the jury should act so disloyally; and that London should be the scene, where hands should be clapt so unworthily.

P. S. Sir, I had sooner dressed, and speeded these my plain, friendly animadversions, had I been in England at your arraignment, or if I had sooner recovered my health after my coming into England: therefore let not delay and the interposition of so many months expose me to your mis-interpretation. I had also kept these papers from the press, had you only been concerned in them; but when my second thoughts suggested to me, that I was bound not to reprove you alone, but your abettors, and partakers also, and that the charity of my reproof ought not only to extend to the conviction of you, and yours, but also to the confirmation of all your dissenters, I was induced to make them public: wherefore pray, let this apologise for me in that behalf. Adieu.

Yours in the bonds of Christianity. H. P.

Lilburne was afterwards, January 30, 1652, banished by the Parliament, and went away on January 28, but returned the 14th June 1653, for which he was tried at the Old Bailey, upon the late Act for his Banishment, the 20th August following, but was acquitted by the Jury, for which they were examined before the Council of State; for which Trial and examination, see No. 193.
